We may take this opportunity of bringing to notice another great grievance which the Mahomedans as a body feel in the Title of Shamsul-Ulama having been most thoughtlessly conferred upon certain learned members of the Parsee community. The Title was created for recognizing eminent services of Mahomedans in the promotion of Oriental (which was all along understood to be Arabic) learning. It is therefore difficult to understand by what rhyme or reason, it was conferred upon Parsees (however eminent they may be in the learning of their Pehlvi literature), who do not know a word of Arabic, and probably do not even understand the meaning of the title Shamsul-Ulama. With equal or perhaps greater justice they might have been made Mahamahopadhyayas, seeing the sororial relations between the Sanscrit and the Pehlvi, and knowing too that the Guzerati language, in which the Parsees are known to be proficient, is an offshoot of Sanscrit.

We do not think that it was ever intended by the "resolution" above quoted, to allow the Parsees to participate in those Titles.

If the Government considered it desirable to honor the most learned of the Parsees with some such Title, a separate Title ought to have been created for that community. Their elders would like to have it in homely Gujrati. At present, they do not know what to do with this sounding Arabic business—Shamsul Ulama. They certainly cannot relish it. They are not sure whether, instead of being honoured, they are not made the standing butt of ridicule. They feel much as the junior members of the Raj families of Behar felt when Lieutenant-Governor Sir Geo. Campbell offered to raise them from Baboos to Mirzas.

THE ORIGIN OF THE RIOT OF 16TH MAY.

District 24 Pergunnahs.

In the Court of the Sub-Judge of the 24 Pergunnahs.

Present Babu Radha Krishna Sen, Sub-Judge.

The 30th April 1891.

Suit No. 43 of 1890.

Suresh Chandra Deb ... Plaintiff.

VERSUS.

Sheik Aliar ... Defendant.

The plaintiff has purchased 10 cottas of land situated in Mouzah Goureepore from one Sreenath Mitter by a kobala dated the 22nd August 1889 and he sues to eject the defendant from 6 cottas 6 chittaks of the said land on the allegation that the defendant had been holding it from the time of his vendor as a tenant at will and that though a notice to quit was served upon him on the 31st December 1889 he has not given up the land. He also claims rent from the month of Kartik to the month of Magh 1296 and damages for the use and occupation of the land from the 1st Falgun 1296 up to the date of the delivery of possession.

The defendant objects to the court fee paid, and contends that the suit cannot proceed under Sec. 44, C. P. C., that no notice was served upon him, that the notice alleged to have been given is insufficient and illegal, that out of the 6 cottas 6 chittaks of land mentioned in the plaint, there stands a musjid or mosque on about 2 cottas of land, the same having been erected about 25 or 26 years ago by him (the defendant) and 30 or 32 other Mahomedans of the locality, with considerable labour and expense, that neither the plaintiff nor his vendor ever objected with regard to the musjid and that after this long lapse of time and acquiescence, the plaintiff is not entitled to take khas possession of the land on which the musjid stands.

The issues raised are

1. Has there been a defect of party in this suit?
2. Does section 44, C. P. C. apply to this suit?
3. Did the plaintiff serve the defendant with a notice to quit? If so, is it legally valid?
4. Is it true that the defendant has given up the disputed land with the exception of 2 cottas, on which a pucca musjid stands, since the month of Chaitra last?
5. Is the plaintiff entitled to take khas possession of the said 2 cottas of land on which the musjid stands?
6. Is the plaintiff entitled to recover rents and damages claimed?

Judgment.

There is no evidence to show save the statement of the defendant himself that the musjid was erected by public subscription. On the contrary it would appear from the testimony given by the defendant's vendor Sreenath Mitter and his brother that it was the defendant who erected the musjid though he has allowed it to be used by other Mahomedans for offering prayers and celebrating festivals.

2. The exception (a) to sec. 44, C. P. C. shows that arrears of rent may be claimed in a suit for the recovery of immovable property, but as no permission was taken from the court to join therein a claim for damages, I think this claim should be disallowed.

3. The service of notice upon the defendant has been satisfactorily proved by the evidence of the plaintiff and the pleader's mohurer, and the fact that the defendant immediately after took steps to remove almost all the rooms from the land, clearly shows that he had received the notice and complied with the plaintiff's demand to quit the land to a great extent. He was a monthly tenant of a piece of land not used for agricultural or horticultural purposes and, under section 106 of the Transfer of Property Act, was only entitled to 15 days' notice expiring with the end of a month. In this case however the notice was served on the 31st December 1889, corresponding with the 17th Pous 1296 and the defendant was required to quit the land on or before the expiry of the month of Magh following. As to the local custom pleaded that the tenancy should be terminated at the end of the year, we have no evidence whatever. This issue must therefore be decided in favour of the plaintiff.

5. The defendant has no doubt removed the other rooms and the plaintiff says that only the musjid and some *beras now stand on about 2 cottas of land. Evidently the defendant has only partially complied with the notice and there has not been a complete evacuation of the land. The musjid seems to have been erected by the defendant about the year 1876 or 1877 and not about 25 or 26 years ago as alleged by him in his written statement. It is doubtful whether its walls are made of bricks, for the defendant's lessor Sreenath Mitter says that it consists of mud walls raised with small bricks and it has a tiled roof. I cannot therefore say that it is a house of a very substantial character though it has been plastered and has a pucca chatal or platform over which some cement has been spread. The defendant was admittedly a monthly tenant liable to be removed from the land at any moment and he does not contend that he had any permanent interest in it. If he therefore chose to lay out some money and erect a musjid on a portion of the land, he did so at his own risk, and nothing has been brought out in evidence to show that his lessor by his conduct led him to believe that he would be allowed to occupy the land on which it stands permanently. All that Baboo Srinath Mitter and his brother state is that they did not object after they came to know that the room was to be used as a musjid. They however distinctly state that when the walls were being erected they did not know that the room was to be used as a musjid. As to the law on this point it was clearly laid down by the High Court in the case of Piosanna Kumari Debya vs. Sheik Ratan Byaparee that a holding at will cannot be converted into a permanent tenure simply because a tenant without any arrangement with his landlord chooses to build a house upon the land demised(?) and the facts disclosed in this case are not such as to bring it within the purview of the ruling reported in 8, I. L. R., Cal., p. 960. As to the case reported in I. L. R., Bombay 15, p. 71, it is rather an authority against than in favour of the defendant, and I do not know why it has been cited on his behalf.

6. I have already observed that the plaintiff is entitled to recover rent, and the defendant admits that he used to pay rent at the rate of Re. 1-2 per cottah. Consequently the rent of 6 cottas 6 chittaks of land would be Rs. 7-2½ annas per month and the rent from Kartik to Magh would be Rs. 28-9 annas as stated in the plaint.

ORDERED.

That the suit be decreed in favour of the plaintiff who will recover khas possession of the land sued for, by ejecting the defendant therefrom. The latter will remove the musjid and everything standing on the said land within 15 days from this date and pay Rs. 28-9 annas on account of the arrears of rent together with the costs of the suit and interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, up to the date of realization.

REPORT ON THE DRAINAGE OF CALCUTTA.

By Baldwin Latham, Mem., Inst., C.E., Mem., Inst. M.E., F.G.S., I.S.S., F.S.I., President of the Royal Meteorological Society.

TO THE CHAIRMAN OF THE CORPORATION.

21. The present volume of the dry weather flow of sewage at Calcutta is a very variable quantity largely influenced by percolation or leakage into the sewers. The average water supply for last year, as given by Mr. Kimber's report, was 44.4 gallons, or 7.104 cubic feet per head per day; this quantity is a very large supply considering it is an intermittent supply distributed over 14 hours of the day, and should the supply be made constant under the existing arrangements, the volume per head per day would be much larger, probably rivaling the quantity supplied to some American cities. There appears to be no means of checking waste of water which, as far as I have seen, is constantly going on all over the city.

In the amalgamated area I am of opinion that provision should be made in the new sewers for taking 7 cubic feet per head per day of sewage from the future population, allowing one-half of this quantity to reach the sewers in six hours, or in other words, the sewer should be large enough to take 14 cubic feet per head per day from the future population. The full quantity of rainfall and sewage together from the amalgamated area, may be taken at 27 cubic feet per minute for each 1,000 persons of the future population of the district.

22. To sewer the south and south-eastern portion of your added district, it will be necessary to pump part of the sewage twice. One pumping station would be located south of Tolly's Nullah, and the other pumping station would be the general pumping station for the whole of the district, so that only one additional pumping station will be required for the added area. A considerable augmentation of the power will, however, be required at the present pumping station. The main sewer for draining the added district should have its invert level at both the pumping stations at about two feet below datum.

I have laid down the sewers on a plan and section, but it must be understood that these lines may be modified to meet any local requirement. All that area of the city between the Circular Road and the canal which is severed into separate blocks by deep storm overflows from the Circular Road sewer so far as it can be drained by gravitation on the principles laid down, so that the sewers are not to be water-logged may be drained to the Circular Road sewer. But if proper drainage cannot be accomplished in this way, my opinion being that it cannot, then each block ought to have its sewage automatically pumped into the Circular Road sewer, the power for this purpose being transmitted from the main pumping station by means of high pressure water which will supply the cheapest and most sanitary method of transmitting power and removing the sewage. The water that has been used for transmitting the power, can be subsequently used for flushing the sewers. The fringe area abutting on the southern part of the Circular Road can be drained as far as possible by gravitation to the Circular Road sewer, or it may be dealt with like the canal area, but the best course will be to drain it into the proposed new sewer that has been designed to receive the sewage from this area. An additional outfall sewer will be required to take the sewage from the main pumping station to the proposed combined channel that will convey it to the Biddiadhury River.

23. The population to be provided for in a new system of sewers, is always a difficult problem to determine, as some districts are liable to considerable fluctuation in their population, while in others, the population remains stationary, or is even declining. The census now being taken in Calcutta will in all probability give some interesting facts, but that I think we may safely conclude that Calcutta of the future is not likely to be less in population than the Calcutta of the present, and I am of opinion that provision should be made at the outfall works for a future population of the united district of 8,50,000 persons made up as follows :—

Calcutta town	...	Estimated population	5,60,000
Fort William	...	"	5,000
Canal area	...	"	35,000
Eastern and southern district	"	"	2,50,000

Total population ... 8,50,000

24. I have heard it mooted that the present method of disposing of the sewage in the direction of Salt Lake is at times a great nuisance to the city, and the following quotation from Mr. Blandford's work on the climate of India very forcibly expresses what has been explained to me by other persons. Speaking of Calcutta he says—"Easterly winds are most frequent in the early hours of the morning, chiefly in October and November, and are too often tainted with the unsavoury exhalations from Calcutta sewage and refuse which are discharged in that direction in the borders of the Salt Lake." In order to determine the influence of the direction of the wind Mr. Kimber has had taken out for me the relative frequency of all the winds and calms observed at Calcutta for a period of eleven years with the following result :—

N	Direction of wind	...	Percentage of frequency	14'49
N-E	"	"	"	6'35
E	"	"	"	6'92
S-E	"	"	"	10'54
S	"	"	"	20'66
S-W	"	"	"	20'31
W	"	"	"	8'89
N-W	"	"	"	10'03
Calms	"	"	"	1'81

10'000

From the foregoing observations it will be seen that, even supposing a nuisance to be created by the discharge of the sewage, the point of outfall selected is decidedly the best, having regard to the relative frequency, and proportionately small number of times the winds blow from the direction of the present outfall located to the east and south-east of the city. I am of opinion that the sewage in this case is unjustly charged with creating the nuisance. No doubt a nuisance does exist in the mode the refuse from the city is disposed of in the square-mile lying to the east of the city, but a still greater nuisance exists at the knacker's establishment in the neighbourhood of the outfalls, the effluvia from which is most disgusting, and is distinctly perceptible at a considerable distance.

25. It does not appear that any nuisance is created by the present discharge of Calcutta sewage into the Biddiadhury River, for a personal examination of this stream from the look at Dhappa down to below the proposed new outfall and back, shewed that the river teemed with fish life, a condition of things that could not occur in any tidal channel that contains oxidizable organic matter even in moderate amount. It is certain no smell or malaria can be eliminated from water mixed with sewage which contains healthy fish life; therefore as at present no pollution of the waters occurs, no necessity at present exists for making any diversion of the sewage, for the water into which the sewage is poured, is not likely to be used for drinking purposes as it is decidedly salt.

26. A proposal has been made to make a new sewage outfall into the Biddiadhury River at a point some distance lower down than the present outfall. In order to ascertain what the probable effect of removing the sewage outlet lower down the river would be, I requested Mr. Kimber to have some experiments made with proper floats so as to ascertain what was the strength of the current at various periods of the tide from the point of the proposed new outfall.

It will be seen from the figures that the strength of the flood-tides tending to bring sewage up the river is greatly in excess of the downward movement. The reason for this is obvious as the river fills under a full head due to the tidal waters being brought up a narrow channel, but being diffused over the large area of Salt Lake, a loss of head occurs which retards the downward rate of flow. The relative time of flood and ebb-tide varies considerably, probably the true length of the flood-tide is about 4·6 hours, while the length of the ebb-tide is about 7·8 hours. Taking the most favourable condition for discharge at the proposed new outfall or for the sewage put in at the top of the ebb-tide, it would flow down the river on an average 10·812 miles, and be brought back up the river 11·468 miles, or it would be taken 1·656 miles higher up the river than the point it was put in. Sewage put in at the same point at between one-third and half-ebb would flow down the river 4·937 miles, and return up the river 8·937 miles, or it would be brought to a point four miles above the place at which it was put in. At low water any sewage put in at the site of the proposed new outfall would at once run up to Dhappa lock, a distance of 6·75 miles from the proposed site of the new outfall in a time varying from 3 hours 35 minutes to 4 hours 50 minutes.

In speaking here of sewage returning it must be understood that what would return is not sewage; as the sewage will be destroyed in the tidal waters, but the remains of sewage, or as it has been not inappropriately termed "skeleton sewage."

27. There being such a preponderance of flow on the flood-tides, it may be asked how can sewage or "skeleton sewage" possibly get out of the river. The answer is it gets out very quickly by mixing action, just as sea water is brought up the river by mixing action, so is fresh water, and sewage carried down the river very much more quickly than by the ordinary flow of the river. It will be noted that in this case that tidal water containing sea water is brought up the river on a single tide to this proposed outfall—a distance of about 100 miles. Yet the actual tidal current that enters the mouth of this river from the sea would probably not flow up the river for a greater distance than one-eighth the length of the river, yet in this case by mixing action and tidal impulse a part of the salt water of the sea is transferred up the whole length of the river. In the case of the river Thames I had the entire charge and responsibility of all the investigations made by the Corporation of the City of London and laid before the Royal Commission on Thames Sewage Discharge. These investigations shewed that the "skeleton sewage" travelled very much faster out of the river by mixing action than by displacement due to the ordinary flow of the river, and with proper surveys of the channels below Calcutta, it would not be difficult to determine the exact rate of progress of the sewage out to sea. The more completely a tidal channel empties the more quickly will mixing action carry away the mixed tidal water and sewage. The channel of the Biddiadhury River into which the sewage of Calcutta now discharges is very favorable for the rapid removal of the sewage by mixing action.

28. When I examined the river on the 21st February last, I caused two samples of the water to be taken, one at the proposed site of the new outfall and the other at the present storm-water outlet into the river. The lower of these samples, when examined by Dr. Simpson, gave 385 parts of chlorine in 100,000 parts of water, while the sample taken higher up the river gave 310 parts of chlorine in the same quantity. The sea waters of the Bay of Bengal probably contain 1,900 parts of chlorine in 100,000 parts of water, this being so the relative amount of "skeleton sewage" in the river at the proposed point of the new outfall as against the present point of discharge of the storm sewage of Calcutta, will be in the proportion of 1,515 for the lower point against 1,590 for the upper station or a difference of not quite 5 per cent.

29. There is also another point to be considered in connection with the tidal outlets. I have already mentioned that the presence of fish life throughout the river clearly shews that the sewage, as at present discharged, does no harm to the river at the point at which it is put in. It is known that sea and tidal waters contain a large amount of oxygen, as much as is contained in pure river water. Now in the case of Calcutta, on the average of two tides, I found over 950,000 cubic feet per minute of tidal water passing up the river from the point of the proposed new outfall. This would give in the short period of the flood-tide a dilution of about 150 parts of tidal water for one of sewage, and the daily amount of oxygen brought up the river, and available for the oxidation of the organic matters of sewage would not be less than 150 tons.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

"NON ANGLI SED ANGELI."

BY THE LATE MR. MARTIN TUPPER.

HO ! ye swift messengers out of the north,
Mercy's ambassadors—haste to go forth !
Speedily let your broad sails be unfurled,
Winging your errand all over the world,
Wafting your message of peace and goodwill,
Brotherhood, godliness, science, and skill !

Ye are the salt of the earth, and its health—
Ye are its gladness, its wisdom, and wealth—
Ye are its glory ! O Britain, thy sons,
Thy stout Anglo-Saxons, thy resolute ones,
Ever triumphant on every shore,
Are only triumphant for good evermore !

Ministers bright of the bounties of God,
Where is the land by these angels untrod ?
Tell it out, Africa, China and Scinde,
And Isles of the Sea and the uttermost Inde,
Tell out their zeal, and their grandeur of soul,
From the stands of the line to the snows of the pole !

Tell out the goodness, the greatness, the grace,
That follow their footsteps in every place !
Tell it out, thou, the first cradle of man,
Teeming with millions, serene Hindostan—
Tell how fair commerce, and just-dealing might Have blest thee with peace, and adorned thee with light !

Boundless Australia, help of the age,
And heirloom of hope on Futurity's page,
Lo ! thy vast continent, silent and sad,
With the song of the Saxon has learnt to be glad ;
Rejoicing to change the wild waste and the fen
Into wide-waving harvests and cities of men !

Mighty Columbia, Star of the West,
See, 't is a world by the Saxon posset !
Glorious and glad, from the north to the south,
Your millions praise God with an Englishman's mouth,
And all love a land where at home they would be,
England, old England, the home of the free !

Dotted about on the width of the world,
Her beacon is blazing, her flag is unfurled ;
Not a shore, not a sea, not a deep desert wild,
But pays its mute homage to Energy's child—
Not a realm, not a people, or kingdom, or clan,
But owns him the chief of the children of man !

The foaming Atlantic hath rendered its isles,
And the dark Caribbean its tropical smiles,

And the Southern Pacific those many-hued flowers,
And Europe's mid-ocean these temples and towers,
Their tribute the seas of old India bring,
And Borneo is proud of her new British king !

Yes ! for dear Britain, the mother of Men,
Rules all, under God, by the sword and the pen :
She is the Delphi, the heart of the earth,
The rock-rushing spring of humanity's worth,
And, if two hemispheres prosper, the cause
Lies in old England's religion and laws !

Yes ! for her realm is the Goshen of light ;
The wings of these angels have scattered the night !
Duteous and daring, as beauteous and strong,
They are helpers of right and avengers of wrong,
Fair in their souls as their eyes and their locks,
Stout in their hearts as their oaks and their rocks !

THE FALLEN STAR.

FROM THE GERMAN OF SALLET.

KNOW ye what it meaneth,
When looking up on high,
Ye see a star deserting
The regions of the sky ?

Those orbs above us, shedding
Their softened light around,
Are myriad bands of angels,
With wreaths of glory crowned.

All true and faithful warders,
Wide scattered through the sky,
On earth whatever passes,
They mark with watchful eye.

And when, within our borders,
In fervent faith and love,
A good man, bowed by sorrow,
Looks up for aid above,

And prays unto the Father,
In agony of woe,
Then quickly there departeth
A messenger below,

Who gildes with beam so cheering,
Within the silent room,
And soothes to gentle slumber
The mourner's heavy gloom.

This, this is what it meaneth,
When looking up on high,
Ye see a star deserting
The region of the sky.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

IT is said that English women are getting taller, while the men are falling in height. We believe the fact was always so, only the women did not know it and allowed the men to rob and oppress them. It is sufficiently hinted at in such expressions as the grey mare is the better horse.

IF it is still an impossibility to minister to a mind diseased, it has been the privilege of a French surgeon to minister to a brain diseased or distorted. A girl when only 18 months old was found deficient in intelligence. She grew up in that condition and became subject to epileptic attacks. These continued up to her 7th year. In her eighth year, she was examined by the doctor. It was found that her physical developments kept pace with her years, but her intelligence remained that of an infant. The surgeon suspected too early coalescence of the bones of the skull. He decided on operation on the skull, removed several small pieces of bone from the top of the skull and thereby relieved the pressure on the brain which had then freedom to expand. The wound healed in eight days, and the patient was discharged a more intelligent child.

THE great showman Barnum left at his death upwards of a million sterling. By a will with eight codicils he made several bequests: 40,000 dollars go to Tuft's College in Massachusetts; 125,000 to complete the new historical and scientific building at Bridgeport, the town where the deceased lived; 15,000 to the First Universalist Church in Bridgeport. Other societies and charities too benefit by his will.

"BAMBOO paddy" now supplies the food for the distressed people of Kalahasti. In the famine of 1877, the bamboo seeded for the same purpose.

SIAM or more correctly Bangkok is connected with India for purposes of the parcel post. The rate for each pound or fraction thereof has been fixed at eight annas.

IT is on the cards that the Maharaja of Mysore visits England.

THE Nottingham police arrested in the local cattle market, on suspicion, a well dressed, respectable looking youth who offered for sale a valuable horse at £ 5. The prisoner admitted having stolen the horse from Mr. Palmer Morewood's park at Alfreton, and walked 14 miles with the animal. On remand, at the jail, the prisoner turned out to be a woman, confessing herself to be the daughter of Mr. Morewood's coachman. The silly rogue! what an opportunity for confounding laws and magistrates was there thrown away.

A New York millionaire, Mr. Stephen Anderson, unable physically to write his will, whispered it to a phonograph brought close to his bed. A week after his death, the phonograph was solemnly opened at his lawyer's, in the presence of the testator's family. Will the law recognize the will? The testator has not witnessed the disposition of his property after death by his hand. But the phonograph is a record still—of the movement of the voice though not of the hand, and a go-ahead Judge may admit—not unreasonably—the validity of a will made through a well-tested, if new, scientific invention. Of course, our laws will have to be changed. The whole statute-book has to be brought into harmony with modern life, influenced as it is by the countless agencies of science in different departments.

FOR attempting a criminal assault on a European girl of seven years, a pariah lad has been sentenced by the Sessions Judge, Karachi, to five years' rigorous imprisonment.

IN the House of Lords, the Lord Chancellor and Lord Esher, in reply to a question, expressed surprise that the decision in the Clitheroe abduction case had been greatly misunderstood. Lord Esher went further and explained that in their judgment the court had only held that a husband could not beat the wife or imprison her if she refused him conjugal rights. What objection then, we say, can there be to that decision? To make a wife yield to force against her inclination, is mere brutality. Suits for restitution of conjugal rights must soon be things of the past. They cannot survive the modern delicacy of feeling.

THE Madras High Court refused to relieve Mr. and Mrs. Ross of each other. As a consequence, the husband has notified that he is not and will not be responsible for the debts of the wife. The wife, advised by her doctors, returns home to recruit her health, funds being provided by friends.

A NATIVE clerk of a native firm of Bellary and Madras decamped to Sadras with the proceeds of a cheque for Rs. 400, which he was entrusted with to cash, and had spent half the sum in the company of a dancing girl when he was arrested. He pleaded guilty and was fined rupees three hundred, that is, 200 for his masters and 100 for the Crown.

THE Secretary of State sued, in the Madras High Court, M. Kistnasawmy Naidu and K. Rungiah Naidoo each for Rs. 500 damages and perpetual injunction, the first for printing and selling printed copies of the Tamil First Book of Lessons published by Government and of which it held the copyright, and the second for having in his possession for sale printed copies of the Telugu First Book of Lessons also the property of Government. Recently, the High Court had awarded Rs. 50 damages and costs against one Geariah Chetty for printing the Telugu Book. In the first case, Mr. Justice Shephard ordered Rs. 100 as damages with costs, and in the second Rs. 5 besides costs. The defendants are further prohibited from printing, publishing or selling the said books.

THE Dubdubai Sikandari of Rampore, of the 25th instant, contains an account of the Durbar there for inaugurating the new régime, enriched with the rather remarkable speech of the Commissioner of Bareilly, who is ex-officio Political Agent to the Lieutenant-Governor of the North Western Provinces. We have much pleasure in translating it for the benefit of our readers, speech and all. It will show the arrangements made for the carrying on of the administration of the Rampore State during the minority of the Chief.

"Mr. William Kaye, Commissioner and Agent to the Lieutenant-Governor of the North West for Rohilkhand, held a grand Durbar at the Dewan Khana of the Rampore State on the 16th May. The members of the Council of Regency, (including the President, Nawab Sufder Ali Khan) the Members of the Rampore Family, and all the officers of State, landholders, &c., who had been invited to attend, were present on the occasion. The gentlemen assembled at the Durbar took their respective seats at 4 O'clock, and the Agent entered the Dewan Khana at 5 P. M. All those present, out of respect to Mr. Kaye, rose from their seats, and a salute was fired. The Agent then stood up and addressed the assembly as follows:—

"Nawab Saheb, Members of Council and gentlemen,—In consequence of the murder of the late General Mahomed Azimuddeen Khan, a thorough reorganisation is necessary in the management of the State of Rampore. I have called you gentlemen at to-day's Durbar for the purpose of conveying to you the orders of the Government of India with regard to the proposed change in the administration of the State. But before announcing the decision of the Government, I should like to tell you something with regard to one or two other matters. Now-a-days rumours of all kinds are floating about in Rampore—for instance, it is said to be an open fact that His Highness the Nawab Bahadur is soon coming down to Rampore, and that his future education will be given at Rampore. This is totally incorrect. His Highness the Nawab Saheb will not come here, and he will continue to receive his education outside Rampore as he is doing now. Perhaps it has also been rumoured that the members of the Rampore Family who have been kept away from Rampore will now be allowed to return to this place. This report is also wholly incorrect. They have been made to live away from Rampore, and they will continue to remain so. Perhaps it has also been reported that the forces of the British Government are to come here. Although the English forces are always ready for prompt action, they would not come until a necessity arises for their doing so and so long as there is peace here. But in case of any outbreak or disturbance caused by turbulent people, the troops of the Rampore State are themselves quite competent to suppress and put them down, and there would be no necessity for asking the services of the British forces. The Rampore troops have always been loyal and faithful to the State, and I am fully satisfied that they will continue to be so. Another report has nowadays been flying about and that is true, namely, that the construction of the Railway has been sanctioned by the Government of India. The lines will soon be constructed from Bareilly to Rampore and from Rampore to Moradabad. Now the question remains as to who will be appointed in the place of the deceased General. The world has produced few men like General Azimuddeen Khan Bahadur. Whatever he intended to do, he used to throw his whole heart in accomplishing it. Whatever arrangements or new measures he desired to introduce into the Rampore State, however disagreeable to some persons, he carried them through for the welfare, advancement and prosperity of Rampore. At last the result was that he gave up his life for the cause of Rampore. Now it is the duty of the British Government that the labours and exertions of General Azimuddeen Khan in this behalf should not be permitted to be lost. The assassination of the said General took place on a public road. If the authorities of the Rampore State could immediately manage to arrest the murderers, or even could find out the real facts of the diabolic deed, then it might have been admitted that the management of the State was possible by means of a Native Council. Now that neither the accused were arrested nor any clue has yet been found by the officers of the Rampore State, as to who are the culprits, it became evident that the present constitution and system of government must necessarily undergo a complete change. His Honor the Lieutenant Governor of the North West Provinces and Oudh has therefore decided that the Council should remain as it is, but its chief head should be a European officer of high rank who should exercise the highest authority until the installation of His Highness the Nawab Saheb. The first thought and attention of that officer will be directed to this matter, namely, that he should find out the murderers of the deceased General, arrest their abettors and award suitable punishment to them."

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE criminal is said to be pinned to his venue. The murderer usually takes to flight in fear. But often a strange fascination draws him to the scene of his crime. So the Senapati. He was captured on the 23rd instant in a village not half a mile from the Palace. In fact, all the Royal Family of Manipur are now prisoners in the hands of the British. They await their trial. We hope they will receive a fair one.

TODAY is the celebration of the Queen-Empress's Birthday. The complete success of British arms in Manipur will give additional zest to the enjoyments of the day. Both the Supreme and Local Governments being away on the hills, and Mr. Lee not being enabled by the Commissioners to repeat his Garden Party, the metropolis must content itself with only the military salute of the occasion.

If the Commissioners are not prepared to vote for a permanent allowance to the Chairman, why not make a special grant for the present purpose as a "contribution to the cost incurred on occasion of any public ceremony or entertainment in Calcutta" allowed by the law as a proper object of municipal expenditure?

FORTY one of the men arrested as rioters in defence of the mosque in Circular Road have been put on their trial in two batches of 20 and 21. The defence has reserved cross-examination. In fact, the prisoners reserve their defence for the Sessions Court. Mr. Henderson is prosecuting.

IN the meantime, to quiet the popular panic, Mr. Lambert, under instructions from Darjeeling, has brought about a transfer of the purchase of Suresh Chunder Dey to a Mahomedan—Kasim Ariff Saheb. The Baboo parted with his property for Rs. 4,500, which he bought at Rs. 4,000. Many have come forward to claim the service done. But it is not time yet to make public how the transfer was effected.

FROM an upcountry journal, we find that the Rampore Durbar has settled a monthly pension of Rs. 1,200 on the heirs of the late General Azimooddeen Khan Bahadur. They are his mother Kudsjia Begum—his two wives, Nowshaba Begum and Fatimah Begum—and his daughter Nader Zamane Begum. The pension will be distributed according to the discretion of the deceased's mother and younger brother Hameed-uz-Zafar Khan, who have been appointed Trustees of the pension, which has been sanctioned on the following conditions:—

1. The pensioners shall be loyal to the Chief of the State, and shall live in respectability and chastity.
2. They should not be on friendly terms with the opponents of the State.
3. The pensions shall only be for life.

The second condition, except in so far as it is included in the first, is indefinite enough to be possibly employed in mischief hereafter. There can be no enemies of Rampore. The chastity clause is very proper and the Government of Upper India deserves the thanks of the country for insisting on that important condition.

Although a reward of 15,000 rupees has been advertised, the murderers of the late General are yet unknown.

THE poor Babu! If he is crowded out at home, he is kicked out abroad. Hitherto if the pressure of competition drove him away from Bengal, he had some chance of winning his bread honorably in the sister Provinces of the N.-W. P. and Lahore. Bengalis were hitherto eligible for the Secretariat clerical examinations at Allahabad and Lahore, success in which entitled them to service in the N.-W. P., Oudh, the Central Provinces, Rajputana, Central India, the Punjab and Beluchistan. The Government of India now narrow the interpretation of the rules so as to ordinarily exclude the Bengali from such service outside Bengal. They lay down that "no person can be considered to be domiciled in any of the provinces, unless he has fixed the habitation of himself and his family in that province, not for a mere special or temporary purpose, but with the intention of making it his permanent home. Candidates who desire to compete for vacancies offered for competition at Allahabad and Lahore will, in future, be required to prove to the satisfaction of the Secretary to the Board of Examiners that they are domiciled in one of the provinces, permanent residence in which would entitle them to appear at either of these centres." The isolation of the Bengali Babu is complete. He is limited to his own Bengal. "Natives of Bengal who are temporary residents of, and not domiciled in, any of the provinces enumerated in paragraph 3 of the Resolution of 3rd July 1888, will be permitted to present themselves at the examinations at Allahabad and Lahore, but they will be treated as competing for the vacancies offered at Calcutta, and not for those offered at Allahabad and Lahore." The Bengali is hated—by the Sahebs, for the sins of the Boys—in his own Province, and he is not to be easily allowed to relieve himself by moving out of it. Such a sentence of outlawry and confinement—such an imposition of civil disability on a people in their own land, is a departure in British Policy in India. Has Lord Lansdowne pronounced it with open eyes? Or, do we owe it to the Secretary of State?

HERE is a godsend to the Garbhadhanists. A Madhav marriage is reported from Bangalore of a girl of seven months and a boy of five years of age. We shall not be surprised to find both boy and girl whipped into premature maturity, necessarily imperfect, under the atrocious influences of a debasing system. Meanwhile, we should like to hear something more about these miserable Madhavs. The custom is a survival of old barbarism. But this sort of thing is not confined to this backward tribe in the backwoods of the South. Within our memory the Bardik Brahmans of Bengal, outcroding Herod, carried the point to its utmost logical conclusion. They negotiated marriages between womb and womb, contracting hypothetical unions of embryos, to be postnatally ratified in the event of one proving a male birth and the other a female birth. That horrible outrage has, we believe, been entirely abolished, thanks to the exertions of a Brahman journalist who was no English scholar and who had not improved his mind by residence in Europe or America.

COMPLAINT of the rigour of the assessment clauses of the present municipal Act is not restricted to native owners of residential houses who have to pay both the owner's and occupier's share of the rates on increased valuation of houses calculated on the market value of the land and of the building thereon. The managers of some of the charities—such as the Calcutta Free School, the District Charitable Society, the European Female Orphan Asylum, the St. Vincent's Home, the Old Church Vestry (Parochial and other Schools), the Calcutta Hospital Nurses' Institution, the Catholic Male Orphanage, the Armenian Philanthropic Academy, the Foundling Asylum, the American Union Mission Orphanage, and the Loretto Orphanage, Entally—have memorialized the Lieutenant-Governor for amendment of the law so as to exempt, either entirely or partially, the public charities from "the heavy rates which now press so severely on their precarious incomes and curtail their usefulness." The memorialists urge the extension to their institutions of the principle, recognised in the Act, exempting places of public worship from municipal rates. Both the Local and Supreme Governments have repeatedly refused a hearing to the native owners of Calcutta property against the harshness of the law. These European owners quietly looked on and allowed the law to take its course. Now that their shoes pinch, they have raised a cry. Will the Government give them the same answer—Let us wait till the whole of the town is assessed? or come forward with a helping hand?

In connection with the subject, we have a suggestion to make. Even if the assessment provisions be considered strictly just, it is not fair to assess every portion of a native dwelling house on the same principle. There are parts which are not ordinarily used for domestic purposes, but set apart for the worship of the family god and ordinarily used for religious purposes, and for these, if they are not to be entirely exempted as places of worship, a concession should be made in the assessment of a house.

WE read in the Statesman :—

"The Corporation Worsted Again.—The Corporation recently made a demand upon the Gas Company for licence fees for each of their depôts in various parts of the city at which the Company's coke was sold. Legal proceedings were threatened, but before a prosecution was instituted it was agreed to refer the matter to arbitration. Under the contract between the Corporation and the Gas Company it was provided that the latter was not to pay any licence fee for carrying on their work, and the arbitrators (Mr. Dunne for the Corporation and Mr. Dignam for the Gas Co.) held that the establishment of shops for the sale of the coke made in the process of manufacturing gas was auxiliary to the Co's business, and was therefore exempted from the payment of licence fees under Section 16 of the contract. The decision of the arbitrators cost the Municipality Rs. 357, which they have just been compelled to pay."

We cannot accept the decision of the arbitrators as final or correct. They have proceeded upon the contract and not the municipal law. The question is Does the municipal law itself allow the exemption claimed by the Gas Company? Supposing the contract to favor the claim of the Company, Are the Commissioners competent under the law to enter into such a contract? The Act saves no trade or trader from payment of the licence fee. The Commissioners, therefore, can not exempt any body, by contract or otherwise, from that liability, in the same way as they cannot take advantage of a contract, entered into with them, for an income not sanctioned by the law. The Great Eastern Hotel Company obtained the sanction of the Corporation to erect their splendid frontage verandah by agreeing to pay Rs. 100 a month for the encroachment. But it being found that the Commissioners were not empowered to receive more than a fixed sum for the permission given, they had to forego the monthly income from the Hotel Company, while the verandah still stands, a noble monument of both ignorance and triumph of law.

Unless the contract itself has been accepted by the legislature, it is due to the ratepayers that the question between the Corporation and the Gas Company should be settled by the authoritative decision of the highest Court.

THE indefatigable law reprinter of the Law Publishing Press in this city, has come forward with another scheme of cheap publication. Mr. Cranenburgh has applied to the Government of India for permission "to publish a cheap fac-simile reprint of the Indian Law Reports up to 1890." He proposes to supply to the public a cheap edition of the Reports without putting Government to any loss. By way of securing Government against possible harm, Mr. Cranenburgh makes a notable proposition. He offers to buy up as many volumes or sets of the Reports as the Government could sell during the last five years. This is decidedly bold and original, as well as liberal. We do not see how a Government with any pretensions to liberality can refuse such a request.

In 1885, Mr. Cranenburgh had the sanction of Government to republish in four volumes the Criminal cases in the Reports. He is ready with three of these which he offers to the public—the Calcutta volume at Rs. 3-8, the Madras and Bombay, each at Rs. 3. This low rate he makes a ground for not disturbing Government in future years, for continuation of the said publications.

A MILITARY correspondent of the Pioneer, writing under the initials A. R. D. M., not long ago related a characteristic incident of the British vengeance of 1857. A captain of an infantry regiment had strayed far from camp with a small force, in quest of game, doubtless. He came upon a walled enclosure within which some forty sepoys were cooking their dinner each by himself, according to the rules of caste. There were no other men, not even as watch. This was the opportunity for the brave Captain H. We better allow the brilliant action to be narrated in the military chronicler's own language :—

" 'Halt!' he shouted in a stentorian voice, to his men, adding in Hindustani 'Only twenty men follow me into the gate. Let the rest of the regiment remain outside.' 'Throw down your arms in that corner' he roared to the terror-stricken sepoys. 'Gather together in the opposite corner' and be quick about it or I will slay you all.' He was immediately obeyed. 'Now,' said he, 'I see among you a number of men older than the others whom they have probably led astray. Drive them out from among you, that I may destroy them.' The miserable cowards of young men instantly thrust out the older ones, stungling and fighting for dear life: and H—and his party fell on them and killed them."

The brutes! and the greater cowards! The times were in some measure a palliation of their blood-thirstiness and their confusion of right and wrong. But what shall be said of the man who, at the end of thirty-four years, in cool blood, at a time of peace, draws out of his pigeon hole and presents to an astonished world this sickening stuff—this horrible incident—this record of the shame of his countrymen—this treacherous massacre of defenceless men without even so much as a drumhead court martial! And what of those who publish the account without comment and of those who read it without protest!

HEROINES are women still. Adventurers are not a very reliable lot, and it were too much to expect the feminine gender to be above the weakness of the masculine. Travellers from the most ancient times are notorious for drawing the long bow, and when the credulity and carelessness of woman enter the field, the world has need to be very careful indeed! It would be rude and impertinent to suspect a lady or doubt her assertion. But ladies are ladies, and it is no disgrace to any one to be guilty of hysteria. We can never forget how Lady Anne Dixie lapsed into the wildest hysterics about the poor king of the Zulus. Are we threatened with another illustrious victim to the same disease?

Lady Burton is an old honored acquaintance of the public, respected not only on account of the husband but also on her own as the companion true of a brave man of infinite adventure and fun and an absolute original. More than that, she has not only been a travelling wife but a writing traveller, writing if not roaming on her own account, the result being the production of an interesting view of life in Syria. More than all, her devotion to her husband during his protracted life of disappointment and poverty and disease before the final summons, claims our highest regard. As in her husband's life time, so after his death, she still maintains the ideal of a true wife.

Such a lady is entitled to a respectful hearing, even in her aberrations. So she shall be listened to, large as is the demand on our faith.

Lady Burton, the widow of the famous traveller, tells a curious story. When a young girl, she had her horoscope cast by a gipsy woman, who bore the name of Hagar Burton, who wrote her predictions in Romany—the Gipsy language. She told her, when the time came, to present the document to the man she accepted as her husband. It contained the following passage :—"You will bear the name of our tribe, and be right proud of it. You will be as we are, but far greater than we. Your life will be all wandering, change, and adventure. One soul in two bodies; in life or death never long apart." "All that Hagar Burton foretold," says Lady Burton, "came true; and I pray it may be so to the end—namely, 'never long apart' in life or death."

That strikes us as another version of a gospel long since announced by another lady of even superior rank, who started the singular passion for the desert shown by so many British ladies. We mean Lady Hester Stanhope. She died among the Arabs in the Desert, because a gipsy had prophesied for her such a death.

THE Indian Nation concludes its account of the riot of May 16, in this strain of bravado :

"We hope no one will be insane enough to connect it with the Consent Bill and the agitation against it."

We would not have cared to do so, but since the challenge is thrown there need be no delicacy, we will accept it, even at the risk of our contemporary's mad doctor sending us to a far from agreeable place. Insane or not, we do connect the riot with the Consent Bill.

The systematic efforts of so many months to undermine the loyalty of the people, are bearing fruit. On the one hand, the people have been taught that their religion was at last in danger from an alien Christian Government which had abandoned its wonted policy of religious neutrality and toleration. On the other, they have, by precept and example, been taught an attitude of contempt of authority, and actually drilled into defiance through rowdy demonstrations. Nor has this dangerous propagandism been confined to Hindus. The Mahomedans have been equally attacked. Apart from the agency of the press, missionaries of evil have gone about tackling individual Mahomedans, and persuading them that their religion was in danger. It was an impudent falsehood, the Mahomedans being utterly unaffected by the Consent Bill. Nevertheless, the poison took. The masses in their ignorance came to believe as they were told, not only by respectable Baboos but also hired Mahomedans as ignorant as themselves. After all the folly of the last six months, what wonder that the populace should break out into such scenes as have lately disgraced Benares and Calcutta? If the editor of the Indian Nation will calmly think on the matter, he will see a distinct connection between the Agitation against the Consent Bill and the Mosque Riot.

Indeed, the connection is admitted by the Agitators. Herein, at all events, our contemporary reckons without his host. The Garbhadhanist press scarcely conceal their joy at the occurrence. Some of the leading organs distinctly attribute it to the Consent Bill.

THE Ranaghat Municipality is in a fix. The Government would not accept the Chairman of its choice. The Commissioners after the general election re-appointed their old Chairman Baboo Jogesh Chunder Pal Chowdry who had given every satisfaction. But the Baboo had incurred the displeasure of Government. He stands convicted under section 155 of the Indian Penal Code for omitting to prevent a riot attended with death committed in his Zemindary. The law—an exceptional measure of coercion originally enacted in turbulent times—throws an unusual responsibility on the owner of a land respecting which a riot takes place. It requires, under penalty of unlimited fine, the owner or occupier or him who claims any interest in such land or in the subject of any dispute which gave rise to the riot or who has accepted or derived any benefit therefrom, he himself or his agent or manager having reason to believe that such riot was likely to be committed, to use all lawful means in his power to prevent such riot from taking place and for suppressing and dispersing the same. We will not reopen the question decided by the High Court as to the justice or legality of the conviction. All that we intend to do at present is to point out that the offence charged and declared proved against the Baboo is not an offence of commission and is bailable. Conviction for a bailable offence is no disqualification under the Bengal Municipal Act. The Baboo is admittedly a valuable chairman, the present stigma from which he suffers does not debar him from continuing a Municipal Commissioner or even being appointed Vice-Chairman of the Municipality and, as such, under authority from the Chairman, performing all the duties of the Chairman. If the election had preceded instead of following the unfortunate conviction, he could not have been disturbed in the exercise of the duties of the Chairman, unless two-thirds of his colleagues on the Board voted for his removal and the Government confirmed the vote. But such is their faith in him, that, instead of electing another Chairman, they have prayed the Local Government for reconsideration of its decision. In consequence of that conviction the Commissioner of the Presidency Division had recommended the removal of the Baboo's name from the list of Honorary Magistrates. Sir Charles Elliott, however, in consideration of the position of the Baboo, allowed him the option of resigning that appointment. Thus both law and executive authority were vindicated. To do more may seem vindictive.

Baboo Jogesh has been sufficiently humbled by the judgment of the courts and the deprivation by Government of his powers as an Honorary Magistrate. To humiliate him the more, Government avails itself of a mere accident to exercise the power vested in it by the law to the prejudice of the Baboo. If these repressive measures are for reform of the scions of Zemindar families, we hope Government will not be too far led away to send them back to their old ways by freeing them from the Government hold on them through honorary appointments. The Zemindar is trebly punished for one and the same offence.

THE NORTH WESTERN PROVINCES RESOLUTION ON THE BENARES TEMPLE RIOT.

In a recent Resolution Sir Auckland Colvin deals with the subject of the Benares riot with unsparing firmness and severity. The severity of his treatment of the malcontents, however, is fully deserved. They went to lengths which admit of no other treatment, nor was there the least justification for their taking the law in their own hands. They had as yet no real grievance. The Municipality had not yet finally decided upon the question of the temple. Indeed, the municipality, though it has been acquitted of all blame in the matter, would have shown more foresight and appreciation of popular feeling if, instead of putting off the consideration of the question till the 20th April, it had disposed of it on the 15th when there was an ordinary meeting and the people had mustered strong in the expectation that their grievance about the temple would be finally considered. People have no notions of the distinction between ordinary and special meetings, and in view of the urgency, in their eyes at any rate, of the subject on which they were so much exercised, they could scarcely understand the meaning of any delay. Indeed, if there had been no meeting in the interval, they would probably have waited till the 20th, but that there should be an earlier meeting without taking up the question which, in the mean time, was convulsing the popular mind, could be only construed by the illiterate mob in one way. It appeared to mean nothing more or less than a refusal to reopen the temple question, and in so far as the Municipal Commissioners, by holding an ordinary meeting before the special meeting which was anxiously looked forward to by the people, lay themselves open to this misunderstanding, they were in our eyes guilty of a tactical blunder. Technically, they are, of course, right, but they would have shown more practical wisdom by promptly deciding the question of questions in the local politics of the city.

All the same, however, are the rioters guilty of most disgraceful conduct. The city of Benares has always had an odious name for ruffianism in the past, and it would seem it is still no better than before. The causes of the riot are carefully discussed in the Government Resolution. The temple grievance was the declared, and the more immediate motive, but it was not all. It is rightly believed that behind it there was a complication of feelings at work which is analysed in the Resolution. It is said:—

"The temple formed the declared motive of the outbreak, and in the opinion of the Government it was the immediate motive; though the rioters probably met with sympathisers, and were inspired by instigators from among men more subtle and better informed than themselves. The high prices ruling at the time in Benares, as in other cities, owing to recent short crops and to heavy exports of grain from these Provinces to Europe, caused a general feeling of pressure and discontent. There is a class of men to be found in all cities who, under the guise of disinterested regard for the poor, and boasting enlightenment to which they prove themselves to have no claim, take the lead in opposing necessary schemes of improvement, the burden of which will in some measure fall upon themselves."

The order about the temple is characterised by Sir Auckland Colvin's astuteness and practical sagacity:—

"The Government is always prepared to give due consideration to the religious feelings of the Hindoos, and although it appears still doubtful whether, according to the requirements of the Hindoo faith, the idol is immovable, the Lieutenant-Governor is willing that no part of the temple enshrining it should be touched and that necessary measures should be taken to prevent any damage occurring to it at any time in connection with the water-works or pumping station. The temple will be maintained in situ; and will not be allowed to fall. On the other hand, the Government will protect the works during their progress; and will ensure the land attached to the works, which (with the temple) has been acquired by Government, and the men engaged upon the works from the interruption and confusion inseparable from admission of the public. To that end, the priests attached to the temple will be given by the district magistrate passes of permanent admission to the grounds in which the temple stands, and will be suffered to go backwards and forwards, at such hours as may be fixed, through the gate of the water-works and pumping station enclosure to their temple and shrine. The service of their idol will thus be secured. The public, however, for the reasons which have been stated, will not be admitted, during the progress of the works, to the shrine, as they are not admitted for any purpose to any other part of the enclosure, taken up for the works. Persons trespassing within the enclosure, from whatever cause, will expose themselves to prosecution. Had it been possible to allow an exception in favour of the devotees of the Buddaini temple to the invariable rule prohibiting the public from entering enclosures in which public works of the kind in question are being carried on, the Government would have felt it necessary to mark its sense of the disgraceful conduct of the people of Benares on the 15th April, and of their impudent defiance of Municipal authority, by closing the temple to general worship during the progress and completion of the water-works."

The temple is saved to the god but lost to the people. Probably, Sir Auckland means thus to bring these to their bearings. The exclusion of the devotees will operate till the continuance of the building operations on account of the water-works, and after these are completed, "it will be for the Government of the day to decide whether, and if so, with what, if any, restrictions, the Ram Chandra temple can be again opened to public access." It will depend on the conduct, in the mean time, of the Benares citizens. They are already convicted of bad citizenship. The acts of violence and plunder committed by them in defiance of authority, while their case was pending consideration, without even such justification as they might plead from the final rejection of their prayer, admit of no palliation. For these they are now punished with exclusion from the temple, the duration of which after the erection works are complete, will depend on their future conduct. In the mean time, the slightest recurrence of disorder is threatened with the imposition of a very heavy extra police force, at the expense of the Benares residents.

This is an adroit and neat solution of a most difficult and delicate problem. It is easy to cavil, of course. Equally easy is it to answer cavillers. The subject, however, is delicate, and it is by no means expedient to discuss it. In matters involving the passions of the populace, statesmanship must be content to be plausible without probing to the bottom or disturbing the whole truth. And journalists who are good citizens must do likewise. All who understand affairs will recognize the firm grip of the master in the Resolution and the successful and ingenious disposal of the matter by the Lieutenant-Governor.

THE BLACK MOUNTAIN EXPEDITION OR HOW LIGHTLY ARE OUR LITTLE WARS MADE AND MULTIPLIED.

ANOTHER illustration of the powerlessness of the Foreign Office before the influence of local opinion is afforded by the Black Mountain Expedition. So far as the Government of India is concerned, there would have been no expedition in October last, were it not for the urgency of the Punjab Government. The Government deferred to local opinion and knowledge, and found, when too late, as in Manipur, that it had been misled. The Pioneer whose access to official information is wellknown, is our authority for this view. The Allahabad journal is also far from satisfied as to the necessity of last winter's expedition. Our contemporary's reticence on the subject is apparently conquered by a correspondent evidently well posted up in military matters, signing himself "Tax-payer." It is now clear the Black Mountain Expedition has been a very mountain in labor. This causeless and fruitless military demonstration, at a cost of lacs of rupees, is shown up by our contemporary's correspondent in such a trenchant manner that we will quote him at length. He writes:—

"So far as is known to the public the Black Mountain tribes had been on their best behaviour since their punishment in 1888, the date of the last expedition. On the principle of letting sleeping curs lie it would, one would think, have been wise to have left them alone. But no: in October last it was decided 'to test the temper of the tribes,' in other words to stir them up. Accordingly a strong force was sent to the Black Mountain to perambulate within our nominal, but their actual tribal, border. As was anticipated Hashim Ali's loosewulaks resented the invasion by firing a harmless fusilade from a safe distance as the troops marched up the hill. Whereupon, for the third time in Black Mountain history, they marched down again, instead of then and there exacting punishment for the insult. That insult was the ostensible cause of the big expedition, which was launched nearly two months ago. Of course there could be no opposition to 7,000 troops; nor was there. A bridge of boats was dragged up the Indus; the river crossed; the two brigades united, the trans-Indus hills partly ascended, the objective being Baiio, a few miles further up the mountain. This Baiio, it seems, is a village common to Akazais, Chigharzaïs and Boneiwals. Hence the Baiowals, as expected, in honour bound began a game of brag, collected to the number of ten or fifteen hundred, waved flags, danced war dances and shouted defiantly: 'Come on; but by jingo if you do we'll—run away.' Upon this demonstration our army was halted for three weeks grumbling sorely at the inaction. But behind that army all was action and decision of purpose. The reserve brigade was mobilised and pushed to the front. A fourth brigade was formed at Hoti Maidan to demonstrate on the Boneer frontier. Finally, when 12,000 perfectly equipped troops were ready to eat up Akazais, Chigharzaïs, Boneiwals and all other zaïs and wals who might come in their way, the expectant army was faced rearwards and, for the fourth time in Black Mountain history, meekly marched down hill again, the zaïs and wals being, I presume, apologetically informed that it was all a mistake: there had never been any intention of occupying Baiio: since which strategic movement to the rear that army reduced to its original strength of 7,000 men is sitting on a deserted hill top cis-Indus, wondering what the whole show meant and means. And what does it mean, I ask? Everything done and left undone by actual and possible enemies from the insulting fusilade in October last up to date was exactly foreseen. Government seems first to have deliberately sought a pretext for the expedition, by trailing its coat within our nominal border, and having provoked a show of opposition on the part of one small faction, leisurely prepared a large expedition, leisurely marched its army some miles up the Indus, leisurely bridged the river, crossed it, and then spasmodically met the Baiowal brag (waving flags, &c.,) by British counter-brag (calling out two more brigades) and finally peacefully withdrew cis-Indus, having accomplished nothing beyond spending some 14 or 15 lakhs of rupees and destroying a few huts worth a hundred rupees or so. This Black Mountain mystery wants clearing up. Why was a pretext sought for an expedition? Why was the insult of October last not punished then and there? The tribes generally were passive and behaving well. The force on the spot was sufficient to go to Hashim Ali's village and destroy his cottages and those of his adherents. An expedition being determined on, why was it launched on such a large scale, if Baiio and the Chigharzu country were not to be visited? As they were not, what was the object in crossing the Indus at all? What in keeping the force inactive for weeks about Palosi? What in withdrawing cis-Indus? What in calling out the reserve? What in mobilising a force at Hoti Maidan? What is now the use of keeping 7,000 troops on a hill top cis-Indus? The Black Mountain camp-of-exercise, on service conditions—for the expedition is nothing more—must already have cost many lakhs. Why let more heavy expenditure be incurred? There is no enemy worthy the name cis-Indus. If the Black Mountain itself is to be annexed that would be a reason for leaving a couple of native regiments up there for the summer, or permanently: but why keep two brigades there? And what is the use of annexing the country? It has no strategic value. It can never give us good recruits as its people are not warlike. It can never yield us revenue. Annexation would simply mean an extra permanent charge of several lakhs a year for posts and garrisons. If the object of the expedition was simply the capture of Hashim Ali, that ruffian's cousins and his aunts would probably have gladly captured him for the Sukar for a few hundred or thousand rupees, or better, he himself would have willingly exchanged the life of a hunted and hungry wolf for the luxury and safety of a pension of Rs. 10 a month and a plot of land in British territory. Expeditions cost money, and India is too poor to waste lakhs on unnecessary expeditions. If this Black Mountain camp-of-exercise is a specimen of the way the Government of India works its 'forward policy' the sooner we revert to 'miserly inactivity' and consolidate our frontiers within our frontiers, the better for India and India's tax-payers. If many lakhs are to be spent on an expedition whenever some petty trans-frontier ruffian exhibits his impotent hostility towards us, the little wars which seem inseparable from the 'forward policy' as now conducted will be unending."

The Pioneer, as a supporter of the Forward policy of which this expedition is an instance, is called to explain what all this means. Our contemporary takes up the challenge kindly and puts as good a face upon the matter as possible. To do this he goes back to the events of the year 1888, when a detachment of Gurkhas and police marching on the lower slopes of the mountain were attacked and two English officers killed. To punish this outrage, an expeditionary force was soon after assembled, which chastised the clans guilty of the outrage, and dominated their country, when a compact was entered into with them which entitled the English Government to march through their country whenever found necessary and to construct and maintain a system of roads for the rapid occupation in times of need, of more important strategical points. The expedition of this year, however, undertaken at the recommendation of the Punjab Government, does not meet with the Pioneer's approval. Evidently, there would have been no such waste of public money were it not for the urgency of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab. The Government of India was of a different mind, and, as in the Manipur case, was in the right. The Local Government stood upon its superior local knowledge and at last got the Supreme Government to yield to its views with the result which forms the subject of "Tax-payer's" complaint. The Pioneer writes:—

"This being the agreement, (referring to the compact of 1888) it is evident that there was a good deal to be said for not allowing it to become a dead letter. If our newly acquired right of way was to be of any use, it needed to be occasionally exercised, or the fact of its existence would certainly be obliterated from the reluctant memories of our independently-minded neighbours. Whether the right was worth preserving and asserting at the risk of bringing on another collision with the tribes is a different question: our own opinion is that the matter might have been very well left to look after itself, at any rate until there were symptoms among the tribes of an active inclination to disregard the understanding. But when the subsequent developments are traced to the operation of an ambitious frontier policy in the Government of India it becomes necessary to say that this was so far from being any part of a great Imperial scheme, that active measures would never have been adopted except for the urgency of a provincial Government. It was the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab who recommended to the Government of India that a force should be assembled at Oghi in October to march through the Hassanai-Akazai country and put the roads in order: and when it was pointed out in return that if the tribes opposed the march it would be impossible to punish them until the spring, the provincial Government pledged itself and its knowledge of border politics to the statement that no opposition would be forthcoming. The claims of local knowledge carried the day and the arrangements for the assembling of a force were allowed to go forward."

What a melancholy confession! The right of making war and peace belongs to the Supreme Government. Yet such is the sympathy of officialism—such the esprit de corps of bureaucracy, that a subordinate administration is quite able to involve the Empire in war, if not to bring it out of it. There is nothing to prevent this. There is no true responsibility. This is the way that the people are sacrificed and the revenue wasted. Will the Secretary of State call the Lieutenant-Governor to account?

THE RESCUE OF THE SIBPUR WORKSHOPS—

THE BEGINNING IN EARNEST OF TECHNICAL EDUCATION IN BENGAL.

THE doom which threatened the Workshops of the Sibpur Engineering College has been averted. For this our thanks are due to both the late and the present Lieutenant-Governor. Sir Charles Elliott's experience gained during his charge of the Public Works Department of the Government of India has deeply impressed him with the need of developing technical knowledge in this country. It has been a valuable preparation for his duties as a ruler. Witness the way he dealt with some practical questions of engineering the other day at Purnea. Witness the practical scope of his recent remarks at our Science Association. He is too strongly convinced of the need of this country in the way of schools for industrial training to abandon our only agency of the kind in the Mechanical class of the Engineering College, and the proposals for closing the Workshops attached to the College have been properly negatived.

Our acknowledgments for this decision of the Government are also due to the able Director of Public Instruction, Sir Alfred Croft. The proposal to close the Workshops emanated from a Committee which was appointed to investigate the course of study and other matters connected with the Engineering College. This Committee was unexceptionably constituted and made a number of suggestions which are excellently calculated to improve the efficiency of the College and which have been accepted by the Government. In regard to the Workshops, however, they found that they had of late been turning out a very inadequate measure of work and recommended their abolition. But this diminution of work was due to accidental conditions arising in the Public Works Department rather than to any fault of the workshops. Sir Alfred Croft therefore demurred to the proposal as likely to imperil, if not to ruin, the mechanical apprentice class, hitherto the most important and successful of all the classes of the College. The Committee, after recommending the abolition of the College Workshops, suggested in lieu of them that the Railway Workshops and other similar places should be used for completing the manual instruction of the students after their theoretical course was over at the College. This Sir Alfred Croft justly considered as calculated to make the period of apprenticeship too long. He had also great misgivings whether outside shops could provide even a moderately large number of apprenticeships or would care to take apprentices ignorant of the use of tools. He likewise pointed out the incongruity of maintaining a technical institution without any provision for manual training.

This view was accepted by Sir Steuart Bayley, and on his recommendation the Government of India recorded the following remarks on the subject:—

"There exists in the Sibpur Workshops the nucleus of a technical institution, the value of which would be seriously affected by disassociating the practical from the theoretical training of the College. The Governor-General in Council doubts if any valid inference can be drawn from the state of the attendance rolls unfavourable to the prosecution of the experiment; and he attaches no great weight to the argument that hitherto the school has not been a financial success. He thinks the importance of the interests involved calls for perseverance in the undertaking, and he would be glad if, with a view to improving the opportunities for practical instruction afforded by the school, it were arranged that some of the work of the Public Works Department should continue to be undertaken at the Sibpur Workshops, and Local Boards and other bodies were encouraged to patronise the institution in a similar manner."

Sir Charles Elliott who fully accepts the same view has already issued orders in the Public Works Department for adequately utilising the Sibpur Workshops. With a view, further, of familiarising the students with the use of tools as a preparation for being actually called upon to take part in any heavy piece of work which the Public Works Department may put through the shops, Sir Charles has sanctioned a cost of Rs. 12,000, for the purchase of six lathes, four shaping machines and two planing machines for the exclusive use of the students. A model-room is also in course of erection, which is likely to cost about Rs. 7,000, and a testing-room with testing apparatus will soon be provided.

In view of the large increase which has taken place in the number of students both in the Engineer and the Apprentice Department of the College, Sir Charles Elliott has sanctioned the appointment of one additional European and four more native instructors.

A salutary departure from the present cast-iron rigidity of the Examination system has at last been approved by the Government. It is a change which cannot fail to have a thoroughly stimulating effect upon admissions to the college. The change proposed is that those who fail in the examination for the degree will nevertheless be furnished with certificates of their actual proficiency from the Principal of the College. This wise and practical suggestion was made by the Committee and is embodied as follows :—

"The Committee considers that all students of the Engineer class, in common with those of other classes, who have gone through a full course of instruction, ought to be furnished with certificates of having done so. Under the rules now in force, a student of the Engineer class, who fails in the University examinations, has not only nothing to show for the four years' theoretical training he has undergone, but he is barred from going through the course of practical training, which, notwithstanding his failure in taking a degree, would undoubtedly add to the value of the theoretical training he has received at the College. The Committee therefore recommends that the Principal of the College be authorised to hold a final College examination of the students of the Engineer class, and to issue certificates similar in character to those which are granted to students of other classes of the institution. The holders of these certificates, whether they obtain a degree or not, should also, in the opinion of the Committee, be put through the full course of manual instruction and practical training which is recommended for this class."

This is virtually a return to the pre-University system, and it is good so far it goes. Would it not do to extend it to other Examinations of the University?

Another important reform adopted on the recommendation of the Committee, is likewise a reversion to old practice. The combination of practical with theoretical instruction from the moment of one's admission to the Engineering class, is at last, after 8 years' experience, condemned, and henceforth the manual course for Engineering students will be postponed until the theoretical course is completed.

Sir Charles gives crowning proof of his interest in the maintenance of the College at the highest possible point of efficiency, by guaranteeing four additional appointments to passed students. On the Committee's recommendation, he has also ruled that, subject to certain conditions, students who fail to pass the University Examination but are successful in the final College Examination will be qualified for employment as District Engineers.

The Committee's proposal for appointing Lecturers on Agriculture and Botany with the object of training students for the callings of managers of estates or Tahsildars, is under the consideration of the Government. We are sure this branch of technical education will be dealt with in the same effective way as the other, and then something will at last have been done to qualify our young men for practical professions in life.

MR. HARRINGTON'S INCINERATOR, OR THE SUCCESS OF UNSUCCESS.

THE Chairman of the Corporation of Calcutta has laid down a principle which, if accepted, would exempt contractors from fulfilling conditions of any contract they may make with anybody. At Thursday's meeting of the Municipal Commission of Calcutta, "one member ventured to ask," with reference to Mr. Harrington's Incinerator, "how is it that the final payment has been made, when the Corporation's own responsible officers, the Engineer and the Health Officer, had shown that Mr. Harrington had failed to fulfil one most essential condition, viz., that the furnaces shall be absolutely proof against the escape of noxious fumes?" The Chairman replied, and what do our readers think was the reply?—the Chairman replied, "that there are degrees of success, that perfection is attainable only in heaven, that we are on earth, not in heaven and should not expect perfect success." These words have not been reported in the morning papers, but we have been informed by gentlemen who were present at the meeting, that these were very nearly the words used by Mr. Lee in reply to Dr. Sircar's question. Let the Corporation beware of the danger involved in these utterances of its Chairman.

These utterances were not made in jest. They were practically carried out by the payment that was made to Mr. Harrington in the face of the condemnation of his Incinerator by Mr. Kimber and Dr. Simpson, and they were endorsed by the Corporation by the sanction given to that payment at the last meeting. The Corporation has thus virtually placed itself at the mercy of its contractors, present and future, and must be prepared to pay their full demands however much they may fail in fulfilling the conditions of their contracts. The example of Mr. Harrington's failure and triumph will thus operate, we are afraid, most injuriously on the Corporation as regards all its transactions which are carried on by contract. Mr. Harrington's triumph with his failure has entailed not only loss on the Corporation, but the most intolerable discomfort and avoidable unhealth on the residents of Calcutta. It is not the people in the immediate vicinity of the Incinerator that are the only sufferers. They are of course the chief sufferers. But we believe that the whole of Calcutta is in danger from the Incinerator. Any one, who has watched the course and progress of the smoke as it issues from the Incinerator and felt the nuisance and suffered from it personally, must have been convinced that, whatever certain doctors, prejudiced or eccentric or unsympathetic, may say to the contrary, the smoke associated with fumes of such offensive smell cannot but be deleterious to health, and that, according to the direction of the wind and certain states of the weather, all parts of the town are liable to be affected by it. It was because of his strong conviction of such widely-operating injurious character of the Incinerator as it is working at present, that the Hon'ble Dr. Sircar pressed for an expression of opinion on the part of the meeting as to the absolute necessity of closing it at once. He was supported by Nawab Abdool Lutef Bahadur, but thwarted by a brother professional in the person of Dr. McLeod who, "though he was free to confess that it was a nuisance which should not be maintained in that part of the town so close to human habitations," strangely enough, "was at the same time not prepared to urge its immediate removal." We take no note of the objections raised against Dr. Sircar's insistence for coming to a resolution for the immediate closing of the Incinerator by some other Commissioners on technical and frivolous grounds, but we must confess we are surprised at the attitude assumed by Dr. McLeod. The learned Doctor freely admitted the nuisance and the necessity of its removal from its present site, but not of its immediate removal. If it is a nuisance and if it must be removed, why delay its removal to the inconvenience, the annoyance, and the most unbearable discomfort of the people immediately and severely affected by it, some of whom have literally to give up their meals at times, others are occasionally roused from sleep with a most oppressive sense of suffocation at dead of night, and others again have often to suffer from the aggravation and persistence of their already existing complaints? Why? we ask, and the strange answer has been furnished by the worthy doctor. It is because "he did not think there was any evidence to show that there was excess of mortality or sickness in that quarter!" So unless there actually be an epidemic (this is the word, we hear, actually used) raging in the quarter distinctly traceable to the Incinerator, Dr. McLeod would not believe that the noxious fumes daily and nightly emitted by it can exert any injurious influence on the health of those subjected to the nuisance. If this be so, well might we bid farewell to sanitation, dispense with all costly schemes for its promotion, and go back to the primitive savage condition of dirt and uncleanness. But we seriously ask if the corporation is determined to continue to work the Incinerator and thus efficiently poison the atmosphere? If unmindful of the condemnation passed by the Engineer and the Health Officer, and if in contemptuous disregard of the repeated complaints of thousands of sufferers, the corporation neglects to remove this new prolific source of annoyance and unhealth of its own creation, it must be prepared for the ignominy of doing it under the inexorable authority of Law.

A PROTEST.

SIR,—In noticing the action brought against Police Inspector Mahit Chunder Banerjee of Serampore in consequence of that officer's alleged "illegal" search of certain premises, you described the plaintiff as "a man of the cowherd caste" and made this fact a peg for hanging certain observations of yours upon "the present temper of the masses" and the increased "difficulty of the Police in discharging their duties. I verily believe the paragraph was written without careful enquiry. The plaintiff, though "a cowherd by caste," is an educated gentleman. His knowledge of English is decent. He is a very good Sanskrit scholar. I have met few persons, amongst even our university graduates, possessing a more intimate knowledge of the Sanskrit Darṣan śāstras than this person of the "cowherd caste." His edition (just commenced) of the Bhagavadgita is a splendid one. Gentlemen of acknowledged respectability treat this "cowherd" as their equal. I am sure if you had known all this you would never have pained the plaintiff and his friends by such an offensive allusion to his caste. In your last issue, in noticing the lamented death of Rai Sarat Chunder Ghose Bahadur, you have spoken of the deceased as "our excellent neighbour and friend" and as "belonging to a respectable family of Chinsurah." I do not wish to find fault with what you have said. Rai Sarat Chunder was an intimate friend of mine. I used to respect him for his abilities. For all that, it can hardly be that you of all men do not know which is which in caste matters. There are Ghoses and Ghoses. Rai Sarat Chunder was not a Kayastha Ghose but a Sadgopa or a good cowherd. You, of course, know the origin of this caste. Jatimala says that "two castes, viz., Magadha and Gopa, have sprung from Vaiṣya sires and Kshatriya mothers. The occupation of the Magadha is reciting the praises of Brahmins and Kshatriyas; while that of the Gopa is agriculture and cattle-rearing. Sometimes the Gopa is called Sadgopa." If you reject this account of the Jatimala regarding the origin of the Sadgopas, and think that there is some difference between the Gopa and the Sadgopa, conjecture would seem to point out the latter came to be so called possibly in consequence of their avoidance of certain acts, such as emasculating bull-calves, which are always done by Gopas.

So, Sir, your plaintiff in the Small Cause Court is no mean and poor cowherd living by the supply of milk but is an educated gentleman and a casteman of Rai Sarat Chunder Ghose and of some one more eminent than Sarat Chunder, of some one, that is, who has sat in the Bengal Council and whom Viceroys and Lieutenant-Governors love to honor.

THE ACCEPTANCE OF PRESENTS BY PUBLIC SERVANTS.

THE following Resolution has been issued from the Bombay Secretariat :—

The Governor in Council has been recently considering whether any addition to the standing order regarding the acceptance of presents by public servants is required. A summary of the law and rules laid down on the subject was published in Government Resolution, No. 2271, General department, dated the 25 July, 1876, circulated with Political Department circular, No. 5555, dated the 4th of September, 1890. In the rules then published an exemption is made in favour of "the receipt of a few flowers or fruits and articles of inappreciable value, although even such trifling presents should be discouraged;" and a Political Officer of high standing has recently suggested that this exemption should be further limited to fruits or flowers locally grown, and a prohibition against the regular daily receipt of even such fruits inserted. On the whole, however, the Governor in Council is not disposed to alter the rule but to recall attention to it and to the spirit which underlies it. The spirit of the orders of Government is to discourage the receipt of all presents, and only to permit the receipt of occasional offerings of fruit, of flowers, where such offerings cannot be rejected without causing offence. At the same time the Governor in Council thinks that the time has come when every ruler of a Native State might be furnished with a copy of the orders of Government, and this Resolution may be given accordingly. A copy should also be furnished to every officer in the Political Department of this Government.

The occasion may be suitably taken to call attention to other standing orders of a similar character. Government circular, No. 3336, dated the 31st of May, 1873, repeated in circular No. 5713, dated the 7th of September, 1887,—ordered Political officers to pay without fail for all supplies and transport furnished to them by Native States. Where an officer must depend on the assistance of the Durbar for his supplies he must request the Durbar to appoint dealers from whom the articles required can be procured for proper payment. It is to be understood the grass, or fodder, or free supplies for the table of officers staying in State bungalows, for however short a time, are absolutely and expressly prohibited. In any case where a Political Officer visits the capital of a Native State in the course of his tour he is bound to supply himself with all that he requires. In the case of rapid journeys, occasionally undertaken for special service where the official's own transport is obviously insufficient and no higher transport can be obtained, the Durbar may occasionally lend a carriage. An absolute prohibition to use such means, where no other means are procurable, might cause injury to the Public Service; but in future Government desire that, just as in the case of the sale of horses to a Durbar, the fact should be specially reported to them. The use of any Durbar carriage will thus be restricted to the rarest occasions and to the narrowest limits; and officers will under no circumstances be allowed to live in State bungalows at the cost of the Durbar for their supplies.

The furnishing of residences at the cost of Durbars was prohibited by Government Resolution, No. 729, dated the 10th February, 1878. By circular, No. 5977, dated the 16th September, 1887, the subordinates of Political Agents are forbidden to receive free quarters, and all orders that apply to Political Officers are now declared to have equal application to their subordinates. It is clear that in Native States where dharamsalas or other places for the convenience of the Agency servants are not available, permission when on tour to occupy other quarters need not be refused. What is required is to secure as far as possible the independence of British officers and their subordinates; and, therefore, every Political Agent must be personally held responsible that the spirit of these orders is duly observed. Government are confident that the rulers of Native States will not regard enforcement of these orders as any act of discourtesy, but rather will consider it an act of necessary courtesy to Government to assist them in the execution of their declared policy, which is mainly devised in the interests of the Native States themselves.

REPORT ON THE DRAINAGE OF CALCUTTA.

By Baldwin Latham, Mem., Inst., C.E., Mem., Inst. M.E., F.G.S.,
I.S.S., F.S.I., President of the Royal Meteorological Society.
TO THE CHAIRMAN OF THE CORPORATION.

[Concluded from p. 250.]

30. The proposed new outfall sewer is intended to be an open canal in section part of an oval sewer, and it is estimated to cost Rs. 12,32,615, and in addition the sewage will require to be pumped a second time at an intermediate point between the present pumping station and the proposed point of outfall. The new channel is over 7 miles long, and containing as it will nothing but crude sewage, it is much more likely to be a nuisance than the sewage in the present river channel mixed with the tidal waters in the proportion before given; the present average dry weather sewage of 2,300 cubic feet per minute would occupy just five hours in passing down the proposed channel, assuming there is no delay at the intermediate pumping station. Having regard to the limited means at the disposal of the authorities of Calcutta, I am of opinion that the construction of this proposed new outfall may with advantage be deferred, and the money available for its construction should be applied to the construction of more urgent sanitary works both within and without the city.

31. With reference to the flushing arrangements I am of opinion that the present large sewers of Calcutta can best be flushed by a system of sectional flushing, or a series of flushing gates should be introduced into them, and the flush water and sewage dammed up.

In flushing the bottom gate should be first opened, and the gates above on regular succession. The amount of water required to flush a sewer in this way will be comparatively small. All flush-water entering the sewers must be under the control of the pumping machinery. It is essential that sufficient power should always be available at the sewage pumping station, so as to relieve the sewers, and maintain the necessary velocity of flow through them. Under no circumstances ought it to be necessary to lift the pen-stock at the pumping station, so as to put the sewers in connection with an outfall at a higher level than many of the sewers. With reference to the flushing of the minor sewers, abundance of provision should be provided, for it is essentially necessary that these sewers should be efficiently flushed. The average amount of the present dry weather flow of sewage in Calcutta is infinitesimal when spread over all the sewers. The total length of all the small sewers according to Mr. Kimber's last Annual Report was 965,437 feet: the average flow through the sewers on the 19th February last was 2,391.125 cubic feet per minute, or the quantity per minute on the average flowing through a foot in length of Calcutta sewers would be .0027 cubic foot, or a cubic foot per minute on the average would only be found in a length of 404 feet of sewer. It is not necessary in order to keep a sewer clean that a constant current should be maintained through it. It will suffice if such a velocity is created through it for a few minutes every day as will remove any deposit. Flushing tanks should be constructed at the head of every sewer and at such other points as experience indicates, so as to make the flushing effectual throughout every sewer.

Holloway's Pills.—Any dyspeptic sufferer aware of the purifying, regulating, and gently aperient powers of these Pills, should permit no one to cloud his judgment or to warp his course. With a box of Holloway's Pills, and attention to its accompanying "Directions," he may feel thoroughly satisfied that he can safely and effectually release himself from his miseries without impairing his appetite or weakening his digestion. This most excellent medicine acts as a nervine and bodily tonic by aiding nutrition, and banishes a thousand annoying forms of nervous complaints. An occasional resort to Holloway's remedy will prove highly salutary to all persons, whether well or ill, whose digestion is slow or imperfect, a condition usually evidenced by weariness, languor, listlessness, and despondency.

32. With reference to the question of the ventilation of the sewers all that is required is a series of vents that shall preserve the tension of the air within the sewer at the same pressure as it is outside the sewer, under the conditions of the fluctuation of the flow of the sewage going in within the sewers. The fluctuation in the rate of the flow in the sewers will effectually change the air of the sewers if the vents are provided. In my judgment the best mode of ventilating the Calcutta sewers will be by pipes or shafts carried up to sufficient elevation so as to secure the dispersion of the sewer air. Under no circumstances should openings for ventilation be made at the ground surface in streets under 40 feet in width. In a district like Calcutta subject to heavy rainfall open gratings on the roads may allow road detritus to be washed into the sewers, and when this is likely to be the case, their use should be prohibited. All pipe sewers should be fitted with properly balanced valves to prevent back currents of air up the sewers.

33. With reference to the question of the use of what are called master or intercepting traps, these traps no doubt are very useful in many places in Calcutta, but they should always be constructed with an abrupt fall into them of not less than three inches, and the receptacle for solid matter should be sufficiently deep so as to contain a bucket for catching the solid matters which can then be readily removed. The proportions of these traps should be so adjusted that the removal of the bucket will not unseal the trap.

34. I quite concur with Mr. Kimber in his recommendation as to bringing up the covers of all man-holes to the surface so as to save the constant trouble, expense and nuisance existing from breaking up the streets to get into the sewer. I am also of opinion that a large number of man-holes are required in these sewers so as to bring them under proper examination and control.

35. The kirbing and channelling of the streets is a matter of considerable sanitary importance, and I am particularly struck with the neat arrangement of the street gutters adopted in Calcutta which give a finished appearance to the streets, and at the same time allow cleansing operations to be perfectly performed. The extension of the system adopted cannot but be attended with the greatest sanitary good.

36. It is of importance in connection with the surface drainage that proper and numerous gully-pits should be provided for the reception of the surface waters flowing from the roads to the sewers, and these pits should be so constructed and of sufficient capacity so as to retain any detritus washed from the roads, and prevent it getting into the sewers. It is also a matter of great importance that these gully-pits should be frequently scavenged, and their traps should be of such a description that the lowering of the water line in emptying the gully-pit will not unseal the trap.

37. It is essential that the materials used in the construction of all works of sewerage should be of such character that they will withstand the action of the sewage when brought in contact with them. I am clearly of opinion that no lime mortar, as hitherto used in the construction of the Calcutta sewers, will permanently withstand the action of sewage, and all new sewers should be constructed with brickwork set in Portland cement mortar or of Portland cement concrete. In order to cheapen the cost of sewerage works in India, I have advised in some places that the main ring of large brick sewers may be set in Portland cement mortar, that outside this ring of brickwork there should be a collar joint of Portland cement mortar, and the rest of the sewer may be built either in brick-work or concrete set or compounded with the best local hydraulic lime. All pipe sewers should be jointed with tarred gasket and Portland cement mortar and not with clay or a mixture of clay and Portland cement, the clay being a material liable to considerable shrinkage if it dries, and if it does not dry then it remains soft and plastic, and the weight of the earth filling of the sewer-trench squeezes out the lower part of the jointing material, leaving an opening at the upper part of the pipe joint through which sub-soil water, earth or sand may enter the sewers, or when the sewers are overcharged, the sewage may escape into the sub-soil.

38. I consider it is not necessary to have two outfall channels from Calcutta, one for the discharge of the storm-water and the other for the sewage proper, neither of which channels at the present time is sufficient or proper for the purpose intended. In my judgment it would be better for these two channels to be combined into one proper channel to carry both sewage and storm-water. The storm-water would then tend to flush the sewage channel, or it may be flushed from the canal as the present storm-water channel is flushed aided by sectional flushings. The present sewage channel has no fall through it except what is created by the sewage pumped into it, and this channel is in a very unsatisfactory state at the present time. The combined channel should be properly pitched on the slopes and bed, and if constructed at the proper level and provided with a sluice at its connection with the river would not be a difficult channel to maintain free from deposit and in fine sanitary condition.

39. The extension of the works of sewerage into the amalgamated area will necessitate the construction of additional sewers. I propose that these sewers shall converge at a point at or near the present sewage pumping station, so as to have as much machinery as possible at one point under one staff of Engineers. This will necessitate a remodelling of the present sewage pumping station, and the provision of more powerful machinery. The present engines are not economical at work, consuming nearly 9lbs. of coal per pump horse-power per hour. In future with better machinery a much larger power may be maintained at the same annual cost as now incurred. In considering the arrangement of the new machinery it must be borne in mind that the sewers of Calcutta in the future must not be allowed to become water-logged; it is obvious therefore that if rainfall and flush-water are admitted to the sewers the only way of controlling them is by providing sufficient power at the proposed main pumping station to deal with them.

40. The present brick sewers ought to be made water tight for this purpose; they may be lined with a ring of brick-work set in Portland cement with a collar joint of Portland cement between the new ring of brick-work and the old work. This lining will not injuriously affect the discharge capacity of these sewers which have never been up to their work, and with increased power at the main pumping station, they will have in future a much more satisfactory flow through them.

41. Before any of the proposed new works are undertaken, proper surveys of the district with borings as to the nature of the ground should be taken. If it is found that there may be a difficulty in the construction of the sewers at the depth proposed near Tolly's Nullah, then the sewers may be raised in which case the sewage of the southern portion of the district may be directly or automatically pumped into the raised sewer in a similar way to that suggested for dealing with the canal area.

42. I consider it would be a great advantage to Calcutta if all that part of Salt Lake lying between the Circular Canal, the Biddiadhury river, Tolly's Nullah and Calcutta was embanked and reclaimed, and this operation would greatly facilitate the getting rid of the surface water from Calcutta, and would in my judgment be an immense advantage to Calcutta from a sanitary point of view.

43. In order to facilitate the surface drainage and prevent back currents in the surface water channels of the district, it will be requisite that self closing valves, flaps or gates should be fixed on the outlets of all surface water drains that discharge their contents below the level of high water spring tides whether into the Hooghly, Tolly's Nullah or other tidal channel.

44. I am of opinion that there are certain districts around Calcutta that for the sake of preserving the health of the inhabitants of Calcutta, ought to have been combined with the city in the recent enlargement, and which districts urgently require pure water and sewerage arrangements if the noxious influence of such places is not to extend to Calcutta itself. I more particularly allude to what is called the island area and Matiabrooj, south of Calcutta along the bank of the river, the property of the late King of Oudh.

45. The disposal of the present dry refuse of the city on the square mile is attended with some nuisance. Now, this in my judgment may almost entirely be prevented if precaution is taken to cover over the newly deposited material with from 18 inches to 2 feet in depth of material that has been deposited for ten years or upwards, and which has been converted into a natural mould or soil possessing considerable absorbing and deodorizing property.

46. I have very carefully looked through the health statistics of Calcutta for some years past, and have perused the carefully prepared and exhaustive reports of Dr. Simpson, your medical officer, and I regret to find that it appears from the figures and from the reports of your medical staff from so long a period ago as 1874, and up to the present time that the attention of the authorities of Calcutta has been directed to the enormous good that has resulted from the supply of good water to the city, but, on the other hand, their testimony has been against any improvement having been secured by the works of sewerage. After inspecting these works of sewerage and ascertaining the state of affairs to which I have drawn your attention, I should have been surprised if any sanitary advantage could have arisen from such works, but I am clearly of opinion, as I am of my own existence, that with a proper system of sewerage in Calcutta the benefit would be as certain as those which have arisen from the supply of good water, and when the defects in the present system of sewerage now pointed out are remedied you may rely upon securing the good results to health which have followed in every town to my knowledge that has been sanitarily drained.

47. I cannot conclude this report without tendering my thanks to James Kimber, Esq., MEM., INST. C.E., Dr. Simpson, Mr. W. Johnstone, Mr. G. M. Dickson, MEM., INST. M.E., Baboo Khetter Nath Ghose and to Mr. C. Cooper for the valuable services they have rendered to me throughout this enquiry.

MOTHER MARGARY.

BY GEORGE S. BURLEIGH.

ON a bleak ridge, from whose granite edges
Sloped the rough land to the grizzly north,
And where hemlocks, clinging to the hedges,
Like a thinned banditti straggled forth,
In a crouching, wormy-timbered hamlet,
Mother Margary shivered in the cold,
With a tattered robe of faded camlet
On her shoulders, crooked, weak, and old.

Time on her had done his cruel pleasure,
For her face was very dry and thin,
And the records of his growing measure
Lined and cross-lined all her shrivelled skin.
Scanty goods to her had been allotted,
Yet her thanks rose oftener than desire,
While her bony fingers, bent and knotted,
Fed with withered twigs the dying fire.

Raw and dreary were the northern winters,
Winds howled pitilessly around her cot,
Or with rude sighs made the jarring splinters
Moan the misery she bemoaned not.
Drifting tempests rattled at her windows,
And hung snow-wreaths round her naked bed,
While the wind-flaws muttered on the cinders,
Till the last spark fluttered and was dead.

Life had fresher hopes when she was younger,
But their dying wung out no complaints ;
Cold and Penury and Neglect and Hunger—
These to Margary were guardian saints.
Of the pearls which one time were the stamens
'Neath the pouting petals of her lips,
Only four stood yet, like swarthy Brannins
Penance parted from all fellowship.

And their clatter told the bead-roll dismal
Of her grim saints as she sat alone ;
While the tomb-path opened down abysmal,
Yet the sunlight through its portal shone.
When she sat her head was prayerlike bending,
When she rose it rose not any more,
Faster seemed her true heart graveward tending,
Than her tired feet, weak and travel-sore.

She was mother of the dead and scattered—
Had been mother of the brave and fair—
But her branches, bough by bough, were scattered,
Till her torn breast was left dry and bare.

Yet she knew—though sorely desolated
When the children of the poor depart,
Their earth-vestures are but sublimated,
So to gather closer in the heart.

With a courage which had never fitted
Words to speak it to the soul it blest,
She endured, in silence and unpitied,
Voes enough to mar a stouter breast.
'Thus was born such holy trust within her,
That the graves of all who had been dear,
To a region clearer and serener
Roused her spirit from our chilly sphere.

They were footsteps on her Jacob's Ladder ;
Angels to her were the Loves and Hopes
Which had left her purified but sadder—
And they lured her to the emerald slopes
Of that heaven, where Anguish never flashes
Her red fire-whip—happy land where flowers
Blossom over the volcanic ashes
Of this blighted, blighting world of ours.

All her power was a love of Goodness ;
All her wisdom was a mystic faith,
That the rough world's jargon and rudeness
Turns to music at the gate of death.
So she walked while feeble limbs allowed her,
Knowing well that any stubborn grief
She might meet with, would no more than crowd her
To the wall whose opening was Relief.

So she lived an anchoress of Sorrow,
Lone and peaceful on the rocky slope,
And when burning trials came, would borrow
New fire of them for the lamp of Hope.
When at last her palsied hand in groping
Rattled tremulous at the gated tomb,
Heaven flashed round her joys beyond her hoping,
And her young soul gladdened into bloom.

THE ROBIN REDBREASTS' CHORUS.

[There is an old English belief, that when a sick person is about to depart, a chorus of Robin Redbreasts raise their plaintive songs near the house of death.]

THE summer sweets had passed away, with many a heart-throb sore,
For warning voices said that she would ne'er see summer more ;
But still I hoped—'gainst hope itself—and at the autumn tide,
With joy I marked returning strength, while watching by her side.

But dreary winter and his blasts came with redoubled gloom,
With trembling hands the Christmas boughs I hung around the room ;
For gone the warmth of autumn days—her life was on the wane :
Those Christmas boughs at Candlemas I took not down again !*

* Evergreens hung about on Christmas eve, ought to be taken down on the 2nd Feb.—Candlemas-day—according to old usage.

One day a Robin Redbreast came unto the casement near,
She loved its soft and plaintive note, which few unmoved can hear;
But on each sad successive day this redbreast ceased not bringing
Other Robins, till a chorus full and rich was singing.

Then, then I knew that death was nigh, and slowly stalking on;
I gazed with speechless agony on our beloved one;
No tearful eye, no fluttering mien, such sorrow durst betray—
We tried to soothe each parting pang of nature's last decay.

The blessed Sabbath morning came, the last she ever saw;
And I had read of Jesus' love, of God's eternal law,
Amid the distant silver chime of Sunday bells sweet ringing—
Amid a chorus rich and full of Robin Redbreasts singing!

The grass waves high, the fields are green, which skirt the churchyard side,
Where channel vaults with massive walls their slumbering inmates hide;
The ancient trees cast shadows broad, the sparkling waters leap,
And still the redbreast sings around her long and dreamless sleep.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

LORD Lansdowne is charmed with Narkanda. Last year he visited the place. This year too he strays into it. He will be accompanied by Lady Lansdowne and Lady Evelyn.

It is likely that the Viceroy will leave Simla in September, proceeding on short tour in the Central Provinces. Reaching Calcutta, he may visit Burma.

THERE was an apprehension of disturbance at Mizapore. A body of police was accordingly despatched from Benares. This too was a temple affair—a dispute between two factions. It was reported—but not confirmed yet—that there was rioting and looting of Government treasury.

THERE was a thanksgiving service at the Russian Church in Paris for the escape of the Czarevitch from the sword of an assassin in Japan. After the Doxologia, Mass was celebrated. There were present the Russian Ambassador, Baron de Mohrenheim, King Milan of Serbia in civilian dress who was the first to kiss the crucifix presented to the faithful by the Archimandrite at the close of the service, Prince Louis Napoleon in his Russian Dragoon uniform, and the Japanese and Siamese Ministers.

THE Parsi agitation in Bombay has triumphed, to the condemnation and humiliation of the Police. The University Tower mystery has been solved—to the glory as well as the shame and sorrow of the Zoroastrians. The Coroner's verdict is that Buchubai died from injuries received in throwing herself from the tower in consequence of an attempted outrage upon her by some person or persons unknown, except to Manockji Aslaji, and that such person or persons and Manockji Aslaji were guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder. The other lady Perozebai, the Jury found, was thrown from the Tower by Manockji Aslaji in order to destroy evidence of his complicity in an attempted outrage on her by some person or persons unknown and that his act amounted to culpable homicide amounting to murder.

THE Gaekwar of Baroda has subscribed £100 for the Congress on Hygiene and Demography. The Secretary of State for India has suggested to the Viceroy the delegation to it of Native experts at the public expense.

HERE is another "extraordinary freak of Nature" from the columns of the Deccan Times :—

"A strange domestic occurrence is related to us from a village called Ramaram about 12 hours' journey on foot from Secunderabad. It is stated that a native woman of that village gave birth to a monster, a few days ago. The top of its head was as flat as a pan-cake and covered with a thick skin resembling hide. On each side of the forehead protruded a curved horn about 2 inches long. The eyes were similar to those of a deer, the face and body were of a human type, with the exception that the arms terminated at the elbow. It survived its birth but a short time."

IT is reported from Coonoor that a native horse-keeper's wife brought to litter four still-born female babes. Three were of equal size, about a foot high and about 3 inches across the shoulders, and the other about 9 inches long and 1½ inch thick.

AT Lahore, a stout Bunniah, while walking on the balcony of his house, in Hira Mandi, lost his balance and fell on a young woman who was lying on a cot downstairs. The Bunniah with a soft fall escaped with a few scratches, while the woman suffers from fracture of ribs.

In the first version of this paragraph from the press, the word preceding downwards was cat. Lucky would it have been for the woman had the fact agreed with our "devil's" reading.

HERE is a touching instance of the faithfulness of the dog :—

"Mr. Fielden had no relatives in England, and his faithful dog was the nearest mourner. When the neighbours gathered to pay their last respects to the deceased, they found the dog sitting at the head of the coffin, where he was allowed to remain until it was carried in the hearse; the dog walked beside the hearse to the cemetery, some three-and-a-half miles, and when the casket was taken into the vault he was allowed to follow. After the brief services there he returned to the old home with the neighbours, and has been taken by Thomas Ball, to whom Mr. Fielden gave him before he died. It was stated by those who attended the funeral, the dog seemed to realise what was taking place, and really exhibited signs of genuine sorrow."

MR. W. E. Ward, C.S.I., assumed charge of the office of Chief Commissioner of Assam on the forenoon of the 27th May. The Chief Commissioner arrived at Shillong on the 31st.

THE Gazette of India of May 30 notifies that the Meteorological Reporter to the Government of India will take rank in the first class of the supplementary graded list of civil offices not reserved for members of the Civil Service of India published with the Warrant of Precedence for India in Home Department Notification No. 2032, dated the 1st November 1877—that is to say, in Article 57 of the said Warrant.

POST runners are supposed to travel between five and six miles an hour. A Hindu has just done 22 miles in two and-a-half hours or nearly nine miles an hour. He started from Mysore with a letter to a merchant at Ganjam, Seringapatam, at six o'clock in the morning returning with the merchant's reply at 8-30.

AFTER they had been engaged for two years, a Bremen well-to-do engineer, Herr Seesen, jilted a girl, Franlein Zipper, a governess from Königsberg, for a wealthier woman. The girl revenged herself on him by entering his bedroom and shooting him dead. In her fury, she next ran to the house of an architect, named Pansing, and fired two shots at his eldest daughter, Seesen's intended bride, saying "You will never make sport of me again." The bullets missing their mark, Zipper aimed the revolver at her own head. She was, however, secured before she could end her own life.

AFTER a career of nearly half a century, Allen's Indian Mail has ceased to exist. It has been incorporated with the Homeward Mail.

MR. Beveridge contributes to the new number of the Calcutta Review some Notes of a Holiday Trip to Maldah and Behar. It has no literary pretensions, but, like everything from the same pen, is worth attention. His fellow enquirers in the field of Indian history and historical topography will find some bits of valuable information.

Mr. Beveridge, we see, revives the old legend of the death of Jagat Seth. "It was," he says, speaking of Monghyr,

"It was from a bastion of the fort, it is said, that the Set and his faithful servant were flung into the river."

It is true that Mr. Beveridge qualifies the statement by the addition "it is said." In a note to the passage, too, he more distinctly inclines to a contrary belief. Nevertheless, he gives the "bazaar gup" of Haji Mustapha. We better quote the whole note :—

"The Sâir says that the Sets were killed at Barh, and this I believe to be correct, but Haji Mustapha, the translator, says, li. 281, note, that 'out of 10,000 boatmen that pass every year by a certain tower of the castle of Monghyr, there is not a man but will point it out as the spot where the two Jagat Seths were drowned, nor is there an old woman of Monghyr but will report the speech of the heroical Chuni to his master's executioners. Chuni was the Seths' servant and insisted on being drowned with them, (see the same volume, p. 268, note). At all events it would appear that the unfortunate Ram Narain, the Governor of Patna, was drowned in the Ganges."—Calcutta Review, Vol. CL. XXXIII, January 1891, p. 160.

That last statement is certainly safe, though of course requiring a word of explanation to the uninitiated. Rannarayan met with his death at Monghyr, forcibly drowned in the river with a heavy bag of sand by order of Meer Kasim. That is the account of Gholam Hossein and other authorities and the established truth. So far so good. The rest of the note only enshrines error. It is an error, to begin with, to speak of the two Jagat Seths. There cannot be two men of the same designation at the same time. On the death of the two brothers, the author—the original authority—and his translator are at variance. By repeating the latter's babblement, Mr. Beveridge has done his best to perpetuate false history. We may mention that the point is incidentally touched in Mookerjee's Travels in Bengal, in the following passage:—

"The boatmen of Bengal's partiality is wellknown. Grave historians love to tell how no native craft, small or large, ever rounded the fort of Monghyr without the sailors paying their homage of song to the memory of the great Jagat Seth and his brother hurried to death from its tower by the ruthless Nawab Nazim, and, above all, to that of the Seth's heroic valet, Choomnee, who pressed the offer of his own life to save his master's. The singing may be true to this day, though its subject must be different, for I am sure the historians, as in so many other cases, have perpetrated and perpetuated a fable."—Travels in Bengal, pp. 19-20.

Mr. Beveridge will always be remembered for the light he has thrown on the history of the British conquest and administration of Bengal. He has given the true account of the Indian career of the first Governor-General, the accuracy of which neither the special pleading of Fitz-James Stephen nor the researches of Forrest have substantially impugned. In the present article, he incidentally shows up the pretension of the former as a controversialist in the debatable points of Indian history. Speaking of the old stronghold in Shahabad, he writes:—

"Rohtas is curiously connected with the trial of Nanda Kumar. When he was accused of forging Bolaqi Dass' Seal, a witness for the defence produced a paper containing a similar impression which he said he got from Bolaqi. Impey and the jury seem to have considered this as an undoubted forgery, and Sir James Stephen is of the same opinion. The reason for this idea was, that it was thought impossible that Mir Qasim (Bolaqi's master) could have had anything to do with Rohtas, or with treasure, at the time mentioned in the paper. It appears, however, that all this was a mistake. Sir James Stephen, indeed, is so ill acquainted with Behar that he does not know that Buxar is in it, and speaks of Mir Qasim's leaving Behar in May, 1764, and never returning to it. In fact, Mir Qasim had his wife, and apparently his treasure also, in Rohtas till the battle of Buxar, in October, 1764, and even later."—Notes of a Holiday Trip to Malda and Behar by H. Beveridge in the Calcutta Review, January 1891, pp. 162-63.

WE are sorry to hear that a young Magistrate in a District not far from Calcutta, has got into the habit of using offensive language in his remarks on the work of the Deputy-Magistrates and Deputy-Collectors subordinate to him. Senior and experienced officers, who have always enjoyed the favorable opinion and confidence of their superiors, are now smarting under uncourteous and insulting language. Nothing can possibly justify such extraordinary rudeness. In the present case, we need scarcely say it is entirely undeserved. We trust that the Magistrate in question will yet show enough consideration for the feelings of men who have grown grey in the service of Government and who have attained a high reputation for ability and efficiency.

WHILE firing at a target with a pea rifle in his palace grounds, notwithstanding the precautions taken, a son of Raja Murli Manahar, of Hyderabad, Deccan, shot dead an old servant.

THE Beliatwallahs in the Dacca District seem striving for the highest honours in lawlessness. They have added another feather to their cap by a recent murder. Mr. Manomohan Ghose, who originally hails from the same District, is being prepared to defend the accused.

MR. Gungaram Bhow Mhaske, Pleader, is being prosecuted in the Poona City Magistrate's Court on charges of house-breaking by night in order to commit an offence punishable with imprisonment and using criminal force with intent to outrage the modesty of Jainumbee—a Boree widow of 32 years. Babajee Kashiba Teliis charged with abetment of the same, having permitted the Pleader to have access to his house adjoining the widow's to enable him to enter her room. Mr. Bland, Solicitor, assisted by Mr. R. B. Vaidya, prosecutes, while Mr. Perashaw Mehta, Barrister-at-law, instructed by Mr. Sydenham Smith and Mr. Meewanjee, defends the accused. We reproduce below from the Mahratta the examination-in-chief of the widow:—

"I live with my brother-in-law, Moosajee, in Main Street, Poona. I occupy a room in my brother-in-law's house on the upper floor over the shop, overlooking the street. I know both the accused Gungaram, and Babajee Kasiba. Gungaram lives opposite to my house. I remember Monday the 11th of May. I went to bed about 10 o'clock; my daughter aged 5 years slept on the same cot with me. About 1 o'clock at night Gungaram entered my room and caught hold of my hand. I saw him enter the room. He came from the side of Kasiba's house through the window. I saw him the first time when he entered the room. I saw him step through the window into my room. I saw accused come through Babajee's window and then enter mine. I was lying on my cot when I saw the accused coming into my room, and I concluded he came in the direction of Babajee's house. On entering my room, Gungaram pulled my hand. I cried out 'Bhai, Bhai' on which he let go my hand. I saw him distinctly, as there was a light burning in my room at the time. When I shouted 'Bhai, Bhai,' he let go my hand and blew out the light. My brother-in-law Moosajee then came and caught hold of Gungaram. Then I went out to the back terrace and made an alarm, and Luckmanjee brought in a light. I then went into the room at the back of my house, the room occupied by Luckmanjee and his wife. I remained there with the children. I did not invite Gungaram to my house and had no reason to do so. I lived in this room since I got married. Gungaram has never been in my room before. I have never spoken to Gungaram, and never had any communication of any kind with him. I have never written him a letter of any kind, and do not know how to write. I could see Gungaram's verandah from my windows. I have often seen him in his verandah. He too can see into my room from his verandah. I can't say if he ever stared at me from his verandah. He never acted as my Vakeel. He has never been to my house to my knowledge. He has been on good terms with my family, and never quarrelled with us. I have never given him any encouragement to be intimate with me."

THE following is an extract from the despatch of the Governor General in Council to the Secretary of State, dated Camp, Delhi, 12th November 1890, regarding the disturbance in Cambay, from among the papers published as a Parliamentary blue-book:—

"The interesting reports submitted by Mr. H. E. M. James, the Commissioner of the Northern Division, show that there is much in the administration of the Cambay State, besides the assessment of the land revenue, which demands remedial attention. Among other causes of discontent are enumerated, the reduction of the pay received by the village headmen whose influence has thus been diminished, the imposition of oppressive cesses on cultivators and others, the appropriation by the State of the hides of dead cattle, and oppression and even torture, employed in the collection of the revenue. Both the police and the military force are said to require re-organisation, while the finances are in disorder, and the revenue administration is tainted. Taking all these matters into consideration, the Governor of Bombay in Council has, with the approval of the Government of India, temporarily deputed Major Kennedy, a political officer of tried ability and experience, to reduce the affairs of the Cambay State to order.

In carrying out the necessary reforms, the Political Officer will act under the supervision and direction of the Commissioner of the Northern Division of Bombay; and, subject to this limitation, will exercise all the authority of the Nawab, who, in the meantime, will be required to abstain from interference. The Political Agent's arrangements will be made with the intention of rendering the Nawab's restoration to power a possibility of the near future. It is anticipated that, within two years' time, the administration of the State will be sufficiently settled to enable the authority of its ruler to be restored, and it is not the intention of the Government of Bombay that the temporary suspension of His Highness's power should be prolonged more than is absolutely necessary to secure the stability of his rule and the welfare of his subjects."

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

EXECUTION of stern justice has commenced in Manipur. Kajao, charged with, and convicted of, the murder of Mr. Greenwood, has, after confirmation of his sentence by the Governor-General in Council, been executed. This was no "retaliatory execution." The corpse was allowed to be taken away by the friends of the hanged. Colonel Sammo Singh and Major Arya Parel have been sentenced to death, for abetment of the murder of Mr. Quinton and other British officers. Poor Sammo's fate in especial has evoked much sympathy in British India and among all who knew his amiable character. The Tongal Major or General, as he is indifferently called, was tried for having ordered the execution of the British officers. He denied having had any hand in the massacre, and said that the witnesses against him are the adherents of the Senapati. He has been pronounced guilty and sentenced to be hanged. The sentence was delivered as well as sent up to Simla for confirmation on the 1st June. The trial of the Jubraj Prince Tikendrajit, usually called the Senapati, commenced the same day.

THE Maharaja of Benares has been conspicuous by his loyal celebration of the Birthday of Her Majesty. According to a Benares telegram, the Maharaja "fired a royal salute of thirty-one guns from his fort, and distributed large quantities of food-grain, clothes and umbrellas to the poor. A general holiday was observed at Ramnagar, and his Highness's officers also gave an entertainment and an ice supper, to which about one hundred Native gentlemen were invited." The ice supper is not described. Is it a cold supper? or was ice used to cool the drinking water? In either case, it is an advance on orthodox ideas. The distribution of umbrellas is in keeping with modern social anarchy. Under the vaunted equality of British rule, everybody, whatever his position in the scale of society, is free to ape royalty. This is markedly visible in marriage processions. A sweeper or a fisherman has no scruples to order of a contractor the paraphernalia of a royal progress for his boy bridegroom, and the procession is allowed by the authorities and guarded by the Police, while the public who have lost the significance of such demonstrations, look on in brutish indifference if not with admiration. The contagion has spread to Ramnagar, and the Maharaja of Benares makes a free present to the rabble of umbrellas, the peculiar privilege of kings and of the high. Another report speaks of shoes in addition to the umbrellas. While the European in India has begun to exact barefootedness of the native as a mark of respect, His Highness of Benares descends to cover the nakedness of the people's lower extremities. For such a suggestion his forefather Ooditanayan would have given a shoeing in a different sense.

"OLD TAMIL," a correspondent of the Ceylon Patriot, tells some home truths to his people on the Island, which have a wider application. He reprobates the habitual use of English in business and the affairs of daily life by those who are but imperfectly acquainted with the language. Writing himself thoroughly well, he is entitled to speak with authority. Nor does he talk like a pedant but with true sympathy, if from the experience of a man of the world. He cautions his countrymen against the use of English if they can help it. He counsels them to stick to their vernacular whenever their official or other European is well acquainted with the latter. A sound rule, doubtless. He would also discourage the priggishness of natives conversing in English, except on necessary occasions, such as formal meetings. He doubtless can have no objection to those indulging in the luxury who are thoroughly competent for it. But such foreigners are rare indeed. He justly says:—

"The native is generally taken at a disadvantage when he does not use his own language with a foreigner conversant with it. He finds that he is not at home; his ideas lose their persuasiveness in the difficult struggle to find adequate expression, his statements are half understood and perhaps wrongly construed, and his several halts and hesitations make the addressee impatient, with the result that the thing aimed at is lost. The witness box is one of the places where one should avoid expressing himself in a foreign tongue. The important issues at stake, the imposing and impressive assemblage, the hard handling by the Counsel and the Bench have made many a smatterer of English get nervous and confused and break down.

The objection to the free use of the vernacular seems to arise from a notion on the part of the native that such use may be construed as an indication of his incapacity, while the foreigner thinks that the very reverse of the course the native adopts will be in keeping with dignity. If improvement be your object in conversing in English, do so by all means; but let not the craze for English conversation be so indulged as to impede the intelligent and speedy transaction of business."

This is true counsel, and "Old Tamil" has brought to notice a folly which rages no less on the Continent than on the Island. We need scarcely say we heartily concur in every word of his letter.

SOME of the Calcutta papers have given insertion to a telegram from Bombay to the effect, that a meeting of Hindoos and Mahomedans was recently held at the place to adopt a memorial to Parliament against the Age of Consent Act. We could see at once that the demonstration had been got up by wire-pulling from Calcutta, and here is how the Advocate of India confirms our suspicion.

"For some mysterious reason, the few people in the Bombay Presidency who took the trouble to express an adverse opinion about the Age of Consent Bill are maintaining a spasmodic opposition to the Act. No doubt they are being influenced as of old, by urgent messages from Calcutta, which is said to be organising a mass meeting for the same purpose. In accordance with the announcement made on Saturday, a number of persons, Hindoos and Mahomedans, met last evening near the Victoria Gardens to protest against the measure, and to move Parliament to abrogate it. Not a single Hindoo or Mahomedan of note appears to have attended it, and it seems safe to say of nine-tenths of those who attended the meeting that they did not understand a word of the long memorial that they were supposed to have come there to support."

This is how the journalist at the spot describes those present at the Bombay meeting. Is it, we ask the wire-pullers, desirable or advisable to continue the agitation in this way, and disturb the minds of the ignorant Hindoo and Mahomedan population, by telling them that the Government of India is bent upon interfering with their religion?

A NATIVE groom prosecuted his Christian master for assault. The master denied the charge and stated that the groom was insolent to himself and his wife and that he wanted to chastise him when the syce ran away. Mr. Handley found the charge false and fined the complainant Rs. 10, awarding the sum as compensation to the defendant. In the present case there was a show of assault, but absolutely false cases by servants are not unfrequent. The common trick is to sue in the Small Cause Court for wages far in excess of what may be actually due. The rascals know that gentlemen will suffer much rather than appear in court. The Judges say they are unable to put down the practice as the cases are often ex parte. But is there no means to summarily punish such delinquents? We are of opinion that the legal advisers of the suing parties are much to blame. Has the Court no hold on its practising pleaders?

Our readers are already aware that the piece of land in Shambazar, on which the disputed mosque stands, has been purchased for Rs. 4,500 by our wealthy townsman, Kassim Ariff Suratee, the wellknown merchant and owner of the Silk Manufactory at Ultadinee. In consequence of the unwillingness of the former owner, Suresh Chunder Deb, to sell the land at a fair price, there was some difficulty in the way of the peaceful solution, in the ordinary way of business, of a grave religious feud. The Baboo had made his purchase, with full knowledge of its difficulties, in the hope of making a good thing out of it, and was bent on obtaining more than double what he had paid. He had actually told Mr. Lambert when asked what he meant to do with the land—that he intended to stand by his rights, the law being on his side. After the riot, a change, however, came over the spirit of his dream, and the Baboo ultimately agreed to sell his property at a reasonable value, and Kassim Ariff, an active Member of the Committee of the Mahomedan Literary Society, purchased it, solely with the object of putting an end to the dispute between the Mahomedans and Hindoos. The Mahomedan Literary Society, during its career of more than a quarter of a century, has rendered a good many services to the Mahomedans as well as to Government and the public at large, by bringing about a good feeling between the different sections of society, and in the present instance it has made itself useful in the interests of the general community.

FROM the proceedings of the trial of the Shambazar riot, which have appeared in the papers, only the guilt or innocence of the parties who have been arrested by the Police, will be established. But the trial, as conducted, is not calculated to shew how the row originated, and how it developed into a serious affray. It is, therefore, desirable that a thorough enquiry should be made into the whole thing, to find out what act or acts of the decreeholder, or of any one else, had exasperated the Mahomedans, originally collected at the spot simply to save the mosque from being demolished, into committing such excesses and defying the Police. It is also deserving of enquiry, whether the Baboo had really threatened the Mahomedans with demolition of the mosque, with the help of a number of Dhangurs or scavengers, who are under the orders of his younger brother, an Overseer of the municipality—and whether a large party of them had not appeared at the scene and given the Mahomedans an impression that the threat of the Baboo was going to be carried out.

THE Sadharan Brahmo prosecution of the Banganibashi is not concluded yet. It was twice taken up by Mr. Handley, the officiating

Chief Magistrate, last week. It came on again last Thursday. Mr. Garth and Mr. P. L. Roy prosecute, while Mr. Palit and Mr. Dunne represent the defence. The proprietor, the publisher and the printer all pleaded guilty technically to the atrocious law that spares nobody however connected with a newspaper. While thus yielding to the law, the proprietor stated that he was not the writer of the matter complained of and that he could not possibly prevent its appearance, but he was willing to give up the name of the writer. The publisher was a mere publisher and knew not what he published. The poor printer was in a worse plight. He simply carried out orders. The editor disavowed all connection with the alleged defamation in that he was not the editor when the article appeared. These as regarded the complaints on behalf of the Somaj. With reference to the individual complaint of Baboo Dwarkanath Gangooly, the defence would not admit that he or his wife (who since the commencement of the prosecution has filed a suit in the High Court against the said newspaper, claiming one lac of rupees as damages which the Judge, while admitting the plaint, characterized as extravagant) neither of whom is mentioned by name, was aimed at in the article, and that if they chose to fit the cap on themselves, the accused could only be sorry for it. They could do something else although they did not mention it—laugh in their sleeves at the tomfoolery. Nothing daunted by this neat reductio ad absurdum, Mr. Garth insisted, notwithstanding the disclaimer, that he would show that the portraiture was unmistakable—it fitted his client Gangooly to a t and nobody else within a reasonable margin. He wanted to put in other issues of the paper. Mr. Palit objecting, a day was fixed for argument, the Magistrate ultimately deciding in favor of Mr. Palit.

A FERRY contractor near Farrah, in the Muttra District, has been committed to the sessions for carrying, in a small old boat, at night, one hundred and twenty old persons and attempting to cross the Jumna, when the bottom of the boat giving way in mid stream eighty of the passengers were drowned. We hope our contemporaries up the country will report the proceedings in sessions. It would not be amiss if the Government watched them with interest. Sir Auckland Colvin has done much to stimulate the progress of railways. But great as are railways, they are not all in all. In the personal life of the people they hold a subordinate position. To the poor cultivator the ferry boat is a more important institution. Now the abuses in connection with these ferries are many and grave, which the people cannot choose but suffer in silence, a reform in this department would be a boon to the masses.

The matter concerns the whole empire, and Bengal is specially interested. We wish Sir Charles Elliott might give his mind to the subject.

It may be in the recollection of our readers, that the Government of Bengal, about this time last year, had promised to take into consideration the strong recommendation of Nawab Abdool Lateef to extend the provisions of Act I (B. C.) of 1876, for the registration of Mahomedan marriages and divorces, to the town and suburbs of Calcutta, as well as to some of the Suburban Districts. Orders have now been passed for the extension of that Act to Calcutta and to the Districts of the 24-Pergunnahs, Jessore and Moorshedabad, and eight Registrars appointed for the registration of Mahomedan marriages and divorces in Calcutta divided for the purpose into eight Divisions.

These eight Registrars are all Sunnis. For the Sheeahs, a Sheeah has been told off for all the eight Divisions. Similarly, four Registrars have been appointed at Cossipore, Sealdah, Bhowanipore and Khidderpore, and seven in the interior of the District of the 24-Pergunnahs.

We trust these newly appointed officers will succeed in persuading the Mahomedans, chiefly of the lower classes, to register their marriages and divorces in due form, and thereby materially help the magistrates in the disposal of the numerous cases arising out of matrimonial squabbles.

AFTER all the recommendations in vain of years—after the amalgamations and abolitions and substantial economies urged by Commissions and Committees, the Government of India have awakened to the subject. They have gone in for reconstitution and no mistake. This is the characteristic flea-bite with which they are prepared to inaugurate their new rôle.

As a measure of Army reform, it has been decided to localize two native battalions of the Bombay army in Baluchistan, and to change the composition of these corps by the substitution of men recruited from the border tribes inhabiting the country above the passes. The two regiments selected are the 24th and 26th Bombay Infantry which will be henceforth known as "The 24th (Baluchistan) Regiment of Bombay Infantry" and "The 26th (Baluchistan) Regiment of Bombay Infantry." These corps will be enlisted for general service, but, except on emergency or when required for field service, they will only be required to serve above the passes in Baluchistan or transfrontier country. The head-quarters of the 24th will be Quetta. Both the regiments, consisting each of 800 sepoys, will be recruited from Pathans and other tribes within the limits and on the borders of the Baluchistan Agency. Their uniform will be the same as that of the Baluch battalions, a drab coat and pagri being substituted for those now worn. They will be armed with Martini-Henry rifles.

THE NATIONAL INDIAN ASSOCIATION AND POSTOFFICIAL BABBLEMENT.

SOME extraordinary statements were made at the annual meeting of the National Indian Association at London which, notwithstanding the position of those who made them, will be heard in this country with some surprise. This is an Association which has existed for some years with the object professedly of promoting the training of Indian women, especially of widows, as teachers, but the actual impression it has been so far able to make upon the vast field of Indian female education is scarcely proportionate to all its imposing professions, its paper organization, its meetings and speeches, and its desperate devices for raising funds. In this last respect, it achieves no mean success, we believe. We do not know the exact financial transactions of the Association or of the institutions allied to it. There is not overmuch of publicity about them. But from the wellknown inexhaustible liberality of the English people at home towards any movement set afoot in the name of philanthropy, and the rapidity with which this country is learning Western arts of making philanthropy a trade, the funds realised cannot presumably be inconsiderable. Properly applied in the hands of really good and disinterested men, the money obtained by official pressure or otherwise would go far towards promoting the cause of female education. But unfortunately there is no knowing if the funds are not diverted from their proper destination, make-believe institutions for training and teaching being kept up for the sake of appearances. Imposture of this kind, in the sacred work of education, is by no means new. It is an importation into India of European methods of raising the wind—which deserves to be unmasked some day.

The guise of philanthropy is, however, taking. Its clever methods are successful even with people otherwise keen and astute enough. Not to speak of charitably disposed British Dives who is the especial prey of the imposition, people more in touch with this country have sometimes shown a singular incapacity for seeing through these dodges. We are afraid there is something unreal about the National Indian Association. We are the more led to this view from our observations during Miss Manning's recent visit to this country. At any rate while in Calcutta, she did not apparently find that her Association had done much real work. We say the Association has made little or no impression upon the difficult work which it has professedly undertaken. If in Calcutta or elsewhere there is some progress in female education, it is due to Government initiative, and to schools partly or wholly maintained by the Government. The Association's influence is little seen. Beyond an annual meeting at Belvedere, held under the presidency of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal for the time being, the National Indian Association's very existence would not be suspected by the outside public. On this occasion the Director of Public Instruction is put forward to make as good a case for the Association as he possibly can, but every knowing man understands that this annual ceremony serves no really useful purpose beyond an official certificate or advertisement of the Association.

Such being the real state of things, one cannot help being amused by the kind of claims set up for the Association at its recent anniversary at London. The following extract from an account of the proceedings will show the extent of irresponsible speaking freely indulged in by retired Anglo-Indian officials on their release from the restraints of office :—

"Sir Roper Lethbridge, M. P., referred to the immense value of the society's work as a social force in India. While giving credit to the efforts of the various religious bodies, it was essential that there should be social and educational work carried on by a society absolutely unattached to any religious denomination. The chairman (Sir Stewart Bayley) expressed the opinion that the association had an immense and important work before it. The next generation of Indian women would not be content to remain in the absolute darkness of ignorance, and he could hardly express the intensity of his own feeling upon the all-importance of this subject to the welfare of India. The present want of education among the women of India undoubtedly constituted a check to social progress. While he was Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal he had had conclusive proof that the opposition to the Age of Consent Bill and the great difficulties which were thrown in the way of many other items of social reform were largely due to the opposition of the Zenana, and that opposition could only be reached through education."

We wonder how a man of the Indian experience and knowledge of Sir Roper Lethbridge could put forward for the Association the claim of being an undenominational body. This claim is purely imaginary—nay, absurd in the circumstances of this country. If the authors of the Association have chosen to give it such a constitution, it is and will remain a paper constitution, for many a day. So far as this Association exists—and its existence is sometimes of an intangible kind—it is connected with one or other religious society in antagonism with the orthodox religions of the people. The statement is mere claptrap.

Sir Stewart Bayley is perfectly welcome to indulge in the fervour of his feeling, but it is evidently a fervour of a manageable kind. During the long years of his Indian career nobody suspected it. Were it not for Miss Manning's voyage the little overt indications of interest in native female education shown towards the end would probably not have occurred. He was wise in confining the "immense and important" function of female teachers to the future. In the past and present, there has been precious little seen of these products of the Association. No doubt, the work of female education and of a civilization in India moulded after Western models has a future before it. But we are afraid that future will not be much in the hands of the National Indian Association, if it does not discard the unreality of its present management. Sir Stewart was evidently determined to commend the Association to the British public in the most impressive manner he could, but this object might well have been accomplished without laying at the door of our uneducated women a charge which is not true. We are not aware of the information on which he bases the opinion that the opposition to the Age of Consent Bill came largely from the zenana. We are in a better position to judge of the matter, and we are decidedly of a contrary opinion. Our elderly ladies with all their superstitions and prejudices in other respects were in real sympathy with the Bill, and it would have been unnatural, nay monstrous, if they failed to appreciate a law intended to afford to the female sex protection from hardships too wellknown to them.

This sort of irresponsible chatter by retired Indian rulers is mischievous. It is a common enough dissipation, but we are pained to see a sober man like Sir Stewart indulge in it.

MR. HARRINGTON'S INCINERATOR, AND THE HEALTH OFFICER'S NOTE THEREON.

NOTWITHSTANDING the complaints of suffering from hundreds and thousands, an infinitesimal fraction of which only reaches the ears of Editors, some of whom seem to be so interested in the blundering author of the Incinerator as to turn a deaf ear to these complaints; notwithstanding powerful leaders in at least one disinterested paper which has held the view that the whole thing has been a delusion from the first, a view that has been singularly verified to the very letter; notwithstanding the strong condemnation passed upon it by the Engineer and the Health Officer to the Corporation; notwithstanding that a hut has been actually set on fire by the burning cinders from it; there stands the Incinerator in all its unenviable glory, belching forth, without intermission, day and night, vapours and gases, which, issuing in continuous stream, have so thoroughly contaminated the atmosphere of certain wards as to render pure fresh air unknown to their residents, thus rendering life almost unbearable. It would be a great delusion on the part of those who from their position and distance do not actually smell the blessed smells, to believe that they will escape their pernicious influence. If the law of diffusion of gases be a law of nature, then the whole atmosphere of Calcutta is being efficiently poisoned by the gaseous products of the Incinerator.

We published in our issue of the 23rd ultimo, Mr. Kimber's note on the Incinerator. It is a short but a straightforward document. Mr. Kimber says plainly in what respects Mr. Harrington has failed to carry out the agreement entered into by him with the Corporation. One of these is that the Incinerator has not been able to burn the stipulated quantity of refuse, but has fallen short by 12½ per cent. But this is a small matter. The most essential condition has not been fulfilled, viz., "that the furnaces shall be absolutely proof against the escape of noxious fumes." "Several complaints," says Mr. Kimber, "have been made by people in the neighbourhood of the Incinerator of noxious fumes since the date of the latest alteration made by Mr. Harrington with the view of preventing them, and I have myself experienced such fumes on several occasions. I am of opinion that the alterations have made no improvement in abating the noxious fumes. * * The prevention of noxious fumes and the destruction of carcasses and infected articles require the most intense combustion—a feature which is entirely absent from Mr. Harrington's Incinerator."

We have to consider in our present issue Dr. Simpson's note on the Incinerator. It is much more elaborate than, but we are sorry to say not as straightforward as, Mr. Kimber's note. As a sanitarian Dr. Simpson could not but condemn an incinerator of refuse and garbage which does not fully burn up the first products of combustion, that is, break them up into their constituent elements. But he has chosen to dilute his condemnation by pointing out the utility of the Incinerator in other respects, and by an ill-suppressed ridicule of those who complain of the offensiveness of the smells and the pernicious character of the gases given out by the Incinerator. The distinction he makes between offensiveness and disagreeableness is a distinction without a difference, and is what we did not expect from a sanitarian of his experience and eminence. "There was no great offensiveness," says he, "proceeding from the chimney, but there did come from the chimney a slightly coloured smoke mixed much with vapour which, in certain states of the atmosphere, or when driven down by the wind into the windows of houses at some distance from the Incinerator, was distinctly perceptible. The smell was such as is noticeable in the smoke of burning hay, and though not offensive, was certainly disagreeable, and not such as any one should be subjected to for any length of time." Admitting that the smell was not offensive, which however is against the experience of the majority, we have Dr. Simpson's admission that it was certainly disagreeable, and the distinction between offensiveness and continuous disagreeableness is practically nil for those who have to suffer from the latter not only during the day but during the night when with the exhaustion and relaxation of the bodily powers the susceptibility to morbid influences becomes greater. The smell is "not such as any one should be subjected to for any length of time." It is a pity that a Health Officer of such scientific eminence as Dr. Simpson should have used language so loose as that, should not have thought it necessary to fix the "length of time" however approximately it might have been. What did he mean by any length of time? Did he mean a continuous hour or a few hours, a day or a few days, a week or a few weeks, or months, or years? For notwithstanding his opinion against subjecting any one to the fumes of the Incinerator for any length of time, the Commissioners, absolutely unmindful of that opinion, have allowed the Incinerator to work on to the disgust, discomfort, annoyance and unhealth of a large number of rate-payers whose money was permitted to be wasted in making a dangerous and blundering experiment. If Dr. Simpson had been precise in his language, we dare say the Commissioners could not have been so unmindful as they have been.

Another fatal mistake committed by Dr. Simpson is the hasty expression of opinion as to the innocuousness of the smoke of the Incinerator. Dr. Simpson cites the statistics of the Campbell Hospital in support of his opinion. "This smoke blew steadily into the hospital for four months," says he, "yet beyond the inconvenience arising from the circumstance, nothing occurred in the health of the patients which could be attributed to the inhalation of the smoke." Here then we have the admission that the poor patients of the Campbell Hospital were and are being subjected to the inconvenience arising from the Incinerator. Would the authorities of the General Hospital, would the authorities of even the Medical College Hospital, permit their patients to be subjected to such inconvenience for "any length of time?" The authorities of the Campbell Hospital must have hearts as sensitive as their olfactory organs, and what reliance can be placed upon statistics furnished by them? Besides, an experienced sanitarian like Dr. Simpson should have known how subtle in the majority of cases, and therefore how difficult of ascertainment, the etiology of disease is, and how impossible it would be to enforce sanitary measures and reforms if in every case we were to base them upon only the positively ascertained facts of etiology. Then again, there is the fact of immunity from constant habit. Witness our mehters and dhangars who not only do not seem to suffer from the nuisances in the very midst of which they may be literally said to live and move and have their being, but in reality are most of them very robust people. How dangerous it would be to conclude from these facts that nuisances are not nuisances, that sewer gas is not only not offensive but innocuous?

Dr. Simpson had the smoke and vapour issuing from the Incinerator analysed by Mr. Criper, the analyst at Waldie & Co., and the result of this analysis, though imperfect, is, as far as it goes, strongly condemnatory of the Incinerator. Mr. Criper detected tarry matter, carbonic acid and ammonia in the smoke, but with reference to the remaining gases he says that they have not been estimated as apparatus for their determination had to be procured from England! Nevertheless Mr. Criper has not hesitated to observe that "the presence of tarry matter indicates a certain amount of distillation. It also shows that all the organic matter is not burnt out of the smoke. It is this organic matter probably combined with some hydrocarbon gases (not yet estimated) which causes the smell." He further observes that "the arrangement for submitting the smoke to a high temperature, called by Mr. Harrington a cremator, is very imperfect." So then there is tarry matter and other organic matters in the smoke, and there is no arrangement in the Incinerator to burn them up. Who will say that the continual inhalation of such smoke charged with tarry and other gases will not be attended with derangement of health? Nature must have committed a great blunder in having planted a very sensitive organ acting as sentinel for the detection of smells at the very entrance to the respiratory apparatus, when those smells are no correct indices of the salutary or insalutary character of the gases which may mix with the pure air of heaven. It is refreshing, however, to see that notwithstanding his half belief in the innocuousness of the gases of the Incinerator, his instincts as a sanitarian compel Dr. Simpson to emphatically declare: "From a sanitary point of view, I should be the last to recommend any system that would in the slightest degree have a chance of polluting the air or ever causing annoyance to the inhabitants, because the purpose of the whole Incinerator scheme would thus be nullified if one bad system was merely to be substituted for another, and for this reason the efficient burning of the smoke should be insisted upon." When this is done, no body would object to the Incinerator. But so long as this is not done, it should not be permitted to render breathing impossible. For it has literally come to that. The air of the ground floor of Calcutta houses has been rendered impure by the gases from the sewers, and now the air of the second and upper stories is being rendered worse by the gases from the Incinerator. Where are people to go in order to breathe? The practicability, in Mr. Baldwin Latham's opinion, of doing away with the smoke nuisance, cannot be any consolation, inasmuch as so long as the practicability is not actually carried out, people will be suffering all the same. The mere opinion of practicability cannot supply the place of fresh air.

While writing the above we learn to our great relief, and it must be to the relief of other sufferers, that the General Committee of the Corporation, at their meeting this afternoon, have adopted the suggestion of the Health Officer of closing the Incinerator for the present. The Incinerator will cease to work from Monday. We have no doubt the residents of the suffering wards will now freely breathe, and will invoke blessings on their Health Officer and on the members of the General Committee.

DANCING PASHAS IN DIABOLIC DISSIPATION OR BRITISH GODS AND GODDESSES PLAYING AT FALLEN ANGELS.

THE British rulers—civil and military—of Southern India having, on plea of being able to work better in the cool atmosphere of the Hills than in warm Madras and the Coromandel Coast generally, retired to Ootacamund, are making the most of their summer retreat. They are dining and drinking and dancing and singing their hours away in a round of enjoyment and possibly laying in stores of work for the courts of the plains below. Meanwhile, between frisky matrons and hoary-headed sinners, between bold grass-widows and reckless official "mashers," between Military adroitness and Civil impudence, they are amusing themselves with a merry abandonment which has quite filled the rest of European society in India with uncalculable envy. They lately held a saturnalia of pleasure in the shape of a masquerade under the auspices of Sir James Dornier. The highest authorities have declared that the office of this exalted knight is an anachronism and an anomaly, and only the other day it was definitively proposed to abolish the Command-in-Chief of the Madras Presidency. The wide-awake incumbent has accordingly demonstrated the uses of the post. If Geography and History alike have thrown the Madras Command into the shade, genius may still discover a function for it, by adapting it to circumstances. If there be no need for it, it may still shine as an ornament. If the warrior's occupation's gone, he may still dance and lead to dance and be bedanced. What wonder! It has always proved more serviceable to some persons in uniform that they attended more to their posture-master than their drill. Well, something is better than nothing. Your Madras heroes are not to be condemned outright. If their occasions for showing fight have become small by degrees until they have totally disappeared, their opportunities for dissipation have multiplied by leaps and bounds. Indeed, since the waning political interest of the Southern Presidency, this has been the case of the whole albocracy of the South, civil as well as military. They are all trying their best to divert their becalmed and colourless existence and to make themselves agreeable in the sight of men and gods, specially the latter of the Northern Olympus who claim to have discovered the secret of combining work with play. In their endeavour to establish their raison d'être, the Madras officocracy have gone beyond the highest latitude of the Himalayas. From dancing these howling Pashas have come to very devilling. There is a saying attributed to the Prophet of Islam that where a man and a woman are together in a convenient situation, the presence of a third person may be taken for granted, whether you see him or not, that person being no other than the enemy of God and man. Without any claims to prophetic inspiration, prudent men of the world have said that the descent from the polka to Pandemonium is easy as that down Avernus. And the Madras magnates seem to have found this out on the slopes of the Nilgiris. Dancing in propria persona as honest Britons and Christians had evidently lost its zest for them. Accordingly, in search of a sensation, they went down from low to a lower deep until they found themselves dancing in the valley of the Devil and calling their brethren and sisters to join in the unique function, as who should say,

Black spirits and white,
Red spirits and grey;
Mingle, mingle, mingle,
You that mingle may.

At the late dance given by the Commander-in-Chief, the high and mighty Britons of the South were glad to appear as devils and dance a diabolical fandango that would have put the most backward Maories to the blush. When enlightened Christians stoop to be devils, they do it to perfection. Besides devils, there were angels too, fallen and unfallen. Doubtless, the former description of the latter order of beings carried the palm in vraisemblance. This on the same principle on which the Poet excused himself who, having once sung the Lord Protector, afterwards welcomed the Restoration in verse. He was reminded that his former poem was far more forcible and hearty than his present effort. "Sure," at once replied the adroit courtier, "we poets succeed best in fiction."

We have seen no sufficient description of the phenomenal entertainment, but here is an outline given in an Anglo-Indian contemporary :

"The great feature of a ball, given at Utacamund the other evening by Sir James Dormer, the Madras Commander-in-Chief, was a set of Lancers, danced by eight men, attired as devils in black coats, knee breeches, black stockings, shoes and black ganze wings, with long black tails and horns. When the first discordant crash of fiendish music was heard (the introduction to the Bogie Man Lancers), each devil seized a reluctant angel, and dragged her to a place in the set. The angels were most becomingly attired in loose flowing robes of white, with silver girdles and stars in their hair, flowing wing sleeves and a big spray of lilies in their hands. The devils and angels danced as follows :—Devils.—H. E. the Governor, H. E. the Commander-in-Chief, Captain Lowley, General Kenney Herbert, Captain Canaye, Captain Baring, Lord Douglas Compton, Captain Bethune. Angels.—Miss Dormer, Lady Wenlock, Miss Gustin, Miss Golton, Miss Lockhart, Miss L. Dormer, Miss M. Dormer. The devils danced with the most wonderful fiendish grace and agility, dragging their partners, whirling them round, and prouetting round them. They finished up with a wild, rapid waltz, and ended by giving yells of triumph and truly unearthly shrieks."

That is eminently suggestive. It reminds one of a delicious lyrical drama in English and its characters and their doings—of

Bacchus, that fust from out the purple grape
Crush'd the sweet poison of misused wine, and his young hopeful,

a son

Much like his father but his mother more,
Whom therefore she brought up, and Comus named :
Who ripe, and frolic of his full-grown age,
Roving the Celtic and Iberian fields,
At last betakes him to this ominous wood ;
And, in thick shelter of black shades embower'd,
Excels his mother at her mighty art,
Offering to every weary traveller
His orient liquor in a crystal glass,
To quench the drought of Phœbus ; which as they taste
(For most do taste through fond intemperate thirst)
Soon as the potion works, their human countenance,
The express resemblance of the gods, is chang'd
Into some brutish form of wolf, or bear, &c.

Here, in the far more ominous glades of Ooty, the transformation is still more serious. The unfortunate traveller fleeing before the drought—the blaze and heat—of Phœbus in the plains, is metamorphosed into devils and fallen angels !

THE TESTAMENT OF GARIBALDI.

Garibaldi had, it would appear, left a political testament, just like Peter the Great of Russia. This is at least what we are assured by one of his old companions in arms, the trustee of the said will, the publication of which has hitherto been prevented by the Italian Government.

And this opposition itself explains the ideas of Garibaldi being very different from those which have hitherto directed the Italian policy. This testament, after what has been revealed to us, will be the condemnation of Crispi and the Triple Alliance.

The dream of the late hero had been, on the contrary, a grouping of the Powers against Germany. He had wished the union of Russia, Denmark, Roumania, Italia and France, that is to say, of all the countries that have some demands to make against Germany and Austria. Garibaldi shows here a grandeur of views much superior to the narrow combination of administrations of his country. He opposes, in a word, the Latin and Slav races to the Germanic race.

He pushes his dream much farther and constructs accordingly his map of Europe. Naturally, he restores to us Alsace and Lorraine, Italy becomes the mistress of Trieste and Tyrol ; he reconstitutes Poland with the provinces stolen by Austria and Prussia ; he organizes a Zeehic confederation with Prague for its capital ; a Slav confederation, to which he gives Constantinople as its chief city ; Roumania takes its ancient boundaries of Theiss and Dniester, and becomes a strong power ; Greece aggrandises itself with Epirus, Albany, Macedon, Candia, Cyprus, and the Hellic Asia ; Ireland regains its autonomy ; Denmark takes back Schleswig-Holstein and Lanenbourg ; Germany is compressed between the Rhine and the Oder ; and Turkey disappears altogether.

This is but a dream ; but we cannot deny that the Europe thus constituted will have better guarantee against aggressions than the Europe rendered incoherent to the Prussian ambition.

The publication of this document, if authentic, will produce a great effect in Italy ; in that Italy which Garibaldi had made, although there are men who affect to forget him, especially those who owed their crown to him ; and if they are ungrateful to us, they are still more so to him.—The Radical.

RAJPUTANA.

Jeypore, May 22.

Of local news there is little now. Miss Tassell went away without giving us a second performance, as she had expected to do, under the Raj patronage. His Highness gave her Rs. 500 as man. This afternoon preparations are being made for a melâ in front of the Palace Gate (outside) in the evenings of to-day and to-morrow. The scene enacted will be from the Mahabharat, viz., the slaying of Hiranya Kasipu by Nrisingha Avatar. The customary 'paper Knights' and clay figures of huge shape and size to represent the various actors in the scene are ready. The people enjoy the sight much. The weather is very uncertain. Almost every evening the sky is overcast with clouds, resulting in a drizzling occasionally, which serves only to intensify the heat on the following day. This has been going on for the last 5 or 6 days. The Maharajah's College is still open, in spite of the weather, and will not close for the summer as long as a week does not pass without a shower. The Principal and Professors may not suffer much but poor children who have to walk long distances under a powerful sun at 10 A.M. in empty stomachs, consider their lot really hard. But in a Native State highhandedness can never go too far, they say, and people must suffer in silence. Throughout Upper India, schools and colleges have closed for the summer. Besides, as the old year is out, and the course of studies to be pursued next session is not known now (it will be fixed in July), there is very little work done. The only good derived possibly is that the Maharaja will fancy the Babus love work sincerely and are over-true to their salt. Poor boys of the Raj College !

THE BENARES RIOT RESOLUTION.

No. 774/III--255B-15 OF 1891.

Dated Naim Tal, the 19th May 1891.

READ :--

(1) Letter from F. N. Wright, Esq., Officiating Commissioner, Benares Division, No. 3983/XIII-258 dated 28th April 1891.

(2) Memorandum by J. White, Esq., Collector, Benares, dated 17th April 1891.

(3) Letter from R. H. MacLeod, Esq., Officiating Magistrate, Benares, No. 594/XIII-69, dated 30th April 1891.

(4) Extract from letter from R. H. MacLeod, Esq., Officiating Magistrate, Benares, No. 682A/XIII-79, dated 13th May 1891.

(5) Memorandum by Raja Shiva Prasad, C. S. I.

(6) Memorandum by Hon'ble Babu Bireswar Mitra, dated 28th April 1891.

1. Sufficient information has now been laid before the Government to enable it to pass final orders in regard to the riot which occurred at Benares on the 15th April last. Reports by the Commissioner, Mr. Wright, the late Collector, Mr. White, the present acting Collector, Mr. MacLeod, a memorandum by the Hon'ble Babu Bireswar Mitra, member of the Municipal Board, and a brief paper by Raja Shiva Prasad, formerly a member of the Board, are printed as appendices to this Resolution. From them can be gathered full information as to the causes and progress of the riot; and the Resolution is therefore confined to a brief analysis of the principal incidents, and to a statement of the orders of the Government in regard to the arrangements to be made in future in respect of the temple known as the Ramchandra or Budhaini temple.

2. The reports are necessarily silent as to the course adopted by those interested in the matter, before the 15th April, in so far as the Government was concerned; and it may therefore be stated in this Resolution. It was pointed out to the Lieutenant-Governor when visiting Benares in July 1890, that a small temple stood on the site which the Engineers and Sanitary authorities regarded, and which the Lieutenant-Governor approved, as necessary to the water-works. His Honor desired that arrangements should be come to with those interested in the temple; and was informed that in this there would be no difficulty. An extract from a Benares native newspaper to the effect that, owing to the establishment of the pumping station of the Benares water-works at Badhaini, the site of the temple situated there caused great anxiety to the Hindus, attracted the attention of the Government; and on the 27th November 1890 was forwarded to the Commissioner of Benares for report. A petition, dated the 11th December 1890, from the Rani of Barhar and certain residents of Benares, praying that orders might be issued prohibiting the demolition of the temple, was received by the Government and was also forwarded for early report on the 18th December 1890. On the 20th December the Commissioner replied to the Government order of the 27th November, to the effect that as the work was Municipal, and on the Benares Municipal Board has a very large majority of Hindus, he saw no reason to fear that Hindu religious susceptibilities would not be respected as far as possible. He added that he had received a petition from certain Hindus of Benares on the subject and had informed the petitioners that there was no need for alarm, as the matter was practically in the hands of their co-religionists. On the 28th January 1891, the Commissioner forwarded a report upon the petition of the Rani of Barhar above referred to. Mr. White, the Magistrate, stated that he was assured by Raja Shiva Prasad that the idol had been brought to its present site from another place, and therefore that there was no ceremonial reason why it should not again be removed. The Municipal Board proposed to give Rs. 500 for removing the idol and reconsecrating it in a new shrine. The idol removed, no further sanctity would, it was considered, attach to the building in which it had been placed. The Commissioner expressed himself as satisfied that the Municipal Board had taken all reasonable measures for the satisfaction of those concerned. On the 5th February 1891 the Commissioner was informed, in reply to these reports, that, in view of the explanations offered, the Government left the matter to the Municipal Board to settle with those concerned. On the 24th February 1891 the Commissioner forwarded a Resolution passed in accordance with the above proposals at a special meeting of the Benares Municipal Board held on the 5th idem, with an explanatory memorandum by the Chairman. As the idol was believed to be of the class which is known as movable, or "chul," in contradistinction to idols which are deemed "achul," or immovable, the Municipal Board decided that it should be removed by its owners, Rs. 500 being given to them for that purpose, besides compensation for the buildings, to the amount of Rs. 2,084. It was expected that the buildings round the shrine which in themselves, as has been stated, would not have been regarded as having sanctity apart from the idol, would fall in the next rainy season, the ground about them having been lowered by 10 or 12 feet for purposes connected with the water-works. There was no immediate intention of laying hands either on the temple, or on the shrine in which the idol was placed.

3. On the 4th March one Vijayanand, calling himself Secretary to the Budhaini Temple Protection Committee, drew the Lieutenant-Governor's attention to the matter, in a petition sent by post and asked that His Honor on his approaching visit to Benares would look into it. This petition, which came before His Honor after his visit to Benares, was transferred to the Commissioner. On the 10th March, the Secretary to the Committee telegraphed to the Lieutenant-Governor as follows :—

"Application to your Honor, dated 4th instant, not replied. Municipality exempted the temple, still Collector refers and Judge fixes 14th for compensation. Magistrate also proceeds under section 133, Criminal Procedure. Great alarm. Please order a stop to these proceedings."

4. The telegram was forwarded to the Commissioner on the following day for report, with an extract from a Benares newspaper, to the following effect :—

"In opposition to the orders of the Municipal Board, which was in favour of preservation of the temple, the District Magistrate had applied to the Judge for permission to demolish the temple on payment of compensation. Judge had issued a proclamation calling for objections. The proclamation should have been published throughout India, as the temple belonged to the whole Hindu population."

In reply the Commissioner, on March 30th, forwarded a letter from the Magistrate, stating that as the Government had left the matter in the hands of the Board, the Board had decided in the sense of the Resolution of February 5th above referred to. There was no difference of opinion between the Magistrate and the Municipal Board.

5. On 7th April 1891 the Government of India forwarded a telegram from the same Committee, expressed in similar language, dated 31st March, to the effect that although the Municipality had saved the temple, some members had devised plans to demolish it by digging a ditch round it; and asking the Government of India to save it. The Government of India requested that the Committee might be informed that no representation to the Government of India could be considered unless submitted through the Local Government. The Committee was duly informed. On the 15th April another telegram was received from the Government of India, forwarded to that Government by Gopal Das and others, dated 12th April, asking that, pending a memorial, action on the part of the local authorities might be stayed. The Government of India directed that the petitioners be informed that no action could be taken till their petition was received through the proper channel. By the time this telegram had been received by the Local Government the riot had taken place.

6. Meanwhile, on the 14th April the Chairman in compliance with a request of certain members of the Municipal Board, had called a special meeting of the Board for the 20th, further to consider its Resolution of 5th February, which was thus placed in suspense.

7. No petitions or memorials, other than those above noticed, have been received by the Local Government nor has any request been presented to it to receive any deputation on the subject. No evidence of excitement, beyond such as the telegrams averred, was brought to its notice. Telegrams to the Local Government on various subjects, despatched by unknown individuals or associations, and conceived in terms identical with those above referred to, are of constant occurrence; and on inquiry are usually found to contain nothing calling for the direct interference of Government. In the absence therefore of any fresh communication from the authorities of Benares, and in the presence of the Commissioner's letter of March 30th, no especial weight attached to the telegram of March 31st addressed to the Government of India. It has appeared since that, at a later date (April 7th), an armed police guard was placed over the temple to prevent interference with the workmen. Intimation that it had been found necessary to adopt this significant measure was not given by the local authorities to the Government.

8. The actual events of the 15th April 1891 need not be dealt with in this Resolution. Those who took part in it are under trial, and their punishment is left to the Courts of Justice. The incidents of that day at present concern the Government only so far as they throw light on what led to the outbreak. It will be seen that upon this point opinions are divided. The Commissioner, who was new to the Division, writing a fortnight after the event, describes it as entirely due to annoyance and vexation at the proceedings concerning the temple. The Magistrate (who is also Chairman of the Municipal Board which has decided as to the measures to be taken in regard to the temple), writing the day after the outbreak, attributes it to a strong popular prejudice against modern improvements and the taxation involved thereby. Raja Shiva Prasad attributes the outbreak entirely to motives connected with fanaticism. It will not fail to be observed that the Muhammadan weavers, who are an important element in the population of Benares, took little or no part in the riot, which was a Hindu outbreak. There was no outward indication during the 15th April, so far as can at present be gathered, of any immediate connection of the outbreak with dissatisfaction at prospective or actual increase of the fiscal burden. The railway and telegraph offices were doubtless wrecked; but both of these are buildings in which it was certain that cash would be found. The temple formed the declared motive of the outbreak, and in the opinion of the Government it was the immediate motive; though the rioters probably met with sympathizers, and were inspired by instigators from among men more subtle and better informed than themselves. The high prices ruling at the time in Benares, as in other cities, owing to recent short crops and to heavy exports of grain from these Provinces to Europe, caused a general feeling of pressure and discontent. There is a class of men to be found in all cities who, under the guise of disinterested regard for the poor, and boasting enlightenment to which they prove themselves to have no claim, take the lead in opposing necessary schemes of improvement, the burden of which will in some measure fall upon themselves. The papers published with this Resolution give grounds for believing that men of this class have for some time been agitating in Benares. The incidence of taxation in Benares as well as in other municipalities will be dealt with elsewhere; but it may be mentioned here, that both the Government and private aid are very largely subsidizing the Benares Municipality to assist it in its water and drainage works, and that after recent enhancement of the octroi duties the rate of taxation per head in Benares is Re. 0-12-3 only against an average of Re. 0-11-11 for the whole Province. Benares is wealthy and prosperous beyond all towns in these provinces; while its sanitary state which is in the last degree detestable, and had been spontaneously condemned, before the Government moved to their assistance, by the influential Society calling itself the Ganga Prasadini Sabha, which has formed itself with the object of realizing and conducting the drainage to a point distant from the city.

It removes instantly all noxious smells, not by temporarily disguising them (as is often the case), but by chemical combination, substituting instantaneously for the poisonous a pure and healthy atmosphere, and thoroughly eradicating the evil.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE LEGEND OF OGRECASTLE.

By Thomas Dunn English.

THE lady May went forth at morn
The greenwood round to roam—
The greenwood fair that spread for miles
Around her castled home ;
And plucking flowers to deck her hair,
And singing, Lady May
Found she had strayed in forest shade
Too far from home away.

She turned upon her steps, when, lo !
Leapt from a hanging limb,
And stood directly in her path,
An ogre dark and grim.
Unkempt his locks of yellow hair,
His skin was like the pye's,
His fingers were like eagle-claws,
And ferret-like his eyes.

"Where are you going?" thundered he,
"And why do you wander here,
Where mine are trees, and mine are flowers,
And mine the tawny deer?
You've trespassed on my wide domain,
And passed your father's by ;
This is Amal the ogre's land,
Amal the ogre, I."

She could not scream, she could not flee,
She trembled as he spake,
But crossed herself and prayed for aid,
For the Blessed Master's sake.
At which the ogre loudly laughed,
And to the lady said :
"I am of earth, and Christian ban
Falls harmless on my head.

"Earl Carlon is a childless man
Henceforward and for aye,
For she who was his darling child
Shall be my bride to-day.
And months shall come and months shall go,
And passing years shall be,
Ere he shall see the daughter fair
That must away with me."

Then seizing her within his arms,
He bore the maid away ;
He bore her to the church's door ;
She durst not say him nay.

And there the old priest made them one,
And she, Earl Carlon's pride,
Lost home and friends, and so became Amal the ogre's bride.

Ten years had come and ten had gone,
And children twain were born,
When forth to hunt the tawny deer
The ogre went one morn.
And waiting there for his return,
The lady longed to gaze
Once more upon the home wherein
She dwelt in other days.

She took her son and daughter through
The pathway in the wood,
And hurried on till they before
Earl Carlon's castle stood.
The tears they gathered in her eyes
The olden pile to see,
"My home was there," she murmured low ;
"My father—where is he?"

With knights around rode up the Earl,
And stopped his steed, and said
"This woman is my daughter May,
Whom I have mourned as dead—
Fair welcome back ! This hour repays
For years of grief and pain,
But be you maid, or be you wife ?
And whose these children twain ?"

"I've lived a wife ten years or more,
Five miles beyond these towers ;
Amal the ogre is my lord ;
These children twain are ours.
A loving husband has he been,
And ever kind to me,
And honor's self in all his deeds,
An ogre though he be."

And then Amal came riding up,
To seek his dear ones three.
Earl Carlon's brow grew black with wrath,
And "Seize the wretch !" said he.
And ere Amal could draw his sword,
To serve him in his need,
A score of burly men-at-arms
Had dragged him from his steed.

"Unhappy woman," cried the Earl,
"Learn, to thy deep despair,
The lord thou lovest is the one
Who slew thy cousin's heir.

When died our kinsman Ethelred,
He slew his only son,
And kept by force of gramarye
The lands the murder won.

"He closed your eyes by wicked arts,
By magic spells and dread,
Or with an ogre foul as he
You never could have wed.
And you and these shall dwell at home,
My children all to be ;
But for Amal--I'll hang him high
Upon the gallows tree."

She bent her low, the Lady May,
While tears fell o'er her face --
She bent her low, and on her knee
Implored her father's grace.
"For know the truth," she sobbing said,
"An ogre though he be,
The man whom you to death would doom
Is all the world to me."

"Rise up, my daughter," cried the Earl ;
"Your prayers are all in vain ;
I've sworn before I rest to-night
The ogre shall be slain.
Were I forsworn it were disgrace
To one of lineage high :
From hence the ogre's form shall pass,
Or I shall surely die."

She rose, and snatched a sword from one
Of those who stood around,
And sprang to where the ogre stood,
And cut the bands that bound.
"Draw forth your sword, my lord," she cried :
"Will it fight it out again ;
They shall not grace the gallows-tree
Till both of us be slain."

When, lo ! upon her words there came
A change of form and face :
The loathly ogre grew to be
A knight of courtly grace,
A stalwart knight of stately mien--
A hideous thing no more.
"And who art thou," Earl Carlon cried.
"Who ogre was before ?"

"I am thy cousin's son ; by me
Amal the ogre fell ;
But, dying, through his gramarye
Upon me laid a spell,
That I should take his name and shape,
And in his mind should be,
Until some woman pure and fair
Should risk her life for me

"The wife I gained without thy will
From thrall her lord hath won .
To-day you have your daughter back,
And with her take a son."
"In faith, I shall," Earl Carlon said ,
"And pleasant 'tis, I wis,
When from an ogre's form there springs
A son as fair as this !"

Earl Carlon lies in cloistered earth ,
The rest have passed away ;
The castle where they lived and died
Is now in ruins gray.
But where the ogre bore his bride
Four stately towers are found,
And these are Ogrecastle styled
By all who dwell around.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

TYPHOID fever is reported from Simla. Already, an assistant in the Finance Department has succumbed to it.

WE read :—

"In Berlin, a new experiment, that of serving a dinner party with salad grown under the guests' own eyes, was successfully tried at the house of Prince and Princess Blucher the other day. Here is the recipe :—'Take good germinating Lettuce seed and soak it in alcohol for about six hours ; sow it in an equal mixture of rich soil and unslacked lime, and place it on the table. After the soup, water it with lukewarm water, whereupon it commences to sprout immediately.' At the Prince's party the thing worked like a charm, and the Lettuces when plucked and prepared for eating were the size of Barcelona nuts!"

MECHANICAL invention seems to be the very element in which MR Edison lives and moves and has his being. His brain is as full of projects as the Abbé Sièyes's pockets were of constitutions. Just now he is engaged on a novelty to be exhibited at the Chicago Exhibition next year. He is perfecting an invention which will enable a person to enjoy from his or her own drawingroom an opera played at a distance of a mile or two. Such person will not only hear the music but also see reproduced on a white curtain the exact performance even to the color of the scenery and dresses and the facial expressions of the artists. At this rate, poor impossible cannot help being an obsolete word.

THE Russians have just explored the Black Sea. The basin is generally found to be very deep, more than half sinking below 6,500 feet, the deepest parts being about 8,500 feet. Different depths give different temperature and density of the water. Near the Bosphorus, the temperature is 73.6 deg., at the surface at 130 ft., it falls to 42.8 deg. At the deeper parts of the Sea the minimum is 44.9 at 174 ft., the temperature rising slowly to 48.7 at depth of 7,080 ft. Owing to the influx of the Danube and the Dniپر, the Black Sea is freshest at the surface, the greatest salinity being found in the centre and near the coast of Asia Minor where the rainfall is small and there are no large rivers.

A HINDU named Fattch Chand has been hanged at Melbourne. He was charged with, and convicted of, the murder of a countryman of his named Juggo Mull, on circumstantial evidence and condemned to death. In November last, the two Hindus left Melbourne with some wares to sell in the country districts. Travelling towards Healesville, they passed on to the Coranderk Aboriginal Station, where they disposed of a good portion of their stock-in-trade. Next they were known to have left that Station. Two days after, the body of Juggo Mull was found terribly mutilated at the foot of Mount Riddell near Healesville. Fattch Chand was suspected, especially as he could not be traced. He was, after a time, arrested at Geelong, tried and sentenced to death. He seemed prepared to die. After the capital sentence, the prisoner refused to take any food. But the clemency of the jail discipline stood in the way of his own despatch of himself, and food would be forced down his throat to keep him up for the gallows which the law had decreed. He could not be allowed to commit another murder—though the victim this time were no other than his own self. So persistent however was his refusal to take nourishment that the question arose, whether it might not be advisable to hasten the execution. No, that could not be. The condemned must have full justice and the regulation period between capital sentence and execution, for any favorable evidence to turn up. That is true civilization and justice and enlightened judicature, and the present impatience of such safeguards among our rulers in India is a distinctly retrograde sign.

WE take the following from the Englishman :—

"A Locust Story.—The following comes from a European correspondent at Gujranwala :—Half the trees in the station have scarcely a leaf remaining; and a few days back you could not walk a hundred yards without trampling on thousands of locusts, who, as soon as they were dead, were attacked and eaten by the living ones. But all this is nothing when we come to think of what happened in the harvest season. A native woman in one of the neighbouring villages left her infant a little way from a field while she was reaping. She heard the child cry, but thinking it one of the usual fits of crying she was so accustomed to, did not trouble about going to pacify it. About an hour later, when she came out, the babe was dead, a great portion of its flesh having been eaten by the locusts. The Arabs of the Soudan have a fable about an army whose camp was visited by locusts one evening, and when the army woke up in the morning, lo, they were all naked men, the locusts having devoured their clothes and blankets as they slept! But the Gujranwala story beats this."

The question of beating is a trifle. That apart, the difference between the two sets is at most denominational, not ethnic. In eating capacity they are probably at par. Only the Panjabi pests are carnivorous Sikhs, while the Soudan tribe are gymnosophists who would not injure any living creature. It might be worth sending out missionaries to wean the latter from this amiable weakness. What an ally they might be to a state in these days of a wasteful armed Peace. They would make short work of the greatest army by quietly insinuating themselves into its camp at dead of night, and overwhelming the vain modern Xerxes with the result of their visit.

THE inordinate regard for the Past is one of the mysteries of our nature. Antiquity is ipso facto venerable. The charms of the Past may be difficult to state, but they are none the less irresistible! Such at least is the experience of an enlightened native prince. In far off Rajasthan, rules a noble prince who worships hoary-headed Antiquity, in the famous shrine called by the secular name of the Raj Press (Jeypore). The pious votary will here meet with the most ancient collection of printing types remarkable for their unrivalled hazziness, symbolical of the divine halo. There is no doubt that these were procured from the earliest Type Foundry known, and many of them are sacred to the touch of Caxton's glorious self. The inroads of innovation have spoiled other things in the Raj, but here, in the department of typography, the desecrating hand of the reformer has been scrupulously stayed. This deity of letter-press is worshipped in an image—a representation on paper as old as anything could well be. The image is known to mortals by the name of the "Jeypoor Gazette"—mark the antiquated spelling—and is publicly worshipped twice a week. The image is presented to the votary in a way which reveals the triple attributes of the deity—Urdu, Hindi, and Anglo-Saxon (not English which is modern). The priest charges a salutation fee of Rs. 15 for a year's grace. A select few only are compelled (in a manner) to welcome the forcible entrance in their homes of this Avatar. Then, how rich the blessings conferred by his godship! The worshippers are treated to a sumptuous dish of the rarest and most ancient news of the period. The genuine divinity of this deity is proved by the fact that the image cannot be seen by any but the initiated and the blessed. To the unaided mortal eye the letters are invisible; for, the impressions are vivid to those of the cult only. This Jagannath of the Press in Native India is miserably served, though. He goes out unattended, like a bear "without leaders," there being but very little to "lead" and none to lead the same. The celebrated Holloway's Pills are hallowed by the touch of this image, and hence their curative power. Such is the official Gazette of Jeypore in the sag end of the 19th century. After all, official Gazettes are not as a rule interesting reading, but in Jeypore this kind of literature reaches its lowest degradation. The leading officials there, unlike our British officials, have such a dread of newspapers that they eliminate from their official Gazette what our Imperial or India Gazette or each of the Provincial Gazettes usually contains. Visitors and pilgrims to Jeypore are strongly recommended to include in their programme a visit to this Raj Press alongside of their visits to the old goddess Kali and the old city of Amber. At least, antiquarians may earn fame by proving the date of the manufacture of these types which have not been replaced by new ones. Yet a show is kept up to meet the demands of modern civilization!

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE principal speeches in Council on the Age of Consent Bill have been published by Government with the Circular from the Home Department to Local Governments on the administration of the Act in pamphlet form, and may be had at this office as elsewhere for two annas only, exclusive of postage.

AFTER sixteen days' trial, the proceedings against the respectable batch of the Benares rioters concluded on Saturday the 6th June at the Sessions Court. On that day the court sat from 9-30 in the forenoon to 8 at night with only ten minutes' interval for lunch. The Judge, Mr. G. J. Nicholls, addressed the Jury for over two hours. The Jury retired and deliberated for an hour, and returned with the following findings :—

(1) That on the 15th April there was an unlawful assembly and rioting; and that the rioters were armed with deadly weapons; (2) all the jurors unanimously find that dacoity was committed and that the dacoits were armed with deadly weapons; also that mischief by fire was committed, as charged; (3) the jurors by a majority find that none of the prisoners was present at any of the occurrences at Bhadaini, and that none of them took any part or parcel in the riot or dacoity; (4) the minority find that of the prisoners Gopal Das and Raghunath Das were not concerned with the offences committed at Bhadaini, but they find the other prisoners guilty of all the charges of rioting; (5) the jury unanimously acquit all the prisoners of instigating dacoity and arson; (6) the majority find the shawl belongs to Rameshar, accused, but the minority that it belongs to Babu Brijinohan Das. The majority, therefore, acquit Rameshar under section 412 I. P. C.

The Judge disagreed with the Jury. In his opinion, the charges under sections 147 and 148, I. P. C., of rioting and rioting armed with deadly weapons, were fully proved against each one of the prisoners. As regards the other charges, the verdicts being against the weight of evidence, he decided to take the opinion of the High Court. The prisoners were brought up on the 9th to receive their sentences on charges under sections 147 and 148, I. P. C. Gobardhan Das was awarded three years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of rupees twenty-five thousand, in default, another nine months' hard labor; Gopal Das three years and ten thousand rupees with the same alternative of nine months; Gijji Prasad three years' rigorous imprisonment of which three months' to be solitary confinement and a fine of three thousand rupees, with the alternative of nine months; Lachman Das three years including three months' solitary confinement and a fine of five thousand with the alternative of nine months; Sukhnandan Das and Rameshar Das, each three years including three months' solitary confinement and a fine of rupees one thousand with the alternative of nine months; and Raghunath Das, three years' rigorous imprisonment including three months' solitary confinement.

The prisoners suffer in honor, liberty and purse. The fines come up to rupees 45,000, to which is to be added the cost of the defence to represent the total pecuniary loss.

SIR Lepel Griffin drives his point home against the British Anti-Opium Agitators, thus:—

"Why does not Sir J. Pease and his crew of fanatics attempt to prohibit the import of French wines and brandies? No expert who has lived among and studied opium-smoking or opium-drinking people as I have done, will not declare that alcohol is a hundred times as pernicious as opium. For one crime caused by opium there are 1,000 caused by drink—by beer, by wine, by whisky, by brandy, by the alcohol which has carried into the House of Commons and the House of Lords so many men who were distinguished for nothing but their distilleries and their breweries. Sir J. Pease does not attack these men or the trade they follow, because he knows that Englishmen are not so foolish or so cowardly as to allow their liberty to be strangled by intolerant lunatics. But he has the impertinence to dictate to a Chinese gentleman the quality of the opium he shall use, and to forbid him the choice and highly-prized drug which is produced in India, and which the Chinese soil cannot grow."

That is not the whole truth, though. The Opium wars undertaken in the interest of the East India Company were infamous. But now matters stand on a different footing. It is impossible to go back, we are afraid, except cautiously, step by step. And surely the Indian peasantry ought not to be sacrificed to a moral awakening in their rulers.

THE Salar Jung Estate Committee have recommended the reduction of establishment by about Rs. 25,000 per annum. Already there is the cry in a Urdu paper that "the rising moon, the shining lamp (the young son of Sir Salar Jung II.) is neglected to such an extent that the affectionate and loving mother finds different kinds of difficulties put in her way in providing the child with the first necessities of life." At the same time, the Deccan Times speaks of intrigues "in the Salar Jung Palace and money being extracted from the Begums under various pretexts." Already, the Begums, it is said, have been relieved of half a lac of rupees as a necessary preliminary expense for securing certain allowances and privileges. When will the Committee take up the debts and begin payment?

At Hazaribagh, a head constable—Ram Jeebun Lal—refused the Revd. Mr. Keepel admittance into the Inspection bungalow, thus compelling the missionary to pass the night on a cart in the open air. The circumstance was entered in the Police diary to the effect that a Padri Sahab accompanied by six or seven Native Christians came to the thana in a state of drunkenness and demanded to be allowed to stay in the Inspection bungalow, then under repairs, and was refused. The Revd. gentleman complained to the District Superintendent with the result that the constable was prosecuted for making a false report and for violation of duty. At the trial, the missionary denied being drunk and the Sessions Judge sentenced Ram Jeebun to two months' rigorous imprisonment. The prisoner has, however, obtained a rule from the High Court, calling on the Judge to shew cause why the conviction should not be quashed and the sentence set aside, with an order admitting the prisoner to bail.

A BENGALI Pleader of the High Court—Baboo Ambica Churn Bose—is dead. Latterly he made himself a name as a criminal Pleader, appearing before the Criminal Bench. The Chief Justice noticed his death, saying that whenever the Baboo "had charge of a case, one always felt perfectly safe in his hands. One always felt that he would leave nothing unsaid or leave us in ignorance of any point we ought to know in favor of his client but at the same time one was perfectly safe that he would do nothing to deceive or mislead us." This is a high compliment in a Pleader-ridden and Barrister-jockeyed country. Mr. Woodroffe joined in the mourning. He had found the deceased most fair as an antagonist and most open as a junior. Mr. Twidale, not the senior or the junior Government Pleader, thanked the Chief Justice for the tribute paid to one of his brotherhood. He himself bore testimony to both public and private virtues of the dead.

WE are not disposed to quarrel with the Muhammadan for the exception it has taken to a native contemporary's criticism of British Rule. Much may be said on either side of the great question, and in the interest of the Empire the public mind should be familiarised with the say on both sides. Let not this queer Muhammadan journalist who is not to be coaxed with the name of the great Akbar himself, know that, though the people would do wrong if they did not thoroughly and cordially recognise the benefits of British sway, the contention of the Hindu publicists is right that there is no career for the children of the soil in British India. That truth stares full in the face every observer, and no one who has eyes can fail to see it. Not all our contemporary's cleverness will blink it. The Mills and Macanlay and Marshman certainly attempted not the impossible feat. We would not see the Muhammadan scribe rush into ground which they avoided.

For the rest, we question the propriety of this critic's tone. He writes with contemptuous patronage of an able and eloquent brother penman. The latter's article is characterized in the critic's heading—"Brilliant Babblement." That is a dangerous suggestion which may return upon the suggester—possibly without the former B.

THE Muhammadan has a large vocabulary, but the treasury is not quite so rich, being crowded with all sorts of nondescript coins. He speaks of "the lowly sworder Hyder Ali." There is an addition to the language—if the learned will accept an unnecessary barbarism.

THE Report of the Travancore State for the year 1889-90 is a record of active and progressive work in every branch of the administration. Full details and statistics of the business of every department are given, which leave nothing in the way of particular information that may be desired for purposes of special enquiry, while the general reader not having the inclination for a closer study will be glad that a summary of the more salient facts is given at the end of the report. We congratulate Mr. Rama Row on the success of his work, and on his cordial relations with his master. The report is concluded with the Dewan's acknowledgments for the support received from the Maharajah, the counsels of the British Resident, and the co-operation of the more important departmental heads, and to these he modestly attributes the credit for such progress as the report may show.

ON the 17th September last, the body of a newly born infant was discovered in a tank in the village of Suraoon within the jurisdiction of the Pacham Srari Police Station, Allahabad. Gobra, the chowkidar of the village, sent information to the Thana, of which Ali Jan was Sub-inspector. Ali Jan deputed Asrar Hussain, the head-constable, Sher Ali, the literate constable, Binda Prasad and Rona Hussain to make the necessary enquiry. The result of the enquiry was that on the 25th September, in the court of the Assistant Magistrate of Allahabad, one Mussammat Godhani Thakurani was, on her own confession, convicted, under section 318 of the Indian Penal Code, of having concealed the birth of a child recently born of her body, and sentenced to three months' rigorous imprisonment. Thus the Police had done its duty, and its conscience was satisfied; the crime was detected and the criminal punished, the four deputies looking forward to their reward in the next promotion. In the meantime, Godhani Thakurani began to work out her sentence. She was unable to work and being examined was found to be far gone in pregnancy, and the Civil Surgeon pronounced her seven months quick with child. Here was a surprise. She could not have given birth to the child whose death she was expiating for. The Jail authorities reported the matter to Government, and Government consulted the magisterial authorities who, while releasing the innocent prisoner, in their turn, reported the case to the High Court for orders. Mr. Justice Tyrrel set aside the conviction and confirmed the interim release.

Government conscience could not be as easy as Police conscience, and an enquiry was started to clear up the mystery. The four policemen were subsequently charged and tried along with Gobra, the Suraon Chowkidar, for committing, in reference to the original enquiry, offences under sections 348 and 506 of the I. P. C. Ali Jan was convicted simply under section 343 and fined. Asrar Hussain and Shere Ali were convicted under sections 348 and 506, the latter being ordered two sentences of nine months' imprisonment to run concurrently. Binda Prasad and Rona Hussain were acquitted, while Gobra was sentenced under section 506 to one month's hard labor.

The case of Shere Ali, the literate constable, recently came up to the High Court, before Mr. Justice Straight, in appeal, the conviction being upheld by the District Judge. The High Court Judge thoroughly examined the case and exposed the villainy of the Police. The bare facts are thus laid bare by him :—

"Asrar Hussain and Shere Ali came to the village of Suraon some time on the night of the 17th September, that they were accompanied by the chaukidar, Gobra, that they went to the house of Rampet in which resided Mussammatt Godhani, that they roused her from sleep and took her away to the house of Matta Din, a Bramin, which lies a short distance away and that Rampet was taken away along with them, that the corpse of an infant was then shown her, that those two men Shere Ali and Asrar Hussain put questions to her, abused her and decried her saying that she was then with child, asserted that the child which was there was the child of which she had been delivered. Thereupon she was taken away in the charge of Binda Prasad to the house of a chamar, and was examined by two chamars by the light of a chirag held by Binda, that these chamars first said that she had not had a child and then being threatened said that she had, that she was then brought back to the house of Shammath and that there she was constrained to remain for the night lying between two charpoys on which slept Asrar Hussain and Shere Ali. The following day, after pressure had been brought to bear upon her, she was taken by Asrar Hussain, Shere Ali and Gobra chaukidar to a burgot tree and at that burgot tree Gobra in the presence of the others said to her : "You say the child is yours, and if you do you will get off. If you do not the doctor of the city will split you up." After some short time, in consequence of this she made a confession which was subsequently repeated later in the day to the sub-inspector when he arrived and was ultimately repeated to the Magistrate at her trial."

The Judge thus comments on the facts :—

"I have no doubt in my own mind that the story of the prosecution is true, that this man Shere Ali and Asrar Hussain, from the miserable idleness that too often characterises these police inquiries, or from some worse motive, when they arrived at the village instead of making inquiries at different quarters to try to ascertain whose this child really was jumped at the conclusion that because the chaukidar told them that this woman had been in the family way, she being a widow, that therefore she must be the person who had been guilty of this offence. Having once got this into their heads they proceeded, as the police in this country invariably proceed, not to get independent proof from independent sources, but to get hold of the suspected person and from that suspected person to extort a confession with a too deplorable result to the whole administration of justice and the administration of the police. This woman, who had not been delivered of a child, actually is convicted in a public court of having concealed the birth of a child and on what not unnaturally might lead any magisterial officer to the conclusion, as this officer was led in this case, upon the confession of the prisoner herself that she had been delivered of this child. Although the petitioner and Asrar Hussain came to this village upon the 17th September, yet as a matter of fact Mussammatt Godhani was never taken into custody until the 20th September. That that is so the police records undoubtedly show. The learned counsel who has addressed me on behalf of this petitioner, has suggested that his client was acting merely under instructions given him by his superior officer. There seems to be no pretence for such a suggestion. I do not even concede that had the arrest been ordered there would have been any authority on the part of Asrar Hussain to direct Shere Ali to do the things that he is sworn to have done. As a matter of fact there was no arrest and the detention of this woman from the 17th September until the 20th was in my opinion within the meaning of section 348 and she was wrongfully confined. That wrongful confinement was made for the purpose of extorting a confession from this woman. The facts that have been found have abundantly established that. It is positively shocking to think that this, which, I fear, is a sample of what is often done in the conduct of police inquiries should leave us in the courts, that have to deal with the trial of the most serious cases, in doubt and hesitation as to whether we can act upon confessions which have been recorded as made by accused persons. Here there was not a shadow of pretence for the suggestion that the woman had been delivered of a child or that she had concealed its birth. Despite that, she is induced by the pressure of the police to make a confession that she had been delivered of a child and that she had concealed its birth."

Mr. Justice Straight at one time doubted whether "You say the child is yours, and if you do you will get off. If you do not the doctor of the city will split you up."—constituted a threat. He, however, decided that it was a threat to an ignorant village woman such as would naturally alarm her and lead her to do anything required—unto making an absolutely false confession. After such a strong expression of opinion, it was naturally expected that the Judge, in exercise of the powers granted by Sir Fitz James Stephen's law, would enhance the sentence, but, with strange inconsistency, he refrained from doing so because the literate constable had borne a good character. A capital reason, to be sure ! But what is the value of a character under such a system ?

The case is a warning to magistrates not always to convict a person on simple confession.

ON Sunday before last, the steamer Lindula carried away from Calcutta, the remains of the late Nawab Faridun Jah Syud Munsoor Ali Khan Bahadur, the last Nawab Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, to Bombay, en route to Kurbala in Turkish Arabia.

The deceased, after having given up his dignity and position, in favor of his eldest son—the present Nawab Bahadur of Moorshedabad, was living in retirement at Moorshedabad, when he died there upwards of six years ago, and his corpse was interred in the family Mausoleum, for being transferred to the Holy Kurbala, in accordance with his expressed wish.

This transfer could not take place all this time, for various reasons. Arrangements having now been made, the corpse was disinterred from the Moorshedabad graveyard, and sent down to Calcutta in a boat. Here it was placed in the steamer above named, and is being carried to Bombay, where it will be transhipped on board another vessel and taken to Baghdad. His third son, Nawab Syud Assad Ali Mirza Bahadur, alias Soobah Sahib, proceeds by rail to Bombay in time to meet the above steamer and accompany the corpse from there to Kurbala.

A REMARKABLE ultracentenarian has passed away. A parrot named Polly died in New London at the age, it is said, of 118 years, and was buried with honours. Honour to whom honour is due ! What a living history this Parrotian Saheba was ! And what a history she had passed through ! Her reminiscences extended back to the very thick of the ancien régime. The drama of the Great French Revolution unfolded itself before her followed by the Consulate and the Empire and then alternate restorations and republics including a revival of the Empire. So in other countries. So in the domain of science and art. She had seen the throes of empires and the birth of nations. Before her eyes a new civilization, with a higher poetry, a superior art, a purer morality and a spirituality transcending religion, and an all but all-knowing science, lord over all, had been evolved and developed. All this experience could not have been lost, and this poor little biped was presumably the wisest being in our generation. She was a greater philosopher than the profoundest two-legged animal without feathers.

Whatever rank might be assigned her, she was certainly no imposter like the famous Parrot Philosopher immortalised by Lord Lytton in his Fables in Song. Of that worthy it has been said, Seldom he spake. Much given to thought he seem'd.

No public office had he ever held ;

But, when he oped his beak, all listeners deem'd

That they had heard an oracle of old

Sedate his mien ; and all his language seem'd

With sage enigmas : none its meaning spell'd .

All praised it more for that. So judgments go.

Omne ignotum pro magnifico !

For Polly was a genial communicative soul, not a solemn owl who posed as an oracle on the strength of a few interjections or laconic phrases ill-understood. She was full of talk and the friend of all the children in the neighbourhood. She had in course of time become a local institution and one of the best of them. Her loss will be felt—specially by the dear part of the community, and she is universally mourned. Requiescat in pace !

UNDER the head of "A Voice from the Grave" the Mundulay Herald throws light on the judicial system of Burma. Myooks may be a bad lot, but surely European officers ought to be able to keep them in check. At any rate, now that all Burma is British one has a right to expect that there is no more room for any nonsense. In Thebaw's time we were prepared for many follies and even some atrocities. But the unspeakable Thebaw and Thebawism have been abolished. It is now all a British administration and nothing outré or improper can have a place under it. Alas! the truth falls distinctly short of these fine anticipations. Here, at all events, is a survival of old barbarism. A well known native officer of the judicial service died without passing order in a case which had been before him for some time. Under the circumstances, the Myook's successor should have taken up the case and heard it de novo. Instead of that, it appears that on the application of the plaintiff, the Judge of the District sent for the bench clerk of the lower court to supply the omissions on the record. The bench clerk declared on oath that the deceased had completed the hearing of the case. He added that the Myook had throughout seemed to favour the defendant and had, besides, expressed to him his determination to give judgment in the latter's favour, but the same evening he was seized with cholera and died before the next dawn. It would seem from our contemporary's comments, though not stated in so many words, that the Judge accepted this evidence as tantamount to the deceased officer's judgment in the case and allowed it the force of law as a regular decision of a court.

We have vagaries enough on the bench in India, but this is a novelty in judicial practice unknown to us. The Mandlay Herald is indignant that a dead Myook should be allowed to dictate from the grave. They are not disposed to be poetical in Burma, otherwise they might take it as a confirmation of the Poet. Of course, a great deal depends upon the receptiveness of the Bench Clerk. It is not every B. C. who is so thoroughly and beautifully possessed by the devil—of his quondam chief.

On some fond scribe the parted "beak" relies,
Some friendly aid the closed eye requires;
Ev'n from the tomb the voice of Myook cries,
Ev'n in our ashes live their wonted fires.

The entire responsibility rests on the Judge. One would have thought that the fact of the late Myook having from the first shown a leaning to any side, would have discredited any judgment he might give in favour of that side had he been living. What shall be said of the perversity of receiving that judgment on hearsay after his death!

We shall not be surprised to hear that the Burmans regard the Myook's death as a providential injunction against his carrying out his views. It was an arrest of judgment. And the Judge's action may well be deemed an act of war against the Almighty.

THE EMPIRE IS PEACE.

A MORE reassuring message of peace has not been heard in recent years than that contained in the German Emperor's Dusseldorf speech. After this clear and unequivocal expression of the Imperial mind, there can be no doubt as to the young Emperor's love of peace. From the moment of his accession to the throne, the Emperor William has given evidence of his pacific disposition, and it is now clear that that disposition far from being altered is only strengthened as he is being more and more familiarised with the practical bearings of the question. Peace evidently dominates his mind. The speech was made at a festival given in the Emperor's honor by the authorities of the Rhine Province. To avail of every possible occasion to accentuate his attachment to peace—to be continually harping on the same theme—can only be due to his strong conviction of expediency of a peaceful policy as the policy for the present and future. The strain of militarism is probably felt nowhere with such severity as in his dominions. Under his Imperial grandfather, the country has seen at once the best and worst of a military policy—reaped its best advantages as well as borne all its sacrifices. With all its glory, it was too wasteful a game to last long, and naturally a sigh is now raised for the quieter joys of peace. The first note of this spontaneous revulsion of feeling was struck by the young Emperor's differences followed immediately by a more open rupture with Prince Bismarck. Bismarck's genius had had its full play and the time had come for the exercise of talents of a different order. The Emperor's quarrel with the minister of his ancestors was the doom of militarism in the German Empire—the turning point in her history. Since then the Emperor's thoughts have been bent upon peace, and his utterances have borne the stamp of a genuinely pacific disposition. His recent speech at Dusseldorf is the most pronounced expression of the policy which is to guide his counsels. The following passage is from the telegraphic summary of the speech:—

"The Emperor said that the preservation of peaceful relations with the Foreign Powers was a duty which his position laid upon him. He would rejoice if, supported by the grace of Heaven, he could hold in his hand the peace of Europe. He would then take care that it should never be disturbed. In any case, however, he would leave no stone unturned to preserve the blessings of peace."

Next to militarism, and indeed an effect of it, is the evil of Socialism in Germany. This is a most formidable demon with which modern statesmanship has to do battle. On this subject, the Emperor spoke with equal decisiveness, if somewhat more caution:—

"At home also things were gradually becoming more firmly established. He would spare no pains to ensure that industry should come to its rights, and that remark applied alike to employers and employed. He was able to announce that a commercial treaty with Austria-Hungary had been finally drawn up, and that treaty would confer advantages upon the country. In conclusion, the Emperor said that he was firmly convinced that salvation lay in the co-operation of all ranks and classes. His Majesty then drank to the welfare of the Rhine Province."

The individuality of the utterance is unmistakable. The speech is throughout characterised by the self-consciousness which belongs to the dynasty. Of this, the most marked expression, to our mind, is contained in the concluding sentence:—

"There is only one ruler in the Empire, and that is myself. I tolerate no other."

AN ARGUMENT FOR THE PRESERVATION OF MANIPUR.

ALL honor to Colonel Johnstone for the way in which he is combating the proposal for annexing Manipur. The arguments of one in his position who speaks on the subject from personal experience of the State, are entitled to special consideration. The proposal itself, so far as is yet known, rests only upon the authority of irresponsible writers in the press. Even a politician like Sir Richard Temple, who might be expected to sympathise with the cry for annexation, is against it on financial grounds. The highest political reasons against such a step are set forth by Lord Ripon. A certain writer in an English journal had written these words:—

"Situated as it is between two British possessions, and nominally under British authority, the destiny of Manipur was to be annexed to our Indian Empire sooner or later. This revolt and its lamentable loss of life have only precipitated the date of annexation."

The dangerous character of the idea suggested by this passage is thus shown by his Lordship:—

"Now if it is to be regarded as the 'destiny' of every Native State which is situated between two British possessions and nominally under British authority to be sooner or later annexed to our Indian Empire, there is scarcely any Native State in India which is safe from such annexation; the policy inaugurated by Lord Canning after the Mutiny would have to be abandoned; and the pledges of the Queen's Proclamation would be made worthless. Lord Canning's policy has given to India nearly forty years of internal peace; it has secured the loyalty of the Native Princes, and it should be maintained. A reversal of that policy would alarm the head of every State from one end of India to another, and I would not guarantee the tranquility of our Indian Empire for five years after so fatal a course was adopted. I do not suppose that the writer of the article on which I am commenting had such a change of policy in view, but the words which he used might be taken to imply it. Knowing as I do with what remarkable keenness the language of important English journals is read by the Native Princes, I feel bound to enter my protest against the idea too prevalent among a certain section of Englishmen in India, that it is our 'manifest destiny' ultimately to absorb all the Native States now existing. I entertain so strong a feeling of the importance of maintaining unimpaired the confidence of Native Princes and Chiefs in the strict observance on our part of the policy of Lord Canning and of the pledges of the Queen's Proclamation, that I cannot but regard the use of the unguarded expressions inconsistent with that policy, and those pledges are most strongly to be deprecated. I trust that no events, however calculated to excite the feelings or to move our regrets, will induce the Indian Government or the Government at home to abandon the principles which were solemnly proclaimed when the direct administration of India was transferred to the crown, and which are regarded by the rulers of Native States as the solid foundation upon which their rights securely rest."

The Indian sentiment on the subject of annexation is faithfully reflected in these words of her popular ex-Viceroy. The policy of annexation has been formally abandoned, and that too under pressure of a most disastrous event. Opinion is agreed as to the relative worth of the causes of the Mutiny of 1857. Whatever the immediate or ostensible circumstances, the main cause was Annexation. Under Dalhousie, that policy of unrighteous invasion of native States had unrestrained scope. State after State was absorbed in the British dominions, shaking the confidence of the country in the good faith of the English Government, till the culminating point of popular discontent was reached with the absorption of a State that had always done signal services to that Government, we mean of course Oudh. Then came the terrible awakening with the Mutiny. As a punishment for that catastrophe, the East India Company was dissolved, and the Queen assumed the direct Government of the country, while the policy of annexation was formally abandoned in the Royal Proclamation of 1858, which the Queen issued on the assumption of rule on her own person. Such is the sacred character of the pledge which, on that august occasion, was given to all Native States. The sanctity of the pledge was still more confirmed by the restoration of some of the territories which had before been swallowed up to their native Rulers. The pledge of the Proclamation has been respected all along. We may as well exclude the case of Burma from our view now. Burma is geographically and ethnically outside India. Its acquisition by the British does not clearly militate against the words of the Proclamation. Nevertheless, we expressed our disapproval of that measure lest it should create an impression that the old discarded policy was again to be revived. But the Government of the day defended their act with regard to Burma on the ground that it was not India, and that explanation was indeed reassuring.

We hope, however, there is no serious thought of taking Manipur. Such an act will be a great blunder—indeed, it will be of a piece with the entire blundering course of conduct which has landed us in the present awkward state of things in that country. The best reparation for those blunders will be the preservation of the State to its own people. That State, like Oudh, if in a lesser way, has always been loyal to the British Government. Its services to that Government on various occasions have been amply acknowledged. Maharaja Surja Chandra also has been a devoted friend of the British. As a Ruler, he has borne himself fairly well. Were it not for the hostility of Mr. Grimwood, he would decidedly have been in the good graces of the Government.

A BRITISH DISTRICT RULER.

Mr. Skrine, Magistrate of Rungpore, belongs to a type of officials whose career has always an interest in our eyes. His activity, his culture and taste, his frankness and geniality and, above all, his real sympathies with the people, are Mr. Skrine's bright points. As an official, he has, indeed, his peculiar ways, and no one is more conscious of them than himself. He must have things done on which he once sets his heart, and this makes him sometimes disagreeable to those with whom he has to deal. He is a restless reformer, and in his zeal for improvements, he can not bear to move slow. He bends everybody to his will, not unoften with a rude handling and a degree of official pressure which, though quite the grand Dustoor, is disavowed by your safe average man. This is a side of his character which has stuck to him from the first and appears to be developing with age. At Rungpore he found himself in the midst of a number of wealthy people,—exactly the sort of men after his heart among whom he was well fitted to play the king. Here his peculiarity found full vent, and if he trod inconveniently on the toes of not a few of his lieges, he has the satisfaction of leaving Rungpore a far better and more advanced place than he found it. Mr. Skrine is by no means unconscious of his odd peculiarities, and with his characteristic frankness he took an opportunity of making up his account with his people. Availing himself of the occasion of a School Prize Distribution at which he presided, he made a capital speech, saying several interesting things on the topics more or less cognate to the occasion, and at last entering upon an explanation of himself. The explanation, as a frank confession, must have been very pleasant to the audience, while it cannot fail to set him right with those that had conceived a different impression of his character from his official singularities. After this preamble, we leave him to speak for himself:—

"And now, in conclusion, a few words of personal explanation. This is probably the last time I shall raise my voice in your midst, for I am shortly proceeding on leave, and it is very unlikely that I shall return to this district. It is sad to do anything for the last time; and sadder still when one sees around one so many friendly faces which one may never see again. And at certain periods of his career it is well that a man should pause and take stock of his public life. My stay at Rungpore has extended over two and-a-half years, a considerable space in this precarious life of ours, and a larger slice still of my official existence. Looking backwards, I would ask you to say whether I have not laboured with a single heart to promote your welfare. A new Rungpore has arisen, embellished with works destined to improve public health and increase public convenience, and not without the means for gratifying the cravings in the human heart for relaxation and healthy amusement. Alone I could have accomplished little; and I take this opportunity of tendering an acknowledgment to those among my hearers who have given me their ready help. I am conscious of many failings. Frederick the Great of Prussia used to say in his old age that though his life had been a busy one, he had not done half the work that he might have accomplished. How much truer is such a self-accusation in my case! To sins of commission, too, I plead guilty, faults of temper and of a masterful disposition which I cannot always control. If I have offended anyone, of him I now ask pardon. My excuse must be unfavourable climatic and social surroundings. I have had much, too, especially of late, to try my patience and embitter my heart. Those who do not know me charge me with popularity seeking. Again, I appeal to you to say whether I have ever shrunk from an unpleasant duty. I have never stooped to flatter the people of the country or to encourage crude and pre-emptive political ambitions. Indeed, I abhor that which is commonly called politics. In old times men shed their blood to gratify the ambition of Princes. The last generation fought to annulize and establish the rights of races. The world is older to-day. The struggle for existence is daily growing severer, and the hope of compensation in a future state of miseries endured in this is fading from the minds of millions. Hence the questions which shake the world to-day are social, not political. They are the growing disproportion between population and the means of subsistence, the limitation of the hours of labour, the more equal distribution of wealth, sanitation, and the like. My quarrel with the Congress is that it is an anachronism. It grieves me to see so large a proportion of the talent of this Province focussed on matters of parochial interest, while the population question is knocking at the door of statesmen; while millions are perishing from preventable disease; while the masses are sunk in ignorance and superstition; while public spirit is confined to few; while the arts and sciences are at so miserably low an ebb; and while a beginning has hardly been made to develop the resources of this great country.

"On my first arrival in India I was as full as most young Englishmen are of that which you term 'insular prejudices.' And, let me tell you gentlemen, prejudices rest on solid foundation, and have had their share in making England what she is. The august mother of nations, whose history is a glorious record of battle for the right, of sacrifice for the common good, and of broadening liberties, may well claim the affection and pride of her sons. I would wish that Bengalis had something of this pride, and something of the same reason for it. But this sentiment is, after all, but a stepping stone to something better still. The first Magistrate under whom I served was Mr. Wilfrid Healy, whose memory is still green in the hearts of countless friends. He said to me one day: "Narrow sympathies mean deficient culture. When you are as old as I, you will have learnt that the framework of human nature is the same, whatever may be the colour of the skin." From that moment the conception dawned on me of the brotherhood of man: of the claim possessed by all our fellow creatures on our love and pity. I resolved not to let a day pass without doing something to increase the scanty stock of human happiness. Let my last words to you be, abjure the prejudices and prepossession of race and religion; sink private ambitions, pride and self-aggrandizement; and labour for the common good. You will then have a sweet reward from your own conscience. You will secure the gratitude of others, for it is a libel on the people of this country to brand them as ungrateful. And you will be in sympathy with those who are the salt of the earth. It has been well said that there exists between tender and generous minds in all countries a sort of holy and natural freemasonry, which leads them to discover and acknowledge each other through the external differences of creed, language, and nationality."

Bating a single lapse towards bathos, that is a remarkable address which does high honor to both the head and the heart of the speaker. Not only has he thoroughly vindicated himself but Mr. Skrine has left the District a discourse of enduring interest.

ARE WE CIVILIZED?

ACCORDING to one of the most judicious of English philosophers who made a special study of the Human Mind, most controversies have their origin in an erroneous or imperfect comprehension of the meanings of certain terms used by the disputants on either side. He very sensibly observes that a great many of the intellectual disputes which arise among men would end where they begin, if only the parties define all the terms of doubtful signification at the outset. Experience helps to confirm this notion. All controversies of an interminable sort, or those that do not lead to any legitimate conclusions at all, will be found, on analysis, to suffer from the defect above referred to. Those who seek to find out the truth in every controversy have carefully to guard against falling into this great error. The first requisite, then, is to form clear and definite notions about the subject of discussion and then to support them by the use of such terms and expressions as can have no two meanings. If this last condition cannot be strictly fulfilled, the sense or idea the words individually stand for should be laid down once for all, so that the opposite party may not mistake them for something they do not mean. During the recent controversy on the Age of Consent question the Pioneer taunted the Bengalis with the remark that their civilization is skin-deep. The Babus were quick in resenting, if not repelling, the charge laid at their door. Here we find an illustration of the truth first remarked by Locke. Neither the Pioneer nor the Bengali opponents of the Bill may be said to be in the wrong. For, evidently the word "civilization" is here used in two different senses by the two sides. The Babus who have so greedily taken to European costume and European ideas in politics and general education, must have sadly disappointed the Pioneer and Company in showing an unexpected tenacity for an obscure and hitherto ill-understood social practice. Their intellectual acuteness has generally helped them to rise above caste prejudices, and assert their broad views and universal sympathy in a Congress of many castes and communities (where they do not object to a promiscuous banquet, far removed from the keen and jealous sight of Orthodoxy). But on this occasion when the polish of their exotic foreign civilization could be shown to their best advantage, they shrank back from the prominence they had so long been courting. Well might the Apostle of Western civilization characterize such a people as half-hearted, and refuse to call them civilized at all! Of course, there would be no justification for the Pioneer's remark if the civilization it possesses and to some extent embodies in itself, were not adopted by the Bengalis in part. If Bengal had really been the land of pious Rishis which it looked like during the agitation, at least from a distance, and the inhabitants did not as a rule and wilfully violate every day several important injunctions of their Shastras, then would the foreigners have really understood the full sense of the opposition. The Pioneer's surprise is therefore more reasonable and natural than the Hindu of Bengal's opposition. The last embers of the controversy have not yet died out, and it is feared the agitation will be revived on a large scale, though the necessity for it is not quite clear. Common sense would tell us to take a different course. By obeying the new law Bengal fears it will incur punishment in a certain hereafter. But do not the Sastras and Sastris say that the person who, under royal compulsion, does a thing forbidden by religious authority, or forbears the doing of an act enjoined as a religious duty, is exempted from punishment? It might be urged, in answer to this possibly, that it is the duty of the Bengali Hindus to demand the repeal of the new law, and if persistent efforts fail to secure the desired repeal of the measure, submission to its provisions would no longer be held to entail a sin on the helpless violator of the injunctions. The effort should, therefore, be made. But this is poor consolation for a distracted conscience, one should think. The objection falls to the ground if we remember that this is not the only religious duty, supposing it to be a duty, which we cannot or do not observe under the new conditions of life which surround the Hindus in the year of Grace 1891.

Now, to return to the main question. The word "civilization" does not stand for the same set of ideas in Bengal as it does perhaps in the West. The Bengali civilization controversy then is due to a misconception of the word "civilization." In Bengal it stands for a compound (nay, a mechanical mixture rather) of curious ingredients both of Eastern and Western manufacture. In Europe and America, where the spirit of competition is abroad and the nations are vying with one another for the first place in civilization, the word represents a different state of things. John Bull proclaims his nation to be the most civilized, while his practical cousin on the other side of the Atlantic is not slow in asserting the civilization of America to be the best. The same contest is raging between the astute Frenchman and the sturdy German. In fact, while all these nations of the West agree more or less as to what constitutes civilization, they differ as to the degree of civilization each has attained to. So that the civilizations of these various countries may be regarded as alike in their general features, and points of minor details may be ignored for the purposes of a comparison or contrast between the civilization of the West and that of the East. It would not, therefore, be improper to overlook or neglect any slight differences that may exist among the civilizations of the countries composing the West, and to consider the civilization of one of them, say that of America, as the advanced form of the general civilization of the West. Years ago Burke observed: "Our manners, our civilization, and all the good things connected with manners and with civilization, have in this European world of ours, depended for ages upon two principles.....the spirit of a gentleman and the spirit of religion." At the present day, however, the last-named spirit is more or less wanting. New principles have, moreover, come into operation. Civilization does not now mean merely a reclamation from the savage state, with the acquisition of knowledge in arts and civil manners, superadded. It means the reversal of the mutual relationship between the two sexes: the men have been displaced, or are about to be displaced, from their natural position as the guardians of the weaker sex, by the latter. Religion has become somewhat formal and devoid of spirituality. The tender side of humanity is suppressed. Men have become materialistic and practical. Pure sentiment is at a discount, more or less. Useful knowledge is pursued enthusiastically. Individuality and liberty are the watchwords in this community. In short, the civilization of the West is more artificial than natural—being a mass of dry bones, as it were, without the vivifying spirit. It is not the inevitable result of experience and human wisdom so much as it is the outcome of an inverted order of society. This does not imply that the civilization of the West has no redeeming features in it any more than that the Bengali civilization is entirely devoid of good things. The point contended for is, that the Western races may call us civilized if we come up to their standard of living; and if we do not, then we have no reason to feel pricked when we are adjudged uncivilized or semi-civilized by them. Judged by our standard they suffer as much as we do by theirs. As to the absolute value of both these types of civilization it is idle to speculate at present. It may be noted here that we have spoken of Bengali civilization alone, as though that were the only one in the East. We have done so advisedly as we are not concerned with those of China, Japan, Russia, &c. Of these latter Japan has nearly aped the Western civilization of the day; China alone retains an old and unique civilization. Russia is much the same in Asia and Europe. The other tribes in Asia can hardly be regarded as civilized by Asiatics of an advanced type, and so they are neglected.

THE SHASTRAS DONE FOR BY MERCENARY VOTARIES.

THE SHĀNTI IN ITS VARIOUS TRANSLATIONS.

OF all the Parvans or books of the Mahābhārata, the Shānti is by far the most important. In the introductory section the whole epic has been likened to a tree, of which the Shānti has been described as the fruit. The first portion of the Shānti treats of Rajadharma, i. e., the duties of the kingly office. The Hindu sage has treated his subject almost exhaustively. In reading through the spirited rendering of the original that is published by Pratapa Chandra Roy, the reader is sure to be startled at particular passages and pause and admire the wisdom of the author whoever he was. A close student of modern politics cannot fail to be struck at the remarkable coincidences he would meet with in almost every page between the teachings of the old sage and the practices of the great states of the day. In acknowledging the first two fasciculus of P. C. Roy's translation of the Shānti, Professor James W. Reese, of Westminster, Maryland, U. S. A., says that "it would be difficult, indeed, to find in all literature a complete treatise on the duties of the kingly office than the one contained in these sections of Shānti Parvan."

It is a pity that both the Bengali versions of this grand Parvan, we mean Baboo K. P. Singha's and the Maharajah of Burdwan's, are extremely unsatisfactory. Baboo Singha's version is said to have proceeded from the pen of Pundit Iswar Chunder Vidyāsāgar. There are faults of both omission and commission. All difficult verses or portions of verses have been systematically ignored. Close attention to the original and a disposition to utilize more faithfully the labours of Nilkantha would certainly have enabled a Sanskrit scholar of Pundit Vidyāsāgar's attainments to give correct renderings of almost all the passages omitted from haste. A careful revision again would have enabled the translator to remove many serious blunders. It is well-known, however, that Baboo K. P. Singha's translators had all to work under high pressure. The translators employed by the Maharajah of Burdwan, however, had no such excuse. It took them about twenty-six years to finish their version.

Their Shānti is full of blunders. In their attempts again to incorporate the explanations of Nilkantha with their rendering of the text, they have written utter nonsense in almost every page. When a second edition of the Burdwan version was announced by the proprietors of the Bangabashi concern, we expected that some care would be taken in revising the Shānti and removing the blemishes, many of which are perfectly inexcusable, which can be detected by dozens in almost every section. Unfortunately, this second edition, or rather republication, proved to be a Thomas Tegg affair. It was a mere reprint, cheap and nasty, like their Shāstraprakasa introduced without a preface, with no indication of the manuscripts and editions collected and collated, perpetuating the ridiculous blunders, pointed out by previous editors of real ability and in some instances reproducing the very errors of the press of one well-known edition from which it was pirated. When makers of literature, forgetting what is due to the muses, turn their eyes towards only the readiest method of clearing a profit, it can never be otherwise. The transcendent genius of Scott himself failed to rescue his poetry and novels from serious blemishes for suffering himself to be guided by considerations of lucre. It cannot be expected that men owning only the mechanical appliances for multiplying copies of a work would be able to achieve what the genius of Scott himself could not. Such persons accordingly have the greater need for care and deliberation in their work. Unfortunately, speaking for Bengal at least, the times are such that the book-buying (we cannot say the book-reading) public do not care a straw as to who the persons are that bring out for sale some of the grandest works of ancient India and how those works are executed. Vernacular journalism is still in its infancy. The tricks of advertisement are too much for the feeble attempts at criticism. Indeed, the trade has its critics too. Since the discontinuance of the Banga Darsan, the evil has increased to frightful proportions. And well it might. The same writers deal you pirated news every day in wretched print, summarise or elaborate their diurnal nonsense every week, and as if this was not sufficient, have put in a monthly appearance for treating you to aspiring criticism!

A NOTE AND A QUERY.

Nor long ago Reis and Rayyet noticed how, after the passing of the Consent Bill, the Hindu Patriot had taken up the study of the Hindu marriage system from the very beginning, commencing with betrothal.

On the Bombay side the Indian Spectator is still at it. It lately devoted a long leading article to "Baboo Neel Comul Mitter's Letter to Dr. Sambhu Chandra Mookerjee," of February.

Well, better late than not at all. My present purpose is to learn, if possible, whether the Bombay editor has understood in all its parts the voluminous letter he notices. That letter came as a surprise upon the public, except to those who were acquainted with the writer and his age. These certainly thought it characteristic. But does the Bombay writer know his man? Mr. Malabari probably does. I shall not be surprised to hear that like many of us from this side, he during his previous missions in Upper India was a guest of the letter-writer's at Allahabad where Baboo Nil Comul was the Doyen of publicans and patron of sinners in the North Western Provinces. Perhaps the article is not Mr. Malabari's own; probably not. Whoever wrote it, I doubt whether the writer, even if he is the great Malabari himself, understood the whole letter he commented upon, text and all--trunk and branches and leaves--body and limbs and extremities, jewel and setting. I say text and all and the rest of it, because something besides the text is noteworthy. No intelligent man can have read the letter without being struck by the opening address. And yet though the article analyses the whole text, the opening is ignored. The letter begins--"My dear Lad!" Is not that a remarkable commencement? Letters on public questions do not begin in that more than familiar, absolutely family, way. The demi-official is here reduced to an absurdity. I suppose the literature of biography and correspondence does not contain a single instance to match this Baboo effort in the epistolary line. It was a wonder to us all to see a man of Dr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's years called "Lad." Mr. Mitter may be older than Dr. Mookerjee, but surely there is no such disparity between them in age as to entitle the one to regard the other as a boy. Besides, whatever the advantage of Mr. Mitter in years, he is but a Kayastha, and Dr. Mookerjee is a Brahman of Brahmins, and it is little short of sacrilege for the Sudra to name a reverend Brahman thus lightly. Mr. Mitter is not a flighty young man unacquainted with the proprieties of intercourse or the etiquette of his tribe. How comes it then that he behaves in this queer fashion? Was he carried away by his zeal in the controversy of the day and did he mean to put an insult on Dr. Mookerjee for having obeyed the summons of his countrymen to head the movement in support of the Consent Bill? In conclusion, what is a Lad?

BIG BEN.

MONGHYR.

Jumalpori, June 2nd, 1891.

THIS Station had a programme for celebration of Her Majesty's Birthday on Saturday the 30th ultimo. There were special parades by the Volunteers, distribution of prizes in money to the best shots attached to the corps here and a Ball at night in the R. I. Railway Mechanic's Institute. A wild rumour that this as well as Monghyr would be looted by dacoits on the same night naturally created a panic. Happily it proved no better.

A young Bengalee student of the Calcutta Medical College, who came here to pass his summer vacation with his parents, made up his mind to be a deserter and left home surreptitiously.

A few days ago there was a case of assault between a 2nd class respectable native passenger and a Ticket collector of this station, on arrival on the Loop mail train, and the E. I. Railway Co. have brought a criminal suit against the Baboo.

News of a fatal accident has been received here. The other day an East Indian carriage examiner employed under E. I. Railway Co., at Mokameh, whilst he was on the platform, seeing his wife and family off by the passenger train, slipping his feet off the foot board on the train then in motion fell and was run over. He was crushed to pieces.

The remaining portion of the Traffic Manager's office is likely to be transferred to the metropolis by the latter end of this month or the first week of the next. It is said that the Traffic audit offices (both coaching and goods departments) will also follow, but it is not settled when. In the event of both being transferred to Calcutta, it will materially affect Jamalpore, specially the schools, the municipality and several other institutions.

THE BENARES RIOT RESOLUTION.

No. 774/III--255B-15 OF 1891.

Dated Naini Tal, the 19th May 1891.

9. The conduct of those who were dissatisfied with the decision of the Municipality admits, it will have been seen, of no palliation. No desecration of their idol was contemplated: no immediate or even early interference with the temple was intended. The Municipality acted with due deliberation, and with the necessary regard to the wishes of those chiefly concerned. The representations of the malcontents to the Municipal Board, after its vote of the 15th February 1891, had already led to a decision on the part of that Board, to call a special meeting on the 20th April in order again to consider its Resolution; it being now asserted that the idol was of another class than that which had been formerly stated. During the recent Municipal elections, several new members had been returned to the Board who were known to be averse to the removal of the idol and shrine. The petitioners, instead of awaiting the date fixed, gathered in numbers at the Town Hall on the 15th April when an ordinary meeting was taking place; and because their grievances were not dealt with on that occasion, proceeded immediately to riot. Their proper course was to have waited till the 20th; and, if the decision of the 20th was still unfavourable, to have presented an appeal to the Local Government; or if dissatisfied with its attitude, through that Government to the Government of India; furnishing both with a full statement of the grounds of their discontent, and the causes which led them to regard the decision of their co-religionists on the Municipal Board as unacceptable to the memorialists. There was no pretext whatever for urgent haste, as it was not proposed to move the idol by force, or to destroy the temple; which, it was expected, would fall of itself (after the idol had been removed) some months hence. The course the malcontents actually pursued, whether under the guidance of seditious-minded men who instigated and encouraged them, or of their own impulse, was to send unauthenticated communications at various times to the Local and Supreme authorities; to abstain from any attempt at personally approaching the Lieutenant-Governor; and, without waiting for the rehearing of their case, which had been duly promised them by the Municipal authorities, to proceed to violence and plunder.

10. The cause of the entire failure of the police to keep order on the 15th April 1891 remains obscure. A large body of police was drawn up in the compound of the Town Hall on the occasion of the meeting on the 15th April; and as the rioters went straight from the Town Hall to the Ramchandra temple, it is difficult to understand why the police failed to accompany them, and to keep touch of them. This matter is still under inquiry. The best thanks of the Government are due meanwhile to Colonel Babington, Commanding at Benares, and to all the Military authorities, for the excellent arrangements made by them; for their prompt response to the call of the Magistrate; and for the entirely effective aid given. It is matter of satisfaction that no blood was shed, and that the appearance of the troops at once led to the restoration of order.

11. Disregard of authority expressing itself in violence, whether it is shown by misguided men or by men acting in a native spirit or lawlessness, will always be met by prompt retribution. The Government freely permits public discussion, appeal, and all recognised means of expressing popular opinion; but it does not allow this freedom to be abused. It has taken the measures needful to bring the chief offenders before the Criminal Courts. It is now called upon to decide what administrative measures it will adopt to bring home to the people of Benares a sense of their folly.

12. The Municipal Board, in careful conference with Mr. Lumsden, formerly Commissioner of Benares, who was requested by the Local Government after the riot to place himself in communication with the Benares authorities, has forwarded for the consideration of the Lieutenant-Governor, in deciding the measures to be adopted with regard to the future disposal of the idol and its shrine, the following Resolutions, contingent on the decision to remove the present structure:—

1st.—That the idol be maintained at its present site; and that a shrine be erected at the expense of the Board in such a way as to satisfy the requirements of Hindu feeling.

2nd.—That a right of way be allowed for ingress and egress in such a manner as not to place unnecessary obstacles in the way of worshippers at the temple.

The considerations on which these Resolutions are based will be found in the memorandum by the Hon'ble Babu Birshwar Mittra, printed among the appendices to this Resolution.

13. After inquiries from the Engineers engaged in carrying out the water-works, and from the other authorities concerned, the Lieutenant-Governor is of opinion that the Resolutions formulated by the Board, while adequate from the Board's point of view, fail to meet fully the requirements of the case, as it presents itself to the Local Government. The Municipal Board justly observes that the decision arrived at must be a decision which, while it makes all proper concessions to religious feelings, maintains the Board's authority; and the Government is of opinion that this end can be equally attained in a form somewhat different from that proposed by the Board. The orderly prosecution of the works, which the Board desires, must be assured; but it is necessary also that the people of Benares should be made to feel that something more than this has, owing to their conduct, become necessary; and that they have but themselves to blame if the orders of the Government embody provisions of a punitive nature.

14. The Lieutenant-Governor has satisfied himself that what has to be dealt with is not only, or even chiefly, the obstruction or inconvenience caused by the presence of the shrine or of the building surrounding it, serious though this inconvenience must be to the plan and scheme of buildings required for the pumping engines and other works connected with the out-take of the water-supply. Had the Municipal Board, on the 15th February, known that the shrine and idol would be likely to prove of an immovable class, according to Hindu views, it is probable that they would, while still acquiring this ground, have decided to leave them undisturbed, whatever might have been the inconvenience. But this was not the only difficulty that met them. It is the unrestrained admission of devotees to the shrine, in the midst of the labourers and works in progress, which is inadmissible. The Government is always prepared to give due consideration to the religious feelings of the Hindus: and, although it appears still doubtful whether, according to the requirements of the Hindu faith, the idol is immovable, the Lieutenant-Governor is willing that no part of the temple enshrining it should be touched, and that the necessary measures should be taken to prevent any damage occurring to it at any time in connection with the water-works or pumping station. The temple will be maintained in situ: and will not be allowed to fall. On the other hand, the Government will protect the works during their progress; and will ensure the land attached to the works, which (with the temple) has been acquired by Government, and the men engaged upon the works from the interruption and confusion inseparable from admission of the public. To that end, the priests attached to the temple will be given by the District Magistrate passes of permanent admission to the grounds in which the temple stands, and will be suffered to go backwards and forwards, at such hours as may be fixed, through the gate of the waterworks and pumping station enclosure to their temple and shrine. The service of their idol will thus be secured. The public, however, for the reasons which have been stated, will not be admitted, during the progress of the works, to the shrine, as they are not admitted for any purpose to any other part of the enclosure taken up for the works. Persons trespassing within the enclosure, from whatever cause, will expose themselves to prosecution. Had it been possible to allow an exception in favour of the devotees of the Budhaini temple to the invariable rule prohibiting the public from entering enclosures in which public works of the kind in question are being carried on, the Government would have felt it necessary to mark its sense of the disgraceful conduct of the people of Benares on the 15th April, and of their impudent defiance of Municipal authority, by closing the temple to general worship during the progress and completion of the water-works. Hereafter, when the works have been completed, the workmen withdrawn, and when the pumping works station is clear, it will be for the Government of the day to decide whether, and, if so, with what, if any, restrictions, the Ramchandra temple can be again opened to public access. The decision then taken will doubtless depend in considerable measure on the conduct of the Benares citizens.

15th. This decision will be communicated, through the Commissioner, to the Magistrate and the Municipality. Those who are interested in the temple, and the public generally of Benares, are hereby warned that the slightest recurrence of disorder will lead to the immediate imposing of a very heavy extra police force, under Act V of 1861, at the cost of the Benares residents; and to its maintenance, at their expense, till further orders.

By order, &c.,

J. WOODBURN,

Chief Secy. to Govt., N. W. P. and Oudh.

Wilt thou nestle among my tresses,
O lily ! so pure and white ?"
But the lily answered : "O maiden !
I should droop in the heat and glare,
And die in the shining ringlets ;
Place the glowing carnation there."

—Romantic Poet.

A young man said to a maiden :

"I eat the oyster to-night ;
Will you come and tackle some fried ones,
O girl ! with the appetite ?"
But the maiden answered : "O, dearest !
For oysters I do not care ;
But let us look at some dry goods,
And of gloves you may buy me a pair."

WAITING FOR ME.

BY JOAQUIN MILLER.

Over the mountains and down by the sea
A dear old mother sits waiting for me,
Waiting for me, waiting for me—
A dear old mother sits waiting for me.

And waiting long, and oh ! waiting late.
Is a sweet-faced girl at the garden gate :
Over the mountains and down by the sea,
A sweet-faced girl is waiting for me

HAPPY CHILDREN

THEY sent him round the circle fair,
To bow before the prettiest there ;
I'm bound to say the choice he made
A creditable taste displayed ;
Although, I can't say what it meant.
The little maid looked ill content.

His task was then anew begun :
To kneel before the wittiest one.
Once more the little maid sought he,
And bent him down upon his knee.
She turned her eyes upon the floor :
I think she thought the game a bore.

He circled then, his sweet behest,
To kiss the one he loved the best ;
For all she frowned, for all she chid,
He kissed that little maid, he did,

And then — though why I can't decide —
The little maid looked satisfied.

THE OLD STAGE QUEEN.

BY ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

BACK in her box by the curtains shaded
She sits above, by the house unseen ;
Her eye is dim and her cheek is faded,
She that once was the people's Queen.

The curtain rolls up, and she sees before her
A vision of beauty and youth and grace .
Ah ! no wonder all hearts adore her,
Silver-throated and fair of face.

Out of her box she leans and listens :
O ! is it with pleasure or with despair
That her thin cheek pales, and her dim eye glistens
While that fresh young voice sings the grand old air ?

She is back again in her past's bright splendor
When life was worth living and love was a truth,
Ere Time had told her she must surrender
Her double dower of fame and youth.

It is she herself who stands there singing
To that sea of faces, that shines and stirs ;
And the cheers on cheers that go up ringing
And rousing the echoes, are hers, all hers !

Just for one moment the sweet delusion
Quickens her pulses, and blurs her sight,
And wakes within her that wild confusion
Of joy that is anguish, and fierce delight.

Then the curtain goes down, and the lights are gleaming,
Brightly o'er circle and box and stall ;
She starts like a sleeper who wakes from dreaming ;
That she lies under a funeral pall.

Her day is dead, and her star descended,
Never to rise or to shine again,
Her reign is over, her queenship ended,
A new name is sounded and sung by men.

All the glitter and glow and splendor, /
All the glory of that lost day,
With the friends that seemed true and the love that seemed tender,
Why, what is it all but a dead bouquet !

She rises to go : has the night turned colder ?
The new Queen answers to call and shout,
And the old Queen looks back over her shoulder,
As, all unnoticed, she passes out.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

BADLY as we suffer from the weather, the effects on the Western Coast are much worse. The heat seems to have sent the Ducks flying to the moors and mountains of the Deccan and their wits to the right about. Behold the Indian Spectator itself printing under date the 7th June 1891 such writing as the following with which an editorial note is closed:—

"Men with a kind heart will always do his own duty himself; he could not rest satisfied by entrusting its performance to another person. To wipe the tears of the poor and the suffering such men are prepared even to sacrifice their life."!

THE Treaty between Her Majesty and His Majesty the King of Portugal respecting their Indian Possessions, signed at Lisbon on the 26th December 1878, terminates on the 14th January 1892, as also the Convention signed at Panjim on the 20th January and at Calcutta on the 30th January 1880 for the extradition of criminals. The Convention of 1880 respecting moneys, weights and measures terminates on the 4th February 1892.

THE Secretary of State for India has sanctioned an estimate amounting to Rs. 1,02,88,965 of the probable cost of the section of the Mu Valley Railway from Sagaing to Kawlin, a distance of 145 miles, with a branch from Myobauing on the Toungoo-Mandalay Extension, Burma State Railway, to Ava Shore, 6 miles long. The estimate includes Rs. 4,83,187 for the cost of a steam ferry on the branch line.

"IN the dearth of fune" in this wretched Manipur mess, the papers—here in India as in England—have for some time been full of the heroism of Lieutenant C. J. W. Grant, who, with a detachment of 43rd Gurkha (Rifle) Regiment of Bengal Infantry and the 12th Regiment (2nd Burma Battalion) of Madras Infantry, advanced towards Manipur on the 28th March 1891 to attempt the relief of the British captives, and captured Thobal on the 31st. In keeping with that cry, he has been doubly promoted to a Majoralty and honored with the Victoria Cross. The others too come in for their share of the glory. The Governor-General in Council is pleased—

1. To admit to the second class of the Order of British India, with the title of Bahadur

Subadar Shaikh Mahtab Din, 12th Regiment (2nd Burma Battalion) of Madras Infantry.

Jamadar Bibhal Nagarkoti, 43rd Gurkha (Rifle) Regiment of Bengal Infantry.

2. To grant the 3rd class of the Order of Merit to Hospital-Assistant Govinda Swami Pillai and all the non-commissioned officers and soldiers of the detachment.

3. To grant a step of rank to all Native officers and non-commissioned officers who are eligible and fit for promotion.

4. To grant a donation of six months' pay and allowances to all ranks, including followers.

There is no cause for complaint. Everybody from the commander who planned and executed the camp down to the cooly who did not "bolt" on the way, is rewarded.

THE heroine of the Manipur tragedy too has her prize, Mrs. Grimwood having wrung from a reluctant ministry the Royal Red Cross.

ONE of the first acts of Mr. Ward as Chief Commissioner of Assam has been to preside at a public meeting at Shillong, where it was unanimously decided to erect a memorial to Mr. Quenton and the officers killed at Manipur. An act of pure supererogation. History will lash to everlasting infamy the names of the wretched bunglers who were caught in their own net.

MR. A. H. Plunkett, the City Magistrate, Poona, has discharged Gungaram Bhow Mhuske, Pleader. The Magistrate, on careful consideration of the case, does not find sufficient evidence to warrant a charge being framed. Just so. The shameless Borin seemed to all men of the world to be depositing to a cut and dry story without probability. The way of love is not that attributed to the Pleader.

A CORRESPONDENT thus describes, in the Times, the Exodus of the Russian Jews:—

"The first day of the Passover was a day of mourning for the Russian Jews. The police and gendarmes began to visit their houses in the middle of the night to examine passports. Those furnished with the police stamp permitting them to reside in Moscow were compelled to sign a paper promising that they would quit the city and district in three days. Those not having such permission were taken to prison to be sent like criminals by etape to the birthplace of their parents on whose passports they are inscribed. In some cases young children were taken away from their parents because they were not yet officially written down in the parental passport. In Madina Koshtche, the suburb inhabited mostly by Jews, there was quite a panic, and heart-rending scenes were witnessed. The heartless military tore away poor people from homes in order to send them to some far-off part of the empire where their forefathers had been born. Large numbers fled into the woods outside the city, and wandered about in despair. Those who had three days to dispose of their chattels realised hardly enough to keep them in bread. Chairs were sold for two pence, bedsteads and bedding for six pence. Some preferred to destroy their furniture rather than to let it go at these prices. Outstanding debts were not paid to the poor Jews by their Christian neighbours, and many well-to-do artisans were ruined in the course of a day and had to ask for transport by etape. In the Synagogue there was weeping, and prayers to the throne of Jehovah to send help. Some of the poor people in prison were supplied by benevolent Jews and Christians with bread and railway tickets. I saw the unfortunate victims being escorted to the railway station, the very images of misery and despair. The men went two and two in fetters like criminals. The women and children were not chained."

LALA BISHEN DASS, a son of Rai Gopal Dass, of Lahore, retired Extra Judicial Assistant, had turned Mahomedan at Ajmere. Subsequently he thought better of it and with the help of the Arya Samaj in public meeting assembled was, on Sunday before last, "purified," re-Hinduized and taken back into caste. On that occasion, Rai Gopal Das invited all the Brahmans of Lahore to dinner, each of whom received a post-prandial compliment of a Rupee.

MOULVI Fuizand Ali, Pleader, Mirzapur, is prosecuting Baboo Madho Parsad, editor of the vernacular journal Khichri Samachar, for defamation, in that the paper described the Pleader as "outwardly respectable but inwardly vile."

THE Zemindar of Parlakimedi has taken the loan of the services of Mr. W. Taylor from the Government of Madras, as manager on Rs. 1,500 a month and pension contribution. The appointment is ominous.

BACKED by a syndicate representing 200 million dollars, a wealthy resident in Chicago has proposed to the World's Fair Commissioners to buy, for exhibition, the Coliseum in Rome and bring it in sections to Chicago. So Barnum has evidently left his cloak.

A YOUNG married woman named Weiss is being tried at Oran, Algeria, for attempt to murder her husband. After five years of married life, she made the acquaintance of a civil engineer named Roques, of whom she grew fond, and he proved himself so much to her taste, that she resolved to take him as her husband. But there was a husband living and until he was despatched, her resolve could not take effect. Roques and Weiss developed a plan to smooth the way to their marriage. Roques furnished her with arsenic, but as soon as the crime was discovered, he committed suicide and Weiss is on her trial.

THE Maharaja of Durbhanga has made a donation of Rs. 1,500 in aid of the funds of the Behar Sanskrit Sanjivan Sabha. The Lieutenant-Governor officially recognizes in the Gazette the liberality and public spirit of the donor.

Holloway's Pills.—Sudden transitions from heat to cold, or from raw inclement weather to oppressive climates, favour the development of manifold diseases, which may in most instances be checked and rendered abortive by an early resort to these purifying, regulating and strengthening Pills. This well-known and highly esteemed medicine affords a safe and easy remedy for almost every constitutional wrong which unhealthy climates, rapid changes, or dietetic errors, can engender, and effectually removes any weakness self-indulgent habits may have induced. In all conditions of the system bordering on disease such as are indicated by apathy, listlessness, and restlessness, Holloway's Pills will prove especially serviceable in begetting the vivacity of mind and body appreciated by both sound and sick.

MR. G. H. Simmons of the Port Trust has obtained one year's leave. Mr. J. H. Apjohn officiates as Vice-Chairman of the Commissioners.

MAHIPATRAM RUPRAM, C.I.E., Principal of the Ahmedabad College, has died of cholera at Ahmedabad.

THE manufacture of steel pens is confined to three firms in America, three in Great Britain, and one each in France, Germany, and Italy. The raw material—sheet-steel finely rolled—is supplied by only one establishment in Sheffield, England. Fourteen different processes are employed to turn out a pen.

For all the extraordinary expansion of this industry, there is not yet a pen to boast of. The best is Perry & Co.'s, but then that pen somehow is not in the market.

IN Albany, Georgia, a man went to sleep on a bench outside his house. A goat, drawn by the scarf of the sleeper, began to chew it and chewed it to nearly suffocate the wearer. The owner of the scarf has sued the owner of the goat for damages. One of the pleas in defence is contributory negligence.

NEVER open the cork of a bottle with your teeth! The Revd. George Bothwell, of the Congregational Church of the Covenant, has paid dearly with his life for the imprudence. While thus uncorking a bottle of medicine for a sick child, in the hurry of the moment, he gulped down the cork himself which stuck in the bronchial tube. All efforts to relieve him of this impediment failed, operations—there were a number of them—were ineffectual, and the reverend gentleman died in great agony.

IT is stated in an American paper that a Chilian residing in Tacna is of the age of—151 years. That is his own statement. His neighbours, however, claim for him a still higher age. A document is forthcoming which the Chilian signed 142 years ago. Yes, there is a deed executed 142 years back, but who will confidently identify our Chilian? It is the old story of exploded Methuselahism.

THE Mala Vita trial at Bari has closed. The Judges retired to consult at nine in the morning and returned to Court with their opinion at eight in the evening. Four of the prisoners were acquitted, sixty-six were condemned to from five to seven years' police surveillance and fifteen to from eight to fifteen years' imprisonment. Notwithstanding the precautions taken of an extraordinary display of force to keep down demonstration and the President pronouncing sentence in an almost inaudible voice, the feeling of the crowd assembled found vent in howls, groans and imprecations.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

ON the 16th instant, in the House of Commons, Sir William Harcourt introduced the sad Manipur business in a moderate motion for production of papers. At that stage, he would not denounce either the Indian or the Home Government. He only wanted to know the views of the Government, in especial reference to the order for the arrest of the Senapati, which, he said, affected the relations of Government with the Native States.

Sir John Gorst had no objection to the motion, but he said it was not yet time for any full expression of opinion by the Government. The Under Secretary, however, took the occasion to, in a manner, justify the action of the Indian Government. The approval of the Secretary of State for India of the expedition to Manipur was not asked, because it was regarded as of little importance. There was nothing unusual in making an arrest at a Durbar, as this had frequently been done, but owing to the massacre of the Chief Commissioner and others the affair would remain an obscure page of history. In conclusion, Sir John deprecated the criticisms as unjust and futile.

Sir Richard Temple, who had attended and held Durbars in India, while approving of the policy of the Government, could not agree that a Durbar was the place where an arrest was admissible. Mr. James Macleay thought the arrest of the Senapati was uncalled for. There was Sir Roper Lethbridge, however, who thoroughly supported the Government. Mr. Stanhope, the Secretary of State for War, announced that the Government possessed full confidence in the policy of the Viceroy, and that it will be prepared in proper time, to apportion blame to such as deserved it, and that everything being known, the Government would express an opinion on the whole case.

REUTER wired on the 17th instant that the Times, commenting on the previous night's debate in the House of Commons on the Manipur affair, "considers that Manipur was neglected by the Government of India owing to the stress of other business, and was finally taken up and settled without careful examination into the affairs of the State." The Times has hit the matter to a T. This is exactly our own view, as already expressed on a former occasion. So long as the Exodus nuisance shall be allowed to continue, such mistakes are sure to be committed. During the very short time that the Viceroy stops in the metropolis, so many questions of grave importance crowd together for decision that what with the laborious work of the Legislative Council, the responsibility of attending public ceremonies, and doing justice to his social duties, His Excellency hardly finds sufficient time to carefully consider many matters of political difficulty which are placed before him. And there is no wonder that, in the hurry of the moment, some of them do not receive the attention which their importance requires. The Exodus has already demoralised British society in India. It may yet be the death of the Empire.

WE are informed by a telegram from Hyderabad, Deccan, that

A high official of the State is charged with having accepted a heavy bribe from some of the ladies of Salar Jung family. The amount in cash is stated to be 50 or 60 thousand. Besides cash the official is also said to have received jewels worth two lacs. A Commission has been appointed to investigate the matter, but the members of the Commission are subordinates of the accused high official. This action of the Government is harshly criticized by the public. The treatment accorded to the Salar Jung family by the Nizam Government is greatly exercising the public mind. Such treatment is directly against the wish of His Highness who takes great interest in the illustrious family, especially in the infant son of Salar Jung II. Lady Salar Jung II. has presented a long petition to the Committee of Management and to the Chief Begum mother of Salar Jung I. detailing her grievances. She says no attention is paid to her requisition for new clothes for her child. The following are her words: "not a single pair of shoes or socks has ever been supplied for the use of my child and whenever a demand for the supply of arrowroot and sugar was made for feeding the Sahibzada with, the khawassama refused to comply with my request and sent word to say that the Committee had not sanctioned such items of expenditure."

FROM a letter dated June 2, addressed by Hurrish Chander Mookerji, Bhowanipore, to the local journals, it appears that Rai Kali Podo Mookerji Bahadoor, the Deputy Magistrate of Barisal, had an attack of fever, which developed into a typhoid character. In this condition he applied for a fortnight's leave of absence to come down to Calcutta for medical treatment, but his application was refused. He then asked for six days' casual leave—but even this was not allowed to him. Such treatment which he never merited hurt his feelings to such an extent that he died at his post on the 25th of last month. Such is the case against Government. But what is the Government version? We trust it will be soon forthcoming. Till then, we reserve our phrases.

WE are informed that some of the Hindoo owners of Bustee lands in Calcutta have given, or are about to give, notice to their Mahomedan tenants to leave their holdings and shift themselves elsewhere. The reason is—that the landlords in question have got into their heads, that Mahomedan tenants may clandestinely build thatched or tiled mosques on the tenanted land and then claim a religious character for their holdings as has been done by the Mahomedan tenants at Shambazar. We think that such fears are quite groundless, and if given effect to, would surely lead to an estrangement and ill-feeling between the two communities, which is not at all desirable. There can be no doubt that the Shambazar mosque existed there not less than 15 years, with the full knowledge and permission of the Hindoo landlord, who was inclined to shew kindness to his Mahomedan tenants. We are not aware of any such mosque having been built on the land of any other Hindoo landholder. And therefore we cannot understand why any Hindoo landlord should get so frightened as to turn out all his Mahomedan tenants from his land. No tenant can venture to build a mosque without consent, or continue it for any length of time without the knowledge of the landlord. A mosque is a public edifice for resort of the public, and there can be no clandestine use of it. It is useless to ask the Police or any other official agency which is sure to spoil such delicate matters. But we hope respectable members of the Hindu community will use their best influence quietly to disabuse the landlord class of this notion. Its spread cannot fail to bring on various complications, political as well as social.

THE Judges of the High Court, N.-W. P., compelled to toil through these summer months in the plains, has this year had a compensation in the shape of lovely woman who has stooped to the double folly of not only making love and the rest of it with another while her husband lived but also forsaking the religion in which she was born and bred. The name itself of this aggravating beauty is a charm. It is Melroonissa alias Mrs. Church. She is the wife of an East Indian who held the situation of clerk of the Allahabad Small Cause Court. Charged with embezzlement, her husband bolted, leaving her to shift herself as best she might. In this state of freedom, she made the acquaintance of a Mahomedan Tahsildar named Noor Mahomed, renounced Christianity, became a convert to Mahomedanism, adopted Mahomedan dress, married the Tahsildar, entered the Zenana, and lived happily inside the Purdah as a Mahomedan lady. After she gave birth to a son named Kabiroaddeen, the Tahsildar died. The landed property which Noor Mahomed left, has been the subject of litigation between Melroonissa (Mrs. Church), her son, and the other heirs of Noor Mahomed. From her own statement given below, it will appear how Mrs. Church became Mrs. Noor Mahomed :—

"I became acquainted with Noor Mahomed, tehsildar, in 1879 at Chunar at the ball held in the house of the Civil Surgeon. I was a subscriber to that ball. The tehsildar was also invited to the ball as a guest by the Civil Surgeon, and he joined in dancing. I did not dance with him, but a friend introduced me to him. I lived with my mother at that time. In 1880 A. D. I left my mother for ever, and went to the tehsildar. After I met the tehsildar in the ball at Chunar and before the marriage I met him on several occasions. He used to meet me with the knowledge and consent of my mother. My mother and I both liked his paying me visits. I intended to get married with the tehsildar when I was living with my mother and before I went to the tehsildar. My mother did not approve of the marriage, on the contrary she was against it. She became reconciled to me two or three months after the marriage. I was married with the tehsildar at Inayet Hussain's house 10 or 15 days after coming to Benares. Sabt Ahmad, son of Inayet Hussain and another person, whose name I do not know, were as witnesses in my marriage, and it was the first time that I came to Inayet Hussain's house. I came accompanied with Ashraf Hussain and a nurse. The tehsildar came there on the day of marriage. I lived in Inayet Hussain's house 10 or 15 days with the females, whose names I do not know, nor can I mention them. There were three women, two widows and one unmarried girl. But whose widows and whose daughters were they I do not know. I used to talk with Sabt Ahmad when I lived in his house and I appeared before him. I became a purdanashin lady when I got married, and before that I used to appear freely before the public as Eurasian ladies do. I had of my own accord adopted Mahomedan costume one month before the marriage. It was 8 days before my adopting Mahomedan costume when the tehsildar first communicated to me his desire to marry me. He first communicated to me his desire in the outer dalan of my house at Chunar. I was standing in the verandah. He came having paid visit to my mother. He began to converse and communicated his desire. He told me that if I wished to please him I should change my costume and embrace Mahomedanism. He communicated to me his desire of marriage in October, 1879. Perhaps the tehsildar came once to my house in 1879 when my mother was not at home. He came without sending a ticket into the dining-room where I was not sitting. I was not surprised with his behaviour that he entered my room without giving information. His entering the room in this manner did not offend me, but I was pleased. And sometimes before this I prayed to God in my mind that the time might come when the tehsildar would show his willingness to marry me. The attention and regards he previously used to pay to me increased my hope that he would marry me. I used to shake hands with him since I met him first. Whenever he shook hands with me I thought he did so cordially. My father used to send my mother sufficient money for our maintenance. My father died last year."

OVER a lakh of suits, or an increase of 2½ per cent. over the preceding year, were instituted in the Central Provinces during 1890. Different and opposite reasons are given by different District officers. One is disposed to attribute the increase to good harvests and general prosperity, while another puts it down to bad crops and widespread distress. The causes of decrease in some of the districts are stated to be "extension of industrial enterprise," "improved condition of the people," slackness of trade, "cholera," &c.

IN a suit for divorce—Long v. Long and Johnson—the husband petitioned for dissolution of marriage on the ground of the wife's adultery with the co-respondent. The respondent did not enter appearance but the co-respondent denied adultery and pleaded collusion. The case was heard by Mr. Justice Butt with a common jury. The husband swore that the wife had, after repeated denials, admitted to him in writing, that the co-respondent had had connection with her, but without her consent. The jury found that the co-respondent had committed adultery and assessed the damages at £50. The adjudication of the question whether the respondent had committed adultery was within the province of the Judge, and he summoned her to make a statement if she pleased. The wife attended and volunteered her evidence. She admitted that the co-respondent had connection with her but that she had been forced and had not been in any way a consenting party. Afraid to confess the truth, she said in cross-examination, she had denied the fact to her husband. The Judge found her weak, both mentally and physically, and the charge against her not proved. He therefore refused to grant the dissolution of marriage. Probably taking compassion on weak woman, he ultimately dismissed the suit against the wife and gave judgment against the co-respondent for damages assessed by the jury and costs.

NO Canal Officer in Bengal shall henceforth be invested with magisterial powers to try cases under Part IX of Act III (B. C.) of 1876, unless he has—

- (1) served for five years in the Public Works Department ;
- (2) passed the departmental standard language examination in Hindustani, and, if employed in Orissa or Midnapore, passed a colloquial examination to be held by the Superintending Engineer in Uriya or Bengali, respectively, and
- (3) passed a prescribed examination in Law.

Officers who joined the service before the 1st January 1881 will not be required to pass the examination in Law, but as regards those who joined after that date, passing the above examination will have preferential claim to the charge of an irrigation division.

It is a wise step that Sir Charles Elliott has taken, but the better course would be still to make the officers in this and the other services conform to the law.

It speaks of the rapid advancement of Bengal under Sir Charles Elliott that the very Sonthals are now enlightened by petroleum. In consequence, Government have found it necessary to extend to their parts the necessary rules regulating the traffic. The Lieutenant-Governor has directed that so much of Act XII of 1886 (the Petroleum Act, 1886) as relates to dangerous petroleum, and the importation of petroleum shall have force and effect in the Sonthal Pergunnahs.

Is an application for a post under Government chargeable with stamp duty? The Magistrate of Midnapore requires, by a notice in the Gazette, each application for the post of Record-keeper to bear a Court-fee stamp of eight annas. While Mr. Dutt thus tries for an income to Government in however small a degree, the editor or printer of the Gazette goes into unnecessary expense in the same behalf. The notice is dated 16th May and notifies that "the post will be disposed of on the 10th June." The notice is continued to the 17th June.

THE following paragraph appears in the Standard newspaper of Madras of the 15th June 1891 as one of its Notes :—

"The best story about Mrs. Disraeli finds no place in Sir William Fraser's volume. When Dizzie and his wife went to stay with the old Duke of Wellington at Strathfieldsaye, Mrs. Disraeli insisted on moving the bed from one side of the room to the other. Asked what this meant, she explained that the duke slept in the other side of the wall, and that if she lay against she would be able to boast ever afterwards that she had slept between the two greatest men in England. That, at all events, was the tale Disraeli used to tell, though, as he delighted in his wife's amusing foibles, he may have invented it. Another of his anecdotes was about the first meeting of Lady Beaconsfield and Sir Richard Temple. Sir Richard called at Dizzie's house, and was shown into the drawing room. Presently Dizzie, who was busy writing, heard a loud scream and a heavy fall. He rushed upstairs, and found that his wife had fallen into a dead swoon at the sight of Sir Richard's striking features."

That appears in the Standard under the head of Notes—whatever that may import. For, we do not know if that is to be taken as one of our contemporary's occasional Notes. If it is, then surely editorial note-making, by far the most important literary function of a journalist, is as easy down the Coast as the issue of false paper. For these notes do not appear to be manufactured on the establishment or first-hand. They are miscellaneous in subject and various in treatment, and apparently made up of pickings from different sources, Indian and European. This note under notice comes startlingly after an account of the Safir defamation case, without the slightest note of warning. There had been no previous talk of Sir William Fraser's book or of Disraeliana, and it is followed by a "note"—if note it deserves to be called—or rather another anecdote of another personage on a different topic, namely, an anecdote of the Count Tolstoi illustrating the power of music. It has apparently little business in the Madras journal and is evidently a picking from a European source. If we had any doubt on the point, that was dispelled on discovering the selfsame "note" of the Madras Standard in the Indian Planter's Gazette of the 17th June. The two days' difference of date does not admit of the Bengal paper deriving its paragraph from the Madras journal. The inference is irresistible that they both draw it from a common source, and probably a European one. In the Bengal journal, the paragraph appears under the head of Home Notes—that is, London Letter. It rests upon the honour of our contemporary's Correspondent to explain how his paragraph got into the Madras paper. The Madras Standard does not pay for its Notes, but evidently gathers them from different sources.

THEY held a close consultation in the rooms of the British Indian Association over the recently passed law popularly known as the Age of Consent Act raising the age of consent of girls from 10 to 12 years, over which an insensate long howl was raised. The President absented himself, leaving the conduct of the consultation to Raja Pearymohun Mukerjee and Baboo Jodoo Lal Mullick with the inevitable Secretary. Reporters were not allowed, though it was announced to be a public meeting. The persons present are said not to have numbered more than 200. The meeting resolved upon a committee of the chief garbhadhanists to consider what steps should be taken in the matter. The President of the year of the Association, Maharaja Jotendro Mohun Tagore, is not for continuance of the agitation. His counsel is—Wait and watch the operation of the law, before you take further steps in the matter. We hope the other Garbhadhanists will see their way, like the Maharaja, to accepting the measure.

THE military Commission in Manipur for the trial of military and political offenders is still in Session. The execution of retributive, if not retaliatory, justice is proceeding with Saxon celerity in the over-awed capital. Kajno, convicted of the murder of Mr. Grimwood, has been hanged. Subadar Narayan, an ex-sepoy of the British service, has been despatched on the gallows for treason. He protested his innocence to the last. Before mounting the steps, he declared he was innocent; on the platform he called God to witness his innocent death, and said he was being made a scapegoat, because he was a poor and not a rich man. He was only silent at the moment of the drop. Colonel Sammoo Singh, Major Aiya Parel and the Tongal Major or General are already under sentences of death. Since then the Jubraj alias Tikendrajit alias Senapati has been ordered to be hanged. Anglo-Indian indignation could not be satisfied with less. The trial of the Regent has concluded and that of the Senapati Angao Senha is proceeding.

The defence of the Princes has been miserably mismanaged. Without proper legal assistance, they are being tried and they have submitted themselves to be tried as ordinary subjects of the Queen, under a procedure of the Commission's own, a procedure under which no Magistrate in India would be allowed to try the meanest subject of Her Majesty. Instead of a noble defence, they descended to the low, petty artifices of a muktear or village pettifogger.

THE Court or the Special Commission consist of Colonel Mitchell, 2nd Gurkhas, Major Ridgeway, 42nd Regiment, and Mr. Davis, Deputy Commissioner of Kohima. The charges against Tikendrajit are—waging war against the Empress of India, and abetment of murder of Mr. Quinton, Chief Commissioner of Assam, Colonel Skene, Commandant, 42nd Regiment, Mr. Cossin, Assistant Secretary, and Lieutenant Simpson, 43rd Regiment. A third charge was added towards the close of the trial—that of murder. But the Commission found him guilty of the first two only and had the justice not to find him guilty of the murder. All the same, he is sentenced as a murderer. Janakey Nath Bysack, the so-called counsel of the condemned Senapati, complains that "the doomed Prince was given neither the chance nor the time to have his case properly conducted by a professional advocate even from Cachar," although he, Bysack, being selected to defend the Prince, "the Court shewed some leniency on me to conduct perhaps a fair trial lasting about a week." The leniency to the advocate instead of the Prince, we are afraid, completed the ruin of the latter. Efforts are now being made to plead at Simla, where the papers of the trial have been sent up for confirmation of the order passed by the Court, for mercy to the Prince. Mr. Anandmohan Bose, barrister-at-law, has been asked to take up the case. The prisoner has telegraphed to the Viceroy for permission to be represented before him by the barrister. We do not see how a prayer for his only chance of justice can in reason be rejected. The trial at Manipur is necessarily a mockery, in spite of the best intentions of Government and the best exertions of the officers composing the Court. The defence is a farce. Mr. Bysack, the eminent advocate and international lawyer, engaged on Rs. 1,000 net in all to conduct it, is, we believe, a Dacca man who went to the frontier as an underling in the Public Works Department at Kohima. There he got into difficulties from which he escaped by escaping from British India into the Manipur State. There is no P. W. D. in Manipur nor Government of writing requiring clerks. However, Bysack is a man of resources if not of varied accomplishments. He had been an amateur singer and obtained employment as music master to the son of one of the princes or nobles on Rs. 15 a month. This income he ekes out with a few rupees per month as Bengali and English tutor in another family. Can the British sense of fairplay be satisfied with giving such an advocate to the worst enemy of England?

THE Advocate of Ganga Prasad Varma, the cheap printer and publisher—not by appointment—of the Congress, is ipso facto the advocate of that nebulous body—say, star—floating about in vacant space in the Indian universe. This sort of constructive allegiance may not be a dignified connection, but our contemporary has given it at least the appearance of respectability by a zeal and persistency worthy of a better cause. Since first it became visible in the firmament of the Western coast, the new political planet has passed through many vicissitudes and trials. It has flourished and it has decayed. Just now it is on the sere and yellow leaf. Day after day, the best men are turning their backs on it. First went out the veteran statesman Raja Madhav Row, whose adhesion on the occasion of the Madras session had been hailed as a tower of strength. Then the Madras President himself left under pressure of his coreligionists, and last not least the President of the Eurasian Association who was ready to preside at the last Congress was prevented by his people from having anything to do with the "natives." These are typical defections of the most important character showing the advanced state of rottenness within. But our contemporary cared not for such signs. Whoever else might desert the Cause, the Advocate was sure to cling. And the Advocate loves all Congress belongings, and adopts the entire Congress platform with all its planks, rotten and all. Of course it has adopted all the loves and hates of the Congress. Hence the singleness of purpose with which it has pursued the present Lieutenant-Governor of Upper India. The pretensions of the Congress have imposed upon no officials, but they have kept their own counsel. Sir Auckland Colvin has not been permitted that advantage. In an evil hour for all parties, the Father of the Congress employed his syren art upon the ruler of the North-Western Provinces but without effect. If coaxing failed, Mr. Hume tried bullying—all to no purpose. Mr. Hume is an able and above all, an indefatigable correspondent, but he got more than his match—in ability certainly—in his correspondent. His indiscreet passion for controversy drew upon the Congress a scathing exposure from the brilliant pen of the Lieutenant-Governor. From that moment, Sir Auckland Colvin became the vête noire of the Congress camp.

Years have passed since then and Time the great Surgeon has bound up the gaping wounds and healed the sores. But not so with the Lucknow journal. If Mr. Hume himself with the generosity of an English gentleman may be disposed to forget or at least forgive the enemy, his Varma's Advocate is for cruel and endless war. Certainly, it is only in this Lucknow newspaper that the feelings of bitterness are maintained with all the freshness of 1888. It is thus that the Advocate still pursues with unrelenting animosity the Lieutenant-Governor who made no scruple to tell the world that he saw nothing in the air-bladder of a national Indian Congress. In the eye of this journal it seems impossible for anything decently good or wise to come out of Sir Auckland Colvin. And nothing of evil can happen in any part of the Lieutenant-Government but the Lieutenant-Governor is the author of it. The temple riot at Benares, various as are the causes assigned for it by different parties, was somehow caused by the Government. The Municipal Commissioners? Why, they are but the creatures of a remorseless Ruler. The deadlock in the Cawnpore municipality is also due to the Lieutenant-Governor. At Lucknow too, he is to blame. It is the same—here, there, everywhere. The unspeakable Colvin is at the bottom of it all.

THE Advocate, is, as in duty bound, a go-ahead journal. It has not only emancipated itself from the superstition of the later Latins who held De mortuis nil nisi bonum, but it stares death in the face with perfect sang froid. With cool cynicism, it notices the death of a brother in another land, who had presumed to differ from itself and to find fault with the Congress. In its rage against the dead, it forgets the latter's name, calling it the Allen Indian Mut. The defunct paper is characterised as "a great ravisher of our country." What a dreadful monster of letter-press it must have been!

THE methods of treatment of the Advocate are, of course, go-ahead. Here is an instance in point. The Indian Daily News has been complaining, to use the Advocate's language,

"that the Calcutta shop-keepers are becoming more and more disrespectful to the ladies who go for their own shopping (sic.); these people take advantage of the ladies (sic.) ignorance of the Indian vernaculars and use bad language."

Our contemporary cannot help admitting as a general proposition that

"The rogues who resort to these practices deserve chastisement at the hands of all gentlemen."

The admission is evidently against the grain, though. For the Advocate soon nullifies its effect by bringing a counter-charge against the victimised ladies. Interrogates the Lucknow paper—

"But will our contemporary teach the mem sahibs to be more punctual in their payments and less abusive to the blackies."

And then goes on to give its personal testimony in support of the charge, pointing it with a word of its own coining:—

"We have heard of not a few cases when dogs have been let loose on poor traders, when they had the affrontness to demand money from the mem sahibs."

The "affrontness" of demanding the price of goods is, no doubt, an intolerable nuisance, specially to one not overblessed with the wherewithal to make the demand good. But surely that is no reason for hounding the creditors, even though they were the most unconscionable duns in the world. The question, however, is, Is it true? and to what extent? We much doubt it. No such suspicions disturb our contemporary's serenity. Accordingly, he proceeds straight to deliver judgment:—

"The less the kicking, abusing and thrashing of Box walls, the less we will hear of scenes described by our Calcutta contemporary."

Whatever other shortcomings may be noticed in it, that is certainly a neat disposal of a difficult practical question. The matter noticed by the Indian Daily News is no newfangled or sentimental complaint. It is a substantial recognised grievance, which has hitherto baffled all efforts for its removal. But nothing is impossible to the master-mind. The Lucknow editor makes short work of it. And this without stirring out of his sthan—his sanctum. He knows the cause of the trouble. He sees plainly that the contumacy and insolence and outrageous behaviour of the shopkeepers in Chandney Chowk, Calcutta, are but reprisals taken for the rowdy dishonesty of English ladies of the Upper Provinces who, not content with calling the itinerant vendors of millinery and other goods, from whom they make purchases, blackies and other names, actually let loose their dogs at the poor fellows when they demand payment.

On the cessation of the cause the effect as a matter of course will cease. Let the European ladies be honest and sober and the Mahomedan tradesmen will no more molest the ladies who come in their way. Such is the cool deliverance of Congress journalism. It becomes all the more noteworthy for the miracle involved. The inhumanity of Up-country ladies to Boxwallas as the cause of the Badmashi of the shopkeepers of Calcutta, is quite equal to the connection between Goodwin Sands and the light-house.

RAMPORE AFFAIRS.

THREE weeks ago, we published an English version of the speech made in Urdu by Mr. William Kaye, the Commissioner of Rohilkund and Agent to the Lieutenant-Governor for the N.-W. Provinces, at a Durbar held at Rampore on the 16th of last month, which shewed in detail the arrangements made by Government for the carrying on of the administration of that state during the minority of the young Nawab. We have watched with some interest how the final orders of Government in that connection were received by the inhabitants of that state and the Mahomedan community in general of the North West. We find that, on the 29th ultimo, a Durbar was held at the residence of Nawab Sudder Ali Khan Bahadur, the President of the Council of Regency at Rampur, which was attended by a large number of gentlemen, officers of the state and members of the Rampore Family. At that Durbar, the Nawab President made a speech, of which the following is a translation:—

"Gentlemen, I have invited you to this meeting for the purpose of consulting you in respect of a particular affair. It is a matter of the greatest regret that the valuable life of an officer of high position, was untimely sacrificed by the hands of Budmashes—the pains of which regret shall continue in my heart and in those of all of you to the end of our lives. The regret is the greater, because up to this date, no clue has been found of such a serious affair, nor has any trace been yet obtained of the murderers. As a result of this, the Government of India have found it necessary to make new arrangements for the administration of this state, as you gentlemen have all heard from the lips of the Agent to Government himself in public Durbar. In his speech, that gentleman stated, among other things, that if the authorities of Rampore had exerted their utmost for the arrest of the murderers, the real facts of this diabolical deed would have been discovered and the administration of the state would have been possible by a Council composed of Natives. Neither the culprits have been secured, nor have the officers of Rampore succeeded yet in discovering a clue to the occurrence. It has therefore become necessary to make a change in the administration.

Gentlemen, I have no objection to the arrangements ordered by Government. Whatever may be considered proper and expedient, it is the duty of all of us to carry out. But our great regret and sorrow arise from the fact that, owing to no clue being found of the real facts of the murder, a grave blame has been cast upon us, and on that ground a new arrangement is ordered to be made in the administration of the state. And this opprobrium shall stick to us during the whole of our lives. I therefore beg of you gentlemen, that no stone should be left unturned in finding out a clue to the perpetrators of this foul deed. I and all of you gentlemen should exert our utmost, in tracing the culprits and place the result of our exertions before His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor. In addition to the amounts which have been notified on behalf of the Government and His Highness the Nawab Bahadur and the Council of Regency, to be paid as a reward to those who will trace out the offenders, I am ready to spend money from my own pocket for the elucidation of this matter. If there be any danger to life, I shall place myself in front of you gentlemen. If there be any fear of the honor of any of you or of any informer being at stake, I shall put forward my own honor as a shield to the honor of all of you. I have a sanguine hope, that you, gentlemen, will accept this appeal of mine, and will try to the utmost of your power, and consider the discovery of this affair as the cause of your good and advancement, and you will thereby merit the approbation of the Government and of His Highness the Nawab Bahadur. In the event of no clue being found to this case, (which God forbid) you have no idea what misfortunes may befall me and all of you. At that time there would be no means of preventing the same. Neither I shall be able to shew my face, nor shall any one of you, gentlemen, have any claim upon the state. I have applied to the Government, with the concurrence of the members of the Council of Regency, for two months' time. What a good thing it would be, if through the help and exertion of you, gentlemen, a clue to this deed is discovered before the expiry of that period. The Government have considered it necessary to make a change in the administration, chiefly on account of the murderers not being traced, as I have already observed. The changes which will take place in this new line of administration, can be easily estimated by yourselves,—there is no need of my describing them. This Mahomedan state has always remained in the hands of Mahomedan administrators, and we are all accustomed to that administration, and we can also hope for the continuation in future of the present condition. What a happy thing would it be if, through your hearty efforts and attention, the case could be brought to a satisfactory issue."

The above will shew the intense feeling of the people of Rampore at the prospect of a European official being placed at the head of the administration of that Mahomedan state. What is the light in which the proposed change has been viewed by the people of the Upper Provinces, will appear from the extracts from a number of Urdu newspapers published by the Lucknow Advocate :—

The Hindustani (Lucknow) : "The appointment of a European at Rampore is a great mistake, it will be much unpopular with the people as a direct interference. We cannot understand who is responsible for the present meddling policy of the Government."

The Najm-ul-Akhour (Etawa) : "If some conspirators have killed a favourite of the British Government, we do not see any justification in punishing the whole state by the appointment of a European Minister."

The Imperial Paper Lahore : "We do not know why a European has been appointed in place of a Native Minister. Is there no person in Rampore to do this work? If not in Rampore then is there derath of good men in the United Provinces? In the appointment of a European we fear the ruin of the state by the introduction of English element."

The Victoria Paper (Sialkote) : "In Native States, it is better to have Natives as Ministers. In N. W. P. there are good many natives better able to do the work of a Prime Minister than a European, why his appointment is not preferred."

The Tajul Akhbar (Rawal Pindi) : "We expected Sir Auckland Colvin would, by appointing a Native to the post, relieve the people of the state from anxiety, but he has done quite the reverse of what was expected by the people."

The Kohinur (Lahore) characterises the appointment as an unnecessary interference in affairs of the state.

The Azad (Lucknow) is not satisfied with the appointment, and says it is beyond the power of any body to undo it.

The Najm-ul-Hind and the Rahbar of Muradabad do not like the appointment so also many others like the Punjab Gazette, Paisa Akhbar and Nasim Agra.

We regret to find that this decision of Government in regard to the state of Rampore has caused great uneasiness amongst the conservative Mahomedans of the North West. But we can scarcely affect to be surprised. The catastrophe that took place at Rampore, was evidently caused by the deceased General Azimooddeen's own contempt for the feelings and opinions of the profoundly Mahomedan population of that state, and his great zeal in introducing and carrying out so-called improvements in the administration, according to English ideas, in spite of the opposition of all others, with only the strong support of the British Government. And our view is borne out by the following words which escaped the lips of Mr. Kaye at the Durbar of the 16th May :—

"The world has produced few men like General Azimooddeen Khan Bahadur. Whatever he intended to do, he used to throw his whole heart in accomplishing it. Whatever arrangements or new measures he desired to introduce into the Rampore State, however disagreeable to some persons, he carried them through for the welfare, advancement and prosperity of Rampore. At last the result was that he gave up his life for the cause of Rampore."

Now we think that the deceased General's introduction of new measures was rather too fast, which the inhabitants of that out of the way state were unable to follow. We wonder that Sir Auckland Colvin's Government did not see it, and did not prevent his running so fast.

Even in the most advanced Provinces of British India, and the most well educated native communities, Government have always hesitated to introduce new measures and improvements, however the same might be for the good of the country or the welfare of the people. And such measures have only been gradually and partially introduced, when the people have acquiesced in them; and it has taken years before any such measure has gained ground. But here in a Mahomedan state, a go-a-head reformer of the heterodox school was allowed by the British Government, without consulting the feelings of the inhabitants, to introduce improvements and new measures, which, in his opinion alone, were for the welfare, advancement and prosperity of the state—which he was simply administering during the minority of a minor Mahomedan Prince. He accordingly, in four years, introduced numerous improvements of a character which the Government have not probably thought proper to introduce in British India in forty years.

In this connection, we are glad to quote from the speech of the Marquis of Salisbury, delivered on the 20th May last at Glasgow, the following passage which appears to us to be very appropriate, and to enunciate a very sound and statesmanlike policy :—

"Of the Khedive of Egypt he could speak in quite a different tone. The revival of Egypt during the past few years had been one of the most wonderful things that our generation had seen. He did not ignore the share which our officers, military and civil, had had in the revival, and the greatest possible honour was due to Sir Evelyn Baring and Sir Francis Grenfell. (Cheers.) All these things were for good. Those Mahomedan communities were improving year by year. What was weak in them was thrown off, and what was strong in them was developed. We had hopes of a little development among our own Mahomedan population in India, but with respect to all those Islamic populations, we must always remember that they were Mahomedans. We must not attempt to impose upon them the development or the exact growth of the West. They would develop in their manner and after their nature. If they had a good larch tree they could not by any contrivance make it grow like an oak. They would only spoil their larch and cover themselves with ridicule if they attempted it. The same thing was true of nations. They must, whether in foreign countries or in their own dominion, be patient with the fact that they were developing them."

That is the very truth on the subject and the key to true kingcraft in the best sense.

ANECDOTES OF HYDERABAD CELEBRITIES.

AFZAL-UD-DOWLA AND SALAR JUNG I.

THE father of the present Nizam was His Highness Afzal-ud-Dowla Bahadur, long the Ruler of the Deccan, and, with the help of his great minister Nawab Salar Jung, a splendid Ruler. He was a good soul—a simple heart. But his eccentricities were many and formidable. Although he had a most irritable temper, he had a generous heart. The following story furnishes a fine illustration of his eccentricity, irritability and generosity.

In those days street brawls and riots were very common, and they frequently ended in bloodshed and loss of human life. As a preventive measure against this evil, Salar Jung issued an order restricting the use of arms by the Arabs under certain conditions. This order was distasteful to the Arabs themselves, and it roused their ire against Salar Jung.

With a view to overthrow Salar Jung's Ministry, the Arabs conspired to poison the sovereign's mind against him, and spread a report to the effect that he had entered into a secret treaty with the British binding himself to hand over the Nizam's Dominions to that Power for a "consideration" and that, as a preliminary step towards that end, the people were being disarmed. When this report reached His Highness, through the zenana agency and in a magnified form of course, His Highness flew into a rage, and sent a most insulting message to Salar Jung, the sum and substance of which was that the latter should send his Begum to the Royal Harem the next evening.

On the royal mandate being made known to Salar Jung, he bowed his head in reverence, and told the messenger to inform His Highness that he (Salar Jung) as His Highness's slave would obey the royal command to the letter.

The great Minister dismissed the messenger with apparent cheerfulness, but his heart sank within him. What may not a despot do? Once within the Palace walls, will the honor of his wife be safe? What's to be done? Should he disobey the royal order? No, he dares not. For then, who knows? the consequence might be far worse. But the order was so very iniquitous and inhuman—how could he have the heart even to mention it to his wife? Yet she must be informed of it at once.

When Dulan Pasha (Lady Salar Jung) heard the royal mandate from the lips of her husband, she became thoughtful and grave for a moment, after which her countenance brightened up, and she said with a smile:—

"Fear not, my lord, there will be no harm done to me. Our Royal Master only means to test your devotion to him. I will go to the Palace, as desired by His Highness, and, depend upon it, I shall come out of it unscathed. I will go with all the pomp and splendour due to my position."

Salar Jung tried to look cheerful, but still his heart misgave him. After a good deal of hesitation, he decided—

"My duty to my sovereign must give way to all other considerations. Obedience to my master is the motto of my life—obedience in everything. Come what will—the royal order must be obeyed, even if it be at the sacrifice of my honor which is a thousand times more precious than life. May God help me to keep this resolution."

The next evening a little before sun-set, Dulan Pasha started for the royal harem in grand state. The bearers carried the miana (palanquin) fast, but faster than they travelled the hurkurras, and before the miana reached the Palace, the hurkurras brought the news of the lady's approach to His Highness.

On hearing the news, His Highness expressed himself agreeably surprised. He then enquired of Nawab M—, who was a great favorite with His Highness and who happened to be present at the time,

"Do you think Salar Jung himself has sent his Begum in obedience to my order, or she has come contrary to her husband's wish in order to please me?"

Nawab M—, who knew the truth, said—"Tuksir, Salar Jung, as a devoted slave of Bundegane Ali, has willingly sent his Begum in obedience to Your Highness's wish."

His Highness—"Ha! Ha! all right. Go one of you and tell Dulan Pasha that she is my sister, and that she need not take the trouble to come and see me, but that I shall call on her one of these days with tokens of my brotherly affection."

The next day His Highness called at Salar Jung's palace with heaps of jewellery and presented them to Dulan Pasha.

It is said His Highness did not leave the Minister's house until he was satisfied that Dulan Pasha had completely decorated herself with every one of those ornaments.

Soon after this event, Salar Jung himself was also honored with costly Khillut.

INSOLENCE OF RAILWAY SERVANTS.

Railway Company, versus Bhola Nath Ghose.

JUDGMENT.

The accused in this case is charged with having travelled with a short journey ticket and with having refused to produce his ticket when called upon to do so, and with being in a state of intoxication and with having assaulted a Railway servant. Mr. Cesar, the ticket collector at Jamalpur, says that when the 9 up mail came at Jamalpur, he went to check 2nd class passenger tickets. He found the defendant who had alighted from the train proceed towards the Refreshment Room. He again and again asked the accused to show him his ticket, but the accused struck him on the chest and banged the door after him. Then he made his report to the Station Master who came and asked the accused to produce his ticket. The ticket was produced and was found to be a short journey ticket from Sainthia to Nalhati. The accused says he was asleep and he was aroused from his sleep and was asked to produce his ticket. He was then called a thief and his hand was caught hold of and he was asked to come down. He denies even having assaulted the ticket collector. Before the police the ticket collector deposed to the effect that accused got up in the carriage and refused to produce his ticket and also struck him. He was again shoved out afterwards. Neither before the police nor before me is any allusion made to the Hotel Khansama ever having supplied liquor to the accused. On the contrary it appears that the accused was asleep and was inside the carriage when Cesar first came up to him. Several witnesses have been examined in support of the prosecution. The witnesses have considerably amplified the original story. One says the accused was staggering and that Cesar was dealt one blow on the chest. The Khansama says he was shoved out of the carriage. Mr. Rose says the defendant also threatened to strike the ticket collector with a cane. The constable says the accused was vomiting. On the other side the accused has examined a few witnesses. The station master of Nalhati says he knew that the accused had a short journey ticket, and that the guard was informed of it, but the guard took it as a joke and gave no certificate. Then it is urged that the ticket collector woke up the defendant who said the guard knew of his having a short journey ticket with him, but that Mr. Cesar called him chotta and otherwise insulted him and tried to drag him out of the carriage and that the ticket collector caught hold of his hand in order to drag him out and that the accused evaded himself from his grasp.

This is the sum and substance of the evidence adduced in this case. The question for determination is whether the accused actually committed the assault and if he did commit it whether it was a deliberate assault or whether there was provocation or whether the hand of the accused had been caught hold of or whether the blow or shove was purely accidental. The complainant's story as told before me differs materially from the story as developed in first information. The witnesses moreover do not support complainant's statement. The complainant says he was on the platform. His story that he came and demanded the passenger's ticket and was struck, in reply passes belief as the cause. A man can hardly commit such an act without some reason. Cesar assigns no reasonable cause. Constable Komaluddin evidently views the whole matter with condensed (?) eye. He too says, Cesar came and asked for the ticket and was struck. Emaunally, the khansama, says the ticket collector was shoved, but has been inside the carriage. Rose says the ticket collector was on the foot board when a blow was given him. The statements are so discrepant that I cannot accept this story as a genuine version of the affair. Let us see what the defendant's version is and in the first place the assistant Station Master says that the accused did complain to him that Cesar had assaulted him. Then the witnesses say his hand was caught hold of and he was being dragged out when he wrenched himself from Cesar's grasp. According to Cesar's statement before the police the defendant was asleep. So I see no reason for disbelieving his story corroborated as it is by his servant and by a passenger. I am therefore of opinion that the accused had been roughly aroused from his sleep and that his hand had been caught hold of and that the ticket collector was insolent and used abusive epithets towards him. Naturally the defendant resented this conduct and when the ticket collector assumed the function of a policeman, he kicked him off. If there be any offence in this I think there was ample justification for the defendant to exceed the bounds of decency and civility. I am therefore of opinion that the accused cannot be held responsible for this charge.

With reference to the charge that he was in a state of intoxication, I think it is essential that the intoxication is to be such that a man is not able to take care of himself. Now the evidence adduced does not establish this point. The witnesses even of the complainant himself do not say he was in intoxication. They say he was slightly under the influence of liquor. There is no law which prevents a man from travelling in a Railway carriage who has taken a glass of liquor which does not intoxicate him. There is no proof that he committed any other offence. With reference to the first charge I am of opinion that the accused had no intention of defrauding the Railway Company. The deposition of the Nalhati station master establishes the point. He has moreover paid the excess fare. How he can be criminally prosecuted for refusing to produce his ticket, I do not see. It will then appear the accused is not responsible for the act imputed to him. It has been argued and proved before me that this is not the first instance in which insult has been offered to gentlemen at Jamalpur by Mr. Cesar. His youth may have something to do with it. But it is a matter which cannot be passed over with silence. That he offered insult and was insolent to the defendant holding as he does a high position in life, cannot be doubted, and it is a matter of regret that this should be so in the face of the existing circulars, and that the matter therefore deserves to be brought to the notice of the authorities. Let the defendant be acquitted.

THE FUTURE WAR.

Under the title "The German Marine at the Eleventh Hour," there appeared in Germany a brochure, which has produced a profound sensation in that country. We give below a translation of the dramatic part of the pamphlet—the two naval battles supposed to have been fought between the French and the Germans on the coasts of the North Sea:—

Eight hours after the declaration of the war, the French squadron appears in sight of Heligoland.

Dismay, reigns on every side of Germany. The ports are blocked, the Skager-Rack is barred up by a flotilla of French ironclads.

Bremen, Hamburg and Kiel are filled with marines, soldiers and officers, all anxious and running about, some working on the fortifications, and others arming the ships. Williamshafen especially, the key of the Gulf of Jade, the first port of war in the empire, is in feverish excitement. It is before this town that the fate of the campaign is to be decided.

The French Admiral commands the sea from Heligoland to Wangerog; he slowly approaches from the shores, explores the ridges, sounds the depths, takes precaution against the explosive engines stored up by the enemy. At last, the German fleet appear at the entrance of the Gulf of Jade.

It is a day of September, foggy and cold.

The night, closing suddenly, favours at first the German Admiral: he is better acquainted with the secrets of the defence, knows the dangerous passes and profits by them. Toward the evening, by the favour of the darkness, he orders of his steamers towing a flotilla of torpedoes a movement towards the west: the enterprise succeeds. Scarcely in sight of Wangerog, when the towing steamers change the direction and sail in a right line from the coast of Heligoland, sure of falling in with a part of the French squadron.

The silence is complete,—the solitude gloomy and dismal. All of a sudden, the heavy mass of ironclads appears across the darkness; and before the warning has been given, the torpedoes are launched: two or three explosions resound, some pale glimmerings shine in the darkness of the night with cries of death. Two French ironclads are blown up, throwing some sheaves of fire on the dark horizon.

Not losing an hour, the Germans pursue their advantage, profiting by the surprise and tumult of their sudden attack. Everywhere the waters are ploughed by the dark engines of war: the French torpedo-boats meet the German torpedo-boats; the electric light, freakish and irradiating in jets, marks out the way. The conflict is terrible. The cries of agony come from the ships, which turn round and are swallowed by the bottomless sea. The "Suffren" and the "Richelieu" give way; the Lazarboat, in which all the wounded are gathered together, disappears, being broken by a torpedo, in the hazard of the battle.

The right wing of the French squadron is annihilated.

The German torpedo-boats, which at the dawn of day entered the Gulf of Jade, having escaped by a miracle the French cruisers, are hailed with acclamation by the enthusiastic sailors and by the whole population of Williamshafen massed on the quays.

But this triumph is not of long duration. The very morning, the French admiral receives from his own Government orders to destroy at any cost the establishments and dockyards of the Gulf of Jade. This order removes all his hesitation and enervation..... He advances by the pass of Wangerog and cuts direct for the entrance of the Gulf of Jade. He has 8 ironclads, as many iron-plated cruisers, a good number of submarine mines and advice boats.

The sky is of a dark blue; the humid fog lies thick for the watch. The "Konig Wilhelm," placed on look out, is the first to open fire on the French squadron.

The cannonade begins, the ironclads throw out their grape shots and pursue the "Konig Wilhelm" in her retreat—the length of the road.

Then the mines shine, the terrible dangers of the pass reveal themselves. The sea raised by the explosions, is stained with blood and encumbered with wrecks and corpses. A thick mist separates the enemies' ships: the shells fly at random in the terrible conflict. Then a sudden light reveals the situation; the French advance. Their torpedo-boats sink two cruisers, the "Siegfried" is broken into two by the "Sainte Barbe.".....Despite the terrible effect of the mines and forts, the German fleet retreat being half annihilated.

The next day is passed in anxiety.

A pale sun, appearing in the livid sky, illuminates the Gulf of Jade. The disabled ships lie on the strand with human bodies mixed up, bleeding and mutilated. Some wrecks are seen on the tainted surface of the waters.

The French supply their vessels again with provisions, throw their dead into the unfathomable tomb of the sea, repair the damage done to their ships, and make their last disposition for the attack on Wilhelmshafen. The night passes clear and superb, every one is anxiously waiting for the morning. The morning dawns. Some light clouds repose on the sea. Through a thin sail, things appear to pass quickly; the very air seems to take a feverish agitation.

Suddenly some hoarse echoes resound. The shot-proof frigates and gunners attack energetically the last barrier, near which all the German fleet group for a desperate resistance.

At a distance, in the scorching heat of the day, appear menacing the forts, the barracks, the coal-yards and the mole of Wilhelmshafen. The order of the French Admiral is to approach the fortifications about 2,000 metres and to commence the bombardment... To the silence of the night and the anxiety for the result of the battle, is succeeded the terrible roar of the cannonade. The atmosphere is lighted by cannon-balls, discharged from the forts as well as the shots fired by the French ironclads.

The agonizing cries of officers and soldiers caused by the grape-shots are heard. The air is darkened by the smoke, soot, and charcoal, the German marine who play their last card, perform prodigies of valour.

The pass is narrow, obstructed and sown with explosive engines. Two ironclads alone can move in the front. The attack is difficult and long. Cruisers, advice boats and torpedo-vessels sink by turns. The shells, like hailstones of fire, strike the flanks of the ironclads, their reply, seen from a distance, does not appear to be sure.

The remainder of the German fleet having been annihilated, the result is no longer doubtful. The French ironclads, two by two, vomit their fires on Wilhelmshafen. The terrified inhabitants flee, the coal-yards are set on fire; and the town and the forts are soon reduced to heaps of ruin.

The next day, a fleet of reinforcements having arrived from Cherbourg, the towns of Cuxhafen and Bremerhafen are bombarded in their turns. The French remain victorious but their losses are considerable; it is a victory a la Pyrrhus.

The loss of the German fleet is owing to the feebleness of their fortifications on the coasts, their over-confidence in the submarine-mines and the small number of their ironclads.

When the issue of the combats in the Gulf of Jade has become known, a part of the French fleet of the Baltic has passed the Skager piloted by a flotilla of cruisers and advice-boats which know the passages. The Cattegat is now free. The French vessels having freed the Sound are hailed with enthusiasm by the people of Copenhagen, no longer able to hide their sympathy. Soon the commandant of the squadron orders the ports of Pomerania to be blockaded up, and wishes to cast anchor at the south point of the isle of Leland. Some days after, the whole of the French fleet, nine ironclads and five large steamers landing 3,000 French infantry, appear opposite Kiel, with the intention of making a landing at Friedrichsort.

The next day, a bloody and terrible battle is fought. The landing of the French army has been rendered impossible. The two fleets, mutilated and damaged, remain in sight of each other. But the moral effect of this rapid campaign has been immense. Anguish takes possession of anxious Germany.

Before the first great battles have been fought on the Continent, peace is made.

The Powers interpose, and France has taken her revenge.

Official Paper.

NOTE ON THE ADULTERATION OF BENGAL COTTON.

By the Secretary, Upper India Chamber of Commerce.

This cry is practically as old as the trade in the article between India and Europe, and the question has been a burning one all along, judging from the regulations promulgated by the East India Company, the more recent institution of the Cotton Frauds Act, as well as from the numerous resolutions from time to time formulated on the subject by Chambers of Commerce and Buyers' Associations both in India and Europe, the net results of which, as regards any improvement in quality having been effected, being nil. In a Market Report published in 1845, there are records of great deterioration in grade and decrease in output of this cotton; and a Member of this Chamber informs the writer that he has correspondence files in his possession, relating to Agra Cotton, dated back to 1864, throughout which complaints as to quality are prominent. Various have been the remedial measures suggested; but at the present time there appears to be a marked preponderance of opinion against the re-introduction of the Cotton Frauds Act.

In Europe there seemingly still exists a general misconception as to the place of origin of the so-called "Bengal" Cotton, the popular idea being that the name indicates the part of India in which it is produced. The explanation of this is, that as Liverpool gave the name of "Surats" to cotton shipped from the ports of Western India, so London first termed all that was imported from Calcutta "Bengals," although the proportion of this staple exported from that Presidency was then, and is still, insignificant. Prior to the railway era, cotton was boated by river to Calcutta, in considerable quantities, from Furruckabad, Agra, Muttra, Kalpi, &c., these districts becoming, early in the present century, the chief cotton-growing centres in Northern India, and giving the names to the classifications by which various grades and qualities of N.-W. P. Cotton were known in the English markets. There is also evidence of cotton shipped from Calcutta having been sold in Germany 50 years ago as "Banda," "Jalloni" (Jelcyses), "Faria" (Faris), "Catchowra," the last mentioned being a poor article, practically sweepings; and determination of class and quality by the use of the names above referred to is still understood by the older native dealers in Up-country markets.

Thus cotton exported from the North-Western Provinces, Oudh, Rajputana and Central India, grown over an area which has been estimated at, taking the average of the last few years, about 5,500 square miles, was, for convenience sake, simply classed in 3 to 4 grades, from "fair" to "fine," all under the comprehensive title of "Bengals." Throughout the extent of country alluded to, the differences in soil, climate, varieties of seed used, system of cultivation of the plant, and preparation of crop for the market, are very great, resulting in the production of many sorts of cotton, differing in length of staple, strength, colour, texture; and in the case of certain districts, containing a large admixture of seed or leaf or both, and sometimes sand or water. Under these circumstances it has been found practically impossible, owing to the decentralization of the trade, to select in quantity, or to buy in any given market, cotton that will exactly correspond with the "Bengals" standard, particularly as the standard samples are made up in Europe from the previous season's shipments, and are sent out here in the autumn, before the new crop is in the market. In fact, the Up-country selector, acting for a firm that has sold forward, has invariably the odds against him. If the crop is poorer in quantity than the previous season's, he has to buy above class if he means to keep up to the standard on which he sold; should it be good all round, he gains nothing, as neither Indian Mill Agents nor purchasers for the native hand-spinning industry let a cotton go past them which meets their requirements as regard quality and price.

The peculiarities of Up-country cotton and the difficulties of working the trade are, beyond doubt, well known to the export firms; and if a reform is to be attempted, surely it is they who should initiate action in the matter. The fact of no steps having been taken in this direction would seem, however, to point to the conclusion that, as in the case of "dirty wheat," they care nothing for the future, and look only to the possibility of immediate gains.

Although cotton from Western India was for a time known as "Surats," Bombay shippers appear soon to have grasped how extremely unsatisfactory and inapplicable such a term was for the article in which they dealt, and they have since designated the various productions as Broach, Oomrawattee, Khangown, &c., according to the district wherein grown. These varieties they have again, in each instance, sub-divided and graded as "fair" to "fine" as the season's crop turns out.

In Calcutta, jute and indigo are still sold, to a considerable extent, by district and individual names and marks, and it appears that it would be of advantage if Up-country cotton were classed in like manner. Such a system would be greatly to the interest of those engaged in the trade, from the cultivator, packer and exporter, up to the spinner; the latter would, by being able to name the brand required, have a much better chance than he has at present of getting cotton of uniform quality, suitable for his special purpose, while the arrangement would tend greatly, as regards the grower, the dealer and the consumer, to reduce disputes.

From the frequent agitation of the question in recent years, it might be gathered that Bengal Cotton, as exported, had deteriorated in quality during the last two decades; but the facts available do not support this idea, and, on the other hand, the area under cultivation, and presumably the production, has greatly increased during the period under discussion.

The character of the cotton shipped has undoubtedly varied a good deal from time to time; but the general impression is that the article now brought into the Up-country markets is, on the average, unquestionably better than the supplies procurable in the same markets 20 or 25 years ago---a decided improvement in classification, cleaning and packing having followed the introduction of steam presses throughout the Provinces, between 1875 and 1880. The complaints as to quality appear to be really traceable to gradual mutations in the cotton trade itself. Of the cotton produced in this part of India, a certain proportion has, in every season, been of poor quality, short in staple, wanting in strength, stained and so forth. This class has always been considered unsuitable for their purpose by the native handweaving industry (which at one time was an important factor in the trade and is still a considerable consumer of the better descriptions of cotton) and in former days found a market chiefly in China. The weavers there, however, apparently came to the same conclusion eventually as their fellow-craftsmen in India, viz., that it did not pay to work such a low grade article, and the demand ceased. An outlet for this class of cotton was then found on the Continent of Europe and retained for many years, but now this demand has, to a great extent, failed. Germany and other continental nations buy "Bengals" for two reasons, first, because for the manufacture of certain fabrics a rough staple, really white colored cotton of the quality of middle class "Bengals," has been found to be particularly suitable, and there has consequently been a steady demand by the trade for these grades; second, because the cheapness of inferior "Bengals" as compared with lower grade "Surats" and American Cotton has, in the past, made it worth their while to use the class previously shipped to China from Northern India.

It appears that of recent years American and Bombay Cotton has steadily declined in price, but that the Bengal staple has not shared in the fall in the same ratio; hence although certain continental spinners have still to rely on us for rough staple cotton of the better class, those who formerly took low grade "Bengals" find that it suits them better, both as regards price and quality, to buy inferior and field or country-damaged "Americans" and "Surats."

Thus there is no bonâ fide market for our inferior cotton. Native hand-weavers cannot work it; the Chinese found out, some years ago, that it did not pay them to use it, and now our continental customers can and do buy an article that suits them equally well at a proportionately lower price. There is therefore no outlet for such cotton, and native growers and buyers have naturally taken to assisting each other by bulking the inferior and better stuff produced in each district, the mixture constituting a quality just a little below that which spinners want. In this way selectors and packers find it extremely difficult to secure cotton in quantity that will meet the needs of both European and Indian consumers.

In the absence of a market for this low grade cotton, mixing is inevitable so long as the cultivator cannot sell the better classes produced at a figure that will allow of his disposing of waste, pickings or damaged cotton for what it will fetch, and the price of good cotton does not admit of this at present. As a case in point, the so-called "Phoolah," an extra "fine" quality, has disappeared from the Up-country marts; to make this grade the best kapas was selected, ginned, and all seed, leaf, stained and damaged cotton thereafter removed by hand-picking. Of course it fetched a fancy price, and for a time the cultivators in certain districts took a great pride in bringing to market such cotton. But the expense entailed in its preparation and the large percentage of inferior quality left on hand by the process, which they found very difficult of disposal, showed them that it was not a paying business, and this class of cotton has therefore entirely died out.

The chief complaint against Bombay Cotton seems to be the deliberate mixing of the produce of different districts and the bulking of long and short staple by cultivators, middlemen, ginner and packers---practices which those engaged in the cotton industry on this side of the country cannot be justly accused of.

As regards fraudulent damping, the admixture of crushed seed, kaps, sand, &c., the evidence on the subject proves that this is clearly the selector's business, as in all the bazars in the North-Western Provinces he is given ample opportunity of examining every bale or gudda he buys; and if he does not get what he thinks he is taking, it is no one's fault but his own. His price limit, or in the case of speculative purchases, the rate current at the sea ports or in Europe, sometimes has the effect of inducing him not to touch the best of each class only; in fact, in many instances it is held that he deliberately buys somewhat below grade, accepting the risk of having to pay an allowance eventually in preference to facing an immediate actual or probable loss: this is notably so with native selectors, the result being that when a bad crop is followed by a poor one as regards quality, down go the "standards" and the name and repute of "Bengals." Neither does a good quality season subsequently help matters, for the dealer gains nothing by giving better stuff than he is bound to supply, and he does not do so as a rule.

Apart from this view, as already remarked, the area under cotton is steadily increasing, and in this light it would be practically impossible to state a case that would show any need, in the interests of the country at large, for special laws to rule the industry.

Abuses, defects and difficulties such as these that are now rooted in the trade, are not easy to deal with; but it seems that the following remedial measures would be calculated to effect a reform:---

1st.---Efforts to find new markets, at paying rates, for the inferior class of Bengal Cotton---an object which would be also attained if comparatively better prices ruled for the low grades of "Americans," "Surats," &c.

2nd.---A reform in the fixing of "Bengal standards," both as regards the time at which these are made up and their grading, i.e., the re-introduction of provincial marks (the system now being followed by Bombay); sales being effected "fair" to "fine" from each district according to the season's production.

3rd.---The general use of machine gins in the North-Western Provinces, Oudh and the Punjab. These have, to a great extent, superseded hand gins in other parts of India. Two ginning factories are now working successfully in the Provinces; and in view of the great improvements that have been effected in cotton gins of late years, it is but reasonable to expect that the trade can look forward to being, ere long, put in possession of a machine suitable to the cotton which we produce. Knowing what has taken place in other parts of the country, natives are quite ready to accept and use a gin that would properly manipulate North-Western Provincial cotton; and on its appearance a radical change may, and in all probability will, take place in the trade similar to that which was brought about by the introduction of steam-pressing.

The youth loves the maid, 'tis plain to be seen,
And she—had he eyes he would know
That she's long been patiently waiting the chance
Her heart on him to bestow.

To-night, as 'tis quiet and no one is near,
He tells, bending low o'er her chair,
Of his love, and impatiently waits her reply
Behind the portiere.

As they wander forth from the silken folds
And join in the mazy whirl,
Life looks to her twice as bright as it did,
I know, for—I was the girl.

THE BLIND MAN :

OR THE DISEASE OF THE PHILISTINES.

BEHOLD a blind man ! no learned dog hath he ;
But he hath gold, and stocks, and lands in fee.
Sharp are his wits ; his optics clear and bright --
As sound his eyes as ever saw the light ;
And yet no blinder is the creeping mole
To nature's charms than is his sordid soul.

In truth, for him the world in light arrayed
Is little better than a jungle's shade ;
And all the thousand charms of earth and skies
Are blanks or blotches in his batlike eyes.

In vain for him the morn, in beauty clad,
Trips o'er the hills and makes the valleys glad ;
In vain for him the verdure of the world,
Or radiant cloud wreaths round the mountains curled ;
He sees no glories in the effulgent sun,
Which, smiling earthward when his course be run,
Sets all the world aglow with tints rare,
And crowns with splendors all the heights of air.

In vain for him doth nature's royal hand
Paint all the zones with pictures rare and grand ;
Unheeded all the autumn's matchless dyes ;
Unseen, the squadrons of the summer skies ;
Star gems, far gleaming from the depth of night—
The mountain's vastness and the ocean's might—
Or myriad flowers, sweet favorites of God,
Which, ever smiling, deck the grateful sod.

These wake no joys within his darkened mind.
His eyes, they see ; yet lo ! the man is blind !

SATISFIED.*

AFTER the toil and turmoil,
And the anguish of trust belied ;
After the burden of weary cares ;
Baffled longings, ungranted prayers ;
After the passion, and fever, and fret,
After the aching of vain regret,
After the hurry and heat of strife,
The yearning and tossing that men call life ;
Faith that mocks, and fair hopes denied,
We—shall be satisfied.

When the golden bowl is broken,
At the sunny fountain side ;
When the turf lies green and cold above
Wrong, and sorrow, and loss, and love ;
When the great dumb walls of silence stand
At the doors of the undiscovered land ;
When all we have left in our olden place
Is an empty chair and a pictured face ;
When the prayer is prayed, and the sigh is sighed,
We—shall be satisfied.

What does it boot to question,
When answer is aye denied ?
Better to listen the Psalmist's rede,
And gather the comfort of his creed ;
And in peace and patience possess our souls,
While the wheel of fate in its orbit rolls,
Knowing that sadness and gladness pass
Like morning dews from the summer grass,
And, when once we win to the farther side,
We—shall be satisfied.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Vicissitudes of climate, exposure and hardships, tell heavily on soldiers and sailors, sowing the seeds of diseases which may ultimately break up the constitution. Naturally careless of their health a word in season may avert many evils, and may cause them to resort to timely measures without any difficulty or publicity. Holloway's effectual remedies are so suitable, and are so easily adapted for the varied complaints to which our soldiers and sailors are liable, that a supply should always be obtained before proceeding abroad. It may with confidence be stated that many a valuable life might have been saved, or confirmed cripple prevented from begging in the streets, if Holloway's remedies had been used in time.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

SHOCKS of earthquake have been felt at Serajunge, at Assensole, and at Jacobabad.

WHILE we are passing through the throes of a severe hot weather and almost a still atmosphere, a tornado passed over Damookdeah and Sara on the Northern Bengal State Railway, laying down buildings and damaging goods and wrecking flats on the river. At Sara, the wind derailed almost a complete train of goods waggons.

THE unseasonal weather—failure of rains and consequent crops—is felt most in Madras. There is distress already in Chingleput and North Arcot. Over 8,700 persons are relieved by relief works in Chingleput, 4,900 in Wandiwash, 2,170 in Kalahasti and 1,400 in other places, besides 2,000 persons to whom food is distributed at kitchens. In Tinnevely, the rayyets suffer too. As a relief measure, Government has allowed the Zemindary estates in the Tenkasi, Sankaranainar Koil and Srivilliputtur taluqs time till next year for payment of peiscush with 6½ per cent. interest on arrears. This relief, as it may be, is intended for the tenantry who are to be allowed the same temporary immunity from rent.

SCARCITY is reported from Rajputana, and cattle are dying in the Todgarh district for want of fodder. At Bikanir, Kishengarh and Knerwara, they are in poor condition. Fodder has failed in four states. In Deoli, Kherwara and Ajmere-Merwara 44,518 acres are affected by scarcity. In Ajmere-Merwara about 6,000 persons are put on relief works. Government has sanctioned one lac of rupees for advances to agriculturists in Rajputana for wells and tanks.

The Native States will be asked to furnish the Government of India with weekly reports regarding the prices of food grains and the quantity of supplies available.

By the accounts of the county chroniclers, Lord Lansdowne enjoyed his Narkanda trip. Who knows? We can scarcely believe it, in the face of the telegrams from "Home." They had very fine weather though, which as English ladies and gentlemen they doubtless made the most of.

SIR John Gorst informed the House of Commons, that enquiries made shewed that there were no illegalities in race lotteries in India except in Burma, where steps are being taken to prevent them.

ANOTHER batch of Benares rioters, namely, those tried for the attack on the Rajghat railway station—have been sentenced. Of the fifteen brought up, fourteen made a feeble defence or none and threw themselves on the mercy of the Court. The jury found them guilty of riot, dacoity and being in possession of plundered property. The Judge shewed them no mercy and sentenced five to transportation for life, two to ten years' rigorous imprisonment, including three months' solitary confinement, and seven to seven years' rigorous imprisonment, including three months' solitary confinement. The trial of the fifteenth was put off on account of the illness of the accused—a mercy, indeed, shewn by the Judge. Already, a much larger number has been sentenced to exemplary punishment than the number of those who are likely to be punished for the massacre at Manipur. Yet a number remains to be tried and punished.

MR. W. H. Rattigan, of Lahore, Barrister-at-law, Vice-Chancellor of the Panjab University, &c., has been taken in as an Additional Member of the Governor-General's Council for making Laws and Regulations. It is a wise selection. Mr. Rattigan is not only a learned but also an able man of experience, of knowledge of the country, of thoroughness as well as honesty of purpose. He is sure to bring wise counsel to the Council, and, suitable opportunity being presented, to leave his mark there.

THE "World's Columbian Exhibition" is estimated to cost £4,000,000 sterling, of which the city of Chicago in which it is to be held, contributes one million. According to present estimate, the opening of the Exhibition is timed for 1st May, 1893.

THE Singapore Free Press thus announces the result of a lottery:—

"We are informed that Mr. Griffiths, husband of Madame Franzini, the lady bicyclist, manager of her entertainment before she joined Woodyear's Circus, and now manager of that show, has won—let us keep within the law—'forty thousand dollars in the Lanilla Mottery.' Griffiths is the safe man now!"

A TEMPEST in a tea pot has just happened at Benares. The Pioneer gives the news in the following words:—

"The Benares Municipal Board had not yet recovered from the disquieting influences of the late disturbances: but one would have expected that the effect of all the opposition they have encountered abroad would have been to unite the members to each other. Instead of this a violent schism now prevails between the Mahomedan and Hindu representatives. It appears that at a recent meeting somebody suggested that some vaccination rules that were under discussion might be translated into Urdu. At this suggestion the patience of the Honble Mr. Bereshwar Mitter, of the illustrious Legislature of these Provinces, ran out: 'I hate,' said he, 'the relics of the Moslem tyranny.' The six Mahomedan members of the Board were not the men to let an occasion of this kind go by, and in a joint letter to the Chairman they pointed out how their feelings had been lacerated by the expressions of the Honorable Babu. The end of it seems to be that the latter has offered an apology for his offence, but we have still to learn whether it has been considered satisfactory, and whether the Chairman has succeeded in restoring tranquility in the political nursery over which he presides."

We suspect there was some misunderstanding, perhaps also a loss of temper. At any rate, Mr. Mitter is not the fool that the Pioneer would make him out to be. He is a thorough up-country man, but, then, he is, or had been, a Baboo.

THE German journal Export throws light on the manufacture of paper in China. It is surprising to learn how backward the Chinese are in this branch of industry. This old people probably knew the article long before any nation of Europe, yet to this day their efforts are limited to the utilisation of only one source, and that one about the least practical of all. It may roundly be stated that all Chinese paper is made from the shoots of the bamboo cane, excepting only a few instances, in which it is made of straw and bark. The paper mills too are of the most primitive kind, consisting of a water-wheel set in motion by a mountain rivulet. This lifts up and down a row of wooden beaters, which drop into a rough stone trough filled with young bamboo twigs, which are gradually reduced to a coarse pulp. After passing through a number of sieves, this pulp is exposed to the sun to dry. When this mass is sufficiently dry the article is ready for the market. As a matter of course, this paper possesses but little strength, and not being sized or varnished—treated with glue—it can not be used for writing; the pen sticks and the ink spreads. The writer explodes the popular idea that the so-called rice paper, which is principally exported from Canton, is made from rice. He does not expressly say so, but we take it that for this kind too the everlasting bamboo—the patron, protector and preserver of the races of man inhabiting the whole of Eastern Asia and the Indian Archipelago from the Garrow, Tipperah and Chittagong Hills to the island of Saghalien—supplies the material. Although there are various qualities of paper in China, we are told that even the best of them can not stand comparison with the most ordinary European paper.

THE rumour that Sir Dennis Fitzpatrick is about to leave Hyderabad next month, does not seem to have any foundation. He has certainly not yet applied for leave. As he is understood to have in his pocket the reversion of the Lieutenant Governorship of the Punjab, it is not improbable that he should wish to have a short holiday, before entering upon that important charge.

THE Englishman of yesterday opens its editorial columns with the news of the death of Shama Churn Sen, the late Cashier of the Chartered Bank, one of Mr. Jackson's own, mentioning the time, the place, and the cause thereof. Is our contemporary qualifying itself for the rôle of a Newgate Gazette?

In its new noviciate, our contemporary scarcely shows either the promptitude or the accuracy of a leading journal. The "event"—to speak in true newspaper language—occurred on Tuesday last within a few miles from the metropolis and the announcement is made on Friday. The death-place is not named but vaguely indicated as the deceased's "native village near Santipore." This must be disappointing to those who care for the information—and there must be many such, specially among our contemporary's constituency, or else the Englishman, which systematically avoids native names and matters and ignores native journals, would not in propria persona chronicle this truly "domestic occurrence," to say nothing of giving it such editorial prominence. It is not only disappointing but also misleading. One must naturally look among the cluster of small villages and hamlets in the immediate neighbourhood of Santipore for the "village near Santipore." No one would suppose that a place of any importance was meant. The fact is that the writer did not appreciate the importance of the place understood by him. The misdirection is due to the Englishman's imperfect acquaintance with local geography. Sen's "native village near Santipore" was, as everybody heard during the trial which made him notorious and his counsel Mr. Jackson famous, Halishahar. No one will possibly recognise it as a village near Santipore. It is not near Santipore—certainly not in the way in which it is mentioned—and it is not a mere village. It is scarcely a compliment to Halishahar to give it recognition as a village near Santipore. You may just as well call Serampore a village near Barrackpore. It would be only more awkward to describe Santipore as a place near Halishahar. Halishahar may be a village to a denizen of Cockaigne, but it is something more, certainly as things go in Bengal. Its name stamps its township, meaning New Town. Nor is it such a modern place. Santipore is known to be an old place, almost as old as Nuddea, once a royal capital. As between Santipore and Halishahar it would be difficult to say which is the older. As for the evidence of newness given by its name, Nuddea bears a name of the same import, or perhaps worse. They are both New, only Halishahar is a City, whereas Navadwip otherwise Nuddea is a holm. Both places have passed through many changes of fortune, but they have both throughout been distinguished as seats of the élite of the Hindu race in Bengal and of Sanskrit learning. Halishahar seems to be a modern name received during Mahomedan Rule. It was famous from before under the Sanskrit appellation of Kumarhâtta.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

IN the usual way, the Age of Consent law—Act X of 1891—went up to the Secretary of State for India, and was considered by Lord Cross in Council. He has no objection to the Act and has left it to its operation. If the agitation or whatever is left of it against the new measure is to prevail, a new Bill must be introduced to further amend the Indian Penal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedure.

PARSEE indignation against the Bombay University Tower tragedy has resulted in the committal of Maneckji Aslaji to the sessions. It is more a private than police prosecution. The police, in fact, is on its trial. A large and influential Committee have been formed to raise subscriptions and to memorialize Government for a thorough and independent enquiry.

A WIDESPREAD and sorer grievance, if possible, than the remissness of the Police in the Tower tragedy, is the appointment of Mr. Webb as third Magistrate of Bombay. It is regarded, to quote a Bombay paper, "as unjust to the people of Bombay and to the large staff of native magistrates who look to the ordinary promotion in the service for the reward of their labours." Mr. Webb was first appointed temporarily a long time ago by Sir Richard Temple. Sir James Fergusson refused to appoint him permanently at the next vacancy, because Mr. Webb "was disqualified under the orders of the Secretary of State which reserved such appointments for natives and under the age rules." He, however, continued to officiate from time to time. If he had so continued to the end of his official career, there would not have been the present outcry. It is the pucca plum of office that sticks in the throat of the country Ducks. If by the Secretary of State's directions the place should be reserved for a native, it is strange that no native officer has all this long time been found for it, while all the repeated occasional appointments of Mr. Webb were allowed to accumulate and thus constitute a claim in his behalf.

WITH characteristic persistence, Mr. Warburton has returned to the attack on the Tribune. He has taken out against the proprietor and the editor, who have already been punished heavily, fresh summonses on the remaining charges of his complaint which technically remain still undisposed of by the Magistrate. Is there no respectable officer in the Punjab to knock his vindictiveness out of this Afghan in European costume?

THE papers, quoting the Pioneer without acknowledgment, report that Major Vincent, 2nd in command of the Central India Horse, has been selected for the post of President of the Council of Regency of the State of Rampore. We are not aware of the qualifications or experience of the Major in political or administrative work for a post requiring most delicate handling of a turbulent Mahomedan people of the most orthodox and conservative principles. In making the selection, Sir Auckland Colvin must have exercised his own experience of the requirements of the bigoted Mahomedans of the North West. But we cannot understand why His Honor has "deputed Mr. La Touche, the Commissioner of Allahabad, to proceed to Rampore and report on the present condition of affairs in that State." Could not this be done by Mr. Kaye, the Commissioner of Rohilkhand? This certainly does not show that the latter retains the full confidence of Government.

ANOTHER mosque demolition case of the Shambazar type has cropped up at Dacca. In that town, there is a narrow lane called Meer Ata's Lane. Some native officials live down that lane. At their request, the municipality decided to widen it. But unless an old mosque were removed it could not be widened. So the municipal authorities hunted out a descendant of the original founder of the mosque, and by an amicable arrangement purchased from him the mosque with the grounds for Rs. 300. It, however, did not strike them that the mosque being Wakf could not be sold or purchased. Meanwhile, the news of the sacrilegious intent spread amongst the Mahomedans of the town, and they determined to prevent the demolition at any cost. When the men of the municipality attempted to break the mosque, the Mahomedans, who were previously prepared for the occasion, came forward and prevented them from carrying out their object. Before the public demonstration the municipal agents and underlings fled from the scene in dismay, and a serious affray attended with bloodshed was averted. Information was thereupon laid before the Magistrate of the District, with a view to his passing the necessary orders for demolition of the mosque, but he declined to comply with such a request.

The Commissioner of the Division is just now engaged in making an enquiry into the matter.

THE Native Chamber of Commerce have scored a triumph. On their representation, the Lieutenant-Governor has ordered the refund of Rs. 283, erroneously realized, in the District of Backerganj, as fees for licenses for the possession of petroleum other than dangerous petroleum. The rules under which they were levied apply only to the Presidency town and neighbourhood. But the Collector of Backerganj, under a belief that they applied to the whole of British India, issued notices under them and realized the fees without objection. The Collector now admits his mistake and, "as a small excuse for the oversight," goes on to say, "I may say that it seemed to me so eminently desirable that there should be some rules regarding petroleum for the safeguard of life and property, especially in crowded places like Jhalokati, where very large quantities of petroleum are stored in a haphazard sort of way, that it never occurred to me the application of the Act might be limited to the Presidency town and neighbourhood." Just so. He ought to have been right. Both storage and use of petroleum should be controlled by law. It is not only dangerous to life and property, but it is not unusually an undetected cause of ill health. The cheapness of the oil blinds people to its deleteriousness and dangerousness in every respect.

THE Englishman says that His Royal Highness Prince George of Wales will be one of our probable guests in India, during the ensuing cold weather. If the news be correct, we have no doubt that the whole of Native India will welcome the young Prince with much greater cordiality than they did the Czarewitch last December. Although they are an expensive luxury to all parties concerned, still we think that such visits are not thrown away. For one thing, they are sure to create in strangers—the Princes and all of their suites an interest in the welfare of the natives of the country.

RECENTLY the Senior Member of the Board of Revenue and the Legal Remembrancer fell out on a question of jurisdiction. The Hon'ble Mr. Halliday asked the opinion of the Hon'ble Mr. Allen regarding the amendment of the Revenue Sale Law. The Legal Remembrancer seemed at first to evade an answer and, when pressed for it, was out with his reasons for not answering the reference. He believed that since the reconstruction of his office in 1875, it had ceased to be subordinate to the Board of Revenue. He was further of opinion that it was one thing to interpret for it the law for practical difficulties that arise in the ordinary course of the Board's discharge of its duties and a wholly different matter to furnish it with the Legal Remembrancer's views on hypothetical questions or proposed legislation when the Board itself is asked for its opinion by Government. It is absurd for the Board to ask the Legal Remembrancer in return for an opinion which is intended to be its own. When the Remembrancer's opinion is wanted Government addresses itself direct to him. Mr. Halliday referred the whole question for the authoritative decision of Government. The Lieutenant-Governor has ruled that the Board was justified in addressing the Legal Remembrancer and was authorized to address him again in similar cases of contemplated legislation.

We confess our sympathies are entirely with Mr. Allen in this matter, which is of more importance than appears at first sight. It is easy for a superior to silence a subordinate, and the Lieutenant-Governor is the King of Kings and the Zeus of the Heavenly Powers of Bengal. For their Bengal godships his word is final. It may seem natural enough that Mr. Allen, as the weaker party in this contest between fellow officials, should go to the wall. But truth is truth, and in this instance, as in so many, it is not with the strong. Mr. Allen has been silenced by authority not defeated in argument.

THE Lieutenant-Governor has ruled that—

"All persons committing suicide, who are Roman Catholics by denomination, shall, in future, be buried in the unconsecrated portion of the cemetery allotted to that denomination, unless the funeral is attended by a priest, or unless a priest gives a written certificate that the interment may be made in the consecrated ground."

This is punishment for suicide—though of a religious sect only—whom the law cannot reach. The Indian Penal Code can punish only attempt at suicide.

THE Manipur correspondent of the Pioneer, under date the 6th June, writes:—

"On our first arrival here Manipuri soldiers and civilians alike salaamed till their heads touched the ground, but so familiar has the appearance of a saheb become the majority of men we now meet in the streets take no notice of us. We cannot, however, help observing how carefully they 'salaam' to their own princes who are prisoners in our guards."

It is this spirit of observation—this imperious demand of men who have nothing imperial in them—who, whether they are officers or privates or mere private men, without any official connection, continually fret because they do not receive on all occasions, in season and out of season, the homage willingly paid to Gods and Brahmins and anointed Princes, and who fail not to revenge themselves on the people for the latter's supposed recusancy—which, more than any political calculation, led the Manipuris to despatch the Political Agent and the Chief Commissioner and his party as soon as they got the British officers in their power. And this has ever been the proximate but efficient cause of all such massacres and atrocities, whether before or after the Mutinies of 1857.

ANOTHER Frenchman of letters has been received into the company of the immortals. We present our readers with a characteristic notice of the event translated for them from the French Press. In the third week of the month of May 1891 and at the Palais Mazarin, was celebrated a singular marriage to the delight of every lover of French literature. The daughter of the great Richelieu having lost one of her Forty Lovers, several suitors came to woo her in order to obtain her hand. There were M. Henri de Bornier, M. Ferdinand Fabre, M. Stephen Liegeard, M. Emile Zola and M. Pierre Loti. When such competitors, each brilliant in his own sphere, entered the matrimonial list, the bride felt a real embarrassment as to which of the Five to give her hand. Her first movement was for M. Zola, then she stood balancing between M. de Bornier and M. Loti, between the classic alexandrine and the enchanted prose. And finally, forgetting the little tenderness she had for the robust author of L'Argent, she threw herself on the arms of the handsome literary marine, the youngest of the Five.

The choice is a happy one. For, though only forty years old, Loti has already made his stamp on French literature. In his several voyages, the young Lieutenant has seen the greater part of the world and has acquired a stock of experience which he has turned to excellent use. Elegant, graceful and picturesque, his writings are more eagerly sought after than the latest fashionable novel. His vivid description of foreign lands and strange sceneries are read with avidity and delight.

A PARAGRAPH appeared in one of the morning papers of the 17th instant to the effect that the widowed daughter of the Rajah of Naldanga has been recently married a second time to the son of a Babu Jadu Nath Mookerjee of Bhowanipore. The statement is utterly unfounded, and there was a peculiar cruelty in the circumstance attending its publication. The 17th was the date fixed for the postnuptial feast at the house of Babu Jadu Nath. The appearance of the paragraph on the same morning induced many of the invited guests to stay away, thus involving Babu Jadu Nath in all the trouble, vexation and disrepute of a caste difficulty. Nor is the difficulty confined to him but extends to both the families. Unfortunately, Europeans are simply incapable of understanding all this. But that is all the more reason for caution in treating of these matters of Hindu social and domestic life. It is unfortunate that there is something in the antecedents of one of the parties to lend plausibility to the statement. That made it all the more mischievous. Of course, the poor English editor could have no suspicion of it. As regards the Rajah of Naldanga, years have sobered any zeal he may at one time have felt for the cause of remarriage. He has long since observed how girls cannot easily be married even once, and how even the marriage of spinsters is attended with difficulties that loudly call for the united action of the community for combating them. None but the most irresponsible, having no experience of the inner economy of life here, can talk glibly of promoting widow-marriage in a land in which the religious obligation of marrying daughters has led to female infanticide.

THE apprehensions of the native Press are for the moment quieted down by a statesmanlike remark made by Lord Cross at a Press dinner, on the 13th June. The Secretary of State for India gave out as his opinion that, though the freedom of the Press was carried to great lengths in India, it was better that Native discontent should find a safety-valve than that it should smoulder. That argument has always been the safety of the Native press in India. It is indeed the only raison d'être of a Free Press in a dependent Empire. Whatever may have been the case before, the liberty of unlicensed printing in India is now hedged in by powerful and immediate safeguards against abuse. Prosecutions for libel—hitherto few and far between, if known at all—are now matters of course, and plentiful as black-berries. The law itself is savage, certain in its cruelty, and vague and dubious—always against accused of course—in everything else, and a prosecution is more than death to a poor newspaper, as almost every native organ is. Then there are the clauses in the Indian Penal Code, substituted in lieu of the Lytton gagging Act. More recently, in conformity to a Parliamentary Statute for the whole of the British Empire, a new law has been adopted and added known as the Official Secrets Act. Then, again, there are overzealous and officious Secretaries ready to fill the walls of Government offices with placards in bold type against unsuspecting newspapers which may at any time have hurt their vanity.

ONE of the chief duties of a Municipality, as we take it, is to check the sale of unwholesome food, in every shape. But we do not find that sufficient exertions are made in the Metropolis, in that direction. We are glad that the Indian Daily News of Wednesday last has directed attention to this important subject. It however says that the Food Inspectors “apparently confine their investigations solely to ghee, in its raw condition, leaving alone the innumerable articles in which it is an important ingredient.” If these officers had really given proper supervision and kept strict watch over ghee-vendors, we would have so far been satisfied that care was being taken for preventing the sale of impure ghee. But, notwithstanding that we have half a dozen well paid Food Inspectors, very little is done in the way of enabling us to obtain unadulterated ghee. From the Health Officer's Report on “Food Inspection,” for the Quarter ending 31st March last, we find that “at Balooghat a consignment of 100 tons of grease and China-badam oil, sold as ghee, worth Rs. 700, had been captured on transit to the Commissariat godown, found unfit for human consumption and were destroyed. They were manufactured by one Abdool Barick of Tretty Bazar who holds a license for grease and oil, and secretly supplies adulterated ghee to large ghee contractors of the Commissariat, Emigration Agency, shippings and sweetmeat vendors.” Again, “from a boat at Baliaghatta Canal 5 maunds of grease and oil, sold as ghee, and intended for export to the Eastern Districts, were seized and destroyed.” Besides the above, “rancid ghee 4 maunds and 18 seers” was found in various shops in the Town and destroyed.

This is all that has been done. No steps have been taken to punish those who are in the habit of selling grease and oil as ghee, or those who drive a large and lucrative trade by adulterating ghee with other articles of an unwholesome character. If there be no power under the Law to punish these men, surely the legislature ought to be moved to provide the remedy. But we are not sure that the existing remedies have been exhausted. The municipal law not only empowers the Commissioners to seize and destroy articles unfit for food but also gives them authority to prosecute persons “selling to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food which is not of the nature, substance or quality of the article demanded by such purchaser.” The penalty for such sale is up to Rs. 100 for the first offence and up to Rs. 500 for every repetition of the offence. Clearly, Abdool Barick must be checked. He cannot be allowed, under cover of a license to sell ghee, to sell large quantities of grease and oil, as ghee, at a high price, when it is found that a good proportion of this stuff finds its way into the sweetmeat shops and helps in the preparation of sweetmeats, which is a chief article of consumption amongst the Natives, both high and low—to say nothing of the outrage on the religious institutions of the Hindus who regard grease as an abomination.

We also find from the report under review, that during the whole quarter, only 4 ghee vendors were prosecuted and fined for selling adulterated ghee. From what we are constantly hearing of the open sale of adulterated ghee all over the Town, we are quite disappointed to find that, notwithstanding a large and expensive establishment kept up for Food Inspection, such a small number of men were detected and punished.

The fines again, viz., Rs. 10 on each of 3 men, and Rs. 15 on another are ridiculously small. To punish with such nominal fines men who are systematically cheating the public and selling an article knowing it to be not that article, is simply absurd. The Legislature could never have meant such a mockery. We have no doubt that it is these ridiculously small fines which embolden the offenders to defy the law.

The most outrageous item in the report, however, is that a ghee vendor of the Municipal market was prosecuted and fined Rs. 10 for refusing to sell a sample of ghee for analysis. The report does not say whether the man was turned out of the market, or not. He well deserved that punishment.

When things come to the worst they mend. There seems at last a prospect of amelioration. Nawab Abdool Luteef Khan, at a recent meeting of the General Committee, brought to the notice of the Commissioners the manner in which the Ghee Act is being administered in Calcutta, and how the Food Inspectors are discharging their duty. He strongly urged upon the meeting for some effective measures by which the sale of adulterated ghee might be put a stop to. He reminded his colleagues how nine-tenths of the Hindoo and Mahomedan ladies of the orthodox families, a chief ingredient in whose food was pure ghee—have, on religious scruples, entirely given up the use of ghee altogether, and how these respected inmates of the zenana may be saved from this great hardship by a little attention on the part of the Commissioners. The majority of the meeting cordially supported the Nawab, and we hope the Commissioners in meeting will take the necessary steps for stoppage of the evil.

THE Sessions Judge of Jhansi convicted Lalkanju, aged 16, strong and stoutly built, one of the Jhansi dacoits, under sections 395 and 396 of the Indian Penal Code, for dacoity and dacoity with murder, and sentenced him to ten years' rigorous imprisonment, the highest punishment for the former offence being transportation for life or 10 years' rigorous imprisonment and for the latter, capital. Both the conviction and sentence were upheld in appeal. These dacoits were armed with guns and swords wherewith they broke into the houses in which the robbery was committed. They bound two women to a charpoy and then turned it up so that the victims' heads rested upon the ground. Then the villains burned the fundamental limbs of the poor creatures, till one of them died, the flesh disappearing from her bones. It was proved that the prisoner was one of the dacoits who had used the torch in the burning of one of the women.

In dismissing the appeal, the High Court of the N.W.P. issued a rule on the prisoner to show cause why the punishment shall not be enhanced. In due course, the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Tyrrell have resented Lalkanju to transportation for the term of his natural life. The Chief Justice remarked it was impossible to allow a miscreant capable of such a crime to return to his district again. It was a brutal crime, a shocking crime, inflicted without any provocation in the most barbarous manner upon a countrywoman of his own. For a hardened ruffian such as he was, ten years' rigorous imprisonment was a ridiculously light sentence. The court would not inflict on Lalkanju the extreme penalty of the law, but would reserve it for the next similar crime.

But why not the extreme penalty? We do not understand this tenderness. It is so like faint-heartedness! Where will the court find a better case for the utmost rigor of the law? Here is a malefactor who baffles the vindictiveness of our bloody Code itself. No severity that civilised legislation can stoop to can adequately meet the enormity of the proceedings of this monster Lalkanju. Transportation is more of a reward than anything else. It will be a pleasant change for the miscreant. It is a mockery of justice, as giving a dangerous criminal another field.

It is sad news—that of the death of Kumar Nil Krishna, eldest son of the late Maharaja Kamal Krishna, of the Shovabazar family.

We were no less startled than pained to hear of it. Since the death of the lamented Promod Kumar, Calcutta has not received a like shock. Poor Nil Krishna was young, was not known to be seriously suffering, and had lately taken to wife a second time (after the death of his first wife) a girl still within her teens. Death was the last thing to think of in such a connection. He was no prodigy, to be sure, but he was very far from an ogre. And that is high praise in these times. He was a respectable young man. Unlike many of the scions of wealth, the Kumar was known to interest himself, in conjunction with his amiable, intelligent, and not corpulent brother Binya Krishna, in movements intended to benefit the country. He was a bit of social reformer too. It was not all lip reform with him. He proved in the last marriage his sincerity, whatever might be thought of his wisdom. That marriage was against the grain of his family and connections, and revived a stain which his forefathers had at much cost washed out. In the belief of the people at large he dies of that reform, as the reform dies with him. He leaves no issue of that marriage. His special weakness he shared with the greatest minds. Towards the end, under some strange influence, he joined the worse than conservatives—the wild reactionaries who planned and kept up the agitation against the Consent Bill. He must have begun to see the error in principle as well as the blunder in policy of this connection. By his death he at least escapes the misery of a lifelong regret. God bless his soul!

ON the 22nd June, Lord Ripon raised the Manipur question in the House of Lords. He warmly criticised a statement of Sir John Gorst in the Lower House. The latter in citing the example of Tarquinius Superbus agreed with the Government of India that Tikendrajit's abilities disqualified him for service in the State, and that it was better and safer to depend on mediocrity. This statement, the Marquis of Ripon feared, would leave a bad impression on the minds of Indian Princes. He hoped Tikendrajit would not be executed. The Secretary of State replied that it was impossible as yet to say what course would be adopted with regard to the Senapati, but they might confide in the justice and clemency of Lord Lansdowne. If he could not say what would be done with the Senapati, he took the House into his confidence as to the course that would have been taken if Maharaja Sur Chandra had not left Manipur. Why, the British would have reinstated him and expelled the Senapati. His expulsion would have been the punishment of his rebellion and not of his abilities. Far from removing any man for his abilities, the Indian Government would encourage ability, welcome all able men and find work for them anywhere. Lord Cross contended that it was no treachery to make an arrest at a Durbar, though he did not approve of it. He assured the House that Lord Lansdowne was not answerable for the attempt, simply because he was ignorant of the intention.

While in England, they are discussing the propriety of the measures proposed or adopted against the Manipur Durbar, the Court or Commission for trial of the royal family has completed its bloody work. All the Princes and ministers from the ruling Maharaja downwards have been sentenced to death. It is now left to Lord Lansdowne to be as vengeful as the Commission or not. The Secretary of State has left him full freedom to exercise his own discretion, and is sure that he will not be swayed by un-English sentiments in punishing the princes for what has happened. The Viceroy has already given indication that he is imbued with different spirit from that of the Commission. He is no fanatic humanitarian in penology, but he is not at all disposed to be Draconian. By his interference, capital punishment has generally been commuted to transportation for life.

He has upheld the conviction of Aiya Parel Major and Colonel Samu Singh for waging war but not for abetting the murders of the British officers. They are not to be hanged but detained as prisoners during the pleasure of the Queen.

Maharaja Kula Chandra Dhoj Singh, called the Regent, has been found guilty by the Special Commission of waging war against the Queen-Empress, the new Senapati Angao Sena, of both waging war and abetting the murders. The Jubraj was sentenced last week. The order, however, of the Court, in each case, is the same, that the prisoner be hanged by the neck until he is dead. The sentences on the Regent, the Jubraj, and the new Senapati await Lord Lansdowne's consideration.

The Special Commission is broken up and the Commissioners are returning to their ordinary duties. That, however, does not mean the end of the punishment for the murder of British officers. Major Maxwell, the Chief Political Officer, is now trying the seven poor sepoys who were on duty as sentries over Mr. Quinton and his companions as prisoners before execution. The Sirdar of the executioners and the executioner who decapitated must too answer for the lost British lives. There will yet remain those who witnessed the execution, those who assisted in the preparation of the murderous knife in any way. Will those who read of the massacre be spared? The Reign of Terror is complete in Manipur.

REIS & RAYYET.

THE COMING DURBAR OF ALL THE NATIONS IN LIFE SCIENCE.

A GRAND ceremony is going to be performed at London on the 10th of August next, under the Presidency of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. On that day the Seventh International Congress of Hygiene and Demography will be opened by His Royal Highness in person.

The Congress will be an important one in Sanitary Science, owing to the variety and range of subjects, which have been proposed for discussion; and as it will be the first International Congress of the kind which has met in London, the Prince of Wales is desirous that the gathering shall be worthy of the great country in which it will assemble.

The Congress has been held (biennially as a rule) in each of the following cities:—Brussels, Paris, Turin, Geneva, The Hague and Vienna. The last of these, that held at Vienna in 1887, was under the protection of His Imperial and Royal Highness the late Archduke Rudolph, Crown Prince of Austria, who opened it in person. To this Congress delegates were sent by the Governments of most of the civilised countries of the world, the learned Societies of many of them also sending representatives. The total number of Hygienists and statisticians present from all parts of the world was over two thousand.

Before the close of that Congress, a permanent International Committee was appointed to decide as to the time and place of meeting of the next Congress of the series. On account of the fact that it had been decided to hold a Hygienic Congress in connection with the Paris Exhibition in 1889, it was resolved that the next International Congress should be held in 1891, and London was chosen as its place of meeting.

As England has taken the lead in sanitary science and administration, it may be expected that her colonies as well as foreign countries will send numerous representatives, both official and unofficial, and that the Congress will be of great magnitude and importance.

The aim of the Congress is to awaken public interest in the progress of Hygiene and Demography. The latter term is a new coinage which etymologically belongs to the same category as Anthropology or Anthropography and ought to have the same signification. As understood by its inventors, Demography is the study of the life conditions of communities from a statistical point of view. In plain English, it is the study of vital statistics. The Congress will afford persons interested in these subjects but scattered in different parts of the globe an opportunity of meeting together with the object of advancing their progress. It will open to students and inquirers by private conversation and mutual help, as well as by conferences and debates, to elucidate questions relating to Hygiene, Demography and Public Health.

An Exhibition of Articles of Hygienic interest will be held in connection with the Congress. Excursions will be arranged to various places of especial interest to Hygienists.

Invitations have been issued to the Governments of all countries and all public bodies, throughout the world, which are occupied in the study of the science more or less connected with Hygiene, that they may co-operate with and appoint delegates to the assembly.

Besides a very strong and general Committee, an Organizing Committee has been appointed with Sir Douglas Galton, K.C.B., as Chairman, and Doctors W. H. Corfield and G. V. Poore as Honorary Secretaries.

The scope of the Congress will be best understood from the following brief summary of subjects proposed for discussion :—

1. The prevention of communicable diseases ; as, for instance, (a) Whether Sanitation or Quarantine are most efficient against cholera. (b) How the spread of disease from milk and from water can be checked. (c) The relation which Tuberculosis and other diseases in animals bear to mankind. (d) Vaccination, the prevention of Leprosy, Rabies, and such like contagious diseases. (e) The effect of soil on communicable diseases. (f) Disinfection and Disinfectants.

2. The Science of Bacteriology in relation to communicable diseases. In connection with this subject an Exhibition of Microscopic and Cultivation Specimens would be arranged.

3. Industrial Questions ; as, for instance, the regulation of industrial occupations from a health point of view, including the length of hours of labour in different occupations, the influence of dwellings upon labour, and the effect of large cities on the health of the population ; the influence of the health condition of the people ; and the effect of different sorts of food and of wages upon the efficiency of labour.

We hear that the Government of India have appointed Dr. A. J. Payne as their delegate. Mr. H. J. S. Cotton and Mr. G. O. Osmond will represent the Calcutta Municipality.

The most interesting feature is a Permanent International Committee consisting of 36 members representing all the States of Europe. Dr. P. Bronardel of France is the president. Dr. W. Roth, a leading homœopath and an expert in movement cure too, we believe, is one of the representatives of Germany. He is one of the leading authorities in Hygiene. Besides his professional eminence and versatility, the Doctor is a great scholar and a linguist. As on previous Congresses of the Faculty, he will be valuable as a ready and accurate interpreter between representatives of varied forms of speech. Even Egypt has been represented by Dr. H. Greene Pacha, in this permanent Committee. Professor W. H. Corfield, Mr. Shirley Murphy, Sir Douglas Galton and Dr. W. Ogle represent England. For Demography England still remains unrepresented.

In addition to other Committees, an Indian one has also been organised. Sir Francis Forbes Adam, Sir G. C. M. Birdwood, Sir A. C. Lyall, Major-General Sir Owen Tudor Burne, Sir Joseph Fayrer, Sir W. Guyer Hunter, Sir John Strachey, Surgeon-General Sir William Moore, Sir C. Turner, Sir William Wedderburn, Surgeon-General Cornish, Surgeon-General J. M. Cunningham, Mr. G. W. Allen, Mr. H. S. King, M. P., Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji, Mr. G. Yule, and Mr. S. Digby (Honorary Secretary) are its members.

The executive officers are Sir Douglas Galton, Chairman of the Organizing Committee, Sir T. Spencer Wells, Chairman of the Reception Committee, Surgeon-General Cornish, Chairman of the Finance Committee, Professor W. H. Corfield, Hon. Foreign Secretary, Mr. S. Digby, Hon. Secretary for India, Mr. Malcom Morris, Hon. Secretary of the Reception Committee, and Dr. Charles Edward Shelley, Editor of Transactions. The subject of Hygiene is divided into 9 sections. The following is a list of them with their respective presidents :—

- (1) Preventive Medicine, Sir Joseph Fayrer.
- (2) Bacteriology, Sir Joseph Lister.
- (3) The relations of the diseases of animals to those of man, Sir Nigel Kingscote.
- (4) Hygiene of Infancy, childhood and school life. Mr. J. R. Diggie, Chairman of the London School Board.
- (5) Chemistry and Physics in relation to Hygiene, Sir H. E. Roscoe.
- (6) Architecture in relation to Hygiene, Sir A. W. Bloomfield.
- (7) Engineering in relation to Hygiene, Sir John Coode.
- (8) Naval and Military Hygiene, the Rt. Hon. Lord Wantage.
- (9) State Hygiene, The Rt. Hon. Lord Basing.

Notice has already been issued for several important and interesting subjects to be discussed at the meetings of these several sections. "The relation of Alcoholism to public health, and the methods to be adopted for its prevention" will be taken into consideration and the discussion will be opened by Sir Dyce Duckworth of London and Professor Westergaard of Copenhagen. The final decision on the efficiency of several kinds of disinfectants is no doubt very urgently needed. The subject of school hygiene so much neglected in this country, is to be considered and discussed in one of the meetings of the fourth section. We notice no provision for a subject in which we are personally interested. There is the Hygiene of childhood. But what of the Hygiene of age ?

ANNEXATION PETTY.

THE Howrah Municipality has achieved an unenviable distinction in consequence of the frequent feuds that disturb its counsels and the unconstitutional acts in which its executive almost delights to indulge. Soon after the grant of the elective franchise, the Board that was first formed distinguished itself by its endeavours to expel a colleague on several very serious charges. The large majority of the members who fought for purity had a good case. Supported also by the Magistrate of the District, they expected the Local Government to uphold them in their just quarrel. The irregularities, however, in their proceedings, largely due to haste, assisted the accused in defending himself with ability and success. The majority acted wisely in not seeking to revive their proceedings against their colleague. The Board sat out the statutory period of three years without attracting much notice. There was one scandal, however, that was connected with the election of Chairman which plainly showed that our district officials at least cannot easily swallow a native chairman for towns like Howrah. The election, though regular, was set aside in favor of an official competitor. If for these and other reasons the proceedings of the first Board were only remarkable, those of the second were simply extraordinary. By a strange freak of corporate wisdom, the colleague who had been sought by the former to be expelled for misconduct was by the latter elected as its Vice-Chairman. The only extenuating incident in this election was that the majority which carried it was only nominal. Without even the education that makes a man in these days competent to record simple orders in English without committing as many solecisms in grammar as the number of lines written, he made up by the remarkable punctuality of his attendance for every defect that his opponents could urge against him. Soon, however, the Board was startled by a proposal for settling a very handsome allowance on the Vice elect. The ratepayers were indignant and broke out in public meeting. The Board itself, notwithstanding the strenuous efforts of the Magistrate-Chairman, strenuously rejected the proposal. Everybody expected that the Vice-Chairman would, after that, resign. But our gentleman knew better. He took the verdict of his colleagues quietly. His adherence to office created a sensation. But like all sensations it subsided in time. He sat for the full term, and when the Board was about to die, not choosing to face the chances of election, he sought to enter by nomination. His efforts, however, proved abortive.

Amongst some legacies of trouble bequeathed by the administration of which this gentleman was permitted to be the soul, is one that is of an extraordinary character. A citizen of Seebpore having succeeded in earning some money became desirous of extending his own premises. Under cover of a public benefaction he offered a good sum of money to the Municipality on condition of its acquiring a piece of land belonging to a poor neighbour of his and lying just in front of the premises to be extended. After acquisition a lane is to be diverted through it, and the whole of what would remain, nearly nine-tenths, that is, is to be transferred to the public benefactor. A more flagrant invasion of private property under color of the law could not be conceived. But the law is nothing to men desirous of obliging a wealthy citizen. With such secrecy have the proceedings been conducted that no municipal commissioner knows anything about them even now. The Budget contains no provision for this scheme of acquisition. Without having obtained the consent of the Commissioners at a meeting the request went up to the Government for acquiring the property of the poor ratepayer. The request, however couched, must have contained a falsehood if it stated that the land was required for a public purpose. To acquire a piece of land for actually occupying a few cubits of it for diverting a lane and then selling the whole of what would remain to a private person, cannot, by putting the greatest strain upon the word, be described as a public purpose.

To add insult to injury, the late administration, in reply to the communications addressed by the poor proprietor, persistently refused to enlighten him on some very important points. When the late Chairman, who had, we believe, been made a cat's paw in the matter, understood the real nature of the public benefaction, he assured the proprietor that the lane would be so diverted as to save not only his homestead but the two sacred images of Hindu deities that are of the irremovable description and that are worshipped with veneration by hundreds of people. But he did nothing for withdrawing the requisition sent up to the Government for acquiring the entire piece of land. The proprietor gave repeated assurances of his willingness to give up immediately the portion that was actually needed for diversion of the lane. But those assurances went for nothing. Already the usual declaration has appeared in the official Gazette, stating that the entire 10 cottahs of land are required for a public purpose. Section 5 of the Act says, with that jealousy of the Civil Courts which characterises the Indian Executive, that the mere statement that land is required for a public purpose shall be conclusive evidence of the fact of the land being so required. If, therefore, the guiding spirits of the present Municipal Board of Howrah persist in carrying out, through the agency of the Government, this unholy scheme of downright spoliation, none but the Lieutenant-Governor can restrain them. The application of the Land Acquisition Act under such circumstances is really a fraud upon the power. If this dirty intrigue be not instantly put down, it will establish a precedent in consequence of which no man in a municipal town will be able to save his property if it is coveted by a wealthy neighbour. The poor man has appealed to Sir Charles Elliott for interference, offering that if nothing else can satisfy the intriguers he is willing to give for nothing the portion that is actually required for the very unnecessary diversion of the lane in question, so that his home may be saved and, above all, the sacred images that are irremovable under the Hindu ecclesiastical law and worshipped with veneration by hundreds of people.

MANIPUR FIELD OPERATIONS.

MILITARY DEPARTMENT.

Simla, the 19th June, 1891.

No. 585.—His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor-General in Council is pleased to direct the publication of the subjoined letter from the Adjutant-General in India, submitting, under the orders of the Commander-in-Chief in India, despatches from Major-General H. Collett, c.b., commanding the Manipur Field Force, and from Major-General T. Graham, c.b., and Lieutenant-Colonel R. H. F. Rennick, commanding respectively the Tamu and Silchar Columns of the force. These despatches report the particulars of the simultaneous advance on Manipur of the three columns from Kohima, Tamu, and Silchar, which were sent to restore order in Manipur and to exact retribution for the murder of the Chief Commissioner of Assam and other British officers in March last.

2. The Governor-General in Council cordially endorses the approval expressed by the Commander-in-Chief in India of the indomitable energy displayed by the troops in overcoming the difficulties and hardships of an advance without tents through a mountainous and unhealthy country, exposed as they were to much suffering from intense heat and heavy rain. The association with the regular troops of the volunteer soldiers of the Calcutta Rifle Corps and Surma Valley Light Horse in this expedition is a matter of especial gratification to His Excellency in Council, who also notices with much satisfaction the services of the Assam Military Police with the Kohima and Silchar Columns. The Governor-General also wishes to record his appreciation of the good work done by the Commissariat-Transport Department.

3. The services of Major H. St. P. Maxwell, Deputy Commissioner, Kachar, Mr. A. W. Davis, c.s., Deputy Commissioner, Kohima, and Mr. C. A. Soppitt, Political Officer with General Graham, have been especially valuable, while Mr. Dalrymple-Clark has done good work in connection with the transport on the Nigriting-Nichuguard road.

4. His Excellency in Council desires to convey to Major-General Collett, the Officers Commanding the Tamu and Silchar Columns, and to all the officers and troops the acknowledgments of the Government of India for the excellent manner in which the expedition was carried out.

No. 375-M.—“Field Operations—Manipur,”—dated Simla, 11th June 1891.

From—Major-General W. Galbraith, c.b., Adjutant-General in India, To—Major-General E. H. H. Collen, c.i.e., Secretary to the Government of India, Military Department.

I have the honor, by direction of the Commander-in-Chief, to submit, for the information of the Government of India, despatches from Major-General H. Collett, c.b., commanding the Manipur Field Force, and Major-General T. Graham, c.b., and Lieutenant-Colonel R. H. F. Rennick, commanding respectively the Tamu and Silchar Columns.

2. On receipt of authentic intelligence of the seizure by the Durbar of the Chief Commissioner of Assam, orders were issued on the 29th and 30th March for the formation of three columns at Kohima, Tamu, and Silchar, and for their simultaneous advance on Manipur.

3. Considerable difficulty was experienced in the concentration and advance of the force, the troops for the Tamu and Silchar Columns being furnished from Burma and India, whilst the movements of the Kohima Column were seriously retarded by the difficulty of obtaining coolly transport.

4. The columns moved from their respective bases at Silchar, Kohima, and Tamu on the 5th, 20th, and 23rd April. The advance of the Tamu force was preceded by a gallant attempt on the part of Lieutenant C. J. W. Grant of the 12th Regiment (2nd Burma Battalion) of Madras Infantry to rescue the captives, a detailed report of which has already been submitted for the information of Government.

On the 13th April Captain Presgrave, 12th Madras Infantry, routed 300 of the enemy near Palel, Lieutenant Grant having his charger shot under him while leading the mounted infantry in pursuit.

On the 25th April an advanced reconnoitring party from the Tamu Column encountered a considerable number of Manipuris strongly posted near the village of Bapam. On the arrival of a reinforcement of 200 rifles and two mountain guns under Captain F. M. Rundall, 4th Gurkha Rifles, the position was stormed and carried after an obstinate hand-to-hand combat with a loss of one Native officer and one sepoy, killed, and four British officers,* two Native officers, two non-commissioned officers, and five sepoy wounded. A report by Captain Rundall of this brilliant affair is attached for the information of Government.†

* Captain F. M. Drury, Captain P. M. Carnegie, 2nd Battalion, 4th Gurkha Regiment. Lieutenant C. J. W. Grant, Lieutenant F. W. H. Cox. 12th Madras Infantry.

† Not published.

The other two columns met with no serious opposition from the enemy, and the whole force arrived before Manipur on the 27th April, the date appointed for the concentration.

5. His Excellency heartily endorses the high opinion expressed by Major-General Collett and the commanders of the Tamu and Silchar Columns of the indomitable energy and cheerfulness displayed by the troops in overcoming the difficulties and discomforts of an advance through unhealthy country without tents, and exposed to much suffering from intense heat and heavy rain.

6. Sir Frederick Roberts desires to bring to the notice of the Government of India the services of Major-General Collett, c.b., commanding the Field Force, Major-General Graham, c.b., commanding the Tamu Column, Lieutenant-Colonel Rennick, commanding the Silchar Column, and the officers mentioned by them, especially Major H. St. P. Maxwell, Deputy Commissioner, Kachar, and Mr. A. W. Davis, c.s., Deputy Commissioner, Kohima, whose hearty co-operation and personal influence were invaluable in procuring transport for the Silchar and Kohima Columns, and facilitating their advance.

7. A list of officers recommended for special rewards will be submitted separately.

No. 59, dated the Palace, Manipur, the 2nd May 1891.

From---Major-General H. Collett, c.b., Commanding the Manipur Field Force,

To---The Adjutant-General in India.

I have the honor to report, for the information of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, that the Kohima Column of the Manipur Field Force, strength as detailed in the margin (footnote),* marched from Kohima under my command on the 20th April.

2. The column arrived at Manipur at ten o'clock on the 27th April, having experienced no opposition on the way except a few shots, which were fired at the advanced guard on the 24th April.

3. The only stockade which the Manipuris had erected on the road was at Kaithimahi, and this was found deserted.

4. We arrived at Sengmai, a small village at the northern end of the Manipur Valley, and eleven miles from the capital, on the 26th April, and I endeavoured to get into communication with the Burma and Silchar Columns, then supposed to be at Thobal and Bishenpur, but owing to unfavourable weather was unsuccessful. I also sent letters by messengers (both of which reached their destination) to the commanders of these columns informing them that I would take up a position about 9 A.M. the next morning on the Ching Maikong Ridge, about 2,000 yards north of and commanding the palace enclosure, and requesting them to halt at a suitable distance from the palace walls, and get into communication with me with a view to concerting any further operation that might appear necessary.

5. During the night of the 26th information was received that the Regent with the three princes, his brothers, had fled from Manipur that evening.

6. The three columns of attack, v.z., the Burma Column under the command of Brigadier-General T. Graham, c.b., the Silchar Column under Lieutenant-Colonel R. H. F. Rennick, and the Kohima Column, arrived at Manipur by 11 A.M. on the 27th April, the date which had been previously fixed for the concentration.

7. The villages in the immediate neighbourhood of the capital, the city itself, and the palace enclosure were deserted.

8. The sixty-two British subjects (natives) who had been held in captivity by the Regent were found safe and well.

9. Ample accommodation for the troops of the three columns was found in the palace and the adjacent buildings. This was very acceptable, as it had been raining heavily since the early morning.

10. The spirit and behaviour of the troops have been throughout excellent. Much rain fell during the march, and as we had no tents the men suffered considerable discomfort in bivouac, but it was cheerfully borne as became good soldiers. The only complaint I ever heard was that the enemy did not stay to fight.

11. The transport of the Kohima Column consisted of Naga coolies, and it is entirely owing to the unremitting exertions of Mr. A. W. Davis, c.s., Deputy Commissioner of Kohima, and to the personal influence which he exercises over these wild people, that the column was enabled to concentrate at Kohima and march to Manipur.

I venture to hope that His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief may be pleased to bring the very valuable services rendered to us by this officer to the special notice of the Government of India.

* 3 guns, No. 8 (Bengal) Mountain Battery, under Captain A. H. C. Birch, R. A.

100 rifles, 13th Bengal Infantry, under Lieutenant A. Giles.

200 rifles, 42nd Gurkha Rifles, under Captain H. W. Priestley, 44th Gurkha Rifles.

400 rifles, 43rd Gurkha Rifles, under Colonel H. M. Evans.

300 rifles, 44th Gurkha Rifles, under Major R. K. Ridgeway v.c.

200 rifles, Assam Military Police, Naga Hills Battalion, under Captain D. C. F. Macintyre.

12. I enclose a despatch, dated Manipur, 29th April, from Brigadier-General T. Graham, c.b., commanding the Burma Column, detailing the events which occurred on his march from Tamu; and I beg most cordially to endorse the terms of praise in which he writes of the officers and troops engaged in the brilliant action of the 25th April near Palel. I also enclose a report by Captain F. M. Rundall, 2-4th Gurkha Regiment, describing that action.*

13. Brigadier-General Graham has throughout this short campaign handled his command in a thoroughly satisfactory manner, and I recommend this distinguished officer, and the officers and troops he has named in his despatch, to the particular notice of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief.

14. Lieutenant-Colonel Rennick brought up his column from Silchar to Manipur, in spite of the serious sickness and great natural difficulties he had to overcome, with admirable energy and promptitude.

15. The following guns, ammunition, &c., were captured in the palace arsenal:

Four 7-pounder rifled muzzle-loading guns, presented to the Maharaja by the British Government.

Eight 3-pounder smooth-bore bronze guns.

One 2-pounder muzzle-loading bronze gun.

Four 2-pounder " iron guns.

One 4½" mortar.

A large number of jinjals.

1,290 fire-arms of various patterns, chiefly smooth-bore.

940,000 rounds smooth-bore ball musket ammunition, in boxes.

972,000 percussion caps for smooth-bore muskets in box.

180 barrels of powder.

Elephant gear for the four seven-pounder mountain guns.

16. Fire-arms are still in course of collection. I have issued a proclamation disarming the population of the Manipur Valley and of the neighbouring hill tracts formerly subject to the Manipur Durbar, the penalty for the possession of arms without a license being death or transportation. There are a very large number of fire-arms in this district, and I hope that after a few weeks the greater proportion of them will have been got in.

17. We have also obtained possession of 26 elephants, the property of the Durbar, which have been made over to the Transport Department, and about fifty ponies.

18. I beg to bring the services of the following officers to the favorable consideration of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief:

Deputy Surgeon-General C. P. Costello.---Has done good administrative work in organising the medical service on the Silchar line. His advice and assistance are always valuable.

Major F. S. Gwatkin, Assistant Adjutant-General.---Has given me much valuable assistance and advice. Has great field experience. Particularly recommended for favorable consideration.

Captain G. C. Kitson, The King's Royal Rifle Corps, Deputy Assistant Adjutant-General.---An able staff officer. Has been of great use to me.

Captain C. M. Fitzgerald, Chief Commissariat Officer.---A thoroughly competent and experienced officer. Has managed his departmental business to my entire satisfaction.

Captain R. F. Allen, Royal Engineers, Field Engineer.---Has made an excellent report on the Kohima-Manipur road, and is now engaged in arranging for the accommodation of the troops at Manipur. A very capable officer.

Captain J. Willcocks, p.s.o., Leinster Regiment, Chief Transport Officer.---A very energetic and intelligent officer; of good tact. His former experience in transport work in these hills has been most valuable.

Lieutenant L. G. N. Eales, East Kent Regiment, Signalling Officer.---The circumstances of the march from Kohima and the unfavorable weather have not allowed much scope for signalling. Lieutenant Eales is zealous and energetic.

Mr. J. H. W. Dalrymple-Clark, Assam Police Department.---Was placed at my disposal by the Assam Government to organise and work the cart train on the Nigriting-Nichuguard road. In this work he has been indefatigable, and has succeeded admirably. A very intelligent and zealous officer.

Surgeon H. C. Banerji, Indian Medical Service, Civil Surgeon of Sibsagar.---Was temporarily placed at my disposal by the Assam Government to organise the medical arrangements from the river base to Nichuguard. His services have been most useful.

Surgeon-Major C. H. Beatson, Indian Medical Service.---Took over charge from Surgeon Banerji on the 19th April, and is now doing good service as Principal Medical Officer on the Kohima line.

Surgeon H. C. Hudson, Indian Medical Service.---Was senior medical officer with the Kohima Column on the march to Manipur.

† 250,000 rounds of Government manufacture; remainder local manufacture.

An able officer, with considerable field experience and power of organisation.

The following officers commanded their respective battalions and detachments with great credit to themselves and to my entire satisfaction in every respect.

Colonel H. M. Evans, 43rd Gurkha Rifles.

Major R. K. Ridgeway, v.c., 44th Gurkha Rifles.

Captain H. W. Priestley, 44th Gurkha Rifles, temporarily commanding the 42nd Gurkha Rifles.

Captain A. H. C. Birch, No. 8 (Bengal) Mountain Battery.

Captain D. C. F. Macintyre, Assam Military Police.

Lieutenant A. Giles, 13th Bengal Infantry.

The advice and assistance I received from Colonel Evans and Major Ridgeway in particular were most useful.

19. I leave to Brigadier-General Graham, c.s., and Lieutenant-Colonel Rennick the duty of bringing to His Excellency's notice the services rendered by the officers and others in their respective columns.

20. It is a subject of much regret to me that, owing to the pressure on supplies and transport, I was unable to bring up the 36th (Sikh) Regiment of Bengal Infantry under the command of Colonel J. Cook in time to march from Kohima with the column of advance.

21. For the same reason, I was unable to take more than 100 rifles of the 13th Bengal Infantry with the column. The remainder of the regiment under the command of Major Bingham did very useful work at Kohima and at Nichuguard. Both regiments were in every respect thoroughly fit for field service.

No. 181-M, dated Camp Manipur, the 29th April 1891.

From--Brigadier-General T. Graham, c.s., Commanding the Tamu Column, Manipur Field Force,

To--The Assistant Adjutant-General, Manipur Field Force.

I have the honor to submit the following report of the operations of the Tamu Column for the information of the Major-General Commanding the Manipur Field Force.

2. A report was received from Tamu on the 25th March that the telegraph wire had been cut 25 miles from Tamu, and that the Manipuris were rising. On the 27th March a detachment of the 43rd Gurkha Rifles arrived at Tamu from Manipur, and stated that a revolt had taken place in Manipur, and that the Chief Commissioner of Assam and many other officers were prisoners in the hands of the Manipuri Durbars.

3. Lieutenant Grant, 12th (Burma) Madras Infantry, who was commanding at Tamu, communicated this information by telegraph, and requested permission to take 50 rifles of his own regiment and the detachment of the 43rd Gurkha Rifles (35 rifles), and proceed at once towards Manipur to endeavour to render assistance to the prisoners. His proposal having been sanctioned, he left Tamu on the 28th March. On arriving near Thobal, he found about 800 Manipuris in position there to arrest his advance. Lieutenant Grant immediately attacked the enemy and drove them out, killing about 50 of them. He then established himself in a defensible position where he was attacked by 2,000 of the enemy with two guns, whom he defeated, inflicting heavy loss, and held his position until ordered to retire from it on the 9th April.

4. In the meantime Captain Presgrave, 12th (Burma) Madras Infantry, with 100 rifles, had been pushed up from Auktaung to Tamu, and was sent out to enable Lieutenant Grant to withdraw his small force. Captain Presgrave having relieved Lieutenant Grant, the whole party started for Tamu; but Major Sir J. H. Leslie, Bt., 2-4th Gurkha Regiment, having arrived at Tamu with his regiment, was ordered to push on, and also to direct Captain Presgrave to go back and occupy Pael, and to hurry up to that place himself. During Captain Presgrave's second advance on Pael he came across the enemy, who were evidently following up Lieutenant Grant's detachment. He attacked and defeated the enemy with heavy loss. In the pursuit which followed, Lieutenant Grant's charger was shot under him. Captain Presgrave then occupied Pael, where he was joined subsequently by Major Sir Charles Leslie with the 2-4th Gurkha Regiment, and this place was held as the advanced position till the arrival of the remainder of the Tamu Column on the 25th April 1891.

5. Orders had been received on the 31st March for a force from the Myingyan District, Upper Burma, to proceed to Manipur to co-operate with columns from Silchar and Kohima. The constitution of the Tamu Column was as follows:

Four guns, No. 2 Mountain Battery, Royal Artillery.

Head-quarters and wing, 4th Battalion, King's Royal Rifles.

2-4th Gurkha Regiment.

12th (Burma) Madras Infantry.

With the 32nd (Burma) Madras Infantry in reserve at Tamu.

The main body of the column concentrated at Tamu on the 21st April, and advanced on the 23rd April, it having been arranged that the columns from Kohima, Silchar, and Tamu should concentrate on Manipur on the 27th April 1891.

6. The column advanced without opposition to Pael. On the 24th April, while the main body was at Tinghaphul, information was received from Pael that the enemy had entrenched themselves in a position about six miles north of Pael, and orders were issued for a reconnaissance to be made on the 25th April to ascertain their strength, &c. On the arrival of the head-quarters of the column at Pael on the 25th April, information was received from Captain Drury, 2-4th Gurkha Regiment, who was commanding the reconnaissance party, that he had hemmed in a large number of the enemy in their entrenchment about six miles north of Pael, so that they could not escape, and asking permission to turn them out. As Captain Drury had only 100 rifles of the 2-4th Gurkha Regiment, 50 rifles of the 12th (Burma) Madras Infantry, and 44 mounted infantry of the 12th (Burma) Madras Infantry with him, and as I did not think this force strong enough for the purpose, I ordered two guns of No. 2 Mountain Battery and 200 rifles of the 2-4th Gurkha Regiment, the whole under the command of Captain Rundall, 2-4th Gurkha Regiment, to reinforce Captain Drury. Captain Rundall, on arrival at the scene of action, placed his guns on a hill about 1,000 yards from the entrenchment, and commenced to shell it. In the meantime Captain Drury with his detachment of the 2-4th Gurkha Regiment and Lieutenant Grant with the 12th (Burma) Madras Infantry gradually approached the entrenchment from the north, while Captain Carnegie with his Gurkhas approached it from the south. The guns ceased firing as the Infantry approached, and finally both Captain Drury's and Captain Carnegie's parties, the former accompanied by the detachment of the 12th (Burma) Madras Infantry under Lieutenant Grant, rushed the entrenchment. A regular hand-to-hand fight ensued, when most of the enemy in the work were killed. The mounted infantry of the 12th (Burma) Madras Infantry under Lieutenant Cox cut off the retreat of those who tried to escape, and killed many of them.

Our losses were as follow:

Jemadar Kiruram Gurung, 2-4th Gurkha Regiment killed.

No. 939, Sepoy Dalia Thapa, 2-4th Gurkha Regiment, killed.

Captain Drury and Captain Carnegie, 2-4th Gurkha Regiment, severely wounded.

Lieutenant Grant and Lieutenant Cox, 12th (Burma) Madras Infantry, severely wounded.

Subadar-Major Kalpatti Gurung, 2-4th Gurkhas, severely wounded.

Jemadar Birbal Nagarkoti, 43rd Gurkhas, severely wounded.

No. 112, Havildar Jitman Rai, 2-4th Gurkhas, severely wounded.

No. 523, Naik Pirthidhan Rai, 2-4th Gurkhas, severely wounded.

No. 636, Sepoy Mahadal Limbu, 2-4th Gurkhas, severely wounded.

No. 656, Sepoy Mahadal Limbu, 2-4th Gurkhas, severely wounded.

No. 575, Sepoy Dan Singh Chand, 2-4th Gurkhas, severely wounded.

No. 290, Sepoy Dhan Singh Khattai, 2-4th Gurkhas, severely wounded.

No. 637, Sepoy Dayal Singh, 12th (Burma) Madras Infantry, severely wounded.

No. 271, Sepoy Bhola Singh, 12th (Burma) Madras Infantry, severely wounded.

Of the enemy, 76 dead bodies were found in the entrenchment and 52 outside, while the mounted infantry killed many more. Amongst the killed were two Minzawraws, named Meah and Senna Mypa (a prince), who are stated by the Manipuris of all the adjacent villages to have been among the actual murderers of the late Mr. Quinton.

The force remained for the night in huts close to the scene of the fight.

The enemy on this occasion made a most stubborn resistance, which may be accounted for by the fact that they had no loophole for escape left them.

The behaviour of the troops was magnificent.

7. On the 26th April the head-quarters of the column marched to Thobal, picking up Captain Rundall's column en route. No opposition was met with on the way, and the force was all in quarters in the Thobal village by about 12 noon. The bridge made by Lieutenant Grant over the Arong stream had to be made stronger to allow the battery and transport animals to cross, and this delayed the column for about an hour. Heavy rain fell during the afternoon and night.

8. The column started for Manipur at 4-30 A.M. on the 27th April, and, meeting with no opposition on the way, arrived at the pat at 11 A.M., having been delayed by the very bad state of the roads and bridges. Heavy rain fell throughout the march, which made the road very slippery.

The villagers along the route seemed friendly, and in no way seemed to object to the passage of the column.

9. The behaviour of the troops has on all occasions been all that could be desired; severe marches and intense heat have been endured in a most cheerful manner, and all ranks appeared to be only too anxious to get a chance of showing their metal.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE FRIGATE "ENDYMION."*

By SIR EDWIN ARNOLD.

The English Roses, on her face,
Blossomed a brighter pink, for pride,
As, through the glories of the place,
Watchful, we wandered, side by side.

We saw our by-gone Worthies stand,
Done to the life, in steel and gold,
Howard and Drake—a stately band—
Sir Walter, Anson, Hawkins bold ;

Past all the martial blazonry
Of Blake's great battles ; and the roar
Of Jervis, thundering through the sea ;
With Rodney, Hood ; and fifty more ;

To him, the bravest, gentlest, best,
Duty's dear Hero, Britain's Star,
The Chieftain of the dauntless breast,
Nelson, our Thunderbolt of War !

We saw him, gathering sword by sword
On conquered decks, from Don and Dane ;
We saw him, Victory's laurelled Lord,
Rend the French battle line a-twain ;

We saw the coat, the vest, he wore
In thick of dread Trafalgar's day ;
The blood-stain and the ball which tore
Shoulder-gold-lace—and life—away.

In countless grand sea-pieces there
The green seas foamed with gallant blood ;
The skies blazed high with flame and fear ;
The tall masts toppled to the flood.

But, ever 'mid red rage and glow
Of each tremendous Ocean fight,
Safe, by the strength of those below,
The flag of England floated bright !

* Towards the close of the war with France, Captain the Hon. Sir Charles Paget, while cruising in the Endymion frigate, on the coast of Spain, descried a French ship of the line in imminent danger, embayed among rocks on a lee shore ; bowsprit and foremast gone, and riding by a streamcable, her only remaining one. Though it was blowing a gale, Sir Charles bore down to the assistance of his enemy, dropped his sheet-anchor on the Frenchman's bow, buoyed the cable, and veered it across his hawser, this the disabled ship succeeded in getting in, and thus 700 lives were saved from destruction. After performing this chivalrous action the Endymion, being herself in great peril, hauled to the wind, let go her bower-anchor, club-hauled, and stood off shore on the other tack.

"Ah ! dear brave souls !" she cried, "'tis good
To be a British girl, and claim
Some drops, too, of such splendid blood,
Some distant share of deathless fame !

"Yet, still I think of what tears rained
From tender French and Spanish eyes
For all those glorious days we gained.
Oh ! the sad price of victories !"

"Come then," I said, "witness one fight
With triumph crowned, which cost no tear ;
Waged gallant 'gainst the Tempest's might."
Thus turned we to a canvas near.—

"Look ! the King's Frigate and her foe !
The coast is Spain. Crashing to spy
An enemy, she finds him so,
Caught in a death trap, piteously !

"A great three-decker, Close a-lee,
Wildbreakers on the black rocks foam
Will drown the ship's whole company
When that one anchor's fluke comes home.

"Her foremast gone she cannot set
Head-sails to cast her off the land ;
These poor souls have, to draw breath yet
As long as while a warp will stand.

"'Tis war-time—time of mutual hate—
Only to keep off therefore ;—tack—
Mark from afar 'Jean Crapaud's' fate
And lightly to 'My Lords' take back

"Good news of the great liner, done
To splinters, and some thirty score
Of 'Mounseers' perished ! Not a gun
To fire. Just stand by !—no more !

"Also the Captain who should go—
Eyes open—where this Gaul is driven,
Would steer straight into Hell's mid woe
Out of the easy peace of Heaven.

"Well, let them strike, and drown ! Not he !
Not lion-hearted Paget ! No !—
The war's forgot ! He'll let us see Seamanship at its topmost ! Blow,

"Boatswain, your pipe ! 'Endymions' hear !
Forward and aft, all hands on deck !
Let my sails draw, range hawsers clear !
Paget from fate his foe will pluck !

"So bears she down ; the fair white flag
Hoisted, full friendly, at the main ;

Her guns run in ; twice to a rag
The stormsails torn, but set again.

"And when she rounds to wind, they swarm
Into their rigging, and they dip
The tricolour, with hearts made warm
By hope and love.—Look there ! his ship

"Inshore the doomed one ! and you note
How, between life and death, he keeps
His frigate, like a pleasure boat,
Clean full and by ; and while he sweeps

"Athwart the Frenchman's hawse, lets go
His big sheet anchor buoys it—cast
Clear o'er the rail. They know, they know ;
Here's help ! here's hope ! here's chance, at last !

"For, hauling (you shall understand)
The English hawser o'er her sides
All fear is fled of that black strand ;
Safely the huge three-decker rides.

"Safe will she come to Brest again,
With Jean, and Jacques, and Paul and Pierre,
And float, to fight King George's men ;
Thanks to that goodly British gear !

"But woe to bold Endymion !
Never was darker plight for craft ;
Laid to—all but one anchor gone !
And those hard fateful rocks abaft !

"Fresh saved from death, the Frenchmen watched
A sailor's highest lesson shown ;
They view by skill that frigate snatched
From peril direr than their own.

"To beat to windward, she must fly
Round to the starboard tack ; but drives
Full on the rocks, in staying. Try
To wear her, the same death arrives.

"One desperate shift remains ! She brings
Her cable to the stern ; makes fast ;
Drops anchor ; by the quarter swings,
And, when a-lee her stern is east,

"Hauls on the bight, and cuts adrift—
Sheets home her foresail—fills, and swerves
A ship's length forth. Subtle and swift—
Her aim the tempest's anger serves.

"In view of those safe rescued men,
Foot by foot steals she space to live—
Self-stripped of hope, except she win
The offing. None can succour give !

"A ship's length more ! One ship's length more !
And then helm down ! then some white free,
Comes the fierce blast. That leeward shore
Slides slow astern ; that raging sea

"Widens. If once you whitened reef
She weathers, 'tis a saviour saved !—
Seamanship conquers ! Past belief.
She rounds ! The peril hath been braved !

"Then louder than the storm-wind's yell,
Rings in her wake the Frenchmen's cheer,
Bidding the good ship glad farewell,
While our staunch Frigate draws out clear.

"Never was nobler salvage made !
Never a smarter sea-deed done !

"Best of all fights I love !—She said—
"This fight of the Endymion."

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

ON the 5th of the last month there was a Royal Levée—the fourth of the season—at St. James's Palace by the Prince of Wales. The attendance was full, though not so crowded as at the Viceregal Levées at Calcutta. Most of the ministers, particularly those in the Cabinet, as well as representatives of the Foreign Powers were present, besides high officers in the Army and the Navy in their brilliant uniforms. The Prince was accompanied by the Dukes of Connaught and Cambridge. He was escorted from Marlborough House by a troop of Life Guards to the Palace of St. James, where the Coldstream Guards furnished a guard of honor. He was received by the ministers and other high officers of state. In consequence of the trouble in the leg from which he is suffering, the Prince remained seated in the Throne-Room through the whole Levée. There were as usual many new presentations, among which we find the following Oriental names :—

Mohammed Abdul Alim ; Abus Sabah Mahomed Ziaur Rahman ; Nowrojee N. Wadia ; Bomonjee Duishaw Petit ; Mr. M. Ismail Khan ; Shaikh Molummt Yehya ; Chandra Sekhar Sen.

LORD Harris held a Levée, on June 20, at the Council Hall, Poona. It was over in 25 minutes. Happy Poona ! In chronicling the function the Times of India notes, the weather was cloudy but dusky—a distinction beyond us of the farther East.

LADY Harris's Reception came off on the 25th following, at Government House, Ganeshkhind. Only two hundred and ninety eight ladies and gentlemen were present, the fair sex numbering not more than one hundred and the natives twenty five.

IT is understood that Lord and Lady Harris will give a Flower Ball at Ganeshkhind. What is that ? The sound awakens curiosity, specially after the late saturnalia at Ooty. There will be angels of course, but no devils this time, we suppose.

AS we announced previously, Mr. Smith is Gazetted this week to act for Sir Henry Harrison as Junior Member of the Board of Revenue. Mr. Westmacott, Commissioner of Excise, officiates as Commissioner of the Presidency Division, Mr. K. G. Gupta, Junior Secretary to the Board of Revenue, acting as Commissioner of Excise. On a previous occasion Mr. Westmacott acted both as Commissioner of the Presidency Division and Commissioner of Excise. The present separation allows Mr. Gupta the lift for which he has qualified himself and for which the natives should be grateful to Sir Charles Elliott. Mr. T. Inglis, Joint-Magistrate, from the 24-Pergunnahs, joins the Board as Junior Secretary.

AS a proof of the popularity of his works after death, which has been questioned by many noted literary critics, it is stated that during the five years since Victor Hugo's death, the sale of various editions of his works has brought in over two hundred and ninety-six thousand seven hundred and thirty pounds sterling.

A DISCOVERY of a febrifuge is announced in the Medical Press and Circular. It is said to have proved better than quinine in certain cases of malarial fever. It is extracted from the root of a shrub called Pambuano. The active properties of the root are obtained by its maceration in alcohol at 60 deg. Fahr. The alkaloid has not yet been isolated.

THE denizens of Wellington Square and the adjoining streets and lanes will see that their medical neighbour Mr. J. R. Wallace had not gone to Europe for nothing. He has obtained the degree of M. D. after passing a brilliant examination. There were fourteen candidates of whom six were plucked. Mr. Wallace alone of the eight successful candidates passed with honors, getting distinction in five subjects, namely, Anatomy, Clinical Surgery, Widwifery, Clinical Medicine, and Jurisprudence. It will be seen that these are professionally the most important subjects.

SCOTLAND is steadily feeling the influence of the age. The Gifford Lectures of Dr. Max Muller at Glasgow will not be stopped. On the question of heresy in the Glasgow Presbytery, there were only five against the great Professor to seventeen in his favour. Nothing daunted the bigots applied to the General Assembly, but that body rejected their representation.

THEY think much of the telephone line between London and Paris. The distance is 297 miles, of which 23 miles are laid with cable under the British Channel. But these Europeans have long been beaten by the go-ahead Yankees. They have recorded a conversation by telephone between New York and Cleaveland, O., a distance of 650 miles.

THE world is improving all round. The obscure little State of Puebla, in distant Mexico, seems resolved to stimulate the mining of coal. It has, to begin with, decreed that the mines shall be free from taxation for 25 years. It promises, besides, a premium of 100 piastres yearly, for ten years, to exploiters. Finally, it is prepared to show every consideration to the railway companies, who propose to establish lines passing by the coal basins. This is advanced government. Indian statesmen may well take a leaf out of the book of these Indo-European republicans of not the best repute.

THREE young Hindus were arrested by the Police in Sohhabazar for causing an affray, and charged accordingly. The defence taken was that the prosecution was bad. It had no leg to stand upon. The arrest was illegal, the offence being a non-cognizable one. Moulvi Abdul Jubbar, the Magistrate, accepted that view of the case and discharged the accused.

THERE has been a change in the Civil Service Regulations. An officer on leave is no longer privileged to take payment in any of the Colonies in which he may find himself, whether it be in the Falkland Islands, St. Helena, Honduras or the Gold Coast. He must now select the country in which he desires to draw his leave allowances and will be permitted to change it only once during any one period of leave.

A CORRESPONDENT signing R. G. George, in the Indian Daily News of yesterday, gives the following "infallible cure for scorpion bite":—

"Cut a fresh onion, and rub it smartly over the wound with a little salt and vinegar for two or three minutes, after which take a tamarind stone (not more than a season old, fresh seed would be better), and rub the notch that germinates with a little water on a smooth stone until the white kernel appears; apply the stone (the part rubbed) to the wound, and press gently for a few seconds. It will then without holding adhere firmly to the wound, and not drop off until it has sucked all the poison out."

This fruit stone in its sticking and sucking resembles the famous pebble which is said to be successful in snake-bite, and offers indirect testimony in favour of the latter. Therefore Mr. George's announcement is doubly interesting. We hope his recipe will be tried.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE preliminary investigations into the Shambazar riot have closed. Sixty-five persons have been committed to the sessions. Mr. Henderson prosecuted and Mr. Douglas White represented the defence.

ANOTHER batch of Benares rioters has been sentenced. In the railway station case, the jury acquitted seven and convicted seventeen of the accused. The Judge sentenced the convicted to rigorous imprisonment for terms of one, two, three, four and ten years, with three months' solitary confinement. Five boys received thirty stripes each.

FOLLOWING the Ramnad, the Pittapore Zemindary in Madras is under litigation. The Court of Wards is in possession of the property on behalf of a minor, son of the late Raja. The plaintiff has been filed by the adopted son of the same Raja, known as the Kumarah Raja of Pittapore, and raises an ugly issue. He avers that he was adopted in September 1873, having been given in adoption by his father, the present ex-Raja of Vencatagherry, and that the adoptive father by a deed made him the sole heir to the Zemindary and all his property, moveable and immovable. The plaintiff goes on to state that in 1881, the adoptive father and the adopted son fell out, and the latter separated and lived apart in Madras till July 1890, when the Raja died. During the interval, in October 1885, the minor under the Court of Wards was born of the first wife of the Raja. Not that the plaintiff admits that he is the son of the late Raja. On the contrary, he says that the birth was "cooked" up at the time to deprive him of his rights as the adopted son. Aware of the difficulties of succession to his estate, the Raja in March 1890 made a will constituting his natural born son his sole heir. The suit is to set aside the will as ineffective or invalid and to declare the minor as not the son of the deceased Raja. In case the minor be declared the son of the deceased Raja, the prayer is that the partible property of the deceased be ascertained, and that the adopted son, as the eldest surviving member of the late Raja's family, be declared entitled to its possession.

IN our last issue, we informed our readers of another mosque demolition dispute at Dacca which threatened a serious breach of the peace. Our Dacca correspondent now informs us, that Mr. Forbes, the Commissioner of the Division, has, under instructions from the Government, made a thorough enquiry into the matter, and, finding that the mosque is Wakf and, as such, not subject to sale, has requested the Municipal Commissioners to have the matter amicably settled, by taking back the 300 rupees, the consideration paid by them to the descendant of the original founder of the endowment, and purchasing a piece of land on the other side of the edifice, across the lane, for the purpose of widening it, without interfering with the house of worship. This decision of the Commissioner has given great satisfaction to the entire Mahomedan community.

THE Indian Councils Bill has been abandoned. It was a mistake for the Congressists to oppose it. They could not have made a worse blunder for the advancement of their cause. The moderate measure passed by the House of Lords was capable of expansion by the Executive without the intervention of the legislature. The present elective constitution of the Calcutta Corporation would not have been known if it were not accepted with the clause for Government interference. It was not unreasonable, under existing circumstances, that the Government should retain the power to supersede, though temporarily, the Commissioners, on certain contingencies. But reasonable or unreasonable, that was the condition on which concession was to be obtained. Events have shown that we were right in accepting the limited constitution, and that the legislature was wise in making the limitation. But the Congress is governed by men far too clever—by half.

A MEETING of the Faculty of Arts will be held on Saturday next to take into consideration the proposal of an overzealous member of the Senate, to make Bengali (or Hindi or Uryah) and Urdoo compulsory subjects in the F. A., B. A. and M. A. examinations, for candidates who take Sanskrit and Persian or Arabic as a second language. We do not know how far such an additional and unnecessary burden would be liked by the candidates themselves or their friends and guardians. The only parties to benefit by such an addition to the subjects of the examinations are the authors of Text books in those languages and the publishers thereof. There is already a great scandal in connection with the selection of Text books, both English and vernacular, and we do not think it desirable to add to the scandal.

THE Maharaja Holkar has started as a reformer with Free Education, High and Technical, inscribed on his banner. The Indore Durbar having sanctioned the opening of a College teaching up to the B. A. standard, it was, under orders of the Maharaja, declared open on the 10th June by Rao Bahadur K. C. Bedarkar, the Prime Minister. The College is open to anybody, no matter where he came from, no matter to what caste or creed he belonged. No fees will be charged, the State bearing the entire cost. The College will be under the presidency of an Englishman direct from "Home" who will be known as the Director of Public Instruction and Principal of the College. Chairs have been sanctioned in English Literature, History and Political Economy, Logic and Moral Philosophy, Mathematics and Natural Science in English, and Sanskrit and Persian in the Vernaculars. The College will have, besides, technical classes for drawing, surveying, carpentry, carving in metal, and printing. The management of the technical branch of the College is entrusted to Mr. Ezekeil, the Superintendent of the State mills.

We heartily congratulate the Maharaja and welcome this revival of an old practice suppressed in an age of political economy. Free Education is an ideal which the Indian races should not willingly let die.

THE Japanese are advancing with rapid strides. Their latest feat is an ironclad of war complete and equipped according to the requirements of the day, built in Japan, by its workmen. This is the latest of a series so built. According to Captain Inglis, R.N., it has no point of inferiority to a high European standard, whether in ships or in men. In the city of Tokio there are telegraphs, telephones, railways, tramcars, electric lighting, &c., which show a rare power of rapid assimilation and executive facility, without precedent in Asiatic history. The University buildings with the colleges of law, medicine, engineering, literature and science and full staff of professors, are equipped with laboratories, libraries, workshops, hospitals and museums. In the faculty of medicine there is a staff of fifty-five professors and assistant professors, many of whom have followed their studies for several years in Europe and some of whom have graduated with high distinction in foreign Universities. The physical and microscopical researches by the Japanese students of Japanese professors would be a credit to students of the day in any University.

THE Government Astronomer in Madras, Mr. N. R. Pogson, is dead. He died of cancer of the liver—a martyr to science. Since his appointment in 1861, he was never on leave. His devotion to the stars would not allow him to leave even for a time his post of watch at the Observatory. His constancy did not go unrewarded. The heavenly bodies could not but disclose themselves to their zealous votary. He found the heavens crowded where other observers, less loyal and persistent, saw only blank space. He has given to Science the knowledge of new stars like blackberries in season. If he was not much honored, and was somewhat neglected, in India, he enjoyed the esteem of the learned of Europe and America. All the more glory to him that, without sufficient appreciation in his own country, he maintained its credit throughout the globe. He was almost our sole discovering servant of the day in India. Through him so-called Benighted Madras has illuminated the world's illuminati. He threw a flood of light on the celestial sphere, bringing to notice its darkest corners. Wherever astronomy is studied, his achievements are known. Astronomers will not willingly let the name of the obscure Madras stargazer perish. A single star is enough to perpetuate a memory. Here on the surf-beaten Coromandel Coast was a sentinel over the skies, telescope in hand, who discovered a possum of planets.

THE Government of India having asked the Government of Bengal for an interpreter with competent knowledge of Hindustani, Bengali and Gurmukhi for the Perak Government, the Bengal Government communicated the request to the Director of Public Instruction for such a man. But Sir Alfred Croft was not in a position to recommend any and the Bengal Government has accordingly expressed to the Supreme Government its inability to supply the demand.

NOTWITHSTANDING the recent special authorization with independent powers of the two Members of the Board of Revenue, Lower Provinces, they find they are not sufficiently empowered and moved the Government for change in the law. But it was decided on the advice of the Law Member that no fresh legislation was necessary. In case, however, the Board finds it difficult to discharge its duties, the Government of Bengal has expressed its willingness to address the Government of India on the subject not later than September 1891, bringing the disadvantages to notice which the Board feels in exercising the powers vested in it.

KUMAR GOPENDRA KRISHNA goes to Nuddea as Officiating Judge. His place at Sealdah has been filled by Moulvie Syed Mahomed. The place is an important one and a prize appointment, and the Moulvie has well earned it. He comes of a good stock—being the great grandson of the late Meer Ashruff Ali of Dacca, the largest Mahomedan Zemindar of his time in Bengal—and is himself a man of parts and ability. He is not unknown in Calcutta and has satisfactorily passed his noviciate in the mofussil not excepting the 24-Pergunnahs. He commenced Government service as a Special Sub-Registrar at Mozufferpore and was soon taken in as a Deputy Magistrate for the same place, and was at different periods at Bankipore, Alipore, Hooghly, &c. Recently he was selected temporarily to fill the post of second Inspector of Registration from which he has been just relieved after a service of 4½ months.

The morning papers make a mistake in the Moulvi's name. Kumar Gopendra Krishna does not return to Sealdah.

DURING the last month or two Baboo Prankrishna Chatterjee, a clerk in the office of the Inspector General of Registration, on the receipt of Rs. 50 per month, has been appointed to the post of Special Sub-Registrar of Lohardugga. We congratulate the Baboo on his good fortune, and have no doubt whatever that he is quite fit for the post. But we cannot understand on what principle such an appointment has been sanctioned by Government. The office carries with it a position, dignity and emoluments inferior only to those of a Deputy Magistrate and Deputy Collector, and as it does not require any University Degree or competitive examination as a qualification to obtain it, there are many a young man of high family and superior education and position, who are anxious to get appointed to it. In the first place, we are of opinion that these appointments should be made by selection from such young men. By this we should not be understood to mean that no clerks should ever get promotion to such posts. But if deserving clerks are considered eligible for such appointments, we do not see why clerks only of the Registration Department should have this good fortune and not those of other offices, such as the Bengal Secretariat, Board of Revenue, and so forth. We are aware that there are many clerks in the Bengal office and other offices drawing even so much as Rs. 100, and many Head clerks in the District offices who would be too glad to be appointed as Special Sub-Registrars. If the idea be to reward merit amongst the clerks, by promoting the best of them to special Sub-Registrarships, it should not be limited to the office of the Inspector General of Registration, but should be extended to other offices. As a fact however, we find that whenever a clerk is promoted to such a post, he comes from the Registration office and from none else.

Sometime ago, on the occasion of an appointment of this character, the Government of Bengal issued strict orders that such posts should no longer be given to clerks in the office of the Inspector-General of Registration. How then the appointment in question has been made? We hope to deal with the mode in which rural Sub-Registrars are appointed, in a future issue.

TENDERS for the new 4½ per cent. Calcutta municipal loan for Rs. 20,00,000 were 121 in number, aggregating Rs. 1,28,78,200. Of this sum, Rs. 1,28,21,200 was at different rates, ranging from Rs. 105-8 down to par. Only Rs. 57,000 was below par. The allotments are Rs. 17,96,000 to tenderers at Rs. 104 5/16 and above; Rs. 2,04,000 to those at Rs. 104 4/16 pro rata. The Commissioners are doubly lucky. They net a large premium while reducing the rate of interest by $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. from 5 to 4 $\frac{1}{2}$.

It is a melancholy fact, though. It means that the market is flush of cash. In other words, there is money without occupation. We have money but no enterprise. There are fifty industries which are starving for want of capital. There are hundreds of obvious ways of employing capital to advantage. Under the circumstances, it is little short of feminine timidity and unfamiliarity with business to reserve one's money for the accommodation of the state or of stately corporations and to be content with the usance granted by them. The Europeans too are affected by the universal apathy.

AN important question arising in the Dacca district and affecting the rights of a Hindu widow has been referred to Full Bench by three of the Judges of the Calcutta High Court—by Mr. Justice Prinsep, Mr. Justice Wilson, and Mr. Justice Banerji. The case as stated by Mr. Justice Wilson is :

A Hindu widow inherited the property of her husband, taking therein the estate of a Hindu widow. She afterwards married a second husband, not a Hindu, in the form provided by Act III of 1872, having first made a declaration as required by section 10 of the Act, that she was not a Hindu.

The question to be answered and decided by the Full Bench is :

Whether, by that marriage, she forfeited her interest in her first husband's estate in favour of the next heir ?

Mr. Justice Wilson elucidates the reference by asking a question. What is the nature of the estate of a Hindu widow, whether it is an estate during widowhood and subject to forfeiture on re-marriage, or an estate subject to no such restriction ; for it seems clear to him that whatever estate the widow took on the death of her husband, she could never enlarge it by any subsequent act of her own. The principal matters argued in the case were Act XXI of 1850, the lex loci Act, Act XV of 1856, the Hindu Widow Marriage Act, Act III of 1872, ordinarily known as the Brahmo Marriage Act, the Privy Council decision in Moniram Kalita versus Kali Kalitani, known as the Unchastity case. The view taken by the referring Judges, at least two of them, the first and the last, the barrister and the pleader Judges, is that a Hindu widow's right to her deceased husband's property determined at her re-marriage. Mr. Justice Wilson disposes of the first two Acts thus : "I think Act XXI of 1850 does not affect this case. By virtue of that Act, a change of religion does not cause any forfeiture of property ; and therefore the widow's abjuration of Hinduism did not deprive her of her estate. But neither could it enlarge it, or get rid of any condition or restriction to which it was originally subject." "Act III of 1872 seems to me to have no bearing on the question. That Act is, as its title indicates, 'an Act to provide a form of marriage in certain cases.' Any provision with regard to capacity to marry, or with regard to rights of property would have been entirely beyond its scope." He thus reduces the question to two points. First, what is the nature of a Hindu widow's estate under the Hindu Law, apart from statutory enactments,—is it an estate during widowhood and liable to forfeiture upon a second marriage, or is it free from any such restriction ; and, secondly, what is the effect of the Hindu Widow's Marriage Act, XV of 1856 ? True, the Privy Council, in the Unchastity case, laid down "that an estate once vested by succession or inheritance is not divested by any act or incapacity which, before succession, would have formed a ground for exclusion from inheritance," but, says the Judge, "it was there held not to have been established that the estate of a widow formed an exception to the rule. But it is equally clear that there were grounds which, under the Hindu Law, caused a forfeiture of a vested estate. Change of religion did so before act XXI of 1850 and the Regulations that preceded it. Degradation from caste had the same effect as is pointed out by the Privy Council in the (Unchastity) case. We have to say whether a second marriage is a circumstance, like those just mentioned, which determines a widow's estate." Mr. Justice Wilson finds that it is clearly against the Hindoo Law that a widow can marry and yet remain half the body of her late husband and inherit his property. The principle of the Unchastity case too does not apply. By that decision, a widow's estate is not forfeited by unchastity during widowhood, but "there seems to me to be a very broad distinction between misconduct on the part of a widow, as a widow, and her ceasing to be a widow."

As regards the Hindu Widow's Marriage Act, XV. of 1856, Mr. Justice Wilson is also of opinion that the Act makes every Hindu widow free to marry but, under the same law, with re-marriage her interest in her deceased husband's property ordinarily ceases as if she were dead. This view being opposed to that expressed by the High Court in Gopal Singh versus Dhungazi, the present reference has been made.

The Brahman Judge dilates on the Hindu view of the case taken up by Mr. Justice Wilson. Mr. Justice Prinsep agrees to the reference, but has doubts on many points raised in the judgment of Mr. Justice Wilson.

For the attitude taken up by Mr. Justice Wilson in defence of the Hindu Law, he is entitled to the gratitude of every true Hindu. That Law has been greatly scandalized by recent Acts and decisions, and it will be uphill work for Judges of the present day to restore its pristine purity. Judges may yet arise to overrule the unHindu sentiment of the atrocious ruling in Kalita v. Kalitani.

EARLY in June last, the following draft form of an agreement was sent round to the native papers in Hyderabad by the Home Secretary through the Commissioner of Police for the printers to sign :—

"I..... son of..... residing at..... do hereby declare that I am the printer and publisher of the journal known as the..... and which is printed and published at..... I do hereby promise and declare that neither myself, nor my successor, or representatives, shall act contrary to any of the conditions mentioned below.

"(1.) To print or publish any words signs or equivocations tending to breed sedition either against H. H. the Nizam's or British Government or to interplant any dispute or quarrel between any two persons of different births, creeds or nations, whether the said persons are subjects of H. H. the Nizam or that of H. M. the Queen-Empress.

"(2.) To print or publish anything, which will tend to intimidate or annoy any one or to advise any one to deliver his property or any valuable security, or anything bearing his seal or signature which may be construed as valuable security to another.

"(3.) To print or publish anything which will tend to threaten an injury to any Government servant, or any other person, or persons under circumstances which afford a reasonable belief that such person, or persons, is or are interested in the said Government servant with a view to make the said Government servant do something or refrain from doing anything which he is legally bound to do, or to obstruct him from the lawful exercise of his functions.

"(4.) To print or publish any anonymous writings in the paper.

"(5.) To print or publish anything which will tend to prejudice the minds of the public against His Highness the Nizam's Government or any of its officers, without due and proper enquiries being made regarding its correctness.

"Should I or any of my representatives or successors print or publish anything contrary to all or any of the above conditions the Government shall be competent to entirely put a stop to my paper, and under such circumstances, my claims, or those of my representatives and successors for any compensation shall be construed as forfeited,—and this shall have nothing to do with those responsibilities which may be imposed upon me or my representatives or successors by the provisions of the laws in force at the time being."

The order of the Home Secretary is being enforced as if the agreement were in existence. If it is intended to put down unscrupulous journalism, the order goes beyond its mark. Respectable journalism suffers too. The measure is but another manifestation of the iron rule of the day.

To keep the Nizam's Government in countenance in its raid against newspapers at it were, the Government of India out-Heroding Herod published in the Gazette of India of June 27, the following order :—

"No. 2651-I.—An order respecting the publication of newspapers and other printed works in places administered by the Governor-General in Council, but not forming part of British India.

Whereas some misapprehension has hitherto existed as to the regulations in force in territory under the administration of the Governor-General in Council, but beyond the limits of British India, with reference to newspapers published within such territory, the Governor-General in Council has been pleased to make the following orders :

1. No newspaper or other printed work, whether periodical or other,

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Bilious affections, with all their concomitant annoyances induced by atmospheric changes, or too liberal diet, should be checked at once, or serious consequences may ensue. When any one finds his ideas less clear than usual, his eyesight dimmed, and his head dizzy, accompanied by a disinclination for all exertion, physical or mental, he may be quite sure that he is in immediate need of some alternative medicine. Let him at once send for a box of Holloway's Pills, a mild course of which will remove the symptoms, and speedily renew his usual healthful feeling. If the bowels be irritable, Holloway's Ointment should be diligently rubbed over the stomach and liver every night and morning.

5. The expression 'Political Agent' has in these orders the meaning assigned thereto by the Foreign Jurisdiction and Extradition Act, 1879, and the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882.

H. M. DURAND,
Secretary to the Government of India."

In interpreting the regulations, the Governor-General in Council makes an irregular regulation which no constitutional Government can sanction. It is despotism pure and simple that can dictate that order. The question is, Can the Government issue such a revolutionary ukase? Places administered by the Governor-General in Council, though not forming part of British India, is British for all practical purposes. The expulsion of the Jews from Russia is not more tyrannical than the wholesale suppression of newspapers in one month in British territory. The feelings of the "politicals" towards newspapers is wellknown. To formally invest them with absolute power is to make over the lamb to the wolf. The regulation, if it is a regulation, is one unattempted yet by any responsible British Governor in these modern—that is, latter-days. What is the reason of the regulation, what its justification? Do not the press regulations in British India apply to territories beyond it administered by the Governor-General in Council? If there be any doubt, why not extend them to such territories? Out-spoken journalism is even a greater necessity for Native States which recognize no law but the will of the rulers than for British Provinces.

The Art of becoming a prophet
Saturday, July 4, 1891.

OUR PROPHETS AND AVATARS.

THE recent agitation, with its Mahapujas and Maidan meetings, has given an impetus to impostures of various kinds. Among others, the trade of playing the part of prophets seems to be reviving with vengeance, after having been paralysed for a time by the spread of Western culture. We have nuisances enough in the Sanyasis and Fakeers of the old type. Now the English-speaking Babu Mahadevas threaten to be the greatest bores, if not positive sources of danger to Society. There may be some who have the moral courage and tact to avoid their visits and, by so doing, to save themselves from being tormented with their endless talk about Yoga, Mâyâ, Âtmagyâna and Ananda. But the influence of their yellow garments and bare feet, combined with their smattering of English, may be productive of an amount of mischief which it is difficult now to fore-cast.

According to a wellknown saying of the immortal Western Pandit whose words of wisdom have been preserved in the account of his life by Boswell, the last refuge of a scoundrel is patriotism. Cynical and misanthropic as the doctrine may seem to be, no body can deny that it has a solid foundation in truth. It is, in fact,

"A rugged maxim hewn from life."

There may have been, and, in the future there may be, true patriots. But the facts recorded in history show that the men who usually play the parts of Hampden and Cromwell are those who have nothing to lose by defying the authorities and by exciting the mob to desperate deeds.

To us it seems that the saying of Dr. Johnson contains only a part of the truth. Patriotism affords no doubt a refuge to scoundrels in some cases. But they are generally indebted more to religion than to politics, for fresh fields and pastures new, and for the means of rehabilitating their character.

The case of the living batch of "divine incarnations" that we now see in the streets of Calcutta, gives rise to the question whether such counterfeits flourished also in times past. According to principles applied in scientific investigations, the state of things in pre-historic times can be known only by inference from what we see in the living present. We have no historical records to prove how the prophets of ancient times managed to have themselves deified. By means of faith we may take it for granted that they were actually deputed from heaven by our merciful God to lead us to light. But is it not possible also that, in some cases at least, even a wolf in sheep's skin successfully attracted round him some followers and made it their interest to extol his powers and to have him worshipped by the people?

The pleadings and tricks of votaries possessing the requisite skill can deify even a block of stone or a piece of wood. Is it then impossible for the chelas and apostles of a living teacher to raise him to the rank of an incarnation of the divinity? For aught we know, a prophet may be born or may drop down direct from heaven. But from what we see of the ways of religious and political leaders, it seems to us that, by proper manipulation and a little jugglery perhaps, a prophet can be made also. Those who are inclined to be guided by their faith may believe in the miraculous genesis of Avatars. But the worldly and matter-of-fact men would rather be disposed to account for the phenomenon by the natural laws of evolution.

India has been the birthplace of prophets and Avatars in every age. Owing, however, to the want of authentic history of our country, very few perhaps have any idea of the extent to which the craze for the honour of deification is ingrained in the nature of the few adventurous spirits among our countrymen. Without meaning any disrespect or blasphemy, it may perhaps be observed with truth that, in a country in which the masses are sunk in ignorance and superstition, religion is the most lucrative and desirable profession. Jesus Christ, Mahomet and Chaitanya have each been feeding, from generation to generation, a much larger number of men than perhaps even the Czar of Russia. The prizes being big, the number of candidates is necessarily large. For one Chaitanya or Nanuk whose name we know, there have perhaps been thousands who have played the same game but not with the same success. The case is the same with our educational seminaries, where we see hundreds of thousands engaged in the pursuit of learning, but the number of those who are ultimately able to achieve success as scholars may be counted on one's fingers. In modern times, the press has become an engine for acquiring power, and here, also we see that the number of unsuccessful ventures is far greater than that of the Delanes and Laboucheres.

The like is the case with the prophets. The game is so difficult that the only wonder is that any one is able to achieve success in it. Like Madame Blavatsky, the rising prophet may be betrayed at any time by one of his own men, and may sink for ever to a level far lower than that of even ordinary humanity. Like that of the uncrowned King of Ireland, the prophet's career may also be cut short by a slight exposure of his private life. A very trifling circumstance may suffice to break the spell for ever.

The difficulties which the prophet has to cope with are not only numerous but are almost insurmountable in their nature. To begin with, he must maintain his character throughout. He must be in harness in season and out of season. But the greatest difficulty lies in selecting his tools—we mean his apostles, disciples and chelas. They must be men who know how to act together—who know the value of the maxim that a divided house can not stand. Like members of a theatrical party, the chelas must be content to act his part whatever it may be, even if it places him in an inferior position with regard to his associates. There are very few men who understand the advantage of so acting together. And it thus happens that even among those who are naturally gifted with the power of leading men, very few can avoid making bad selections in choosing their followers. We wonder how Chaitanya could achieve the amount of success that he did. The reason, perhaps, was that he never made a mistake in selecting his men. Jesus Christ was betrayed by one of his twelve disciples. But with more than thousand followers, Chaitanya never had a traitor or a malcontent in his camp.

To be an object of worship for future times, the prophet must secure the services of panegyrists, historians and apocryphal biographers. The world has perhaps given birth to many more Chaitanyas, Buddhas and Krishnas than we know of. But they had no St. Paul, Vyasa or Brindavan Das to record or sing their exploits, and they have not been able to make any permanent impression.

What the future of our present batch of candidates for prophetship is likely to be, it is impossible to predict. Like the Fakira correspondent of one of our contemporaries, some of them may betray their cloven foot in spite of their sacerdotal dress and ecclesiastical change of names. Some may have to end their days in disgrace. But it is just possible that one or two may successfully maintain their character and, by so doing, rise to the rank of true prophets.

THE POLITICAL PROSPECT IN ENGLAND.

DEAR MR. EDITOR,—You kindly ask me for an opinion as to English politics and social affairs; and I gladly send you an opinion as far as it goes. Can you for a moment suppose that our public affairs are in a healthy state? The "fast" life of London has found some sad expression, of late, in several ways, quite apart from such an insane immorality as that of Captain Verney, who was believed by his friends to be the simplest-minded of men. When the veil was lifted, what a state of things was disclosed! The Daccarat case is even more appalling, as an indication of a sore of great magnitude and from its relation to the throne.

I certainly am not among the assailants of the Prince of Wales, or of the ancient monarchy of my country. But I do wish that the Prince had not been mixed up with this scandal, which has hardly one redeeming feature. That Sir W. Gordon-Cumming was guilty of cheating many people may have been unalterably convinced. But who cares whether such men cheat or not, so long as the nation is not even more polluted by their cheating, than it is by their play? That this evil thing—gambling, with or without cheating—should go to the depths of English life, and that a body of English gentlemen, with the heir to the throne among them, should have acted as spies on a guest exceeds all that ordinary people ever supposed possible, even in gambling. No body supposes that the Prince was a spy—he was in the company of such. The facts are a terrible revelation. And the evil is not lessened by the Lord Chief Justice reserving for his friends seats in the court, as for an entertainment.

Everybody who has an interest,—and what Englishman has not an interest?—in the Prince of Wales is at this moment earnestly wishing him well rid of the gang of betting and racing men. The cry raised is not from professedly religious persons alone, but from all classes of decent people; and in many important cases on purely political and social grounds.

If we pass to the Irish Home Rule Bill we shall find the mania run out for the time. Upon our politicians depends whether it is or is not run out altogether. I do not think that it will be possible to again commit the bulk of the Liberal Party to Irish Home Rule in the commonly understood sense. At the same time there is a wide-spread feeling that in Great Britain, as well as Ireland, the functions of Parliament might well be confined to imperial affairs, committing to Local Assemblies all such subjects as railway bills, and local control of local affairs. I do not think there is a politician anywhere who sees in, what way a Home Rule Bill, such as Mr. Gladstone proposed, and still less such an one as Mr. Parnell and his friends demanded, could be made workable. The demand, broadly before the country, was for disintegration; and that idea no sane man, unless for a sinister purpose, would entertain.

Of Lord Salisbury's Premiership I think there is but one opinion among intelligent men. It has been eminently successful judging it by the ordinary standards of success. Taken either individually or collectively there has rarely perhaps been a cabinet of men of less eminent position in politics. But there are among them three or four very able men, and in Lord Salisbury himself and Mr. Balfour two of the ablest administrators of this generation. The prudence and courage of the Prime Minister in foreign affairs have been most marked, and Mr. Balfour certainly stands alone in our time as a successful Irish Secretary. I am writing this from no party point of view, and with no party object.

Then the Government has stood as a unit. The Premier has not been tormented with this man wanting one thing, and that man another thing, as the condition of personal loyalty. It is hopeless to expect anything like this unity in any possible Liberal Government. Whenever Mr. Gladstone quits the post of Leader his inevitable successor is Sir William Harcourt, who has played hard for the succession; and, what is better, has of late refused to be embroiled in the Irish disputes still rampant. Mr. John Morley, the only recognised competitor of Sir William, lacks almost every quality of successful leadership, save a certain power of speechmaking (not however of the highest order) and a consistency in his political principles.

It would be difficult to convey to Indian readers any idea of the great unpopularity of Mr. Chamberlain among his old friends, the Gladstonian Liberals. They as a rule scout the possibility of even his honesty as a politician. Perhaps the only person who compares with him in unpopularity among old friends is Mr. Caine; but then between Mr. Caine and Mr. Chamberlain there is a wide gulf. The latter is a man of, in many respects, the first order, the former is a man, in many respects, not even of the third order as a public man. That he is honest is undeniable, and as a temperance man he has done great good; but his ability and power are vastly below his ambition; and the place in politics which he would claim for himself certainly is not accorded to him by perhaps one notable politician in the House of Commons.

The real questions which bid fair to go to the vitals of the nation are Labour questions. On these future cabinets will stand or fall. Workmen have not yet felt their feet in political affairs. Time will alter this; and we shall have a new phase in politics. The aristocracy has given way to the plutocracy, and the plutocracy will as surely give way to the proletariat. How the great change which is impending may affect the relations of England and India it is impossible to say. It is a question of the dark future, and one to which past history affords no real clue.

This week the Government have done a thing which shows still more markedly that as far as intelligent men of their Party are concerned, the Toryism of Eldon, Sidmouth, and men of their stamp, is dead. I allude to the Free Education Bill. It is, as a Tory measure, really wonderful. It is not faultless as you will see, but the principle of it involves almost a revolution. The proposal is to allow to each locality ten shillings per head per annum for each child educated from the age of five to that of fourteen, but providing that the children, who must be sent to school at five years of age may be sent at three; not, however, coming under the act till five, and hence not till then being eligible for the grant. This is rather an awkward stipulation, since, as a matter of fact, children are sent to infant schools at a much earlier age than that at which the grant begins.

Then again the grant, which more than covers all the expenses of some towns falls far short of the expenses of others. For instance, Birmingham, which does its splendid educational work at about five shillings per head, will gain five shillings per head, while Manchester which expends in the same work about fifteen or sixteen shillings per head, will lose that amount.

These, however, are small matters, and are subject to amendment. The fundamental fact is that such a Bill has emanated from a Tory Government, and that to the Tories we shall owe it that in all schools where the fees do not exceed ten shillings, education will be free. The 5*d* per week schools will be aided to the extent of 3*d*. It is estimated by Sir W. Hart-Dyke, who has charge of the measure, that two-thirds of the elementary schools will at once become free. I sincerely wish that India could have such a measure and have it honestly carried into effect. Your old official Sir R. Temple you will see approves the Bill generally "while criticising some of its details." Indian ex-officials, however, have small weight in Parliament, unless men of commanding ability, which is rare. They represent vested interests.

AN ENGLISHMAN.

Public Paper.

MANIPUR FIELD OPERATIONS.

Dated Palel, the 13th April 1891.

From---Lieutenant C. J. W. Grant, 12th (Burma) Regiment of Madras Infantry, Commanding Advanced Party, Manipur, To---The Adjutant, 12th Madras Infantry.

I have the honor to submit this my report of operations from 28th March 1891 to 10th April 1891.

In consequence of my telegrams of 27th March 1891, I received orders from the Assistant Adjutant-General, Myingyan, at 10-30, 27th March 1891, to march on Manipur with all speed.

At 5-30 A. M., 28th March 1891, I marched from Tamu, strength as per margin (footnote)*. About four miles a small party of Chins tried to ambush us, but my advanced guard flanked them, and their shots did no harm. They escaped in jungle. Arrived at Lockchau river at 5 P. M., the elephants unable to carry their 600 lbs. faster than 1 mile an hour.

29th March 1891.---Marched at 2 A. M., arriving at Kogaung; signal shots were fired by enemy, who retired over ridge near Tunglebun. About 20 shots were fired at us by Manipuri picket. Arrived at water at 2 P. M., 12 hours' march. Found camp burnt and prepared for defence, but not held. Elephant useless in these hills with over 300 lbs. load.

Marched at 11 P. M., moon rise. Order of march,---Gurkha Light Infantry 10; 12th Burma 30; fighting party,---Gurkha Light Infantry 20; 12th Burma 20; baggage guard and reserve. Found wire cut and twisted across road all along, causing great delay; 8 or 10 shots fired from hills at 12 midnight. Found road blocked by number of trees felled across; impassable for elephants and ponies. The 10 Gurkhas cut away with kukris, while 20 of 12th Burma scrambled over and through for covering party; suddenly heavy fire broke out above, but we were too close under to be hurt; covering party going to right front took enemy on their left flank, and after few shots we rushed them. But the Manipuri sepoys were too quick for us, and they bolted into thick jungle, and we couldn't find them in the moonlight. Found ourselves in a shelter trench 90 yards long commanding the road below. While in trench were fired on from above; rushing up found two small trenches empty. Hunted about, finding three guns, lots of ammunition, and eight or nine rough pharwas, which we took along. Heard what we supposed to be wounded moving in thick jungle below, but it was pitch dark, and found nothing. Found traces of a considerable camp. Enemy must have been all asleep and surprised. Marched on at 1 A. M.

30th March 1891.---Passed deserted Naga village Aimool down to Manipur plain, arriving in sight Palel 6 A. M. Extended fighting party of 40 as company, and advanced over open plain, with high grass here and there. But the Manipuri sepoys retreated after emptying their guns, and we did them little damage; though we pursued for three miles, we couldn't catch them up; only found one sepoy in long grass and a man who stated he was cook to the "Apprai Minga" or "Maja," the member of the Durbar who ranks next to the princes, and who has charge of the country from Manipur to Tamu. He states:---Maja got letter from capital stating 5 British officers and 30 sepoys killed and 2 sahibs and 10 sepoys prisoners of Maharaja; that Mrs. Grimwood had escaped for the present, and that all the British army had fled to Assam; could not say whether or not they had made a stand anywhere; that his Maja had been sent with 6 officers, 35 havildars, and 150 men to stop us coming from Tamu, and these men were in the trenches above Tunglebun (or Tignoban). Marched from Palel at 11 P. M., and made fair pace in moonlight for 4 or 5 miles at foot of hills, and then on to an embankment road across swampy field till 12-30 A. M. on the---

31st March 1891,---when we came to a bridge over a bit of jhil, where an elephant trying to cross got bogged, and we had to go into the water up to our breasts to unload him. Hearing of a track 2 miles back along the foot of hills to east, I sent the elephant back and round by it with 30 men, while we waited till they rejoined us again on the road half a mile beyond the bridge. At 5-30 A. M. came to some villages of the usual Manipur sort, i.e., a good wattle-and-daub thatched house about 30'x20', with 4 or 5 straw huts near surrounded by a wall, ditch, and hedge, about 200 yards by 100 yards or smaller. Sometimes compounds like this stretch for miles 2 or 3 deep along a stream. We met with slight resistance from behind these walls, but soon flanked and passed through. Beyond these compounds an open plain on each side of road 1,000 yards wide. Beyond we saw a bridge burning and a line of hedges stretching away from the bridge to the south-west, the road now running north-west, and country to right of road quite open. We advanced across the plain with two sections, 10 men each, firing line; two sections, 10 rifles each, on flanks in support; remainder (40 rifles) 600 yards behind with baggage. We advanced rapidly to save the bridge, and were met by a heavy fire from the opposite bank of the stream when within 300 yards. Halting and lying down, we opened section volleys, and advanced by alternate rushes to within 100 yards, losing one man. Then the supports reinforced to the flanks, and we all rushed to the bank of the river and poured in a heavy fire on the enemy, who were perfectly concealed on their right behind loopholes and on their left in deep trenches. Then the old firing line dashed into the water, covered by the fire of the support, and to my utter astonishment the enemy began to give way. Some of us went in over our heads in the water and weeds, but others found places with water only up to their chests, and were across and into the enemy's trenches with a splendid dash twenty minutes after their first shot. Our left hunted them from wall to wall, covered by flanking fire from our right, till we crossed five lines of walls and hedges, the enemy making very little stand. On arrival at the further line of walls we rallied, and saw a line of the Manipur sepoys in white jackets and black turbans and dbotis mostly---some in red jackets and white turbans---in full retreat to the hills and villages 1,000 and 800 yards away. The enemy's line was 1½ miles long, and I estimated them at from 800 to 1,000 in number. I did not follow up my advantage, as all my baggage and half my men were on the other side of the river, and 200 or so of the enemy in the villages 800 yard to my right rear; but from what I know of the enemy I might have put aside all caution, and taken the hills 1,000 yards in front with little further expenditure of ammunition. Leaving the 40 men at the line of walls, I went back and put the rear party into the compound at the east corner of the village, carrying the baggage over on the men's heads.

The enemy's loss was 8 shot through the head in the trenches during our advance, 6 bayoneted in the trenches on their left, and 6 shot during their retreat. Our loss---No. 399 Muhammad Hayat shot through the head with a snider bullet; none wounded; I only grazed by bullet, which gave me no trouble. Expenditure of ammunition 1,200 rounds up to date. Spent evening preparing "12th Burma Fort" for defence and clearing field of fire, making abattis, and collected over a ton of dban and five or six chattis of gür, and put men on half ata and dal; told off stations, &c., &c. Night passed quietly; pickets did not fire a shot.

The men's conduct was simply splendid; they required no leading at any time, and paid the closest attention to orders under the hottest fire.

1st April 1891, 6 A. M.---Enemy advancing in force. Sent out 30 men to meet them in front at the line of walls to the picket there. We only fired three shots at a group on the road and dropped two.

* 43rd Gurkha Rifles. 1 jemadar, 30 rifles,---60 rounds per man. 12th (Burma) Madras Infantry. 1 subadar, 50 rifles,---160 rounds per man.

They bolted behind hill and walls. Measured ranges up to 600 yards in front of fort; found blood all about from yesterday's action. Some countrymen from south came, and we called to them, but they only shouted not to burn their houses, and we could get no information. Yesterday I had written a letter to Tamu for reinforcements, but put nothing in it which could help the enemy in event of their capturing it. I sent it by the Apprai Maja's cook, swearing him on a sword, promising him Rs. 20, and telling him that if he did not deliver it, I would kill the other prisoners. They gave him minute directions as to roads. They were released on my return to Palel. I sent him off at dark, and he delivered the letter faithfully, but was captured on return and taken to the Maharaj (Regent), who sent him on to me with the orders to retire on Presgrave, which I got on 9th.

At 3 P. M. on 1st, patrols reporting enemy advancing, we occupied the line of walls 400 yards in front of fort. The enemy opened a hot fire from Martinis, Sniders, and Enfield rifles from a line over a mile long. We reserved our fire till they came to 600 yards, and drove them back with a few volleys at their densest parts. Then from the low hill, 1,000 yards from the line of walls, two guns opened fire,—at first with five common shell, time and percussion fuze, and then with 20 or 25 shrapnel. At first their practice was very good, the first bursting overhead, and the third on striking the wall. Then we got the range by "sound," and concentrated our fire on the guns (muzzle-loading 9 lbs rifled guns), and in 30 minutes both guns retired: only one turned up again on the further hill, 1,500 yards from the line of walls, and made wilder practice, only running the gun up to the crest to fire and wasting no time over laying, as the Martinis reached them there. All this time the enemy kept up a hot fire, but were always driven off on reaching 600 yards. At dark they were working round to our left flank, and when nearly quite dark I closed in on our fort, the men being sent back one by one, 50 yards between each, not one doubling. The behaviour of the men, all but ten of mine eight months' recruits, and the Gurkhas, also very young soldiers, was simply magnificent. I cannot express my admiration of them.

The scream and bursting report of the shells was most unpleasant to me, who knew the small loss they could inflict, but the men, who must have had a greatly exaggerated idea of their powers, paid most careful attention to their aim, and obeyed all directions as to sighting and wind when firing on the guns.

We spent the night behind our walls in the main fort, the enemy keeping up a long range fire till 2 A. M., which was not replied to. We tied white rags to our foresights, but the enemy did not close.

2nd April 1891.—At 3 A. M. in moonlight we commenced work, strengthening position with large dhan baskets of earth, ration-sack and pillow-case sand-bags, and making abattis, and continued hard at work making cover for transport till evening. At 3 P. M. I went with the patrol to the line of walls. Enemy all in position. Saw a man signalling with white flag. Went to meet him with white flag. Turned out to be a Gurkha of the 44th Gurkha Light Infantry with letter from babu prisoners imploring me to retire or they would all be killed. If I retired, prisoners would be released and sent to Cachar. Answered that if all the prisoners who wished to go with me were given to me, I would retire to Tamu. Asked for letter from Maharaj. Returned saying Maharaj would send letter. Said till I got letter I would not attack.

3rd, 4th, and 5th.—Negotiated for prisoners, I demanding at least all Gurkha prisoners, saying as all babus and civilians wouldn't come to Burma, they could go to Cachar and Gurkhas must come with me, and I would never retire empty-handed. Then they said all the prisoners had started for Assam and I must retire. Refused to retire without a Maja (or one of the four wazirs) as hostage for prisoners. They offered me a subadar as hostage. Refused, demanding Apprai Maja (whose flag we captured at Thobal), who is in charge of country from Manipur to Tamu. Two babus of Manipur came to meet me. Said 500 lbs. of ata and 50 lbs. of dal and ghi were ready for me to take. Refused to take without the hostage. Said I had lots to eat. Babus said Samoan Juha, Regent's fourth brother, had commanded Thobal when I took it, and third brother, Senapati, Commander-in-Chief, commanded attack on 1st. That 800 men had held Thobal on 31st and 2,000 attacked on 1st, and I had killed four of their gunners.

6th April 1891.—On 6th the enemy attacked at dawn, and I closed in on my fort, which by now was greatly strengthened. At 8 A. M. their shell fire ceased, and enemy had gained the hedges and walls from 1 to 200 yards on my front and left. Crept out with ten Gurkhas, and attacked the enemy on my left on their right flank and drove them off with loss, killing six or seven, and bolted back to fort without loss. At 11 A. M. crept out to front under my right wall and up to enemy with one havildar and six Gurkhas, and, after driving enemy from one hedge, found a party of about 60 in a corner behind a wall 20 yards off. After a very hot two minutes we got to wall, and drove them out of their corner, leaving ten or eleven dead. A double-barrelled gun with buck-shot most effective on their heads as they showed up to fire. Then we bolted in again, but the 43rd Gurkha Light Infantry havildar, Gunbir Rai, had his hand shot through; no other loss to us.

I now found we had only 50 rounds per man left and the Gurkhas only 30, and we had to submit to a purely passive defence. The men lay down behind walls, one in every six keeping a watch. I gave orders that not a man was to fire till the enemy were half way across our field of fire, but they preferred to remain behind hedges, where they kept up their fire till dark; but it was very wild, and they dare not show themselves to aim after one or two crack shots had hit their heads. At dark they retired, and we had a quiet night in the trenches.

I think it was after 12 noon on this day that the men really showed the best soldier's qualities, lying down to be fired at (and the few men on two sides were exposed to reverse fire), and one of each six taking his half hour's watch more or less exposed.

7th April 1891.—Enemy all retired behind hill, but large parties seen going to our right rear: busy strengthening defences.

Our loss on 6th—Havildar Gunbir Rai, 43rd Gurkha Light Infantry, wounded by rifle; Private Miran-bakhsh, 12th Burma Regiment, wounded by shell (slightly); 1 driver by bullet slightly; 1 pony killed, 2 wounded, and 2 elephants wounded (one severely and one slightly).

On 7th with patrol found in "11 A. M. counter-attack corner" 20 Martini cartridges and one 500 express cartridge and lot of blood, but no bodies.

9th April 1891.—At 12 noon the enemy brought out a white flag, and, putting a letter on a stick on road, retired. Brought it in and found orders to retire on Presgrave forwarded by the Maharaj. Started at 7 P. M., bringing away 20 enemies' guns and rifles, but we drowned about 1,000 rounds of their ammunition, all of Government make. An awful night, dark except for lightning, pouring with rain, but perfect for retreat. At 2 P. M. met Presgrave with 75 men and nine boxes ammunition coming to Thobal without kits or rations. We returned to Palel, not reaching there till 6 A. M., about one mile an hour, but unmolested, and having brought off everything.

I recommend every man of the party for the Order of Merit. I think they have all well earned it, not only in attack and defence, but also by their cheerfulness in the fort for 13 days on 6 days' rations and every man on guard every night. I never heard a complaint or doubt; they only asked to be allowed to take those guns, and they would have done it with another 100 rounds a man, all to make a "name" for regiment.

A great reason of our success was the fact of the enemy wearing white coats. Every movement could be seen from afar and anticipated. Their musketry is, of course, contemptible.

A PRACTICAL VIEW OF THE AGE OF CONSENT ACT.

By Nawab Abdool Luteef Bahadar, Secretary, Mahomedan Literary Society of Calcutta.

Now that the Age of Consent Act has been passed by His Excellency the Viceroy in Council, and as there is every likelihood of its provisions not being sufficiently well understood by the Mahomedan Community in general, and by the ignorant Mahomedans in particular, owing to the use of technical legal phraseology in the drafting of the Act, it seems to the Committee of Management of the Mahomedan Literary Society of Calcutta, to be highly desirable that the object and intention of the Government in passing this Act, as well as its scope and the manner in which it is to be administered by the Criminal Authorities, should be laid down on paper in the clearest and easiest language possible, for the information and instruction of the Mahomedan population, and more particularly of such of them as are not conversant with legal technicalities.

2. The Committee are of opinion, that such a course will be highly beneficial to members of their community, inasmuch as it will show to them distinctly what action on the part of a Mahomedan husband towards his young wife has been made by the recent legislation, a heinous criminal offence of no less enormity than the offence of rape, and punishable with the same heavy punishment.

3. It is hoped, that they will thereby be put on their guard against committing, or allowing the commission of, an act, which they have hitherto been accustomed to think lawful and innocent, but which has now been made into a heinous offence; and that they will thus be saved from getting into serious troubles involving the honor of their families and the sanctity of their Zenana,—from mere ignorance of the true scope and nature of the recent legislation, and of the important change made in an already existing provision of the Indian Penal Code.

4. The Committee feel that such a measure on their part will be useful in another direction also, inasmuch as a good deal of agitation has been going on for the last few months in various parts of India, raised by men insufficiently acquainted with the requirements of the Mahomedan Religion, and misrepresentations have been widely circulated to the effect that the Law passed by the Government is intended or calculated to interfere with the Mahomedan Religion.

5. A clear exposition of the Mahomedan Law and Religion on the point in question, emanating from the Committee of the Mahomedan Literary Society, will, it is confidently hoped, succeed in disabusing the Mahomedans of any suspicion of interference by Government with their Religion, that may have been raised in their minds by such misrepresentations.

6. There is further, a wide-spread, but not entirely groundless, apprehension even among the respectable classes, that maliciously inclined individuals, inimical relatives and neighbours, and corrupt Police-men, will find in this Act a very convenient instrument for giving annoyance and trouble to, bringing irreparable disgrace upon, and extorting money from, the victims of their hatred or avarice, by means of false and unfounded charges against the younger members of families.

7. The Committee think that with a view to allay such apprehensions, it would be useful, to give a full explanation of the safeguards prescribed by His Excellency the Viceroy in Council, for the proper administration of the provisions of the new Law by the Criminal Authorities, which will assuredly minimise, if they do not entirely defeat, the machinations of the evil-disposed persons above alluded to.

8. Having the above points in view, the Committee of the Mahomedan Literary Society beg to address the following observations to their co-religionists throughout India; and they will be amply repaid if even the slightest help be thereby afforded to the parties addressed.

9. As regards the first point. There has already been a provision in the Indian Penal Code, passed more than 30 years ago, that a man having sexual intercourse with his own wife, with or without her consent, she being under the age of ten years, shall be considered guilty of the offence of rape, and shall be liable to transportation for life, or to rigorous or simple imprisonment for ten years.

10. From this it follows that, under the Penal Code, a man having sexual intercourse with his own wife, with or without her consent, if she is above ten years of age, shall not be considered to have committed the offence of rape. But the Act that has just been passed, in amendment of the above provision in the Penal Code, raises the age of consent from ten to twelve years, and provides that a man having sexual intercourse with his own wife even with her consent, shall be considered to be guilty of the offence of rape, if the wife be of any age under twelve completed years. This is all the change that has been made in the Law.

11. It having been ascertained from various sources, that in some parts of the country, husbands co-habit with their wives before they have attained to the age of twelve years, and even before they have arrived at puberty,—the result of such intercourse being in many cases to cause injury to the health and even danger to the life of the girls, and to generate internal diseases which make them miserable throughout their lives; and such a state of things having come to the notice of Government, they have considered it their duty to put a stop to it; and this is the object of the present legislation.

12. The Law does not interfere with the age at which a girl may be married; but simply prohibits sexual intercourse with her by her husband before she is twelve years of age.

13. It is therefore incumbent upon all husbands, and their guardians (if they are very young and inexperienced lads,) to be very careful that sexual intercourse does not take place until the girl-wife has passed the age of twelve years. It will also be the duty of the guardians of the girl-wife not to allow her husband to co-habit with her, until she has attained that age.

14. Such parents and guardians of the husband or wife, as may help in, or instigate the consummation of marriage, before the wife has reached twelve years of age, will be punishable as abettors to the offence of rape.

15. The above is simple and clear enough, and if the same precaution is now exercised with girls who have not attained twelve years of age, as has hitherto been exercised in respect of girl-wives who had not arrived at the age of ten, it will be sufficient for the purposes of carrying out the provisions of the Law recently passed. On the other hand, if such intercourse shall still, in spite of its having been prohibited by Law, take place, through the neglect or indifference of the guardians of the husbands or of the girl-wives, they will all be involved in endless trouble and expense, and in everlasting disgrace.

16. In the second place, misrepresentations in various shapes have been made by men, ignorant either of the scope of the Act or of the requirements of the Mahomedan Religion, to the effect, that the above change in the Law will interfere with the provisions of the Mahomedan Religion.

17. Nothing could be further from the aim and object of the new Act than such a result. The Mahomedan Law distinctly sanctions consummation of marriage, only when the wife has reached puberty, and has besides attained such physical development as renders her fit for sexual intercourse,—and it is not imperative upon a Mahomedan husband to consummate marriage with his wife, when she is under the age of twelve years. Even in those rare cases in which the wife attains to puberty and the necessary physical development before the age of twelve, a Mahomedan husband may, without infringing any canon of the Mahomedan Ecclesiastical Law, abstain from consummating his marriage with her, until she attains that age.

18. The above will clearly shew, that the Act recently passed by the Legislature, does not, in any way, interfere with the Mahomedan Religion, and no Mahomedan husband will be considered to have committed a sin, if he abstains from consummating marriage with his wife, before she is twelve years of age.

19. As for the last point, namely, the apprehension that respectable families will be disgraced and the privacy of their Zenanas violated by false and vexatious charges, preferred by malicious individuals, and by the investigations undertaken by corrupt Police officers, it will be sufficient to point out that His Excellency the Viceroy, with that solicitude for the well-being of the people of India, for which he is distinguished, has been pleased, only one week after the passing of the new Act, to issue a Circular letter, in which the Local Governments are distinctly enjoined to “give such instructions to the Magistrates of Districts as will ensure that the provisions of the Act are applied with due care and caution.”

20. It is also prominently mentioned in the Circular, that “the Government of India have full confidence in the discretion with which the experienced officers (namely, the Magistrates of Districts) to whom alone jurisdiction to enquire and commit for trial is left by the Law, will carry out its provisions, and are convinced that no action will be taken except on really trustworthy information, brought by responsible persons, who may reasonably be presumed to have knowledge of the facts they assert to have occurred, and that no mere suspicion will be held sufficient to set the Law in motion.”

21. The Circular moreover invites attention to the wellknown provision in the Code of Criminal Procedure, “which allows a Magistrate, when he sees reason to distrust the truth of a complaint made before him, to postpone the issue of process, and either enquire into the case himself, or order a local investigation by some officer subordinate to him.” The Act (the recently passed Enactment) “allows such an investigation by a Police Officer not lower in rank than an Inspector; but the Government of India think it would be preferable, when an investigation has to be made in a case to which the Act applies, that it should be entrusted to some experienced Native Magistrate. The Governor-General in Council believes that this course would be more agreeable to the feelings of the people, than that, in so delicate a matter as this, the enquiry should be conducted either by the Magistrate of the District himself, if a European, or by any Officer of Police.”

22. The Government of India have, in addition to the above safe-guards, specially enjoined the Commissioners of Divisions to watch the working of the Act, and to impress upon the District Magistrates the necessity of applying the Law with the utmost care and discrimination.

23. It will be seen from the above, that His Excellency the Viceroy has done all that was possible under the circumstances to provide safe-guards in order to prevent the abuse of the Act. In fact it has been strictly laid down, that no action will be taken under the Act except on really trustworthy information brought by responsible persons, and by no means on mere suspicion; that such cases shall be enquired into and committed for trial by Magistrates of the Districts alone; that in case of the necessity of a local or preliminary enquiry, it will be conducted not by the District Magistrate, if a European, or by a Police Officer, but by an experienced Native Magistrate.

24. The above safe-guards are, in the opinion of the Committee, quite adequate to assure the public that they need have no fear that they will be unjustly molested or dishonored during the investigation of such cases.

25. There remains one matter which, in the opinion of the Committee, requires to be prominently noticed. There is an apprehension that in cases under the Act, the girl-wives will be liable to be subjected to personal examination by Medical Officers, for the purpose of ascertaining their ages or the fact of intercourse having taken place,—and that perpetual disgrace will thus be brought upon them and upon their families.

26. To show the groundlessness of such an apprehension it is sufficient to mention, that it has already been authoritatively laid down by the Calcutta High Court, that no Medical Officer (even under a Magistrate's order) has the power to examine the person of any female, unless she herself gives her consent to his so doing. It will thus be seen that there is no fear of the forcible examination of the person of any girl-wife in any prosecution under the new Act.

27. The Committee of the Mahomedan Literary Society are confident that the above exposition of the scope and object of the Act, and of the manner in which it will be administered, should satisfy their co-religionists, that they need not fear any disagreeable results from its introduction or enforcement.

THE CAPTIVE LADIE.

By THE LATE MICHAEL MADHUSUDAN DUTT.

CANTO FIRST.

The star of Eve is on the sky,
But pale it shines and tremblingly,
As if the solitude around,
So vast—so wild—without a bound,
Hath in its softly throbbing breast
Awak'd some maiden fear—unrest:
But soon—soon will its radiant peers
Peep forth from out their deep-blue spheres,
And soon the ladie Moon will rise
To bathe in silver Earth and Skies,
The soft—pale silver of her pensive eyes.

'Tis eve—the dew's on leaf and flow'r,
The soft breeze in the moon-lit bow'r,
And fire-flies with pale gleaming gems
Upon their fairy diadems,
Like winged stars now walk the deep
Of space soft-hushed in dewy sleep,
And people every leaf and tree
With beauty and with radiancy:—
There's light upon the heaving stream,
And music sweet as heard in dream,
And many a star upon its breast
Is calmly pillow'd unto rest,
While there—as on a silver throne—
All melancholy—veil'd—alone—
Beneath the pale Moon's colder ray—
The Bride of him—the Lord of Day,*
In silence droops—as in lone bow'r
The love-lorn maid at twilight hour!
She looks not on the smiling sky—
The wide expanse blue, far and high,
She looks not on the stars above
Throbbing like bosoms breathing love—
Nor lists she to the breeze so gay,
Which whispers round in wanton play,
And stirs soft waves of starry gleam
To wake her from that moody dream!

The moon-light's on yon frowning pile,
But oh! how faint and pale its smile!
Methinks yon high and gloomy tow'r
And battlement and faded bow'r,
With awful hush and solitude
Have chill'd its soft and joyous mood.

And well may moonlight there look pale,
And night-breeze come—but come to wail,

*The water-lily called by the Sanskrit Poets "The Bride of the moon."

For 'tis the scene where sorrow weeps,
And grief her lonely vigil keeps—
Consigned by tyranny to pine
In cruelty's dark, demon shrine,
The donjon's cold and sunless gloom,
Far colder than the silent tomb—
For there the memory of light
Haunts not the sleeper of its night,
With dreams which mock the lightless mood
Of the crush'd bosom's solitude!

The moon-light's on yon frowning pile,
Tho' faint and pale now be its smile,
It lingers on yon gloomy tow'r
And battlement and fountless bow'r,
As one who soothes—tho' all in vain—
The mad and agonizing brain—
Of heart in depth of anguish deep,—
And lingers—tho' it be to weep—
And mingle with the sufferer's sigh
Thine own oh! gentle sympathy!

Yes—rest thee there—thou gentle beam!
And bring from thine own realm some dream,
For yon lone maiden weeping there—
Like thee—the only being fair
Of light within yon donjon's gloom,
Her beauty's cold and darksome tomb!

And there she sits that maiden fair,
In silent sorrow and despair,
As lovely 'midst that scene of gloom
As some sweet flow'r beside a tomb,
Or as some fondly cherish'd dream
Of happiness that could not last,
Brightening with solitary beam
The shadowy regions of the past!

It is a lone and rocky isle,
Where Nature frowns but will not smile;
And save yon castle beetling high
In silent and in gloomy mood,
There's naught e'en sternly woos the eye—
A desert—and a solitude!
How madly all around the stream
Rolls heedless of soft breeze or beam,
Which haunt the gentler streamlets' dream!
And well it may—a wilder shore
Ne'er spread its rugged brow to lave,
Amidst the sleepless water's roar,
Proud Gunga! in thy holy wave!—
And well it may—nor breeze nor beam
E'er lull'd it to a gentler dream:
For if the breeze which softly sings
To flow'rs its wild imaginings,—

While they with dewy, bright tears hail
The viewless bard of whispering tale,
Should ever come to that bleak shore,
"Twill flee when it lists to the waters' roar,
Which hearsely sounds for ever-more ;
Or, if a star e'er sleep on the breast
Of the wave, 'twill savagely break its rest !—

* * * * *

"Tis night—oh !—how I hate her smile,
Which lights the horrors of this isle,
Where like lone captives we must sigh
O'er arms that rust and idly lie—
Far from the scenes where oft the brave
Will meet thee, glory ! or a grave—
Far from the scenes where revels gay
Will chase the darkest cares away—
Far from the scenes where maiden bright
Will steal to list, at fall of night,
To her lover's lute and roundelay,
And like a viewless spirit show'r
Her dewy wreaths of leaf and flow'r,
Love's token—and then swiftly fade,
And vanish like an aery shade !—

"Yon tell me that yon captive lone
Would grace the proudest monarch's throne,
And that from regal bow'rs she came,
And halls whose splendour has no name—
Because she lov'd some chief whose pride
Would stoop not—e'en to win his bride—
To her proud father—for his hand
Could wield as well the warrior brand,
And his the race who ne'er hath shown
Submission to a stranger's throne—
'And ne'er hath lowly bent the knee
To Powers of this wide earth that be !—
I grieve to hear her piteous tale—
And must such cruel fate bewail—
I grieve to hear that maiden fair
Should shed the tear of dark Despair—
And dim the lustre of her eye,
And blanch her cheek's soft—rosy dye—
But why should warrior come to dwell
Like captive in his lightless cell—
Nor list to charger's neigh so shrill
Reechoed far from hill to hill,—
Nor midst the battle's maddening roar—
Nor on wide plains all bath'd in gore,
Wield his bright blade where foe-men throng
To spare the weak—to crush the strong !

"They say the Crescent's on the gales
Which whisper in our moon-lit vales—
They say that Moslem feet have trod
The fanes of him—the Bramin's God—
And that from western realms afar
Fast flows the tide of furious war—
Like torrent from the mountain glen Like lion from his bloody den—
Like eagle from the aery peak
Of skyey mount—and high and bleak !—
What—must we here—on this lone isle—
Watch yon pale Goddess' pensive smile,
Like craven—who will shrink to bleed
E'en for the hero's deathless meed—
And that, too, when perchance her eye
Pale at thy struggles, Liberty !
Or—o'er the warrior's funeral pyre—
His blood-stained bier—and grave of fire !"

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

LAST Saturday, Sir Charles Elliott entertained some of the advanced students of the Calcutta Colleges to a three-hours' river party down the Hughli, on board the steamer Buckland lent for the occasion by the Port Commissioners. The Lieutenant-Governor had a word for each of the young guests, and charming Lady Elliott lent the party a grace beyond the reach of the vulgar sex.

At a Durbar held by Lord Reay at Poona, among those present was a Native Chief, who the day before had been publicly and shamelessly drunk. He was received coldly, and everybody stared at him. The formal ceremonial seemed more than ever trying. It must have been so at any rate to the Indian magnate if he had completely recovered from his mental condition of the previous day. For the great White man at whose bidding they had all come, had kept his eye on him much as some of the lords of the forest do on their intended victims. At length there came a pause,

An awful pause ! prophetic of the end !

Soon the silence was broken by the demand from the Chair addressed to the ill fated Durbari, "Do you like milk ?" The poor fellow could only mutter in reply that he was very fond of the beverage. To which Lord Reay, "Indeed ! Well at all events, if I were you, I should drink lots of it. It is very good for your complaint."

THE other day there arose a water-spout in Ballia, in the N.-W. P. The column formed over the Ganges opposite the Collector's cutcherry. It remained in air for about an hour, and then broke into a shower of rain giving out a number of fish and turtles.

WE are told in Holy Writ what befell the Cities of the plain. The Cities of the Mountains we know have not been spared. Destructive earthquakes can be only occasional visitations. But even in ordinary times, too, when everything is serene, stern Nature's eye seems to be on them and they are undergoing a solitary discipline—an unconscious detraction.

With meteor-standard to the winds unfurl'd,

Looks from his throne of clouds o'er half the world, is being dwarfed. Le Gazette Geographique has discovered that Quito, the highest city on the globe, was 9,596 feet above the level of the sea in 1745 ; in 1800 it had sunk to 9,570 ; in 1831 to 9,567. In 1868, the city's level had been reduced to 9,520 feet above the level of the Pacific. On the whole, the Ecuador's capital has sunk 76 feet in 122 years. Antsana's farm, the highest inhabited spot on the Andes (4,000 feet higher than Quito) is 218 feet lower than it was in 1745.

A BRAHMIN in Bareilly, being in financial difficulties, lost the balance of his mind, ran amok, killed his wife and two daughters and then attempted his own life.

WE are all familiar with the marvels of newspaper enterprise, but the following record shames the great London Press :—

"Mr. Goschen resumed his seat in the House, after his Budget speech, at six minutes to 7 o'clock ; by three minutes to 7 his closing words had reached the office of the Manchester Evening Mail ; and by ten minutes past—or at ten minutes after the right hon. gentleman had concluded his statement—a report of his utterances of the length of about 2,000 words was to be bought in the streets of Manchester for half-a-penny."

THE pretty Amazons are coming to the front. This is by no means unseemly under female dignity. It were still more "pat" had it occurred forty years earlier. A young Peri was on the throne. The Order conferred on Mr. Wood has been followed by the decoration of another hero. This is the wife of Mr. Ronald Ross, author of The Child of Occident. Soon after marriage, Mr. Ross was ordered to accompany the Chin-Lushai Expedition. He could not refuse. His wife, however, boldly came forward to comfort him. He need not suffer the pangs of separation so soon after the honeymoon if he took her with him. She had but just pledged her faith at the altar, and she was ready to go with him to the war with savage men in the heart of the Tropical forest. That was just like the bride whose love had just been crowned in holy union. The bridegroom was match. He behaved like the still warm love yet uncooled in the prose realities of married life. He seized the offer and to alleviate a burden undertook the far more serious burden of a lady on a most difficult march through a wild and unknown country. The wonder is that he was permitted. Now it is all over we can contemplate with a pleasurable excitement the daily, hourly hardships and trials and dangers extending through months of a civilised lady—the only one of her sex—on the perilous journey of the pioneer White warriors. Her courage is beyond question as her devotion is singular. She has just received from the Queen-Empress the Burma medal and clasp, a facsimile, but in miniature, of those sent to the officers who served in the Chin-Lushai Expedition.

Sir Charles scarcely did more than call for her ladyship."

THE Mandolay Herald of the 20th June had a leading article on "Lord Cross and the Native Press" starting with his Lordship's remarks in his late speech at the Dinner given by the Press in London, namely, the freedom of the press was carried to great lengths in India, "but it was better, he thought, that native discontent should find a safety valve than smoulder."

The article concludes thus :—

"We are perfectly aware that there are several native journals published in the English language which can compete, for fairness of thought, moderation of language, and reliability of information, with the leading Anglo-Indian newspapers, but these are so few that in commenting on the native Press they can scarcely be taken into consideration. The vernacular newspapers do the chief mischief. There are vernacular newspapers run for the sole purpose of impressing on the people of India the burdens which are placed on them by the British Government, and in hinting at obscure consequences which will follow if the Government does not alter its policy. We occasionally hear of vernacular newspapers dying from the effects of a prosecution, or of being suppressed when they go beyond the wide margin which the freedom of the Press in India allows, but there are others springing up every day almost and the country is overrun with them. We know of a vernacular paper published in Calcutta and supported chiefly by an Indian Raja which has to keep five or six editors on the Staff as the paper is always represented in jail. Without infringing the freedom of the Press we think something could be done to keep the vernacular newspapers within the bounds of legitimate criticism. Those native journals which have some influence among the people of the country should join together to raise the tone of the native Press and warn the people of India against mischievous agitators and unscrupulous misleaders of the public. Lord Cross may not always treat the subject with humorous indifference."

THE Indian Daily News of July 8 writes the following charming leader on our remark in connection with the late Municipal Loan :—

"Many of the citizens rejoice over the seemingly good credit of the city, in the fact that over one hundred and twenty lakhs of rupees were offered to the Municipality, when only twenty were required. There is at least one local philosopher who heaves a sigh over the melancholy fact. From his point of view we are not prepared to say that there is not room for contention. The sage who presides over the destinies of Princes and Peasants does not see matter for rejoicing in the fact that there is so much money available. He says :—'It is a melancholy fact, though. It means that the market is flush of cash. In other words, there is money without occupation. We have money but no enterprise. There are fifty industries which are starving for want of capital. There are hundreds of obvious ways of employing capital to advantage. Under the circumstances, it is little short of feminine timidity and unfamiliarity with business to reserve one's money for the accommodation of the State or of stateley Corporations, and to be content with the usance granted by them. The Europeans, too, are affected by the universal apathy.' This is not an empty, unmeaning lamentation. If the city were one of poverty, people would have no difficulty in understanding its bearing. It would mean that whatever the will to do, there was paralysis of action for lack of means. In such cases people could only wing their helpless hands and weep for the good they might do. In the present case the opposite conditions seem to prevail. There are ample means : money which 'makes the mare to go' is powerless to move the will that is content to be fed from the Government or Municipal table with about four per cent. This spirit prevails while possible industries are kept out of existence or starved into unprofitableness by the want of enterprise which made Carthage and Venice, which has made London and New York and the many proud cities that dot the world, and vie with each other in wealth and magnificence. There are fifty industries starving for want of capital. This should not be in a place which can tender its millions for a wretched, but placid four per cent. rather than use it with the energy and enterprise that would yield ten. There are thousands of hands waiting for employment that these industries would furnish ; yet they remain idle or listless because there is no spirit to employ them. There are hundreds of ways of employing capital to advantage, says our philosophic friend. And yet they are all neglected. With examples before them of how men of energy rise from and above most adverse circumstances to positions of wealth, honour, and influence, whose success should be an inspiration, none of these possible ways of employing capital and the physical resources of the country is adopted, and all are charmed out of consideration even by the sweet simplicity of the four per cents. The assured usance seems to satisfy, while a much higher one fails to tempt because it may require some effort or involve some risk. These are not the considerations that founded Liverpool, or built Chicago or Melbourne. It was not this spirit that founded the commercial cities which have in turn made nations great. Yet we are told that the Bengalee has a genius for trade. And who can doubt it, whether he sees the boxwallah in the street as a universal provider, or sees the way in which some of the few merchant princes—albeit somewhat hampered by caste restrictions—demonstrate the capacity of trade when carried on correctly. Why, with idle millions lying in the banks, are the fields left to primitive culture ; water that would enrich them allowed to run to waste ; rivers unconcerned that might yield plentiful harvests of food ; mines left unopened and much of nature's prodigality allowed to run to waste ? Why is all this ? There is something wrong. The aspirations of the people are not so much crushed as wrongly directed. Instead of being turned to practical objects, they rush after delusions and imagine vain things."

By the bye, what of the Native Railway of our contemporary Hope ? Has it got the money it wanted ?

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

As previously announced, the Lieutenant-Governor left Calcutta on the 9th for his two months' tour. We published the programme in our issue of the 27th June.

THE last Calcutta Gazette announces the acting appointments of two natives—both belonging to the Statutory Civil Service—as District Judges—Kumar Gopendra Krishna Deb as District and Sessions Judge of Nuddea and Mr. Kedar Nath Roy as Additional District and Sessions Judge of Bhagalpur. What a gracious Providence ! Both these officers have been hounded out of their offices at the Presidency by a meddlesome District Chief who has queer notions of criminal justice and who believes it his mission to propagate them. This temporary lift relieves their wronged souls and maintains their public reputation.

THE Regulations respecting the examination of candidates for the Civil Service of India to be held in August 1892 are published in the Gazette of India of July 4. No fewer than 32 persons will be selected, if so many shall be found duly qualified : viz., 7 for the Lower Provinces of Bengal (including Assam); 14 for the Upper Provinces of Bengal (including the Punjab, Oudh, and the Central Provinces); 2 for Burma; 5 for Madras, and 4 for Bombay. A candidate must be a natural-born subject of Her Majesty and his age above twenty-one years and under twenty-three years on the 1st April 1892. He must, besides, have a good physical constitution and good moral character. By the bye, how will the last condition be tested? how can moral character be determined? It is a useless demand which is not by any means harmless. It is indeed most harmful. Without being any protection against the admission of undesirable candidates, it promotes the perjury of certificates.

THE Lieutenant-Governor has directed that Collectors appointed or declared by the Civil Courts to be guardians of the person or property, or both, of minors shall, in all matters connected with the guardianship of their wards, be subject to the control of the Board of Revenue as Court of Wards for the territories under his administration.

It has been further ordered that

When any part of the property described in a petition under section 10, sub-section (1) of the Guardians and Wards Act VIII of 1890, is land of which the Court of Wards could assume the superintendence, the Civil Court shall cause the notice prescribed in sub-section (1) to be also served on the Collector in whose district the minor ordinarily resides, and on every Collector in whose district any portion of the land is situate, and the Collector may cause the notice to be published in any manner he seems fit.

When an officer of the Government, as such officer, is appointed or declared to be a guardian by the Civil Court, the same fees shall be payable to the Government out of the property of the Ward as are chargeable to estates managed by the Court of Wards, namely, the general management rate, the treasury rate, the audit-fee, and the Legal Remembrancer's fee.

SIR Henry Harrison having taken leave and resigned the Chairmanship of the Burial Board for the Town and Suburbs of Calcutta, Mr. H. Lee, C.S., has been nominated by the Lieutenant-Governor to be the Chairman of that Board. But is not the Chairman of the Calcutta Corporation bound by law to devote his whole time to the duties of his office, except when he is appointed a Port Commissioner or a member of the Bengal Legislative Council? It is doubtful, therefore, that Mr. Lee can be Chairman of both the Municipal and the Burial Boards at the same time, and pass legal orders as Chairman of the Burial Board.

THE new zeal for expansion of the Volunteer movement is showing itself in reorganization. To begin with, the Presidency Volunteer Reserve Battalion has been converted into an active Volunteer Corps and separated from the Administrative Battalion, Presidency Volunteers, under the new designation of "The Presidency Volunteer Rifle Battalion."

THE provisions of Chapter II of the Inland Steam-vessels Act, 1884, have been made not to apply to steam-vessels which do not ply for hire for passenger traffic, or which, though plying for hire for passenger traffic, are not capable of carrying more than 12 passengers. We have so many of these Liliputian launches running about our waters at all hours that it was time for them to be placed fully under the law.

AT a recent meeting of the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce, it was admitted that the importation of Indian cotton into Liverpool had been stopped on account of its adulteration. A feeling was also expressed that something should be done to restore the reputation of the Indian produce. Is not a Cotton Frauds Act in operation in Bombay? We know one was passed in the Viceroy's Council in Lord Lawrence's time. What has been the effect of that measure? If law can help in the matter, and the Act is imperfect, let it be altered. But both the Upper India Chamber of Commerce and the Bombay Cotton Trade Association deprecate legislation. They seem not to consider it desirable in principle, nor conducive to the effect intended. The Bombay Association have just passed a Resolution requesting the Government to organise the distribution of good local seed in large quantities at cost price, or even below that, or, if necessary, gratis, in order to induce the rayyet to procure his seed from the Government depôts.

MR. Justice Norris has encountered a windfall of fortune. Our readers may remember the suit against the Agra Bank for Rs. 15,000, the value of a cheque drawn by Messrs. Macneill & Co. upon the Bank in favor of Messrs. Lall Chand Kanyeram or their order. The cheque was presented for encashment but the amount though paid by the Bank was not received by the drawee. The Bank contended that it had paid Sewlall, the durwan of the drawee, who had presented it, whereas the durwan denied receipt of any money on the cheque. Originally, Mr. Justice Norris decreed the suit against the Bank, but the High Court in appeal, reversing that decree, decided in favor of the Bank. The matter was then taken up to the Privy Council. The Judges there were of the same opinion with Mr. Justice Norris. There was no point of law involved in the case. The question was one of fact only. After stating the case and the evidence on both sides, Sir Richard Couch, on behalf of the Council, said that "Mr. Justice Norris, who tried the case, said that Sew Lall gave his evidence in a manner which impressed him most favourably, his answers were straightforward and to the point, he showed no sign of prevarication, and he was unshaken in cross-examination. Of Mohendro (the poddar of and the chief witness for the Bank) the learned Judge said he did not believe him; he appeared to him to have got up his story and rehearsed his part. Their lordships could not agree with the learned Judges who heard the case on appeal, that the alternative was simply whether the bank officers, or some of them, appropriated the money or Sew Lall had made a misstatement when he was not paid. There was another possible alternative—viz., that by mistake or inadvertence one of the poddars had paid the wrong person, and that the bank officers who might at first have thought that they had paid Sew Lall persisted in saying that they had. Their Lordships were of opinion, upon a full consideration of the evidence, that the decree of Mr. Justice Norris should not have been reversed and they would humbly advise her Majesty to reverse the decree of the Appellate Court, to dismiss the appeal to that Court with costs, and to affirm Mr. Justice Norris's decree. The respondents would pay the costs of the appeal."

TWO eminent Native gentlemen of the Madras Presidency have within the week, been promoted to the highest position in the judicial line. One of them, the Hon'ble Mutuswamy Iyer, senior Puisne Judge of the Madras High Court, has been appointed by the Governor to officiate as Chief Justice of Madras, during Sir Arthur Collins's absence on leave to England. The other, Mr. Thimboi Chetty, the able Judge of the High Court of Mysore, who had long been officiating for the Chief Justice of that Court, who was on leave has been confirmed in his officiating appointment by His Highness the Maharaja of Mysore.

The former, as is wellknown, is a Brahman who has risen to the highest place obtainable by Natives of India, by dint of intellect and exertion. His success has been brilliant, and his learned judgments are the admiration of the bar in England as well as India. He has kept the manners of his country and the faith of his forefathers, and is looked upon as one of the leaders of the orthodox Hindoo community of Southern India. While the latter has a very high reputation as an accomplished lawyer, and his lucid decisions in difficult cases are consulted with profit even by the Judges of the Madras High Court. Those who know him and his superior qualification and rectitude of character are of opinion that he is the fittest man to fill with credit the post of Prime Minister to His Highness the Maharaja of Mysore. He is by persuasion a Roman Catholic but of the Caste Christian class. Although a Christian by faith, he observes certain rules of caste prevalent among the Hindoos, whereby he is precluded from eating and drinking with the ordinary Christians. It was in consideration of these caste rules, which he religiously follows that the poor man was prevented from sending his son to England for the purpose of studying for the Bar. He is very simple in his habits wears a dhotee, a broadcloth English coat, a Madrassee turban, and Deccan shoes, but no stockings or socks, or drawers.

MR. Gopal Vinayak Joshi, of Poona, was publicly baptised at the Sangam. He had for some time before accepted Christianity as the true religion, but the formal ceremony was delayed to the end of June last. Firm in his faith, he at length allowed himself to be exhibited as a neophyte by the Rev. Mr. Taylor. Mr. Joshi, however, wished to retain his sacred thread and the sandal mark on the forehead as insignia of his social position and as fixing his origin, but they were objected to as Heathen symbols and involving idolatry and he formally eschewed them both at the conversion. It was but submission to the pressure of the reason—not the resolution of the heart. Since then he has resumed both, claiming still to be a Hindu.

although accepting Christ as his Saviour. He is more than a "Brahmin Christian." He is both Hindu and Christian. In deference to his aged mother, he lives on vegetable diet, and on these without recourse to any cookery. He has not yet sat at the same dinner table with the missionaries or other Christians. We are glad to find the Mahratta, which had no quarter for those who supported the Age of Consent Bill, advising the Hindu community to look upon Mr. Joshi as a brother and not to persecute him. At the baptism there arose a question on the devolution of the property of the forsaken Brahmanic string. The officiating Poorahit, Taylor Bhutto, claimed it as his perquisite of office, but the friend to whom it had been made over would not surrender his right.

Whatever may be the case in Poona and the Mahratta country, it is not unusual to see farther down native Christians proud of their position in Hindu society. There are what are called "Caste Christians." Gopal Vinayak Joshjee would seem to go beyond that by no means irrational phenomenon. He essays the impossibility of combining the two systems as religious. Neither, we are afraid, will submit to his Chemistry.

THE Press in this country is not very particular about the quality of its casual correspondence. Otherwise, how could the article on the Native Press undersigned by an unknown native name, which appeared in the Statesman a week or so ago, find admittance into the leading page in all the dignity of attractive typography? There is nothing in the political philosophy of the writer. There is scarcely coherency in meaning in his discourse. His show of erudition could scarcely have imposed upon our contemporary. According to him, the censorship of the press is the cause of Nihilism in Russia. Having disposed of the Czar and all the Russias in one word, he takes a leap to Italy and the past and vaults back in the same breath to more recent times, all in one remarkable sentence, to wit:—

"The first seeds of discontent were sown in Italy when Gregory XIII gagged the press by a particular Bull, under the name of minantes, and centuries afterwards all Europe was shaken with the convulsion which followed."

It would be curious to hear from this learned Theban a lecture on the nature, condition and position of the press in the time of Gregory XIII. Newspapers of a sort existed in Italy, the earliest civilised country in Modern Europe, before they were introduced into England. But surely Gregory XIII. had no newspaper at Rome to gag, nor, for that matter, any Press in Christendom to frighten with his bull or to lead his ass of a cardinal minister of the Interior to bray at. The statement is a gratuitous calumny, against the enlightened Pontiff. The earliest date of Italian journalism is 1570, of the Venetian Gazette, a copy of which is preserved in the British Museum. At that time Gregory XIII. had scarcely been two years on the Papal Chair. He must have attacked the institution in embryo! The whole thing is absurd, with the seeds of discontent sown in the 16th century and centuries afterwards all Europe shaking with the convulsion which followed—at a very respectful distance, to be sure! The correspondent's political philosophy is by no means a "hurrygraph," any more than his historic causation. It is a thoroughly Fabian policy—a waiting, not to say wasting game. Says he:—

"It takes centuries for a nation to understand its position, and a still longer time to cut out a programme for itself."

He then goes into the history of journalism in England:—

"The first newspapers started in England, which we may date as far back as the sixteenth century, were mere vehicles of malice. The English Mercurie was the earliest newspaper started in England by Barleigh in the reign of Elizabeth, to prevent the danger of false reports, by publishing true information."

All that may have been of some relative value in the Gregorian era but is worse than trash at this time of day. It embodies the information of our grandfathers, but the world has moved considerably ahead. The 16th century was not the era of the rise of newspapers in England, nor was the "English Mercurie" the earliest of them. It is indeed this fiction of "The English Mercurie" that led to the firm belief in the latter end of the 16th century being the birth-time of the British Press. It was Chalmers, the book-sellers' hack, not the eloquent theologian, who first in his Life of Ruddiman announced the date which long passed current, and still be found in books of reference. This date was fixed on the authority of copies of the "English Mercurie" dated 1588, deposited in the British Museum. Mr. Watts, of the Museum, however, in a Letter to Antony Panizzi, conclusively proved that the said papers are impudent forgeries.

Of the first journalists, he says:—

"The names of Needham, Bukenhead and L'Estrange are known to this day for the violent principles they propagated among the people. It was not till the reign of Queen Anne that any change for the better was introduced in the English press. The Tatler was the first attempt, made by Sir Richard Steele, to introduce literary subjects, but it remained for the chaster genius of Addison to purge away everything savouring of party faction."

The first sentence in the above, as the first sentence in the previous quotation, is a gross calumny against the fathers of the Press. The last shows that the writer does not even know what he is talking about.

THE Press, both in England and India has been for some months past pursuing Lord Lansdowne with report of his ill health and consequent early retirement. Notwithstanding the contradiction by the Pioneer and the Englishman, it has been repeated and reiterated. The circulation of the prejudicial bulletin was so systematic, that it is well that the Viceroy himself has come forward with a clean bill of health. There was a festive gathering at Simla, on July 8, at the renovated rooms of the United Service Club, at which the Viceroy was entertained at dinner. His Lordship took the opportunity to afford the assembled Rakshases ocular demonstration of his innocence of any complaint. The gentlemen present, all excellent devourers, must have been struck by the havoc made by his noble Marquis on the Roast Beef, and the fury of his charge on the dishes all round, and on the well-filled glasses flanking the edibles. He concluded his war with a brilliant speech. He said:—

"You will recollect that about that time rumours were persistently circulated to the effect that my health had broken down, and I was meditating the early abandonment of the office which I have the honour to hold. I was myself quite unconscious of any such intention, or of any necessity for such a step. (Laughter.) In vain, however, did I descend and ascend the steepest khudsm in the vicinity of Simla in order to satisfy myself that my lungs and limbs were in a sound condition. In vain did I test my powers of intellectual digestion by experimenting upon the toughest administration reports. (Cheers and Laughter.)"

"The rumour was repeated from week to week, until at last I was beginning to believe that there might be something in it after all. A suspicion that crossed my thoughts was, therefore, perhaps excusable. One suspicion was that this entertainment might perhaps have been offered me with the idea that it was to be a valedictory banquet, and that the baked meats, which you were going to spread before me, were to be those of my own political funeral. (Laughter.)"

Here is another most felicitous passage:—

"For myself, gentlemen, as you have been good enough to drink my health, let me say what I believe every Viceroy would tell you, as I do, that the strain of his official responsibilities would be intolerable but for the consciousness that he can depend upon the loyal support of the Services, and the feeling that he is surrounded by a body of men whose best energies are at the disposal of his Government. I told you when I rose to return thanks for my health, that I refused altogether to accept the theory that this entertainment was of a valedictory nature, and will venture now to propound a theory of my own, which I much prefer, and which I should like to have your authority for accepting. I find that I have completed almost exactly half of the term of office usually allotted. We have a long tedious journey to make, and it is pleasant to be able to break it at a half-way house. I wish, with your permission, to regard myself as having made a half-way house of the United Service Club upon this most interesting and agreeable occasion. I can assure you that I shall leave its walls greatly encouraged and invigorated by the kindly reception which you have been good enough to offer me. (Loud cheers.)"

The great Dufferin himself would not have disdained to make that speech.

FORTY-FIVE-THOUSAND persons of all sections of the Bombay community petitioned the Governor on the Rajabai Tower Tragedy. The signatures are said to include those of the two Parsi Barons, members of the Panchayet, most of the representative Parsis, some of the prominent Hindus, heads of respectable firms and about a thousand Parsi women. It is a lengthy document of 25 paragraphs which the Bombay papers call the monster petition. The petitioners are not satisfied with the committal of Aslaji. They fear the evidence recorded in the Police Court is not complete for a conviction and that he may escape punishment, thereby rendering a miscarriage of justice possible. They pray therefore that, before the trial takes place, His Excellency in Council will be graciously pleased to take such steps as may be deemed necessary and sufficient to ensure justice in the case against Aslaji by appointing a special and independent commission of inquiry.

The petition is directed against the Police which has earned the just distrust of the community by its conduct in further veiling the mystery without so much as an attempt at elucidating it. Lord Harris, however, is not prepared, at this stage, to agree with the petitioners and to appoint a commission in supersession of the Police. He would await the result of the sessions trial for doing the needful on the subject, and is unwilling to prejudice the trial by any extraordinary enquiry. The Government reply, speaking the true language of British constitutionalism, says, "the memorialists should understand that it is specially the function of Government and of its law officers to determine on the expediency of criminal proceedings, and in the line to be taken with regard to them. Popular interference in such matters has proved at other times and in other countries to be attended with calamitous consequences. In India, where popular judgment is so apt to be misled by prejudices and race feelings, it is particularly desirable that the sphere of reason, mercy and justice, should not be roughly invaded by any impulsive action of popular sentiments." Individuals are as much entitled to protection as communities. It is as much the concern of the Governor to see that Aslaji is not wrongly victimised to appease a popular clamour, as it is his duty to recognize "the necessity for penetrating dark mystery with the light of inquiry, or for the discovery and conviction of any who have perpetrated foul murder." The proper time for any enquiry into the Police in connection with the mystery will be after the trial.

The trial of Aslaji has commenced, the jury being composed of only Europeans.

A MORNING contemporary says that our wellknown townsmen Baboos Preinath Mullick and Bholanath Mullick, the surviving sons of the late millionaire of Bariabazar, Baboo Ram Mohun Mullick, have undertaken to repair the cook house of the Pooree Temple, built by their father about 30 years ago. The announcement is premature. There has only been a talk among the descendants of the late Ram Mohun Mullick, to help in the repair of the cook house but nothing has yet been decided. And as those descendants are very numerous and some of them not in very affluent circumstances, the proposition may fall through unless the wealthier ones take the burden upon themselves.

As for Baboo Bholanath Mullick's setting apart half a lac of Rupees for charitable purposes, our contemporary underrates the bequest after death. It is not fifty thousand but eighty-six thousand rupees.

THE week's mail has brought the full text of the speech of the Under-Secretary of State for India in reply to the motion of Sir W. Harcourt, on June 16, for further correspondence regarding the Manipur disaster. That speech was not only worthy of Sir John Gorst's great reputation but one which would have done credit to any debater in either House. It was a remarkable effort at special pleading and on the whole a successful one so far as it went. It did not go far enough for his clients, so that he left a rather disagreeable impression at bottom. Sir William asked why the transactions were carried to the point of military expedition without any previous consultation with the Secretary of State in London. Sir John Gorst replied:—

"The only answer to that is that it has been the universal practice of the Government of India, in all except what are considered very important cases, to take upon themselves the responsibility of dealing with Native States without seeking the sanction or the approval of the Secretary of State; and if the sanction of the Secretary of State was not asked for proceeding to Manipur it was because the Government of India and everybody connected with this matter regarded it at the outset as one of very little importance. If there had been no military disaster, and the Senapati had been quietly arrested at Manipur and deported to some other part of India, very likely we should have heard very little of the transaction. (Ironical Opposition cheers.) It is because subsequent events have given an extraordinary significance to everything that previously took place that this matter is made a subject of discussion."

Regarding the plan for the removal of the Senapati and the "mediocrity" argument which raised a discussion in the Upper House, the words of the Under-Secretary are:—

"I do not think either the right hon. gentleman or the people who have criticised this policy have quite appreciated the fact that the removal of the Senapati was entirely a political act. I am aware that the Government of India in their despatches make use of expressions like treachery and rebellion, and accuse the Senapati of moral offences for which they declare their intention to punish him. But that is only the way in which the Anglo-Saxon race are always accustomed to treat criminal conduct in their political opponents. (Laughter.) We are quite accustomed to it in this country. The right hon. gentleman himself frequently addresses large bodies of his fellow-countrymen, and he attributes criminal conduct to my right hon. friend the First Lord of the Treasury and his colleagues—('hear, hear,' and laughter)—and he speaks of their expulsion from this bench, which would be a purely political act, as a matter of punishment. ('Hear, hear,' and laughter.) Whether the Government of India did right to expel the Senapati from Manipur or not, there is the question whether it was expedient that they should exercise that power. We must consider who the Senapati is. He is a man of great ability and force of character, and popular among the people for his generosity, which is one of the highest virtues among Orientals. He was a man, however, of not good moral character. I do not know that we can expect the same standard of morality among Orientals as among the people of this country, but a man who has been guilty of having two slaves beaten to death for stealing is rather worse than the average among even Oriental despots. Lastly, the Senapati is a man of independent character, and he presumed to make revolutions without consulting the Paramount Power. There are two ways of dealing with a man of this sort—one is to depose him from his State, and the other is to use him as an instrument for governing the State. It is quite evident that Mr. Grimwood desired to adopt the latter course. That was a very generous policy, and one which everybody is disposed to sympathise with, but it was a rather risky policy. It is a policy which depends on the Resident obtaining the ascendancy of the Senapati, and not on the Senapati obtaining the ascendancy of the Resident. Between the two powers there is a great difference, for one is temporary and the other is permanent. Mr. Grimwood would remain only a few years at the outside in Manipur, while the Senapati would be there after Mr. Grimwood left, and might possibly obtain an ascendancy over Mr. Grimwood's successor, if not over Mr. Grimwood himself. For that and other reasons Governments never have allowed or encouraged such a policy being adopted. They have always discouraged independent and original talent, and have always promoted mediocrity. (Laughter.) This is not a new policy. It is as old as the days of Tarquinius Superbus. (Laughter.) In my own time I have known numbers of cases of this kind. I remember thirty years ago how the British Government spent their blood and treasure in the colony of New Zealand for destroying the power of the Maori King instead of governing through his instrumentality. (An hon. member:—'More shame.') And how a few years ago the British Government destroyed the power of Cetewayo in South Africa as soon as he became no longer a counterpoise to the Transvaal. Again, I can give other examples nearer home of the same kind of policy. Why did the British Government expel Arabi from Egypt? Because he was thought to be dangerous to the peace of the country. I can give now even a closer parallel on the part of the Government of which the right hon. gentleman was a distinguished member. Why did you arrest Zebher Pasha and intern him in Gibraltar? You took him as an act of political necessity, and would not permit him to exercise his influence in the Soudan, although General Gordon had asked that he should be there. The Government of India, in refusing Mr. Grimwood the assistance of the Senapati, acted exactly in the same way as you did in refusing Zebher to enable General Gordon to manage the Soudan. I am not saying these things for the purpose of applying a sort of tu quo que argument to the right hon. gentleman. I say them because I confess that I think the Government of India are very likely right when they consider that it is better that great abilities and independence such as distinguished the Senapati should be considered a disqualification for State service—that it is perhaps on the whole better and more for the safety of the world that you should depend upon mediocrity; but, at any rate, I think it would be unreasonable for the House to censure the Government of India because, in this matter of determining to remove the Senapati, they have acted on the traditional and regular policy of Governments from almost time immemorial."

A bold confession that! But every word of it is true. So much the worse for the speaker. We are not now surprised at the rage with which the Under Secretary is being assailed.

"It was a kind of court held by the Chief Commissioner to which the Manipur authorities were summoned to hear the determination of the Governor of the province, and to be required to give in their obedience. No doubt there is the question whether or not the durbar was expedient, but we have not only the high authority of the hon. baronet the member for Evesham in its favour, but only a few days ago I received a letter from a gentleman who is, perhaps, more entitled to speak on this question than anybody else, I mean Sir Robert Sandeman, who is well known for the success with which he has dealt with independent tribes. Sir Robert says that he has repeatedly arrested recalcitrant chiefs in durbar, and he gave me an illustration of this. He told me that only a few months ago a chief in Beluchistan had made himself obnoxious to the Government. He immediately went down to the district, held a durbar, and then and there took the chief into custody and carried him away. Now that is precisely a parallel case to the transaction that would have taken place at Manipur had the Senapati come to the durbar, and had there been no resistance. (Hear, hear.) I am perfectly ready to admit that the question of arrest in durbar is one that deserves attention, and is one to which the Secretary of State will no doubt give due deliberation—(hear, hear)—but I wish to repudiate as strangely as I can the suggestion that Mr. Quinton was guilty or capable of anything like treachery. (Cheers.)"

We suspect Sir R. Sandeman has been uncomfortable under the condemnation of the plan to capture the so-called Senapati, and has been making a noise among his friends on the subject. We think we discern here the origin of the suggestion of the Indian apologists of Government to ask the opinion of the Ameer as to the propriety of the contemplated arrest. It is only in the practices of barbaric Border courts and of Politicals among barbarous Border Chiefs that the precedents for such acts are to be found.

The Under Secretary's reply to the charge of the small number of troops accompanying Mr. Quinton, is:—

"It is easy for us to be wise after the event, but I doubt whether anybody, before the disaster took place, would have said that 500 Sepoys were not sufficient to give a good account of the whole force of Manipur. Mr. Quinton knew that resistance was possible, and he took with him a force that he thought would meet that resistance. It has never been our policy to use overwhelming force. Boldness and audacity have always been the policy by which the Empire has been acquired and preserved, and those who condemn the smallness of the force which Mr. Quinton thought sufficient are confuted by the events that followed the disaster, when Lieutenant Grant set off with confidence to march on Manipur with eighty men, took a fort defended by 3,000 men, and practically overcame the whole strength of the Manipoor army. (Cheers.)"

Sir John Gorst concluded his defence of the Indian Government with the words :—

"I believe this Manipur affair must always remain a dark page in our history. It is, as the right hon. gentleman pointed out, relieved by two bright examples of conspicuous bravery of a man and of a woman—the splendid audacity of Lieutenant Grant and the patient, heroic endurance of Mrs. Grimwood (Cheers.) I respectfully submit to the House of Commons that no proceedings here can now either mend or mar the past, and that to criticise the conduct of men who have perished in the service of their country, and who can therefore neither explain nor defend their conduct may be unjust, must be ungenerous, and will serve no practical end whatever."

MATTERS MANIPURI.

THE Manipur despatches down to 3rd June have been published. In one of them Lord Cross informed the Viceroy, so runs a telegram, that "he agreed with the latter that it was essential for the security of the British position in India that the subjects of Native States should understand that the murder of British officers renders the murderers and abettors liable to be punished by death, despite orders from the authorities of the States concerned." That, on the face of it, is, no doubt, an extraordinary doctrine, but it is the result of an extraordinary history and the concomitant of an extraordinary polity. That is an assumption which the British in India are constrained to adopt, and it is an assumption which Southern Asia must be constrained to submit to. It is the condition of the situation. The Empire can be maintained only on the principle of the inviolability of the British person. It may be reasonably doubted whether the principle is quite applicable to a state of war like that in Manipur. But, generally speaking, the doctrine is unexceptionable. Harsh as it may sound, conflict as it may with the received notions of international jurisprudence, it must be accepted as a necessary rule justified by circumstances. It is a special protection in an exceptional situation. It is the prime postulate of empire.

As might be expected from the moderation of the head of the Government of India, without the quickening of public opinion in England, the Manipur prisoners' prayer for respite has been granted. It was wrong enough to try them by the court of vengeance of the officers of the hostile Expedition, without allowing them proper counsel or other means of defence. Under the circumstances, it were an unnecessary aggravation to prevent them from making some appeal against the foregone conclusion and sentence of the Special Commission to the possible justice of a less constrained tribunal. The order of the Viceroy on the death-sentences on the Manipur princes stands over till the end of this month. No Counsel will be admitted to plead for either the Maharaja, the Jubraj or the Senapati, but any representation on their behalf will receive careful consideration. The "learned" advocate, Janoki Nath Bysack, of the princes, has been informed accordingly. He is said to be on his way to Calcutta where a flat has been engaged by the Amrita Bazar people at a bazar for his residence.

He will take counsel with lawyers and draw up the case.

We hope in his clients' interest, he will not allow any seasoning of the case which will be drawn up with the lying that has been such a feature in this Manipur business.

Talking of lying reminds us of the sensation caused by the statement first made and reiterated and still persisted in, in the Amrita Bazar Patrika, that the British troops—sepoys—had massacred women and children in the Jubraj Tikendrajit's palace. Such a provocation alone could explain, if not justify, for nothing can justify, the outrage perpetrated by the Manipuris in the palace. Accordingly, we had more than once been minded to adopt the theory, but each time we were warned against the quarter in which the explanatory statement appeared. Meanwhile, though we preserved silence on the point, the statement was circulated throughout the empire and is at this moment implicitly believed in by the native population. We have made special inquiry into the matter, and, as the result, are perfectly satisfied that the whole is a cruel calumny against our sepoys. Not a single woman or child was killed in the attack on the palace.

We regret that these Manipur Chiefs have not received proper legal assistance, not from any morbid or sentimental feelings but from a legitimate sympathy for men hard-pressed and making a desperate struggle in an unequal conflict, who have been brought to their present pass originally by the high-handedness of a Great Power and their own subsequent stupidity and barbarity; and for the credit of our Government. For surely, Baboo Janaki Nath Bysack is but a weak reed to lean upon in such an emergency. We say this without any disrespect to the Baboo. He has shown pluck and ready resource in this matter. We have a high opinion of his parts and his versatility, but though he may be a good hand at accounts, may play a tune or sing a song, or cut a coat according to his cloth, he is not a lawyer. He has admitted it. He made a sad mess of the case before the Special Commission. We believe he is a Dacca man of the weaver caste which is so strong there. He was a clerk in the Transport Department at Kohima. There he had some difficulty. His property was sold by some decree of court. Finally, he removed with his family and took shelter in the Manipur State. There in that land of cheapness and few wants, he managed to make a living by a variety of means. He was engaged by Paka Singh alias Bhairabjit Singh, brother of Maharaja Sur Chandra, as a music master on Rs. 15, and he opened a tailor's shop for the sale of coats of European shape. He also became Tutor to the Maharaja's son. On the revolution of last September, Bysack lost his appointments and depended wholly on tailoring. This was the man who, on the British occupation of Manipur and the occurrence of the State Trials, sprung to the defence of the Princes.

After all, it is doubtful whether Baboo Bysack will turn up at the appointed date in the metropolis. The great want of Manipur has always been money, and the poor prisoners thrown on their own resources find it difficult to pay even the modest demands of an uncertificated Baboo. Themselves close prisoners, their men evade their commands. That is the secret of the delay in the arrival of Baboo Bysack with the papers. The same cause may prevent his coming in due time or coming at all.

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

AMENDMENT OF THE INDIAN CUSTOMS ACT.

HAVING knocked the Vacation in Bengal on the head, the Bengal Chamber of Commerce is free to occupy itself with more legitimate and near matters concerning the commerce of the country. Its latest demand is the simplification of the Custom House passes and the reform of the Indian Customs Act. Early in April last, the Chamber addressed a letter to the Government of India on the subject. That letter commenced with denouncing "the cumbrous and antiquated system" of obtaining Custom House passes for shipment of free goods in Calcutta and at all the Indian ports. The complaint is that the passes must be obtained before shipment. The law requires a shipping bill in duplicate giving a full description of the cargo to be shipped and a declaration of its value. This precaution, it is argued, was, when originally adopted, intended more for statistical returns than for protection of customs duty. For any purpose of revenue, it is now an anachronism, when all exports, excepting only opium and rice, are free. The system has, moreover, to be maintained at a cost wholly disproportionate to its object. It is both unnecessarily inconvenient to export merchants and costly to Government. The original object is frustrated by the excessive number of passes for "Relands." In the interest of their business and for their own protection, export merchants often find themselves constrained to take out shipping bills for large quantities of various descriptions of goods which, without these passes or shipping bills, they would be unable to export. The evil is evident as the list of "Relands" proves.

Particular stress is laid on the hardships to which boats loaded with rice are subject. For instance, if a vessel has cleared at the Custom House and the Master finds he can take 100 tons more cargo than he expected and no shipping bill has been taken out for this quantity, the Collector is competent, under the law, before granting the bill, to impose a fine of one per cent. on the value of the goods. This seems a needless infliction, in every way.

The remedy proposed by the Chamber is the adoption of the system in vogue in the United Kingdom. There, no exporter is required to take out a shipping bill beforehand. But the Agent of a vessel must file, within a week of the vessel's departure, a manifest shewing the cargo shipped by the vessel within that period, the responsibility of the exporter to the Custom House ceasing with a specification of the goods exported by any particular vessel.

The Chamber asks for a simple Act that will, while protecting the revenue, afford all possible facilities to the trade of the port; and, as a step towards that simplification of the law, suggests the appointment of a Committee, with, of course, representatives of Commerce on it, to report on the working of the Indian Customs Act, VIII of 1878.

The English Act too has proved unsatisfactory. There is, we believe, already a Committee sitting in London to suggest a uniform system of obtaining statistics of imports and exports throughout the British Empire. The Government of India would naturally wait for any action, if so advised, till the report of that Committee is submitted and considered by the Home Government. Whatever the deliberations of that Committee might be, there would still always remain the difficulty of applying any English recommendation in its entirety to India. It is doubtful whether Government would admit the costliness charged to the present system. We are afraid that any amendment of the Indian Customs Act must stand over, as also the appointment of a Committee. There is no ground for losing heart, however. The Chamber has a good subject—a distinct grievance. Let it keep up its ventilation, and it is sure to succeed.

A MAHOMEDAN MEMORIAL.

THE SUNNI PROTEST AGAINST THE SHIA TABARRA.

In the name of Allah, the Merciful, the Compassionate!

To the Honourable Sir Charles Elliott, K.C.S.I., C.I.E., C.S., &c., &c., Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal.

The Memorial of Grievance of Sheikh Ahmad Buksh Lahori, Mahammad Akbar Khan, and Ashraff Khan, of the Chowk, general dealers, Dad Khan, Cabuli, also of the Chowk, fruiterer, Sheikh Peära, of Itchagunj, Sheikh Ismael, of Gainpurá, Sheikh Hashim Ali, of Motijheel, Sheikh Abbas of Salar, of Sara, Mahammad Abu Tahir, also of Salar, teacher of Persian and Arabic, at present residing at Gorabazar, all citizens of Moorshedabad, and loyal subjects of Her Majesty the Empress, for themselves and their fellow-religionists,

SHEWETH—

That they have been, and continue still, the victims of a cruel but absolutely unprovoked persecution, at once impudent and obstreperous. Repeatedly affronted and wounded in the tenderest part, tired of suffering, unable any longer to bear the accumulated wrong of years, despairing of protection at the hands of the Officers of the Peace and practically abandoned to their fate by Local—that is District—Authority, and yet unpermitted, under a strong Government, to help themselves, they have no resource left but humbly to come and stand with joined hands before the Sublime Porte of Justice and cry for redress. This is the liberty they now take. This is the meaning of this representation.

2. Your Memorialists are all Mahomedans of the Sunni, that is to say, the Orthodox, persuasion, and they have, for some years, from time to time, had their feelings outraged, their religion insulted, themselves and the venerated Heroes and Chiefs of the Faith (equivalent to the gods of Heathen systems) damned, by a handful of heretics calling themselves Mussulmans but who have less title to the name than any believers in Book—Abel-e-Kitab—out of the pale of Islam. And this in the public thoroughfare and on a day of religious solemnity! It is bad enough to be thus oneself abused. How much more provoking to have the revered names of one's Church anathematised and dragged through the mire! And how can the agonised Mussulman heart permit the holy First Caliphs themselves to be made the scorn of scorn, the hate of hate of those who would not have been worthy to unloosen the latchet of their shoes! How can any Mussulmans see the sainted Companions of the Prophet—Abu Bakr, Omar and Osman—turned into the veriest butts of ribald ridicule and their effigies subjected to beastly treatment and burned by the lowest scum of society, and not interfere! It is indeed too much for flesh and blood to bear! And it is positively sinful to bear with such violence. To stand quiescent in such a situation seems a dereliction of duty on the part of Mussulmans for which they will have to answer at the Day of Judgment. The object and consequence in this world of the outrage is clear and unmistakable. It is a direct call—a throwing down of the gage of battle. If, however, the Mussulmans—by which name of course the Orthodox alone are always understood—took up the challenge, accepting the virtual invitation to combat, and resenting the affront with blows, they were just as likely to be adjudged wrong and punished as the reckless men that had causelessly provoked them; indeed, more likely to be victimised than the others, for the true aggressors, as offending by a profane tongue with a shibboleth not understood of the uninitiated, would be apt to escape notice. The most truthful witness might fail to catch the provoking terms, while the blows given by the aggrieved (Your Memorialists and their coreligionists) would be patent to the least observant. And an outsider magistrate, unless exceptionally gifted with capacity for sympathy and thoroughly acquainted with the Mahomedan religion and Mahomedan manners, would easily miss the true commencement of the assault and be apt to fix the responsibility on the objects of outrage. Nor is this a mere imaginative picture of a speculative possibility. It is the statement of fact—a leaf taken out of the contemporary annals of Moorshedabad.

3. Only the other day the probabilities of abstract reasoning were too rigidly and thoroughly verified. It is but a few months back that Your Memorialists and their brethren in Islam suffered—doubly, in the ways hereinbefore recited. No longer ago than the last Moharram were they thus cumulatively victimised: first attacked by the enemy, and then insulted with a mockery of justice and punished by the State for caring for the honour of their Faith. Their wounds are still fresh and bleeding. What are they to do under the circumstances? What can loyal Mussulmans do but run up to the Government with the record of their wrongs and with the evidence thereof in their compound fractures and festering sores?

4. The British Empire is essentially an Empire of Justice. In Asia it presents the touching spectacle of a handful of Christian strangers ruling with rare success a vast continent of heterogeneous Provinces of diverse races and creeds with a firm toleration to all innocent beliefs and usages. It never molests nor allows molestation. If ever it did either, that must be in simple good faith, from not knowing or not understanding. Even so in the case under representation. In the miserable situation of Your Memorialists, however, there is one sufficient source of hope for them--in the fact that Bengal is now governed by a statesman of ripe Indian experience who is also a scholar thoroughly acquainted with the Mahomedan Religion, in its tenets and history, and with the characteristics of Mahomedan Society.

5. Your Honor is aware how the peace of Her Majesty's subjects is habitually disturbed nearly every year, during the month of Moharram of the Mahomedan calendar, on the occasion of the so-called Mahomedan Festival of the Moharram. Your Memorialists say "so-called" because the Festival can be properly designated Mahomedan only on the assumption of their enemy being held of the communion of Islam. That would be an untenable assumption. The Shias may be, some of them, excellent people, but they have no right to pose as exponents of the Faith brought to the world by the Prophets. Numerically as well as doctrinally they are at a discount. It is by a loose use of language that they are esteemed Mahomedans or the Moharram is regarded a Mahomedan Festival. The Moharram itself is evidence of Your Memorialists' averment. Take it in its Indian aspect, or take it in its Persian, the spectacle on the face of it is in direct conflict with the spirit of Islam, doing violence to all its teachings and traditions. Islam does not countenance claptrap ceremonials and idle shows. Excepting one or two customs handed down from time immemorial, like the Sacrifice of the Lamb after the Chosen People, Islam scarcely boasts any Feasts and Festivals. Its genius is opposed to such Tamabas. It cherishes no superstitions--encourages no illusions. Islam is an iconoclastic Creed which not only will not hear of any multiplication or division of the God-head but also discountenances all appeals to the imagination through the eye--all scenic aids and accessories.

6. A barbaric show like the Moharram--at best but a vulgar amusement under the name of religion--is the last thing to suit Islam. A noisy demonstration of grief swelled by hired mourners cannot consist with the chaste simplicity and stern purity of God's own Word. In fine, the Moharram is simply a Shia business: It is not Mahomedan.

7. Nor would it be patronised as a secular spectacle or quasi-religious dissipation. Even as a representation of a great event in the History of the Moslem Church--as a Passion Play--the Moharram would scarcely have a chance among a Semitic race like the Arabs who, though eminently poetical, are simply lyrical, not dramatic.

8. Within the last few years the world has had convincing proof, of a kind not to be gainsaid, of the exceedingly little regard paid among Mahomedan nations to the religious Drama. It was the same in the East as in the West. Islam is so profoundly in earnest on the subject of religion that it will not allow any trifling with sacred matters, such as pantomimic exhibitions and dramatic representations of them involve. Here, in Bengal, the success of the Hindu mythological Drama--the prodigious run which miracle plays like "Prahla'd Charit" and "Chaitannya Lilá" had at the native theatres--naturally suggested the composition of a drama on the Life of Mahomet with the object of bringing it on the stage. It was obviously a Hindu, or at any rate a non-Islamite, enterprise. Such a suggestion could not possibly emanate, nor receive acceptance or any sort of quarter, from the Mussulman mind. How the Mahomedans regard such matters was made manifest in no time. No sooner was the announcement made than the Mahomedans protested, and Nawab Abdool Luteef Bahadur, ever alert in the interest of the Faith and of his coreligionists, warned the publisher, and the manager, as well as the Police, of the danger of such literature and such acting. The result was that both the publisher and the manager apologised, and while the one promised to abandon the idea of his histrionic exhibition of the Prophet of God on the stage, the other expressed his readiness to suppress the book. The bookseller indeed, true to his word, surrendered to Nawab Abdool Luteef Bahadur the whole edition, and, on a particular day fixed for the purpose, all the copies were publicly burned. Thus were all cause of bitterness and all apprehension of trouble removed, and native society resumed its wonted peace and Hindus and Mussulmans their humdrum harmony. Thus more than three years passed in quiet, when again a fresh omen loomed on the distant horizon. It was an unexpected evil from an unsuspected quarter that now confronted Islam. And a very formidable danger it was. Fellow-subjects might be reasoned with or complained against, but foreigners in their country could not be approached. Such was the new difficulty. Christendom, still struggling with the idolatrous influence of her secular educators, Rome and Græce, and accustomed from of old to see the objects of its worship--Jesus and Mary, and even God Almighty himself--represented on the stage and introduced in other shows--the evil legacy of the Renaissance--could have no scruple on that score with respect to the revered personages of non-Christian Creeds. And jaded France, in quest of "sensation," purposed to bring Mahomet into the theatre. As soon as the announcement appeared, however, His Imperial Majesty the Sultan of Turkey, who is understood to be a regular reader of the Paris Press, at once directed his Ambassador at the French capital to represent to the Government of the Republic how painful to all true Believers was the idea of their Prophet or saints being personated on the stage for show, and for money--a spectacle to be gaped at and received with claps or, it may be, with hisses--and to move for the suppression of the play. The Government of the Republic were not prepared to interfere with the amusements of a volatile people to whom amusement is a second religion. They demurred. They argued. A diplomatic correspondence ensued between Paris and Stamboul. Meanwhile, the reluctance of France to stop instantly the public desecration of the Faith and degradation of the Prophet filled the world of Islam with sorrow and indignation. In Bombay in especial it caused a most extraordinary explosion of feeling, ending in a firm Resolution of the Mahomedan community to boycott all theatres and theatrical performances. Happily for the world, the French Government saw their way to accede to the request of the head of Islam. Latterly, a similar attempt was made to introduce the Prophet on the English stage, and it was similarly dropped.

9. The relevancy of this episode of the exhibition of Mahomet to Your Memorialists' business goes without arguing. It thoroughly, if indirectly, exposes the worthlessness of the Moharram. Your Memorialists could scarcely in any other way demonstrate as conclusively how un-Mahomedan is the Festival--how utterly repugnant to Islam.

10. Your Memorialists protest that no excess of enthusiasm for their own Belief has blinded them to the claims of other people's Beliefs. At any rate, appearing before the head of the Government, sovereign over, and impartial to, all sects and sections, they understand the need and expediency of calmness and fair play. Speaking under the operation of this discipline, they are still unable to countenance the pretensions of the Shias. They will not enter into an elaborate discussion of those pretensions nor will they lead Your Honour through the subtleties of Arabic theologians. They will mention broad facts and leading points such as have not escaped European travellers and historians, and upon which every man of education can form his conclusions.

11. One word of explanation Your Memorialists feel bound to introduce at this stage, by way of clearing their conscience as well as keeping themselves in countenance with their fellows in faith. Employing the English language for medium of representation of their grievance, they find it expedient, in order to preclude puzzle and confusion to the Authorities, to withhold the expressions of regard and veneration with which they are accustomed to accompany all loved and respected names, particularly the great names connected with their Religion. And addressing non-Mussulmans and reciting matters of history they may be betrayed into terms or a tone towards the venerated personages of Islam for which they humbly ask pardon of the Divine Mercy.

12. It is matter of uncontested fact that Shiaism arose out of the rivalry of the families of the first Mahomedans for the lead of Islam after the death of the Prophet. The Prophet did not leave the world of a sudden, but gradually, in the course of nature; in waning strength life came to an end. His ecclesiastical duties he performed himself to the last. These duties included the public preaching from the pulpit in the mosque every Friday. On one or two occasions towards the close, unable to attend himself, he deputed Abu Bakr to officiate. The Prophet had no sons and he left no Instrument of Succession, but it was well understood during his life-time that he would be succeeded in the chief place in the Mussulman community by his trusted friends and companions in arms and in counsel--Abu Bakr, Omar, Osman, and Ali--one after the other, unless any of them died or unless circumstances rendered a departure absolutely necessary. For this was not a matter of sacred law, and had not been made the subject of Divine Revelation, and the Prophet left the judgment of his followers unfettered. His family, however, were not all equally wise, and on his death they were ready to fasten on the new community the evils of an internecine dispute. Hazrat Ali, the son of Abu Talab, was at once Mahamad's cousin and son-in-law, the husband of his daughter (by Khadeja) Fatema, by whom he had two sons, Hasan and Hossein. These, with the widow Ayesha, constituted the leading members of the prophetic family who survived Mahamad. Some of them did not relish the idea of the inheritance going out to strangers, and there were weak men to side with them in a mistaken loyalty to the founder of the Faith. Ali himself was not unreasonable and he was, besides, not ambitious. He who was so celebrated for the justice of his decisions, could not be imposed upon by the plausibility of the contention in his favour. He knew that the office of Khalifa (Caliph) or Imam was no matter for the rules of succession to be exercised upon, that it was not of the nature of an incorporeal hereditament. He showed a noble example by cheerfully acquiescing in the elevation of the venerable Abu Bakr. This submission was the saving of the infant Islam. But it only deferred the evil day. In two years the first Caliph died. The forbearance of the Prophet's son-in-law was, however, by no means exhausted. And so on the death of Abu Bakr he loyally accepted Omar, though his family and adherents again insisted upon his accession and protested loudly against the continued usurpation and robbery of the patrimony of the descendants of the Prophet. The same thing was repeated at the outset of the next---the third Caliphate---the same clamour from the Prophet's household and pressure on the head, and the same wise and dignified self-suppression. Thus Ali would have been glad to remain in the serene and picturesque obscurity of private life, devoted to the performance of his religious exercises, the pursuit of his favourite studies, and the dispensation of justice---a matter of the highest importance in a rising but rude society which did not yet own any learned doctors---had not events compelled him to undertake the perilous charge of the Believers. In the third Caliphate Islam was sorely tried. Disaffection throughout the country and in the Provinces encouraged a formidable insurrection. At last old Osman was cut off in the act of prayer. This was the signal for a general tumult. It seemed as if the Faithful would mutually exterminate themselves. Then came Ali to the rescue by accepting the command and ending the disastrous interregnum. The dream of the Prophet's household was at length fulfilled. Unhappily, that house was divided within itself. The Prophet's favorite widow, Ayesha, bore towards the son-in-law of the Prophet and her co-wife Khadeja and husband of Fatema, and his issue by her, the feelings usual in such a connection. This was the fly in the ointment which detracted from the integrity of a devolution of power which could not fail to be agreeable to the whole world of Islam. This domestic jealousy and hate reacted on affairs and was the fruitful cause of public calamities. After a brief troublous reign, illustrious for valour and justice, Hazrat Ali was despatched to Heaven while praying to God at the head of the Mahomedan congregation by the stroke of an assassin. His eldest son Hassan was proclaimed Caliph in Arabia and on the Border land of Assyria, but with that preference for a private life of contemplation and religion which ran in the House, he in less than a year renounced the sceptre in favour of Moawiyah. Subsequently, on the death of the last named, Hassan's younger brother Hossein was drawn out of his peaceful seclusion at Medina by the cry of distress of the Faithful crushed under the heels of the House of Abu Sofian. The appeal of forty thousand Believers and heroes loyal to the Prophet and his family whose names were transmitted could not be resisted by the young heart of the Prophet's grandchild. Thus he went forth, alone, but encumbered with ladies and children, to his doom. He emerged from the Desert into the fruitful valley of the Euphrates to find not one of his forty thousand heroes. The Governor of Cufa intercepted his progress. He found himself in a hole. He was willing to be carried in an honorable way to the Caliph Yezid, son of Moawiyah, but the son of Ali and grandson of Mahamad would not submit to be a vulgar prisoner. The Governor's instructions were explicit and severe. So Hossein stood at bay to die like a martyr, if denied the death of a hero. And as a martyr died the sainted Hossein. His head was sent to Yezid on a spike and his family---delicate ladies and little children---in fetters.

13. Such in brief was the unequal conflict on the bank of the Euphrates which crushed the hopes and ended the efforts of the race of Hashem. Attempts were, from time to time, made in the name of the progeny of the Prophet to divide Islam, but they were the fitful bursts of individual ambitions and wholly unauthorised. To all intents and purposes the Cause expired on the field of Cufa.

14. The treatment received by the Prophet's family could not be forgotten in a day. The incidents of the painful martyrdom of Hossein had sunk deep in the hearts of many. As soon, indeed, as the beloved grandchild of the Prophet with several infants of his family had, by invitation, been sacrificed to the perfidy and pusillanimity of Cufa, the Assyrians awoke to the enormity of their guilt and sought to make peace with Heaven by vengeance on the foul murderers. They were soon joined by relations, friends and admirers from Mecca and Medina. But their exertions had no other result than exasperating the dynasty in possession. A pro-Ali Party naturally called into being an anti-Ali Party. At the capital of Islam the name of Ali was, by sovereign command, on established festivals, formally reviled. But this was the madness of a moment as it were. The custom was reprobated as impious, and suppressed, and, in less than two generations, the honours due to the family of the Prophet were cordially restored. At the same time, no more attempts were heard of for fomenting disturbances in the name of the despoiled Progeny of the Prophet. The absurd pro-Ali enthusiasm was at an end.

15. Still it moves, and has its being, fed from a perennial source!

Crushed at home it raised its head abroad. By strangers in a foreign land it was cherished---all the more zealously because from animus, and in an irrational obstinacy. It is one of the strangest phenomena in history. The How and Wherefore is a long story. Your Memorialists can attempt the faintest outline.

16. The partizanship in favour of Ali and his offspring was perpetuated by ethnic antagonism and international jealousy. Mahomedanism is the Arabs' religion, revealed through an Arab in the heart of Arabia. The Prophet and his followers became a secular Power and their Faith spread by conquest as well as by persuasion. Soon it extended beyond the farthest limits of Arabia. Persia was drawn into the great tide. Before the Prophet's death his army was on the full march of conquest against the great Zoroastrian Empire. The same year the Persian Doab was attacked and won. In four years more by the decisive field of Cadeisa, Persia itself became an Arab Province and the Persians a people of Islam. But though thus conquered into Islam, they were never thoroughly reconciled to their lot. Reluctant Mussulmans in origin, the Persians have ever since remained Mussulmans against their grain. However much they felt the spiritual claims of Islam and acknowledged its divine character, they still in their imperfect spirituality fretted under it as something like an alien dispensation, as though complaining of Providence for preferring an Arab channel to an Ajami. In fine, they regarded the Faith as an alien yoke. At their first encounter with the soldiers of Islam, the Persians were a polished, wealthy people, abounding in all the learning, arts and comforts of civilization, while the Arabs were rude sons of the desert, ill fed and ill clad. Historians remark how in that war this disparity operated in favour of the invaders, tempting them to the most desperate exertions to acquire so rich a prize. In their defeat the Persians found themselves doubly, trebly humiliated. They came under the religious as well as the political subjection of the Arabs. They submitted to the dominion of a despised neighbour, and they received a new religion from the hands of the barbarian. They withied under this cruel infliction of Fate. This was just the mood for a schism whenever the opportunity might come. Hence the readiness with which they espoused the cause of the race of Hashem when it had been politically lost and even abandoned by those most interested. Long after the descendants of the Prophet had relinquished their claims and certainly given up their efforts, and, accepting the consensus of choice of the Faithful, ratified as it was by Providence, descended cheerfully to the peaceful usefulness of private life, the Persians pretended to be still indignant at the constitutional history of Islam, with the successive devolution of power at the seats of Empire, as a great fraud and imposition. They continued a bootless theoretical but not quite bloodless war of legitimacy long after the historical war of succession had been determined. Such a spectacle is probably unique in history, so crowded with glaring anomalies and the most monstrous prodigies. It is explained by history, however, and is only to be explained by the circumstances of the connection between the two neighbours---the Arabs on one side and the Ajamis to their North-East on the other. It was the only resource of patriotism. There was for the vanquished no return to Magianism or Sabeanism, except for those few martyr-souls who could leave their country for ever to save their faith. Compelled to stick to Islam, they utilised the dynastic ambitions of the leading Arabian families, the claims of the great House of Hashem and, above all, the wrongs of the grandchildren of the Prophet, to spite the halter of an alien creed. Heresy was an irresistible temptation to those who accepted the Faith as a misfortune. It were some consolation, under the unmerited cruelty of circumstances, to be able to create discord in a polity, and introduce schism into a religion, to which one must submit, willing or not. The better to be able to do this they affected to be more Mussulman than the Arabs themselves, and to be more inconsolable at the course of events which kept Ali and his descendants out of their inheritance than the trusted colleagues and dearest friends of the Prophet themselves. They resented the succession of Abu Bakr to the Pontifical Chair of Mahamad, though the Prophet had not left any instructions on the subject, and Ali himself had accepted the arrangement, and, after all, if Ali was the son-in-law, Abu Bakr at least was the father-in-law, of the Prophet, father of his darling Ayesha, distinguished by the title of the Mother of the Faithful. So they equally accounted the successive accessions of Omar and Osman as usurpations---a robbery of the Prophet's own home and hearth. Of course, they deemed the Caliphate of Ali all right, though but a tardy acknowledgment by the Faithful of their true leader. And they were bound to execrate the treacherous miscreants who led his children to ruin and death and the usurpers who heaped on them unmerited wrong and outrage. Thenceforward the Persians called themselves Shias or partizans in preference to Mussulmans, while the rest of the Mahomedan world were distinguished from them as Sunnis or Ortodox. Such is the origin of the division in Islam into Sunni and Shia.

THE CAPTIVE LADIE.

By THE LATE MICHAEL MADHUSUDAN DUTT.

Reprinted from the Madras edition of 1849.

He paused—that warrior young and brave,
And look'd him on his comrades all,
Who by the light fair Chandra* gave
Now sat them near that castle-wall:
They sigh'd—and on their brow there came
The hue of thoughts of fiery flame,
Such as the captive knight will feel
When looking on his rusty steel!
For they had come from the battle-field
Where they lov'd their trusty blades to wield,
To that lone isle and castle there
To guard yon weeping maiden fair,—
A task which ill beseems the brave
With thoughts as free as ocean-wave!

"But come, why is thy brow so pale—
Dost grieve at yon lone maiden's tale?
Or hath this wild and rocky isle
Robb'd e'en thy gay and joyous smile?
Come, wake thy Viut†—thou child of Song—
Methinks its strings have slept full long—
And tho' there be no bow'r and hall
Of joyance or glad festival,
Where eyes of light and starry ray,
Shine brightly when the minstrel's lay
Breathes in soft accents—sweet and bland,
Of Beauty and of fairy-land—
Or pale when in sad cadence low
It tells of love-lorn maiden's woe—
We'll sit us on yon moon-lit shore
And whilst the sleepless waters roar,
And moon-beams in the waves' embrace
Struggle and blush in bashfulness,
We'll list to thy sweet Vin and song
Echo'd yon misty rocks among!"

He rose—but who is he?—"He came
A wand'ring minstrel‡—gay and free—
Who roves like thousand-winged Fame,
And charms with gentle minstrelsie
The high and low—where'er he be:
When first this castle open'd wide
Its portals for yon maiden fair,
His skiff came on the heaving tide,
In fairy beauty—gliding there;

How sweetly from the moon-lit stream
Which hush'd itself to beaming smile,
His music—soft as heard in dream—
Came o'er this solitary isle!
We call'd—he came—we love him well—
For wondrous are the deeds he sings—
And sweet the music of his strings—
And wild the tales which he will tell,—
And there be some enchanting spell
In the wildness of his imaginings!
And well I know our captive fair
Doth love to list to his gentle lay—
And oft thro' yon high lattice there
Her eyes of soft and tranquil ray
Shine pensively—whene'er his Vin
Woos Melody—and woos to win!"
He rose—that bard—and you might deem
'Twas Cama*—God of Love's gay dream!
How wildly o'er the listener fell
His Vin's deep—sweet—and rapturous swell
As thus he sang

THE FEAST OF VICTORY.†

"The Raja sat in his gorgeous hall
In pomp the proudest earth had known—
While monarchs bow'd them to his thrall,
And knelt them lowly round his throne—
The brightest gems of the South lay there
And the North's treasures from afar,
And of the East and West—so fair,
The home of Even's dewy star—
For all were his—o'er earth and sea
His flag had wav'd in Victory—
From proud Himala's realms of snow
To where upon the ocean-tide
Fair Lunka‡ smiles in beauty's glow
And breathes soft perfumes far and wide
And sits her like a regal maid
In her gay, bridal wreaths array'd!

A prouder scene the fiery sun
Had never—never shone upon!

† The "Feast of Victory"—or, as it is called in Sanskrit, the "Raj Shooio Jugum" is described at great length in the Second Book of the far-famed "Mahabharat." It was celebrated by the most powerful monarchs whose claims to superiority over the whole country admitted of no dispute. The celebration of this Feast was an assertion of Universal supremacy, and, in many cases, led to the most disastrous consequences, as it often combined different kingdoms to crush the pride of the aspirant to the honour of celebrating it. There are very few instances of the successful celebration of this Feast, recorded in Indian History or, rather, Mythology. Those of Dasaratha, the father of Rama, King of Oudh, and Yudhistir, the famous Pându Prince, are the only ones which occur to me at present.

Like golden clouds that on the breast
Of yonder Heavens love to rest,
Unnumber'd hosts in bright array
Glitter'd beneath the noon-tide ray—
A thousand flags wav'd on the air,
Like bright-wing'd birds disporting there—
A thousand spears flash'd in the light
In dazzling splendour—high and bright—
The warrior-steed—so fierce and proud—
Neigh'd in wild fury—shrill and loud—
The jewell'd elephant too stood
In solemn pride and quiet mood—
And in the glittering pomp of war
The mail-clad hero in his car—
For nations on that glorious day
Met there from regions far away—
The mightiest on this earth that be
In all the pride of Chivalrie—
To celebrate thy feast—proud Victory!

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

LORD Lansdowne is suffering from influenza and neuralgia. He is confined to his room.

THE Japanese who assaulted the Czarewitch has been sentenced to imprisonment for life.

THE Civil and Military Gazette hears that Mian Baksh, one of the two notorious favorites of the Maharaja of Cashmere, has been sent out of Cashmere by the Council. Dewan Lachman Das had the hardihood to imprison him and suffered in consequence. But he is too valuable to the Maharaja, he was therefore released and taken in private service. He goes out again—to return by the back-door.

LALAS Ram Pershad and Shadi Ram, sons of the late Dewan Kulwant Rai, Financial Minister, Patiala, left for England in September 1888. They are expected back in India next week. They return as B. As and Barristers-at-law.

GEORGE HERBERT WITTENBAKER, a European Forest officer, charged with criminal breach of trust as a public servant, in respect of Rs. 1,098, received by him as grazing fees at Booldana, was found guilty by the jury and sentenced by Mr. Justice Farnen to two years' rigorous imprisonment. The Judge chastised the prisoner saying that as a European officer, he should have set an example to others. But this being his first offence, the Judge would not inflict on him an exemplary punishment.

THE extinct volcano Fujiyama is exhibiting signs of activity. Two centuries back, it covered Tokio with several inches of ashes. There was an earthquake lasting over a minute at Tokio on the 25th May. The one following the other has alarmed the Japanese of the capital with terror. They are afraid of a catastrophe.

CAPTAIN Verney is penitent in his incarceration. He has done what is now left him to do to repair the wrong done to Miss Baskett. His solicitors have sent her a cheque for £400 for the expenses she has been put to by his misconduct.

At Bridgeport—California—a Chinaman was tried for the murder of an Indian and acquitted. The acquittal did not prove happy. It did not save the poor Celestial. The law in that Land of Equality is at the mercy of mobs. As soon as discharged, the acquitted man was dragged from the court room by the people, handed over to the Indians, and cut by them to pieces. They are not "mild Hindus" evidently, those Indians. It was lucky for O'Hara and his comrades who raided into a peaceful hamlet, at dead of night, in the neighbourhood of Dum Dum, carrying devastation and death, that they had victimised a different order of Indians.

THIS year's gold medal of the Simla United Service Institution has been awarded to Lieutenant Cardew, 20th Bengal Lancers, for his essay "Recruiting for the Native Army."

THEY had lately in England an Exhibition of Bookbinding at the Burlington Fine Arts Club, Savile Row. There was a large collection of books, manuscript and printed, from the eighth century, superbly or elegantly bound in metal, wood, ivory, parchment, leather, silk, velvet and other integuments with ornamentation of gilding, carving, enamelling, jewellery, and embroidery, by Italian, German, Dutch, French, and English artificers of different periods. Lord Ashburnham's celebrated Textus of the Gospels drew the prime attraction. Its inner cover is arranged in a coat of mail with pearls, sapphires, emeralds, and cloisonné enamel. This book is valued at about £10,000 and is absolutely unique. There was also the Mazarine Bible, believed to be the first printed book in existence.

THE cotton cultivation in Russian Turkestan has proved a great success. In 1884 the cultivation of American cotton was first essayed and the trial has succeeded so well that the Russians look forward to a trade in the foreign markets of Europe.

THE visitors to the Indian Museum in June numbered 41,578, made up of 483 male and 164 female Europeans and 30,154 male and 10,777 female Natives of India. The average during the 22 days it was open, was 1,889.

THE Rev. Backhaus, a young and energetic German, was the first Roman Catholic priest in the Bendigo gold fields. He arrived there in 1851. A Doctor of Divinity and of Medicine, he practised both the professions, and, with remuneration with nuggets of gold, soon made a fortune for himself. He next employed his vast wealth to gain more. Disdaining no legitimate trade, without caring whether or not it comported with his clerical cloth, he started or owned a brewery, a score of hotels, a squatters' station of 50,000 acres, two vineyards, and a large amount of house property. The fame of the wealth of the Catholic priest of Bendigo spread to other parts of the Australian Colony. In Bendigo itself he was the observed of all observers—both Catholics and Protestants,—and the Archbishop of Melbourne allowed him his own way and would not remove him from a place where he had grown to be an institution. But the priest's secular pursuits had been looked upon with increasing disfavour by many Catholics outside Bendigo. To remove the scandal, the Pope, in 1874, created a Bishopric of Bendigo and would not invest Dr. Backhaus, then Dean, with a mitre until he gave up his secular pursuits. The Doctor was too far gone into these pursuits to be confined to the clerical calling. He was therefore replaced by Dr. Crane. Dr. Backhaus, however, left Bendigo with a heavy sigh, and retired to a mansion near Melbourne. He died five years ago, bequeathing to the Diocese of Bendigo £250,000. To revenge himself as it were on the present Bishop, he directed that that sum should be at interest for 20 years from the date of his death. It is said that a more devoted priest or a better man and Christian gentleman all round than Dr. Backhaus never breathed God's air.

THE Administrator, Rajppla State, has notified the abolition in the State including the feudatory estates of Saghara and Vadi, as injurious to trade, (1) all import, export and transit duties of every kind excepting export duties on mhowra flowers, on forest produce, and on cotton; (2) all imports heretofore levied, whether by the Durbar or by private individuals, under the names of "Khannu," "Khannu Dan" or "Pina;" (3) all taxes heretofore imposed on particular trades or industries, such as "Kasab Vers," "Dhama Vers," and others of similar nature. The prohibition does not affect any toll for maintaining any made road or bridge, or octroi for municipal revenue.

THE Sub divisional magistrate of Naranganj sentenced a Mahomedan and his wife to six months' rigorous imprisonment each for extracting a male child four days old from its natural mother and treating it as their own. They were punished as kidnappers.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

TOWARDS the end of last month, speaking at a Liberal-Unionist meeting, Lord Hartington hoped that a general election was not far off. Whether the success of the Home Rule Party at that election presaged or not the establishment of Home Rule in the next Parliament, the defeat of the Unionist Party was sure to mean the re-opening of bitter controversies, now mouldering, between the north and south of Ireland, between Protestants and Roman Catholics, between landlords and tenants. It will, besides, bring about the repeal of the law which has reestablished order and peace in Ireland and which maintains that order.

Lord Salisbury alluded to the subject in his speech at a dinner given, on the 15th July, by the United Service Club. He was not aware when Parliament would be dissolved. If the question of the electorate was to be raised at the next general election, it would, he said, be necessary first to consider the distribution of seats. Ireland, Wales and the North of Scotland were over-represented while England was inadequately represented in Parliament. Lord Salisbury announced himself in favour of abolition of the illiterate vote and for introduction of woman's suffrage.

THE Emperor William accompanied by the Empress is on a visit to Great Britain. A great naval pageant welcomed their Majesties at Queenborough on the 5th July. The Prince of Wales and other royal personages met them at landing, two lines of ironclads, through which they steamed, saluting the imperial visitors. The party at once proceeded to Windsor. The splendour of the welcome is said to be unprecedented. The following day, the Queen, the Emperor and other royal personages witnessed the marriage, at St. George's Chapel, Windsor, of Princess Louise, daughter of Prince Christian, to Prince Albert of Anhalt.

On the 7th, the Emperor witnessed a musical ride of the Guards in Windsor Park, and lunched with Prince Christian. A brilliant banquet at the Castle to which 140 guests—including Lord Salisbury and the members of his Cabinet—were invited, closed the festivities of the day. The next day, the 8th, their Imperial Majesties moved on to Buckingham Palace. The night was devoted to a State opera, the Prince of Wales and other members of the Royal family being present. The attendance was enormous, the scene most gorgeous and the enthusiasm brimming over.

THE Corporation of London had been preparing for weeks to give the Emperor a night royal reception. On the 10th, the City was en fête. The decorations along the route from Buckingham Palace were of the most gorgeous, and the display unequalled. At the Guildhall, the Emperor was presented with the Freedom of the City. A lunch followed. The Lord Mayor proposed the Emperor's health, who replied he was always at home in England, being the grandson of the Queen who would ever be remembered for the nobility of her character and the wisdom of her counsels. He, besides, claimed blood kinship for the Germans and the English, and was always, following the examples of his grandfather and father, for the historical friendship between the two countries. The Emperor repeated his professions for, above all things, peace. For its maintenance he would always be ready to unite with England and other nations in the common labour for peaceful progress, friendly intercourse and the advancement of civilization. The ceremony over, their Imperial Majesties visited the Royal Naval Exhibition, making a minute inspection of the exhibits.

The grand review of troops came off at Wimbledon, on the 11th. Six thousand regulars and fifteen thousand volunteers, under command of the Duke of Cambridge, paraded in honor of the Emperor. There was a brilliant march-past. The review closed with the firing of a royal salute. The crowd at the review is estimated at over a million. The next was a visit to the Crystal Palace and attendance at a concert. The evening entertainment consisted of a dinner at the Palace and a grand display of fireworks. On Sunday the 12th, the Emperor and Empress attended the morning divine service at St. Paul's Cathedral.

Next day, after a lunch with the Prince of Wales, the Emperor was entertained at Hatfield, the seat of the Premier. His imperial guest expressed to Lord Salisbury his profound satisfaction with the welcome in England which had exceeded all expectation.

THE Orange Lodges in the Army are to be suppressed. We are astonished to hear that they have been so long permitted. That is not a civilised army which labours under such an imperium in imperio. Orange societies are always a bad business, but if they can ever, under any possible circumstances, be tolerated anywhere, it is certainly not in the Army. That institution ought to be preserved free from religious fanaticism and class intrigue.

This is not the first time that attempts have been made to contaminate the Army with this very poison. More than fifty years ago, in the last reign, the lynx of the Lower House, Mr. Joseph Hume, drew public attention to the spread of Orangeism. Great was the sensation when it was known that the Army had been tampered with, so to say. A Parliamentary Committee was appointed and its inquiry brought out the fact that the Duke of Cumberland himself was the patron of the movement. It was under his auspices that, to the prejudice of military discipline and in the face of express orders of the Commander-in-Chief, Orange lodges had been introduced into H. M.'s Forces. The inquiry was followed by the Resolutions of the House. And the societies were dissolved. Whence, then, this fresh necessity, after all the progress of more than half a century, for the suppression of Orangeism in the Army? Either the old societies had not been dissolved, or new organizations have since been started. Perhaps, the extraordinary activity of the Home Rule movement in late years accounts for them. But nothing can excuse Ribbonism or Orangeism in the heart of the Army.

THE Privy Council has authorized the formation of a teaching University for London, under the name of the Albert University.

THE House of Commons has passed the Free Education Bill.

So London is to have a university at last. Just now it has one in name only like Calcutta—without a local habitation, or professoriate or alumni. The so-called University of London, like that of Calcutta, which is formed on the same model, is only an examining body. Under the circumstances, there is no residence of pupils and professors together, no academic life, no esprit de corps, no academic tone. We hail the contemplated institution as the forerunner of a true academy of liberal culture in our own country.

The new Education Bill too cannot be without its reflex effect on the fortunes of our countrymen. This great Liberal measure of a Conservative Cabinet is the best answer to the reactionists who in India would lead our people back to primitive ignorance.

IN Paris they have a sensation of quite a different nature from that experienced by Englishmen in the Baccarat case, though it pertains to a scandal all the same. M. de Lesseps and his two sons, Charles and Victor, with two other Directors of the Panama Company, are under a judicial enquiry on some charges brought against them by certain bondholders. The man who was once worshipped as "le Grand Français" is now being prosecuted as a regular swindler. We deeply lament the pass to which the Heaven-born engineer, who has solved the problem of three thousand years and in doing so has benefitted the whole world and advanced human civilization, has been brought. We can only pray that he may come out of the fiery ordeal unscathed.

THE Jury without retiring unanimously found Manockjee Aslajee not guilty of the tragedy of the Rajah Tower. The verdict had the highest approval of the Judge. According to him, the evidence for what might be called the defence quite outweighed what might be called the prosecution. No other sane verdict was possible. So Aslajee is saved from the insanity of the 45 thousand memorialists to Lord Harris, if not their rage, for a special procedure for his conviction.

THE sensation on the collapse of buildings in Bombay ended with a call on the local Corporation for better supervision of houses and for building regulations. The building regulations as submitted to the Corporation for approval, in their turn, raised a loud and strong protest. The byelaws were passed with the word "good" taken out of them. The mortar, lime, cement or concrete of a building need not be good! They rejected the byelaw "all the timber framing shall be good sound timber properly put together to the satisfaction of the Commissioner!" So Jerryism was allowed any length of rope. But the scandal of rejection of the "good" byelaws proved too great, and they were reintroduced and ordered to be put up when all the remaining byelaws had been considered and disposed of. House-owners may be left to take care of their own dwelling houses, but there can be no doubt that public places where numbers do congregate for work or residence should be brought under strict supervision not only when they are building but always, then and thereafter, during their continuance.

FROM the United Service Club, Simla, Captain George S. C. Swinton, of the Highland Light Infantry, has issued An Idea to Cheapen Polo Ponies and all Ponies. Within the last seven years, the price of ponies in India has about doubled. Nor is there any prospect of its standing at the present figure; rather it is steadily going up. Already, the polo has become an expensive luxury. In England, it is confined to the very rich. In India, it bids fair to follow suit. The cause of all this is said to be the popularity of tournaments which by the publicity they give to the high value of good ponies raises the price of ponies in general. This has led many to propose giving up the excitement of the polo and reverting to the tamer exercises of the past. Captain Swinton offers to rescue "society" from so sad an alternative. He proposes:—

"That at the close of every tournament each pony that has been played, if only for a portion of one chukker, must, with the exception of four per team, be put up for sale by auction at a fixed upset price. That the owner of the pony should receive the upset price, and that any surplus over that amount should be divided up say in the following proportions: One-half to be apportioned to the various teams competing, according to the distances they have come, to assist their railway expenses; one quarter to be apportioned equally to teams competing, for their polo funds; one quarter to be spent in prizes, or otherwise. That the upset price be 1,000 in 1892, 800 in 1893, 650 in 1894, and 500 in 1895, and ever after."

The gallant Captain of the Lightfoot Highlanders is satisfied that the adoption of the measure will reduce the price of ponies all round permanently. Without pretending to acquaintance with the mysteries of the polo or of racing either, we confess to having doubts on the point. We are afraid both Political Economy and the instinct of gambling, which plays such a part in these competitions, will disappoint Captain Swinton.

THE Bombay High Court in full Bench have re-affirmed the ruling in Queen-Empress versus Vithal Bhai Chand (I L. R., 6, Bom., 19) that coins were not instruments of gaming within the meaning of the Gambling Act, defining "an instrument for gaming" as an article devised or invented for gambling purposes, which a coin is not. In its Revisional Jurisdiction, in Queen-Empress versus Jang Bahadur (the eldest son of Baboo Sanwal Singh, Subordinate Judge, Mirzapur), convicted under section 4 of Act III of 1867 and sentenced by the Joint Magistrate (Mr. R. E. Hamblin) of Benares to fine of Rs. 2 or in default 7 days' simple imprisonment on 9th December, 1889, the Hon'ble W. Young, officiating Judge of the High Court for the N.W.P., ruled differently. He held that cowries were undoubtedly "instruments of gaming." He thus disposed of the Bombay ruling:

"A Bombay ruling in Queen-Empress versus Vithal Bhai Chand was cited in which the Bombay High Court held that 'money' was not an instrument of gaming within the meaning of the Bombay Gambling Act. Be that as it may, I think there can be no doubt that Act III of 1867 contemplates 'money' as being an instrument of gaming, for section 4 of the Act enumerates 'money' in the following connection—'playing or gaming with cards, dice, counters, money or other instruments of gaming.' Cowries are money and therefore Cowries under Act III. of 1867 must be considered instruments of gaming in certain circumstances such as are shown to have existed here."

AN Anglo-Indian girl is about to leap up to a high rank in the peerage. This child of luck is known to mortals as the daughter of Mr. Hugh McMaster, manager of the Kousanee Tea Garden, Kumaon. Mr. McMaster suddenly dying in February last, Miss McMaster returned to the family home in Scotland in the same P. and O. steamer with the Marquis of Ailsa. Him the Himalayan maid charmed. In the serene bosom of the Arabian Sea they eyed each other with interest, yet from a respectful distance. Thus they passed the frowning Gate of Tears. The raging Red Sea brought them nearer together, without much observation by their fellow-passengers. Then they were squeezed through the warm, not to say hot, Canal. The longer voyage of the Mediterranean offered many opportunities for improving the mutual understanding, until they were ushered into the great Atlantic. Love waxed as they steadily steamed up. The end could not be far off. At last, the billows of the Bay of Biscay rocked him into her pretty feet. The victory of Love was complete. The rest was mere matter of form of society and law. After his return home and to the wider society on shore, the memory of the Suen of the Sea still haunted his soul. He visited her in Scotland and renewed his offer and was regularly accepted.

The Marquis is no Verdant Green of a bachelor but a wary widower with children.

THE restless beggars, they are served right! It is hot in the hot season in Bengal, but they will none of it: They are off for the Hills. But there Nature is no more after their heart than down below. There they are damped by a succession of damp weather. But the soul of the grumbling race is not to be humbled. Overtaken by rains, pursued by clouds into their very drawingrooms, haunted as by a spirit of evil by the everlasting Drip, drip, or pat, pat, they are reduced to swear in vernacular or sing in verse. Thus poor A. D. C. in the Englishman:—

Oh! what can one do when it always is raining,
And mist clouds hang low on the thick-wooded hills?
When each stream is a torrent, and down to the valleys
Rush seething what once were sweet, murmuring rills?
No breezes are stirring, the rain patters ever,
There comes o'er my spirit a desolate feeling;
There's nothing to do but to sit here and grumble,
Because of the weather we get in Darjeeling.

The birds are all hush'd, not a leaf is in motion,
No sound can be heard but the drip of the rains.
What would we not give for a share in the sunlight
And warmth they are groaning at down in the plains!
O, but for an earthquake! or thunder! or lightning,
With frequent bright flashes th' far hills revealing!
All sounds would be welcome, instead of the stillness,
That comes with the weather we get in Darjeeling.

Indoors, there is nothing whatever worth reading,
No books of sensation from Thacker & Spink—
Out of doors there is nothing to get but a drenching,
No cricket, no badminton, tennis, or rink.
In this easy arm-chair, as I sit by the fire,
A weariness over me gently is stealing—

What's that? Not the tiffin gong? why, how I have slept!
Oh! bother the weather we get in Darjeeling.

Then down with Darjeeling, and down the Hills to the wanted plains! Hurrah for Calcutta!

THE O'Hara case will always be remembered with shock, as well by the people of this country as by all true Britons who care for the reputation of Christian rule in the East. There is but one light spot in that dark story of reckless murder of unarmed Indian villagers by British soldiers on the spree armed with loaded guns and their impunity through the forms of British law. And that is the benevolent provision sought to be made for the surviving family of the victim. Mr. Justice Norris from the bench suggested a subscription. Sir Steuart Bayley realized the duty of Government but scarcely rose to the height of the occasion. He granted the widow of the murdered man a pension of Rs. 5 per mensem. This was almost a mockery even to the poor Bengali peasant woman under her grave deprivation. There was some sharp criticism on the subject. What was more to the purpose there were gentlemen in England with English hearts watching the course of that calamitous episode, who moved the Home Government. It is satisfactory to know that, on reconsideration, the grant has been doubled. The widow has now a pension of Rs. 120 a year.

OVER the signature of "A Student" appears in (July 16) Thursday's Indian Daily News a long but well-written letter. If it is a student's composition, it is a remarkable production. Its calmness of tone, its moderation, its unvaried dependence on facts and reasoning, offer a marked contrast to the journalism of querulousness revelling in reckless assertion and unthinking abuse. Whoever may be the writer, he has done a public service by clearing up a subject which has been obscured by the lucubrations of the Bengali press, vernacular and English. The letter deals with the criticisms made on the recent appointment to the Law Lectureship in the Patna College. Speaking as the writer does from the side of the aggrieved, there is no absence of feeling in the letter, but it is a quiet feeling and its expression never degenerates into abuse. For that matter, the letter begins with a rebuke, thus :—

"The Amrita Bazar Patrika, the Indian Mirror, the Hindoo Patriot, and other papers of the same class are making a howl at the appointment of a Behari Law Lecturer in the Patna College, and are abusing Sir Alfred Croft for his doing a pure act of justice and recognising the claim of a native of the province, so emphatically enjoined by a recent circular of the Government. The empty patriotism and a desire for social union preached by these papers fade away as soon as their self-interest is concerned. Their professions of a desire for social unifications are very profuse when they try to induce the people of Behar to join the Congress. But where are those philosophical preachings of patriotism and love for their brethren now? The Patrika, in order to invoke the sympathy of the Congress men, attributes this simple case of pure justice of the appointment of a native of the province to a hatred on part of the officials towards the Bengalis on account of the Congress. If such is the idea of impartiality of the journals which profess to support the Congress movement, we can only say that the Congress movement has been only set on foot to satisfy the greed of the Bengalis. If the Government is against the Bengali on account of the Congress, how is it that two gentlemen of their province have lately been gazetted to officiate in posts which could only be filled by European Civilians? They are not grateful to the Government when any deserving merit is recognised, but as soon as any appointment is given to one outside their class, they begin to shower all sorts of abuse and charges of partiality and jobbery on the heads of the officials concerned."

We are afraid there is a good deal of justice in that rebuke. The writer exposes the recklessness of the complaint so energetically preferred in so many quarters against the Director of Public Instruction, in regard to the recent appointment of a successor to Baboo Nobin Chunder Dey, Lecturer in Law at Patna.

"Baboo Abinash Chunder Ghose is brother-in-law of Baboo Nobin Chunder Dey, the permanent incumbent. When the health of the permanent incumbent began to fail, he took leave on several occasions, and during his absence, sometimes with the permission of the Principal, and sometimes, when the leave was for a longer period, with the permission of the higher authorities. Nobin Baboo made his brother-in-law act in his place. Matters went on in this way for some time until the permanent incumbent resigned. Baboo Abinash Chunder Ghose went on officiating until the term of his appointment expired in December last. As the permanent incumbent had resigned, and the post had become vacant, the Principal invited applications from candidates. Many Behari and Bengali candidates applied, Abinash Baboo being one of them. At last the Principal, with the permission of the Director, selected a Behari distinguished graduate of the college, who has been appointed, and whose appointment has already been sanctioned by His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal."

That is a most satisfactory statement. The authorities could not have gone in a better spirit or way to fill the vacancy. We much regret the indiscreet criticism which not only unnecessarily harrasses the officials but causes alienation in our own people. There can be no hope of unification when one section cannot brook the advancement of another.

That Babu Abinash Chunder Ghose will complain is but natural.

He is no doubt hardly treated, but it is a case of misfortune rather than of injustice. He has been deprived of no right, though his claim has been over-ridden. And why should the newspapers clamour over it? It is entirely a personal and private matter. Baboo Abinash Chunder himself, if he is a true patriot, will console himself with the reflection that Behar gains while he suffers. What he loses will be a much-needed crumb of encouragement to a whole Province.

THE redoubtable Baboo Basak has given the world another surprise. He is coming—the conquering hero. From Kohima on the way he telegraphs on the 15th July a horrible story of outrage on a temple and plunder of houses, including his own, at Manipur, by two British military officers, Special Correspondents of newspapers, which occurred on the 19th June, and for which he could get no redress—not even a hearing from the authorities.

LAST Saturday, in the Brahmo defamation case against the Bangabasi, the Chief Magistrate sentenced the proprietor to six months' simple imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 100, the publisher to 3 months and Rs. 50, and the printer to Rs. 50 only.

WE have received two formidable-looking pamphlets, one containing the Memorial of Grievance, as it is called, of certain Mahomedan inhabitants of Moorshedabad, all of the Sunni persuasion, to the Lieutenant-Governor, complaining most bitterly of the outrage on their religious feelings committed by the Shias of the city, and praying that the Tabarrá and similar usages might cease; and the other embodying the documentary exhibits referred to in the said memorial in proof of its allegations. The memorial is a long and elaborate representation which criticizes the Moharram Festival, condemning it as anti-Islamite, and goes into the origin of the Shia sect and the causes of its maintenance. Apart from the present connection, this document is so important that we are reproducing it for the benefit of our readers. The case has been made out so clearly from every point of view, that we do not see how the memorial can be answered. It is very opportune that Sir Charles Elliott goes to Berhampore on the 22nd, for the question must be decided at once. The Moharram commences early next month.

THE BAKRID DIFFICULTY IN CALCUTTA.

A NARROW ESCAPE.

THE stern Semitic monotheism of Islam disdains the aid of superstitious or scenic accessories for support of the Faith. Accordingly, its Feasts and Festivals are few and far between. Of course, the Believers make the most of their opportunities, and there is more zeal evidenced in their holidays than perhaps in those of any other creed more rich in picturesque effect in the yearly round of worship. Indeed, their glum and grim earnestness frequently passes the bounds of social peace and order, in so much that their neighbours have reason to look forward with anxiety to the approach of their not even handful days of religious demonstration. Of these days, the chief is the Eedozohá, popularly known as the Bakrid. As the Mahomedan day of sacrifice, it is the aversion of Hindus, specially of the Vaishnav persuasion, and Jains and Buddhists. It not unoften becomes the day of conflict between the followers of Mahomet and those of Vishnu or Siva. On that day, from time to time, during a thousand years, many mosques and temples have been washed with the blood of their respective votaries. It is a day of trial for the guardians of the peace and of watchful anxiety for the people.

This year the great Festival fell yesterday, and had nearly proved disastrous to the peace of the metropolis. But the Police were wideawake and had been schooled by late reverses into wisdom, and managed neatly to tide over the difficulty. Or else, there were elements of combustion sufficient to ignite a great conflagration. There was sufficient misunderstanding and bitterness of feeling for a serious and bloody collision of races and creeds in the heart of native Calcutta, to which the attack in Circular Road in May last were a scratch.

The road called Machooa Bazar Street, which by a straight line connects the two main parallels of the town (Chitpore Road and Wellington-College-Cornwallis Streets), taps a filthy and formidable slum peopled by the wilder representatives of Islam of a floating character and by settled Sikhs and the descendants of the early Hindu owners of land in the quarter. Fifteen or twenty years back, few mild Hindus would have cared to venture out on a walk even in the day in that scowling neighbourhood. And, after nightfall, the boldest would hesitate to try that short cut instead of travelling by way of Colootollah Street. Matters are a good deal improved. Owing to a variety of causes, both Calcutta and her people are now better, and Machooa Bazar Street and Gera Talao Bustee are not the dreadful places they were. Still, the bad odour has left behind a memory and the old leaven remains. It is highly inexpedient to let the rowdies and desperadoes of such a quarter a taste of blood, and it is fortunate that they were not allowed the opportunity of having it.

In this Machooa Bazar Street, premises No. 4 is a mosque, called the Machuas' mosque, at which one Hafiz Mahammad Musa, of Jounpur, reads the prayers under the high name of Imam. The reader whose mind is filled with visions of the imperial domes of Delhi and Agra ought to be told that the mosque is an unpretending house of prayer, occupying not all two cottahs, for there is a Halwai or confectioner's shop which pays Rs. 11 a month as rent. The mosque has just two rooms belonging to it, one for prayer, and another used as a schoolroom for children learning Persian. On the West live Hindus, stalwart upcountrymen from historic Sassaram. On the North of the road opposite the mosque is the Sikh Sangat. Until of late, these heterogeneous elements had always been living in mutual harmony. This may seem strange, considering the ill repute of the place. But the truth is that the disturbing element was confined to the bloody Arabs, Africans, Malays and the more desperate of our own sailors (Khalásis.)

As the Mussulmans and Hindus lived peaceably as good neighbours in all other respects, so in respect of religion. Shias, Sunnis, Boras, Khojas, Saktas, Vaishnavs, Jains, Nanakshahis, were packed cheek by jowl one with another, and kept the observances of their respective religions, without the least occasion for mutual jealousy.

Latterly, the Mahomedans showed a disposition to mischief. The stereotyped method of spiting the Hindus is to threaten to kill a cow. It is impossible for races who daily live on the flesh of the cow to conceive how the very idea of such a slaughter puts out the Hindus, including Jains, Sikhs and all. The Machooa Bazarrees have for sometime been talking of the slaughter of the sacred animal, so the Hindus took good care that the horrid deed was not done. They mustered in force about the mosque on the day of the Bakrid to rescue the goddess incarnate by force and chastise the impious men. Last year, however, the Moslems gave the Hindus the slip and accomplished their purpose. Seeing on the premises cows evidently intended for sacrifice, the Hindus ran to the Police for assistance in preventing the outrage. The Police came with them only to find the bodies of the decapitated cows.

The simple Sikhs would in all likelihood have been "sold" again this year, but for the careful preparations of the Faithful. Thinking that the worshippers at the Sangat would take special precautions against a surprise and inflict on the Mahomedans a signal chastisement, the Imam, on Wednesday the 15th instant, sought the protection of the Police. The Police repairing to the spot for inquiry warned the Hindus of what was in the air. So they made a counter-move. On Thursday, they applied to the Commissioner of Police praying that measures might be taken to prevent so gross an outrage on their religious feeling as the killing of a cow. This was at two in the afternoon. The inquiry of Superintendent Lamb of the previous day had elicited the fact that it had never been the custom at the mosque to sacrifice cows, and that it was only in the last year that any cows were killed. The Hindu application also was made over to Mr. Lamb for report. The Commissioner was utilising other agencies. In the afternoon, he went to the house of Moulvi Abdul Jubbar, the Magistrate of the Northern Division, a gentleman of the highest probity and impartiality as well as unfeigned piety and, in consequence, likely to command the respect of his excited co-religionists. Mr. Jubbar promised to repair to the spot at 8 in the evening. Mr. Lambert preceded him there. Before him Mr. Lamb had gone and commenced his work at the Jorasanko Thana. This had the effect of drawing off the crowd from the vicinity in Machooa Bazar Street, so that the Commissioner did not find more than some five hundred men near the mosque. Of course, the presence of so many high officials had the effect of multiplying the crowd. Mr. Lambert found both Hindus and Mussulmans in an excited state and tried to reason with them.

He was joined by the Northern Division Magistrate, who impressed upon Hafiz Musa and his Mussulman supporters how it was not at all necessary, according to the doctrines of Islam, to sacrifice the cow at the festival of the Bakrid, and reminded them how they had always done at that very mosque without slaughtering the cow, &c. The ground being thus prepared, Mr. Lambert asked the Hafiz Saheb to give an undertaking that he shall not slaughter any cow at the mosque, otherwise he, the Commissioner, might be compelled to issue an order forbidding such an outrage in the midst of Hindu houses. On the other hand, the Hindus were also told not to disturb the Mahomedans when at prayer in the mosque with their conch-blowing and gong-striking. The end of the conference was most satisfactory. The Hafiz and another gentleman, on the part of the congregation of the mosque, signed an agreement not to kill cows, and the chiefs of the Sangat also agreed to desist from making any noise during the prayers in the mosque. Thus the two parties became friends once more, and the crowd quietly dispersed to their homes.

The Commissioner of Police showed great patience and judgment in dealing with an ugly business. It was a stroke of policy to take Moulvi Abdul Jubbar. Mr. Lambert had evidently profited by his recent experience. A weaker man might have been cowed down by that experience, but we are pleased to note that Mr. Lambert kept his head high as befits the Chief of the Metropolitan Police. His decision and the bold front he presented, coupled with the persuasion of the Magistrate, had the desired effect.

The accounts in the morning press are utterly unreliable. The crowd of 8,000 existed in the imagination of the writer. There was no suspension of traffic. And one of those who are said to have brought about the rapprochement pulled the strings from behind.

AN OLD ACQUAINTANCE.

THE hero of the famous Tangail case, Babu Sashi Sekhar Datta, of the Subordinate Executive Service, seems to be too ambitious for fresh laurels to discharge his official duties quietly and in a lawful manner. His doings at Tangail are too well known to require recapitulation. The Sessions Judge of Mymensing censured him severely for his "unworthy devices and subterfuges" and, among others, made the following observations with regard to him:—

"The Deputy Magistrate has prevaricated so much in other matters, and his whole conduct, as disclosed in his evidence, is so unworthy of the high and responsible office he holds, that I am unable to place any reliance on Babu Sashi Sekhar Datta's disclaimer."

On appeal, the High Court gave, on technical grounds, a little white-washing to the character of our heroic Deputy. But the moral turpitude of his conduct in connection with the case was so flagrant that the superior Executive authorities were obliged to order his removal to another part of the country, where he might begin life anew with a larger stock of wisdom. His new sphere of power was the Sub Division of Kandi, in the District of Moorshedabad, which he took charge of about the month of June 1888. We have not any authenticated papers before us as to his conduct here in the beginning. But if there is any truth whatever in reports, his Tangail experience fell flat upon him altogether. At any rate, there was a memorial against him by the people of the Sub-Division within a few months of his taking charge of it. An investigation was held thereupon by Mr. Dalton, the then Collector of the District, the result of which was that Baboo Datta received a warning, and the District Judge was ordered to submit a special report within six months regarding such of his decisions as might be appealed against.

The order of Government was no doubt well meant. But it led to a state of things which bordered on anarchy. The worthy Deputy's nervous dread of being reported against by the Judge made him so anxious to avoid passing appealable sentences, that persons accused of the most serious crimes were either let off scotfree or punished with only a nominal fine. Acquittals, summary trials and the harrassment of complainants became the order of the day. The criminal classes found their opportunity and made the most of it. Even the landholders and other respectable classes took advantage of the new régime in order to gratify their respective grudges against neighbours, to settle boundary disputes and to attain other similar objects. In fact, the lex talionis was directly favored by the new Hakim to such an extent that he not only preached and recommended it from his magisterial bench, but, in some cases, had it enforced before his presence, disregarding altogether of the dignity of his court.

This kind of leniency came to the notice of the District Judge and, being condemned by him, there followed a period of undue severity which, however, was of short duration, the sentences being, in the majority of cases, quashed on appeal. But whether lenient or severe in dealing with crimes and criminals, our Deputy Baboo never loses an opportunity to make the people under his rule miserable. We are told that his illegal orders, his variableness and his choice vocabulary of abusive epithets made his subordinates extremely uneasy and disgusted. At any rate, it is a significant fact that during his short but eventful rule three of the principal Amla, namely, the Sheristadar, the Nazir, and the Peshkar, retired on what pension they could get. The present Peshkar has also become so sick of his position that he has tendered his resignation, though it has not been accepted as yet.

Nor is Mr. Datta more affable or kind towards the Police. From the evidence given by him in the Tangail case, it appears that he was for several years in the department immediately concerned with crimes and criminals. To a certain extent, his sympathies and proclivities, as evidenced by his conduct, appear to be those of a Police officer. Whether that is so or not, it is said that, in displaying his command of Billingsgate and in enjoying the luxury of gloomy faces round him, he spares neither friends nor foes. During his brief reign of three years at Kandi, at least four gentlemen have successively held the post of his Court Sub-Inspector. One of these gentlemen reported to the District Superintendent about the treatment that he received at the hands of the Deputy. The head of the District Police settled the matter in a quiet way by transferring the wronged Sub. to another place. His successor also was regaled with similar treatment, but when he was about to complain to his superior, the proud sub-divisional ruler demeaned himself so far as to repair to the thana himself and to make an apology.

As a typical case showing our illustrious Deputy's carelessness and disregard for truth, we quote below the reference made to the High Court by the District Judge of Moorshedabad:—

1. Sabu Shaik complained against Gokul Mandal and others charging them with having committed rioting,..... The Deputy Magistrate drew up charge of rioting and theft; the accused persons produced evidence for their defence, which the Deputy Magistrate found to be wholly false, and convicted them of rioting,.....

2. A petition was presented by the accused persons praying that I should move the High Court to set aside the conviction on the ground that two witnesses for the prosecution Nayan and Ukhil...had given evidence in his favor but that their depositions were not kept with the record. In fact there was nothing but a very short cross-examination of these witnesses with the record--no examination-in-chief at all.

3. I called upon the Deputy Magistrate for an explanation, and he replied (see his letter No 235 of 14th June) "Nayan as well as another Ukhil do not appear to have been more than cross-examined." This appeared to me unsatisfactory, and I therefore by my proceeding of the 18th June called upon him to say definitely whether there had been in fact any examination-in-chief of these witnesses or not; to which he replied distinctly that there had not; his answer is given in the Magistrate's letter No 715 of the 28th June. At my request the Magistrate went to Kandi and made an enquiry in presence of the Deputy Magistrate, the result of which is that he finds that the witnesses were examined in chief, and that the depositions are not forthcoming. The Deputy Magistrate says, "From the discussion we have had, I think it very probable that Nayan and Ukhil were examined-in-chief."

4. I have no doubt that this finding of the Magistrate is correct, and that the first parts of the depositions which were recorded while the Deputy Magistrate was in camp were lost by the time of his return to Headquarters, and I think that it is to be regretted that the Deputy Magistrate did not admit this at once.

5. I submit that as the whole of the evidence taken is not upon the record, the conviction and sentence should be set aside; and if the High Court think it necessary to order a new trial, I think that it ought to be made over to another Deputy Magistrate.

The proposal with which the District Judge concludes his letter shows clearly what amount of confidence he has in the Deputy Huzoor. As the record was lost, it was plainly the duty of Babu Datta to admit the fact at once. But, so long as he found it possible, he tried to make his superior authorities believe that the witnesses whose deposition was lost were only cross-examined and were never examined-in-chief—a kind of explanation which reminds one of the story of the company of drunkards who, under the influence of liquor, killed one of their own in order to give completeness to a pantomimic representation of the Doorga Pooja and being brought before the Police, while yet tipsy pleaded that the victim of their frolic never possessed a head.

From the above letter of reference, it would appear that the District Magistrate was deputed to hold an enquiry as to the existence and loss of the records in question. This was the second investigation held by the chief controlling authority of the district regarding the official conduct of our hero. These repeated investigations naturally made some of the ministerial officers and legal practitioners of the Sub-Division special friends and objects of favor to their Huzoor, while those who refused to sacrifice their conscience for the purpose of ingratiating themselves in his good graces are, it is said, being made to feel at every step what ministerial displeasure means.

One of the complaints against Babu Datta is that he holds his Court generally till a very late hour in the night, so that the litigants and their advocates are put to great inconvenience sometimes. At any rate, we have before us an affidavit in which the deponent swears that his case was taken up at 9 P.M. although his Mooktear was in Court till 8 P.M., and was told that the case was to be tried the next day. This Mooktear is one of those who, it is said, refused to give evidence in favor of the Deputy Baboo in connection with one of the investigations held by the District Magistrate. We are not disposed to believe the charge of unfairness against our hero upon mere ex parte statements. But he has not evidently the confidence of his official superiors or that of the people under his rule, and we think that it would be a great relief to all parties concerned if the Government of Sir Charles Elliott would give effect to the recently gazetted order of his transfer, instead of allowing him to stick to his present post.

THE MANIPUR DEBATE IN THE LORDS.

ON the 22nd June, there was a sort of supplementary debate on Manipur—this time in the House of Lords. It was opened by Lord Ripon by a motion for fresh papers. He was of opinion that either the exiled Maharaja should have been restored to the throne or the actors in the revolt of September last punished. It was no wise policy to acquiesce in the result and yet punish the principal party in the revolt. Whatever the policy adopted, its execution ought to have been immediate, and carried out openly. He would not encourage the arrest of a man at a Durbar. He regretted that there were not more than forty rounds of ammunition for our troops, nor no guns taken. He thus condemned the "mediocrity" argument of the Under-Secretary of State for India in the Lower House:—

"One thing he was quite sure the Secretary for India would deny, and he himself felt bound to enter his strongest protest against it. They had been told in the other House that the true explanation of the conduct of the Government of India was that they made it the principal point in their policy to remove the Senaputti from Manipur because he was a man of great ability and force of character. The Senaputti, it appeared, was considered dangerous because he was able; and it was stated that the policy of successive Governments of India had ever been to systematically discourage talent, and always to reward mediocrity. In the first place, it was gross exaggeration to describe the Senaputti as a man of great ability and force of character, for he appeared to be possessed of no unusual amount of capacity. At the same time, however, he seemed to have been a man with an extraordinary amount of vigour and popularity among the Manipuris. Such rash explanations as those to which he had referred were capable of causing a great amount of mischief. (Hear, hear.) They would be repeated in every native newspaper in India, and discussed in every bazaar. They would be commented upon with pain by our friends, and would give secret triumph to our enemies; they would alarm the native Princes, while they would fill with just indignation the minds of many able men with natural and laudable ambition."

The absurd cry for a Foreign Minister for India, as might be expected, found no favor with Lord Ripon. He deprecated the idea of the Viceroy not being his own Foreign Minister in India, and believed such a change would be highly distasteful to the native Princes. Regarding the Manipur trials,

"he certainly was of opinion that condign punishment should be awarded to those who had had any hand in the massacre. But he had seen it stated that, while the Regent had been acquitted of complicity in the murder of Mr. Quinton and his companions, he had been condemned to death for the crime of high treason. He hoped they would be told by her Majesty's Government that it was not intended to carry out that sentence. To carry it out would be to weaken the effect of the punishment on the men really concerned in the murders."

Lord Ripon concluded his speech with a reference to the Queen's Proclamation, and urged on his brother peers to discountenance the annexation of Manipur:—

"What he was most anxious about was to obtain, if possible, from the Government a declaration of the principle upon which they intended to deal with Manipur. He most earnestly hoped and trusted that they would be enabled to say that they had no idea of annexation. (Hear, hear.) There were people always ready to cry out for annexation, but he hoped nothing would be done that would shake the faith and confidence of the native Princes, who believed that their rights rested firmly on the pledges contained in the royal proclamation, and that they would dwell in peace and security under British rule. (Opposition cheers.)"

The Secretary of State for India replied to the points raised by the ex-Viceroy. As to annexation, Lord Cross

"had no hesitation in stating, as a broad principle, that he and the Viceroy had not the smallest intention of adding to those territories of British India which were now possessed by the Crown, unless it became an absolute necessity to do so. Annexation in the present case would, in the first place, be a punishment upon a great number of people who had given no offence; it would undoubtedly involve an application of the cumbrous machinery of British law to Manipur, with considerable expense and trouble; it would also, perhaps, breed discontent among the inhabitants of a country where revenue collections had been so carelessly carried out, if they were properly conducted; and it might give to native princes a mistaken idea of the policy of her Majesty's Government. At the same time he thought the native chiefs, supposing the facts were such, after what had taken place, as to make it an absolute necessity for annexation, would see that the circumstances of the case were peculiar. Personally, he was decidedly against annexation—(cheers)—but he would give no opinion at all upon the annexation of this particular province until he heard the opinion of the Viceroy."

With regard to the question of punishment,

"he quite admitted there was a great distinction to be drawn between those who had been found guilty of murder and those guilty of making war, and they might trust that any recommendations made to the Viceroy to temper justice with mercy would have full consideration at his hands. But the views of the Viceroy, however, were not likely to reach her Majesty's Government for some little time, as three weeks had been granted to the Senaputti in which to appeal to the Government of India."

As to Member for Foreign Affairs, he disliked the idea. At the same time, "he was happy to state that it was in contemplation to strengthen the Foreign Department of the Council by the appointment of an Assistant Secretary."

Lord Cross claimed for the British Government the right "to settle the succession in all the dependent states under its rule. This was a principle which he believed was thoroughly understood, and if it were held to be true generally, it was more specially applicable to the State of Manipur."

Speaking of the September revolt, he continued:—

"There was no doubt that it was the Senaputti who was the cause of the revolt, there having been a quarrel among the brothers in regard to the succession, and the Maharaja, not being strong enough to hold his position, ran away. At any rate, it had been shown that the Senaputti was the leader of the revolt, and had used such powers as he possessed to the mischief of the State and the disturbance of the public peace. There was no doubt that he was a bad man and to say it was because he was an able and independent man that he was put on one side was to say what was absolutely opposed to fact and common-sense. Indeed, he (Lord Cross) found it difficult to understand how such a statement could be made, and if any words of his could have weight with the native Princes of India he was sure they need have no fear of any of their number being removed because they were able and independent. (Hear, hear.) On the contrary, such men would always be gladly welcomed by the Indian Government, the difficulty being not so much to remove them as to find them. (Hear, hear.)"

Lord Cross justified the order for the expulsion of the Senaputti, but repudiated any idea of treachery in his arrest at Durbar:—

"There were durbars and durbars, and everybody knew that in this case the durbar was to be a court, and that the decision of the Government of India would be pronounced at it. No attempt was made to induce the Senaputti to go to the durbar on false pretences. Personally, he should entirely discourage such a course as that of arresting a man at a durbar, and it appeared that an arrest in durbar was never thought of till March 21, and the Viceroy had no notice that such an attempt was to be made. (Hear, hear.) He knew it was said the Viceroy gave a qualified sanction to what took place: but it was one thing to authorise a thing, and another to sanction it after it had been done."

MONGHYR.

Jamalpur, July 15, 1891.

The flight of locusts has of late been greatly on the increase here. Their appearance in this part of the Province, has materially affected the local crops, &c., especially in Bhagulporc. I hear no less than 80 to 90 biggahs of land, containing indigo plants, have been spoiled. In fact, I do not remember such a very large number of them appearing of late.

Owing to a number of interesting criminal cases, the Monghyr magistrate's court is nowadays frequented by a number of Bengal Barristers-at-law, both European and native.

The new Agent, Major R. Gardiner, R. E., of the East Indian Railway Company, accompanied by the Chief and Consulting Engineers being out by special train for inspection of way and works on the line, paid a vast to the Locomotive workshops on Monday last, the 13th instant. They minutely inspected the rolling mills and other plant and machinery in the various shops.

The want of rain is keenly felt. In consequence of the protracted drought, the weather has become unbearably hot. The people can have scarcely a sound sleep at night. The cholera has already made its appearance, both at Jamalpur and Monghyr, two cases in the European quarter of the town having proved fatal. In the neighbouring villages, the disease has assumed an epidemic form.

A MAHOMEDAN MEMORIAL.

17. This difference about a single point naturally led to others. From secular to religious, the step was easy. Claiming greater fidelity to the interests of the Prophet's family than his own people, they came to profess more punctiliousness in regard to his teaching. The Schism was soon complete. Under cover of being more Mussulman than the Arabs--the offspring of the Companions of the Apostle of God--the Persians strayed farther and farther away from Islam. They made a lip avowal of the highest attachment to His Holiness Mahamad a convenient cloak for dethroning him--at least relegating him to a really subordinate position--in favour of his son-in-law. In their scheme, Hazrat Mahamad is a mere name--the instrument of Revelation to be sure, but of little practical moment in the worship of the Believers. His progeny are the more important figures, the centre of interest being his son-in-law. They tried to set up a Koran of their own, but failed. Of the Traditions of the Prophet which form the essential supplement to the Koran, they made light of, and supplied their own supplement, with anecdotes of their own creation and the explanations and casuistry of their own doctors. In fine, if they could not quite condemn, they tried to supersede, and where supersession was impossible they overlaid the canonical scriptures with new matter on which they laid the chief stress. They began with changing the well-known Mahomedan Confession of Faith by seating an impudent and blasphemous rider on it. The formula was, as it is and will remain to the end of time, "No God but God--Mahamad the Prophet of God." It was altered into--"No God but God--Mahamad the Prophet of God--Ali the Vicegerent of God." No more confounded heresy could be imagined. It was certainly a clear abanconment of the Faith foretold by the Prophets of the Favoured Race and revealed by the last of the Order. After that, nothing else need surprise. Thus, in their system the pilgrimage to the Holy Places--by which is meant Mecca and Medina--that pilgrimage which is the one visible mark of loyalty of the Believers towards the Founder of the Faith and the consecrated seats of his race--was to all intents and purposes suppressed. The Hajj was not interdicted in so many words, but came to be regarded as an act of superfluous piety. Their Holy Place par excellence is the plain of Kerbala, made memorable in connection with the martyrdom of Hossein, and the tomb of that Imam is the indispensable pilgrimage. The divine doctrine of marriage in the illustrious Koran they degraded by the intrusion of a system of unlimited concubinage under the name of Muta. Some of the details of their canons regarding the relations of the sexes are too horrible for mention. The acme of degradation was reached in the favorite doctrine of Talia, by which the Shia is permitted without reproach or sin to pass himself off as a Sunni, Christian, Hindu, Buddhist, or even atheist, when it suits him. This formal sanction of Hypocrisy in the most essential subject is the unenviable distinction of this truly Persian Creed. How different the example of the martyred saints whom these men degrade by professing to follow!

18. Such a miserable pretence of Religion--such an organization of falsehood and licentiousness in the name of Prophets and Saints--Your Memorialists might well ask a civilized Government to put down as a reeking nuisance. But Government is exceedingly scrupulous and cautious on this head, as the Government of aliens of a vast Empire distracted by innumerable varieties of faith has need to be. Nor do Your Memorialists care to see the heretics' descent to everlasting misery arrested by the fiat of Power, if the wretched men themselves do not see the error of their ways. All that Your Memorialists want is to have the excesses of bigots, schismatics and innovators stopped--to see the mischievousness of the sect in question punished and, above all, their attacks on the true Believers prevented.

19. Your Memorialists have represented Shism as the creation of Persian spite against their conquerors and converters by force. At best, it was the fond device of Persian patriotism. It was the only way the Persians could think of for nursing their self-respect as a race and preserving their individuality as a nation. This is proved by the subsequent history of the Schism too. Shiasm never spread. Indeed, it was never propagandist. It sufficed the Persians and they were content with it for themselves, without particularly caring to embrace other nations in the same communion. Originally, when the opportunity offered, some efforts were made in that direction, but without success. From first to last, Shiasm has not only flourished only in Iran, but has been confined to it. It has been an attribute of race, too, being confined to Persians or men with Persian blood. If it is found anywhere out of Persia, it will be found to have been carried there by Persians. That is the way it is met with in scarcely half a dozen spots in India. In Afghanistan, it is the faith of the handful of Kuzilbash--Persian emigrants, maintained by the rulers as a resource against the defection of the natives. The Empire of Islam is vast--more stupendous in extent than the dominion of any other Creed--extending from the shores of the Atlantic Ocean to the islands of the Indian and Pacific Oceans, from the Cape of Good Hope to the plains of Kamskarka, embracing a slice of Europe, a great part of Asia and nearly the whole of Africa. With the infinitesimal exception of Persia, the whole of that grand Conquest of the Faith is Orthodox ground. Even in Persia, specially in the bordering districts, there is a strong Orthodox minority. India has always been Orthodox. Formerly, Heresy was in some repute at some places under the influence of certain Persian families, as Fyzabad, Patna, and Moorshedabad. But this was mere seeming; it was, for the most part, an affair of the sound and fury of festivals and shows and superstitious demonstrations to which the original inhabitants of the country were partial. The heart of the country was untouched. The Hindus, ever ready for multiplying the members of their already crowded pantheon, gladly accepted a new triad consisting of Ali and Hasan and Hossein. The lower class of Mussulmans, recruited from the lowest classes of the country, with the Hindu instinct for tamasha fully developed, were also open to a little bribery with grants for the purpose of the Moharram. Then, women are everywhere inclined to superstition. Beyond these circumstances and the general drawback of ignorance in certain classes of people or parts of the country, India, from the Throne of Solomon to the Chittagong Hills and from Cashmere to Cape Comorin, has always been thoroughly Orthodox.

20. At Lucknow, indeed, there used to be great fuss about the progress of the "established Church." The Urdu newspapers talked of conversion to the Royal Faith en masse. Enquiry reduced the triumph of Shiasm to the king's sweeper and his castemen--if the most degraded of Hindu outcastes could be called of caste at all--having been tempted to improve their status by turning Mussulmans under His Majesty Wajid Ali Shah's religious instruction and auspices--Pinkish. That is about the sum total of any conversion on any scale. On the other hand, although the court was Shia, Oudh was Orthodox. The very District around the capital was Sunni to the backbone. Even at the capital, Sunnism exacted thorough respect. No nonsense of abusing the Leaders of the Faith would be tolerated by the formidable Afghan element. On the few occasions that offence, real or fancied, was given, the streets of Lucknow were drenched with blood from Sunni resentment.

21. As a rule, whether in metropolitan Oudh or in metropolitan Bengal, the Shia rulers or magnates were far too sensible to irritate the overwhelming Orthodox majority. They held their Moharram Festival and had their processions and their theatrical exhibitions and there was an end of it. There was no offence and there was no quarrel. The Orthodox themselves, many of them, in their ignorance or laxity, would have been sorry at the abolition of the demonstrations. Such as were emphatic certainly looked forward to the prospect of the holiday.

22. At all other places at Delhi and Agra and Hyderabad--Orthodox capitals, seats of Sunni power or influence--it was wholly different. There no such idolatrous exhibitions were permitted. There was toleration to Shiasm, but it was not allowed to shock the Mussulmans with the sight of the, to them, worst form of idolatry--the making the sainted Chiefs of Islam themselves the objects of idolatrous show and worship. Since then, with the British Ascendancy, matters have improved for the Shias. They have had more scope for their idolatrous zeal. Their public exhibition of passion at the martyrdom of Hossein was allowed to be conducted through specified routes in a quiet way. Still, much as under British protection they were relieved of fears from the overwhelming numbers of the Orthodox, the possibility of heretical impudence was out of the question. It was as much as the Shias could hope for that they should be allowed to go in solemn mourning procession to their mock plain of Kerbela to bury their mar-believe coffins. In those great Mahomedan, but not Shia, cities and such other places only, indeed, the Moharram becomes a tolerably respectable ceremony—a procession of mourning—dissociated from noisy street music and wild shrieking. The least disposition to noise and defiance of the general sentiment of Islam was sure to be visited with severe chastisement by an enraged people.

23. If Moorshedabad was somewhat of an exception, there was a particular reason for it. Though the established Religion of the Empire was orthodox, this city had become the capital of a Shia satrapy when the British came to power. And for a full century and a half it has been under the influence of a Shia court maintained by British generosity. The Feasts and Festivals and Shows of this Nizamut have been the wonder of travellers and the admiration of distant provinces. Happily, the Chiefs of the House have always borne their honours well and used their advantages of position with due moderation. Their Moharram exhibitions were brimful of pomp and circumstance and, above all, of noise, but they carefully eschewed every other cause of offence. There was no indulgence in that lowest dissipation in the name of religion—the Tabarra or showering of curses on the heads of the holiest Chiefs and Founders of the Faith. If on any occasion any individuals in the Nizamut processions ever broke out in anathema, the head of the Nizamut disowned him and apologised for the accident and endeavoured to remove all causes of irritation in future. The present Nawab Bahadur has followed this good example of his noble Father and his house. Indeed, he has, acting in the true spirit of this liberal Age, even gone beyond his predecessors in the right path. Unfortunately, there has come a great degeneracy in the Family, and, with one or two exceptions like Jaffer Mirza Saheb, his brothers are imbued with different principles. Without his wide experience, they see not with him, and without his responsibility for conduct they act not like him. Pampered in idleness, devoid of occupation, surrounded by worthless companions, they have grown up in a spirit of religious intolerance and persecution, which is a source of annoyance to their neighbours of other creeds. Their malevolence is naturally greatest against the Mahomedans of the Orthodox persuasion. Against them they have opened war with every sort of demonstration of insult towards Islam in its highest names that the fertility of Infidel ingenuity or the depravity of Infidel taste, might suggest. To begin with, they revived the blasphemy of the Tabarra. During the last Muharram, under their lead or countenance, this profanity was indulged in in the public thoroughfare, under protection of Authority as it were, certainly under the eye of the Police and magistrate accompanying the Shia Procession. No wonder that there was a scuffle between the Mahomedans and the Shias. That scuffle in due course went up as a subject for adjudication to the criminal courts, and the justice of courts was meted out according to their mechanical methods. It is usual in such serious breach of the peace cases in British Indian Judicature to punish both sides. To Your Memorialists's misfortune, even that partial effort at a truly blind justice was not observed on this occasion. Nor was this, as Your Memorialists have intimated at the outset, wholly unexpected. By way of fitting prelude, the Police arrested only the Sunnis, for the universal reason that these were poor, and for the special reason that they attacked with blows whereas the Shias, though aggressors, did not go beyond exercising their lungs. Thus disadvantaged, the aggrieved Sunnis were left no other way of showing how injured they were than that of bringing counter-charges against the Shias. No sooner had they taken this step than the members of the Nizamut family were fired with uncommon reverence for Authority and its Christian representatives. They frequently waited upon the British head of the District, and their demeanour was as modest as possible. Your Memorialists do not impute motives, but they must be allowed to lament culpable indiscretion in neglecting the decencies of official life. The Magistrate was but a human being and he should not have allowed himself to be the objective of pointed personal adulation, nor placed himself within the possibility of misunderstanding. There is matter enough in the records to explain the upshot of the two sets of cases, but the explanations popularly given in the District are not calculated to enhance the credit of Government. Nor can even sober men be wholly reconciled to the result that the Sunnis were punished and the Shias all let off, and this notwithstanding the Magistrate's frank admission that there had been the Tabarra pronounced—that gage of battle thrown to the Sunnis—in the Moharram procession of the 27th August last. The records in the cases have been printed and are hereunto annexed as a general Appendix for convenience of Government for reference. They will, it is believed, bear out Your Memorialists's remark that everything was done in these cases except that substantial justice which the people expect and without which mere technical accuracy is a mockery. As for political justice, it entirely escaped the Head of the eminently political District of Moorshedabad. It was justice of the same school as that of the Subordinate Judge of the Twenty-four Pergunnahs who lately, doubtless in accordance with the strict provisions of law and rules of evidence, decreed the mosque on the Upper Circular Road in Calcutta to a Hindu purchaser of the land on which it stands, to be demolished by him—a judgment which led to a formidable émeute. The Magistrate did not, in a place like Moorshedabad, recognise the need of teaching a lesson to the irresponsible rowdies, who, much more in fun than in faith, had started this new apple of discord among the Mahomedans. Still less did he perceive the prime and indispensable necessity, as a political measure, of condign chastisement on those who, in disregard of the Nawab Bahadur's manifesto, and in defiance of magisterial proclamation, had dared to indulge in the dangerous dissipation of the Tabarra in the streets of Mahomedan Moorshedabad.

24. Your Memorialists are far from expecting or even wishing to see men convicted on insufficient evidence. The punctiliousness of courts is the defence of the subject. It was generally believed at the moment that there was sufficient evidence against not the Shias only but individual Shias. The Tabarra is admitted by Mr. Luson. Can any reasonable man doubt that it was pronounced by the leading Shias or under their immediate auspices and personal protection? And was it not the duty of Authority to leave no stone unturned to gather evidence enough to have such dangerous peace-breakers and enemies of order brought to account? In the amenities of intercourse with the polished princelings of a pensioned court, the gravity of the issue was wholly ignored. Nothing in juridical literature or history is nobler than the emanation of the British mind that it is better that ten guilty persons should escape than that one innocent man should suffer. But that is a principle for courts and to be confined to courts. It would be out of place anywhere else. It would be simply dangerous in camps. The justice of states, too, is different. In the sphere of statesmanship, highhandedness may be true legality, and severity a roundabout humanity. Hence the extraordinary powers vested by law itself in the Executive. But even without recourse to extraordinary provisions, there was sufficient material in the three Police prosecutions of last year (marked A. B. and C. in the Appendix) on which the Magistrate could have come down upon the loudly disturbers of the public peace and reassured the great Mahomedan community. Instead of that, the way in which the riots were dealt with only promoted ill feeling between classes and led to no end of fruitless litigation.

25. Nothing can exceed the contumacy of the Moorshedabad Princes in this matter. They who should have been the last have taken the lead. Surely, it is not for this that they are maintained at the expense of the people. Prosecution or no prosecution, a warning—an unmistakable word from the Collector was sufficient to keep them straight. But that word has to this day been withheld.

26. Your Memorialists submit that even admitting for argument's sake the Shias to belong to Islam, the Tabarra can never be held to be a legitimate religious ceremony. It is not enjoined in either Koran or Hadis—the only two sources of Mahomedan Belief. Your Memorialists, having never heard any authority given by the Shias for the strange practice, conclude that it must be of no essential or obligatory character, and they have reason to believe that many good Shias omit it. Even taking those Shias at their word who insist on the indispensableness of the Tabarra, the proceeding is of a nature which cannot be tolerated in public. To allow it would be to set a most evil example of religious intolerance and quarrelsomeness to all denominations. To the Sunnis in particular, it would be at once an outrage and a challenge to prove the sincerity of their profession by coming to blows. It may or it may not be the duty of the Shias, professing as they do to be Mussulmans, to revile the first three Caliphs, friends, relations, and companions-in-arms of Mahamad and earliest members and Elders of his infant Church. There can be no question that it is the duty of the Sunnis to resent the insult to their Faith and its earliest revered Chiefs after the Prophet. Therefore a public Tabarra means a menace to the public peace and order—a call to zealots to shed blood. In the nature of things, therefore, if anybody could not hope to save his soul without the Tabarra, he must not shout it in the ears of any other man, and by no possible chance in the hearing of a Sunni.

27. This rule is everywhere followed. It is the rule even in places where Shia influence is paramount. And for very good reasons. It may be that a court is Shia, but then the country at large may be Sunni. And this latter is invariably the case out of Persia. In India, there are Shia Houses, once powerful and now pensioned off, as there are Sunni Houses—any number of them; but in not a single instance is there anywhere a Shia people. So throughout the world. Thus poor Shiaism out of Persia is per force condemned to nurse its provoking impudences and preposterous wrath in secret. Sometimes the Chief is Shia whereas his Minister is Sunni. Hence, in some cases from a expediency and in others in delicacy, the Tabarra is omitted, or, what is practically the same thing, perhaps relegated to the inmost recesses of the seraglio. At Delhi, at Lucknow, at Hyderabad, at Calcutta, there is no Tabarra. The law courts of Upper India, headed by the High Court, have pronounced against the Tabarra. The Chief of Indian Shias, His late Majesty Wajid Ali Shah of Oudh, proclaimed the Tabarra down. Nor is that all. Above every other authority in this question, His Majesty the Shah of Persia, the Caliph of the Shias, has formally forbidden it.

THE CAPTIVE LADIE.

By THE LATE MICHAEL MADHUSUDAN DUTT.

Reprinted from the Madras edition of 1849.

"And all around the dazzled eye,
Met scenes of gayest revelrie :—
For, here beneath the perfum'd shade,
By some bright silken awning* made,
Midst rose and lily scatter'd 'round—
That blush'd as if on fairy ground—
Bright maidens—fair as those above—
Sang softly—for they sang of Love—
How fondly in the moon-lit bow'r,
When midnight came with star and flow'r,
Young Krishna with his maidens fair†
Mov'd joyously and sported there—
Or, on the Jumna's holy stream‡
Where star-light came to sleep and dream,
From his light skiff, that sped along,
His soft reed breath'd the gayest song,
Which swelling on the fitful sweep
Of the lone night-wind's sigh—so deep—
Wing'd ravishment where'er it fell—
Love's accents in their aery spell !

"While there the bard in loftier strain,¶
Sang war and mighty heroes slain :
How when Nesumba's impious pride
Swell'd high like storm-lash'd ocean tide,
And made his very Mother Earth
Oft curse the hour she gave him birth,
And the great Monarch of the Sky,||
Realmless to other regions fly—
And quench'd the Brahmin's holy flame,
And curs'd—oh ! horror—Vishnu's name—
How then the Goddess§ from her throne
Descended to the Earth, alone,
And in the tyrant's noon-tide how'rs,
Like a fair Virgin cull'd soft flow'rs,

* The Hindus have no regularly constructed theatres. All their dramatic performances are displayed in the open air, under awnings put up for the occasion. This will, no doubt, remind the classical reader of the ancient Roman custom. Vide : Luciet : iv. 73. vi. 108. Plin. xix, 1-6, xxxvi. 15-24. For further information see Sir W. Jones' Preface to "Sacountala" and Wilson's Hindu Theatre.

† This refers to the "gambols" of the god Krishna with the milkmaids, which have furnished almost all the Indian dialects with innumerable lyrical Dramas acted during the celebration of the Festivals in honour of the numerous gods and goddesses who compose the Hindu Pantheon.

‡ Vindabonum, the favourite haunt of Krishna, stands on the banks of the Jumna and is still looked upon as a holy place.

¶ This is the subject of the "Tchandi,"—a poem which is ascribed to the god Shiva.

|| The giant Nisumba drove away Indra (the "Monarch of the Sky" the Indian Jupiter) from heaven.

§ The goddess Doorga—the martial consort of the poetic author of the "Tchandi."

Till thro' his chamber-lattice high
He saw her sporting joyously,
And sent to seize that lonely maid,
In Beauty's fairest blooms array'd—
Then rose the battle's dreadful yell,
And the fierce blasts of warriors' shell*—
For, lo ! that maiden—erst so fair,
Stood like a tigress in her lair,
And swept th' accursed race away
Far from the smiling realms of Day,
And banish'd Peace restor'd again
O'er hill and vale and mount and plain !

"Or,—how to Beauty's† lonely bow'r
The false one came at noon-tide hour,
And pluck'd its brightest—fairest flow'r ;
And on his aery-wheeled car
He wafted her to realms afar—
And how the Wanderer of the wood
Came home—but came to solitude—
And in his grief sought her in vain
O'er mount—in cave—by fount—on plain :
But when he knew the cruel hand
That tore her from her sunny Land,
How in the hero's madden'd ire
He swore in words—all breathing fire—
That he would cross the ocean-wave
And make fair Lunka all a grave,
And light a quenchless funeral pile
On the green bosom of that isle—
Incarnadine the very wave
That comes its fairy shores to lave !
And how with mightiest hosts he came,
As comes some whirl-wind winged flame,—
The very ocean wore his chain,‡
Nor could his onward rage restrain—
And how he wrought his work of gloom,
And made thee, Lunka ! all a tomb—
Left not a living soul to light,
The funeral lamp at fall of night,
Where calmly in their bloody graves,
The warriors slept by the moaning waves,
And won the bride, who was to thee,
The evil-star of Destiny !

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

INDIA has been called a Government of paragraphs. In some parts, it threatens to degenerate into a Government of play and pleasure.

THE Commander-in-Chief of Madras reached Bangalore on Tuesday. It is satisfactory to learn that Sir James Dormer has left Utakamund and devilling. They are now in for another diversion.

THE Governor of Madras will leave the same on the 7th August for Poona, in view of the cricket match between Bombay and Madras. The constitution of the Empire does not, we suppose, stand in the way of a proconsul or satrap leaving his post and province, any more than the constitution of another Empire interfered with the musical tastes of the Supreme Ruler during a conflagration of the capital.

OUR brethren in the press are unanimous in denouncing the sentence of capital punishment on the Manipur Princes and deprecating their execution under confirmation of the Viceroy. Herein they are acting as true Hindoos. For once at any rate the instinct of Hindooism is in complete harmony with legal justice and political expediency. The arguments used will not all hold water, however. One paper, conducted by a Hindoo gentleman who had been connected with the radical press in the United States, has gone to this length, namely :

"People's minds were full of misgivings when the passing of the Age of Consent Bill appeared inevitable. They felt that things would not go well in the country if the Bill were passed, and things have not gone well since."

We suppose now these writers will quote Sir Charles Elliott's Hoogly speech in support of their view that all the outrages and calamities which have since occurred, from the Manipur disaster to the scarcity in Madras, are, directly or indirectly, due to the failure of a knot of our Bengali agitators to bully Government into abandoning the Consent Bill.

THE Englishman has been inquiring into the story of outrages by British officers at Manipur, and reduces it to the following reasonable and credible proportions :—

"Two officers were out for a ride one morning, and saw a large house on the road-side, about quarter of a mile from the palace. The house, like many others in the locality, appeared to be deserted, and on examination this was found to be the case. The officers on entering the empty house saw signs on the floor which led them to suspect that Residency property was buried there. They instituted a casual search on the spot, and while so engaged were set upon by from twelve to fifteen Manipuris, who pounced upon them in a body. One of the officers was borne to the ground by the sheer weight of his opponents, and it is no exaggeration to say that for a time his life was endangered. Fortunately, after a fierce but brief struggle, the two Englishmen were able to beat off the gang of over a dozen Manipuris, and they then returned to the Barracks; the incident, as far as they are concerned, ending at that point. That an event so promising should end thus tamely did not, apparently, satisfy the artistic sense of Janaki and his friends, and they were at no loss for a telling dénouement. Luckily for them, in the very nick of time a disturbance took place in Manipur in which the Transport coolies looted some of the houses near the lines."

There are elements in the incident of which the malcontents will not be slow to make the most. It was an unfortunate occurrence, in the present state of feeling both in India and in England, and no doubt an inquiry will be called for from Head-Quarters and a report published. Meanwhile, whatever may be thought of the indiscretion involved, our contemporary's account will go far to reassure the unprejudiced part of the public that nothing shameful or tyrannical had occurred.

WE are glad to learn that the Bakrid festival at Durbhanga was a tame affair this year. The guardians of the peace were on the alert, ready in force for any emergency. But they were not called on to interfere. There was no slaughter of a cow, as on the last occasion, (near Baboo Brj Behari Lal's residence,) and no attempt even at it, and there was no disturbance.

TENNIS too is having its victims, like Polo. Two years ago, poor Colonel Robert D. Osborn died in London tennis bat in hand. And here at Durbhanga the other day Mr. Gwatkin Williams, manager of the local Raj, met with instantaneous death while at play.

BABOO Chandra Sekhar Bose, who will be remembered as an able officer in the Calcutta Municipality, from which he joined a responsible position under the Maharaja of Durbhanga, is now in charge of the Raj, pending permanent arrangements.

Mr. Phil Robinson, formerly of the Pioneer, who had lately been suddenly driven from the Sunday Times, which he had been editing some two years, talks of an action for libel against Mr. Augustus Harris, the proprietor.

THEY have opened a dhobikhana, called the Madras Bleaching and Ironing Company, at Triplicane, under the management of a Brahman graduate, Mr. A. Sambasiva Iyer. The rates are—for 4 washes per month, at 30 clothes a week all ironing only 12 annas. The rate is very cheap considering the promises made. The Company will make good all losses, the usual wear and tear excepted. The clothes will not be lent out but returned regularly duly washed. Infected clothes will be disinfected before washing. The preparations do not seem to be complete. The Company await public patronage to set up the requisite machinery. They deserve that encouragement. When will Calcutta have its dhobikhana?

Mr. Edward Hammond Hargreaves, of Melbourne, who obtained the reward of £10,000 offered by Government, and that of £2,500 offered by other bodies, to whoever might discover a payable reef of gold, and has been receiving from the Colony of Victoria a pension of £250 a year, turns out to be a bit of an imposter. A Parliamentary Committee of Enquiry of New South Wales now report that the credit belongs primarily to two men named Tom. brothers and another named Lister, though a reflection of the glory circles round Hargreaves as their predecessor and teacher. He instructed them in the metallurgy of gold, taught them the scientific and practical methods of seeking gold and the use of the many implements required. Thus they were able to go about in searching for ores to any purpose and, when found, to extract the metal from them. The master had given up the pursuit in disappointment, when the disciples, after no end of difficulties and trouble, brought him four ounces of gold extracted by them from ore of their own discovery. But Hargreaves had the meanness to abuse the generous confidence of these poor fellows. With their gold he set up discoverer. He not only defrauded Tom. brothers and Lister of their merit but also of its reward from the State and the public. Truth, however, will be out. After the lapse of many years the fact began oozing out. At first darkly hinted at, it was afterwards openly declared. And now, after forty years, it has been settled by a Committee of the Legislature. The pity of it is that only one of the long-defrauded discoverers remains to enjoy his deferred triumph. The two—one Tom and Lister—died without touching a pence of the land which their discovery converted into a Golden Lanka—an Eldorado. Will the surviving Tom receive any of his dues?

THE following notification, under the Indian Arms Act, 1878, appeared in the Calcutta Gazette of July 8, above the signature of the Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal :—

"The 30th June 1891.—With reference to the notification of the Government of India, Home Department, No. 2343, of the 2nd December 1890, amending clauses (3) and (8) of paragraph I of that Department's notification No. 518 of the 6th March 1879, the Lieutenant-Governor declares that the following officers of the Police, Forest, Postal and Jail Departments, employed in these Provinces, shall, under the amended clause (3) of the latter notification, be exempt from the operations of all prohibitions and directions contained in sections 13, 14, 15 and 16 of the Indian Arms Act, 1878, other than those referring to cannon, articles designed for torpedo service, war-rockets, and machinery for the manufacture of arms and ammunition :—

Police Department	... All Police Officers.
Forest ditto	... Forest Guards and Forest Officers of the rank of Foresters or above.
Postal ditto	... Superintendents, Assistant Superintendents, Independent Post Masters, Inspectors of Post Offices, Overseers and postal runners.
Jail ditto	... Assistant Jailors and all officers superior to them in rank.

The Lieutenant-Governor further directs that the following pensioned officers shall be exempt under the amended clause (8) of the notification of the 6th March 1879, referred to above :—

Police Department	... Inspectors of Police and officers of superior rank.
Forest ditto	... Sub-Assistant Conservators of Forests and officers of superior rank.

Postal Department ... Assistant Superintendents of Post Offices and officers of superior rank.
Jail ditto ... Officers above the rank of jailors."

Under the Government of India notification No. 518 of 6th March 1879, the following persons among others were so exempt:—

(3) all military and naval officers, all soldiers, sailors, volunteers, police officers, forest officers, postal officers, jail officers, serving the Government;

(8) all pensioned officers of the Native Army, and pensioned officers of the civil department who, when employed, were exempt.

These two clauses (3) and (8) were by the notification *No. 2343 of 2nd December 1890 changed into—

(3) all military and naval officers, all soldiers, sailors, volunteers and such officers of the Police, Forest, Postal and Jail Departments as the Local Government, by general or special order, may direct.

(8) all pensioned officers of the Native Army and such pensioned officers of the civil departments as the Local Government, by general or special order, may direct, except as regards the Punjab, to which Province the following clause applies:—

All commissioned officers of the Native Army, pensioned or on active service, such pensioned officers of the civil departments as the Local Government, by general or special order, may direct, and all non-commissioned officers and men of the Native Army under the circumstances provided for and subject to the conditions prescribed in section 12, paras 71, 72, 73, 74, and 77 of the Bengal Army Regulations.

The latest order on the subject not alluded to in the Bengal notification is No. 996, dated 4th June 1891, which amended clause (3) thus:

All military and naval officers, all soldiers, sailors, volunteers, and such officers of the Police, Forest, Postal, Jail, Salt, and Excise Departments as the Local Government, by general or special order, may direct.

As officiating Chief Justice of the Madras High Court, Mr. Justice Muthusawmy Aiyar is entitled to the attendance of two silver-sticks. But he prefers to be attended, like the Puisne Judges, by only one. He probably thinks one silver macebearer already too many for the pomp of the gymnosophist, or at least the consistency of the descendant of the Rishis who enters court in the simple covering of a dhotti and the antique purity of pedal nudity. It is a relief to know that he can rely on his own worth, without any insignia of office or external aids, to maintain the dignity of his exalted position.

THE new Rampore Council of Regency is reconstructing the administrative machinery. The old Superintendent of Police has retired and been succeeded by Munshi Abdul Majid Khan, an Inspector of Police in the Mainpuri district. THE whole East Indian community of the Indies may well be proud of the academic success of a young gentleman of twenty-two of their body. Francis Xaviour De Souza is a distinguished alumnus of the Madras University. He stood first in the B. A. with honours in two branches, English literature and science, and winning the first Government of India scholarship, went to England to study for the bar. Some two months ago, he won the 200 guineas prize of the Inns of Court in Roman Law and Jurisprudence. Since then, he stands alone in the first class in the Law Tripos of the University of Cambridge.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE serene dignity of the court and cabinet of Vienna has been ruffled by a—pamphlet. It appeared anonymously at Leipzig but is attributed to political intrigue. The German General Staff knows nothing about it. Meanwhile, Prince Bismarck's organ, the Hambürger Nachrichten, is popularising its contents. The pamphlet speaks contemptuously of Austria as a military Power. She does not contribute to the effective strength of the Triple Alliance and may prove in time of war a source of weakness. In the next conflict with France, she will not be able to protect the rear and flank of Germany. She has a splendid cavalry, but then the infantry is below par. The whole army is weighed down by anomalies and incongruities of all kinds, while it does not easily pass from a peace footing to one of war. Deficient in numbers and organization, how can it confront the multitudinous Russians who have profited by all the military progress of the day?

In England, the chief topic in military circles must be the expected resignation of the Commander-in-Chief. The Duke of Cambridge has made no secret of his dissatisfaction with his position—a dissatisfaction heightened to the wuthing point by the recent evidence of eminent officers at the Special Committee on Recruiting. On the other hand, the complaint has at length found audible expression that H. R. H. is in the Army what Lord Eldon was for a long course of years at the Chancery—an incubus. Considering his age and the demands of the hour, the C.-in-C. is evidently an anachronism.

WE learn with a shock and record with sorrow that the leading Bengali in Upper India is no more. The Hon'ble Baboo Bireswar Mitter, of Benares, died of cholera, last Saturday. Stupid and mischievous Hindu Orthodoxy will not, we are afraid, be slow to attribute his death to the rage of Ramji for his action in connection with the Bhadani temple and the displeasure of Vishweswar and the rest of the gods for his share in the water works in that holy city, while the NeoHindus nearer home will see in the occurrence another effect of the Consent Act. An enlightened Benares will surely yet arise to appreciate the transcendent merit of such men as the deceased. May we hope that there is already a decent minority to see things in the proper light and give honour to whom honour is due, who will in due form recognise the worth and services of Bireswar Mitter. His fellow citizens must always remember him with gratitude. He devoted himself to the city, and, so far as one man might compass such an object, made it an endurable place for human residence. To him is also due the new Benares drainage works. He was the soul of the Municipality.

THE Government of Sir Charles Elliott has cut the Gordian knot of the question of embankments. Nature's law is always for the best and he would leave her to her own course. Replying to the Moorshedabad addresses, at Berhampore, on Monday, the 20th July, he said:—

"The question of embankments was one of exceeding difficulty, and one into which he had partly come here to see for himself. The present inclination, however, of the Irrigation Department was to abolish as many embankments as possible, so as to allow the rivers to freely overflow the surrounding country and deposit its fertilising silt, and thus improve the later crops. This deposit, too, would also tend to raise the surrounding country above flood level and to keep the river in their beds. Embanking, on the other hand, meant that the river, bound to deposit its silt somewhere, had to deposit it in its own bed, the level of which was consequently raised. This meant raising embankments and and so on alternately, till the level of the bed of the river got to be well above that of the neighbouring country, and that a breach in the embankment at one point caused a terrible disaster. There was, therefore, no hope whatsoever that Government would undertake any system of embankments which was deemed to be a shortsighted policy of reaping the benefits of the present at the risk of future danger and loss, but that a policy would be followed of letting nature have her way and protecting the country by her own natural means."

The Moorsheadabad Association supplied the occasion for this declaration of policy. In their address of welcome they "craved the indulgence of His Honor's attention" to the "works and improvements which," they thought, "are necessary for the welfare and prosperity of this district," the chief among them being "Construction of embankments with sluice gates for affording protection against submersion of lands with crops by inundation, and for giving facilities in the way of irrigation."

THE Ranaghat Municipality must forego the honor and the satisfaction of the Chairmanship of Baboo Jogesh Chandra Pal Chaudhri. The Commissioners' appeal for reconsideration of the order nullifying his election has resulted in a stronger expression of dissatisfaction of Government with the Baboo and of doubt as to their wisdom. In forwarding the proceedings of the Commissioners, the Commissioner of the Presidency Division reminded Government that "the Baboo was practically convicted of knowingly allowing a riot that was attended with loss of life to occur in his interest; and that the Commissioners appear to underrate the serious character of the offence." He was therefore unable to recommend modification of the former order. The Government letter in reply to the Commissioner thus elaborates the offence of the Baboo in justification of the disgrace heaped upon him:—

"Sir Charles Elliott has carefully studied the judgment of the Sessions Court on the appeal of Jogesh Chandra Pal Chaudhri. It appears that three successive riots were committed in the interest of the Pal Chaudhri family, with the object of gaining possession of a certain ghât, and that the third riot, in which a man was killed, occurred while criminal proceedings were pending against the manager of their property in respect of the two earlier riots. It was proved that this manager, who was convicted under section 156 of the Penal Code, had his office in the house of Jogesh Chandra Pal Chaudhri, and the Sessions Judge held that the evidence showed that the latter did acts of management in connexion with the estate, and was actually at Ranaghat when the riots occurred. These circumstances raise the strongest presumption that Jogesh Chandra Pal Chaudhri must have known of the first and second riots if he did not himself instigate or encourage them. It is proved, however, that he did nothing to prevent the recurrence of similar disturbances or to censure the culprits; and the fact that a third riot, at which a man was killed, was allowed to take place in his interest, constitutes a very serious offence against public morality. For these reasons the Lieutenant-Governor is unable to modify the orders already passed, in which he pronounced Jogesh Chandra Pal Chaudhri unfit to be Chairman of the Ranaghat Municipality. The Commissioners should be desired to proceed to a fresh election under section 23 of the Act."

The Commissioners too come in for their share of the castigation:—

"I am to add that Sir Charles Elliott notices with regret the tone adopted by the Municipal Commissioners in dealing with this matter. He would not have expected to see such inability on their part to appreciate the sacredness of human life, and the duty towards the public which devolves upon a land-owner."

It is unfortunate that Baboo Jogesh was convicted. He usually keeps away from the management of his family joint estate and avoids the least suspicion of interference. He might have known of the riots, and not being of the disposition to put his finger in every pie, he perhaps did not think it his duty to take any active steps for their prevention. It is significant that three owners of the joint estate where the riot had occurred were prosecuted in addition to the manager. It is a barbarous law that permits every member of a joint family to be hauled up for an offence committed on the family estate. The present order of Government accentuates that harshness and awards additional punishment. Baboo Jogesh must console himself as best he may, and the Ranaghat Municipality is left no other choice but to elect another Chairman.

MR. Kelleher, District and Sessions Judge, has been put on deputation to inspect the Subordinate Civil Courts of Bengal for their reform. He commenced his special duty with the examination of the courts in the district of Hooghly. This deputation is independent of the High Court. Mr. Kelleher is, we believe, expected to report with a view to retrenchment where possible. We hope he will see how the ministerial officers do their work. Here is the experience of a Subordinate Judge in the N.-W. P. We quote from the pamphlet "The Police and a Gambling Case" by Baboo Sanwal Singh, Subordinate Judge, Mizapur:

"The majority of the ministerial officers exact as much as they can. Copies are not easily obtained unless the copyists are illegally paid. In the absence of such a payment, the preparation of the copy is, unnecessarily, delayed; and if the matter goes up to the notice of the presiding officer a report is submitted by the official in charge of the record, who shares the spoil with the copyists, that the record is not to be found, owing to its having been misplaced. The poor applicant for the copy, then, takes into consideration the losses occasioned by attendance, the amount of necessity for the copy, and the friction that is to arise between him and the ministerial officers, and thus at last is compelled, by dint of circumstances, to consent to illegal payment. The execution clerks in civil courts are, generally, paid to expedite execution work. The readers in civil and criminal courts have a very handsome income, in the way of illegal gratification—the latter far outrunning the former. Other ministerial officers also levy, within their respective domains, as much as they can."

The Ameen of Civil and Revenue Courts do no business unless an illegal fee is paid. Some Moonsarins also levy this blackmail. Registration mohairs raise innumerable impediments unless they are illegally fed."

Will the special report of Mr. Kelleher take note of these impediments to public business and the inconvenience to suitors—the despair of honest men? The law severely condemns these practices and yet they are rampant in the courts administering the law.

THE following is an extract from the Report of the Director of Land Records and Agriculture, Bengal, for the year 1889-90:—

"At the conference of the Directors of the Department of Agriculture held at Delhi in 1888, the question of relieving the surplus population of the overcrowded districts was discussed and it was suggested, with reference to the congested districts of Behar, that it would be desirable to obtain and circulate information as to the precise terms on which lands could be had in Burma, the nature of the soil and the prevailing climatic conditions. The Government of India subsequently expressed a wish that the Government of Bengal should depute an officer to Burma, for the purpose of discussing with the local authorities, the procedure which should be adopted in order to attract settlers from Behar and the terms on which lands might be obtained. In March 1889 it was suggested that the most practicable way to test the feasibility of promoting emigration to Burma would be, to take some representative Zemindars and capitalists to Burma, to show them the lands that may be available for settlers from Behar, and to let them decide for themselves whether it would be desirable for them to take such lands, and to settle Behar cultivators in them, on such terms as might be agreed upon. This proposal was accepted by the Government of Bengal and I was deputed, accompanied by Rai Jai Prakash Lall, Manager of the Dumraon Raj, Mr. Hudson, Secretary, Behar Indigo Planters' Association, Mr. G. Walker, of Messrs. Gisborne & Co., and a party of cultivators from Dumraon. The results of the visit were:—

(1) That detailed rules were drawn up and approved under which land can be obtained in Burma, on very favourable terms by Behar cultivators and capitalists.

(2) That Rai Jai Prakash, Manager, Dumraon Raj, applied for and obtained a grant of 15 thousand acres of land in one district, for settlement upon it of Behar cultivators and that another Behar gentleman applied for and obtained a grant of 15 thousand acres in another district.

(3) That the Chief Commissioner of Burma undertook to pay a subsidy of Rs. 8,000 per annum to the British India Steam Navigation Co., with a view to encourage immigration to Burma, on the condition that the Government of India or Government of Bengal was willing to pay a similar amount for encouraging emigration from Behar. The precise terms on which this subsidy is to be granted are still under the consideration of Government."

Who is the "another Behar gentleman"? Surely, he is entitled to be mentioned in a matter which concerns Government and the people. Is Mr. Finucane ignorant of the gentleman's name? or is the name unpronounceable?

THE Mahant of Tripati sentenced to imprisonment for misconduct in connection with the buried treasure of the temple in his charge, has been released from jail before his time. By his good conduct he earned a three weeks' respite of his sentence. A large number of persons waited at the gate of the Vellore Central jail to welcome him back to society, but not before a purification. The released Mahant was taken to Bhyragi Mattam in the Vellore town, where the purificatory process was gone through. Though he was not put to strict discipline in jail and his comforts were specially attended to, he is very much reduced in bulk. The indignity of the punishment to a man accustomed to receive divine honours—the loss of liberty to a Prince of the church of a joyously free and easy life—drives, we suppose, the superfluous fat out through all the pores of the body. His Holiness next proceeded to Tripati where too a welcome awaited him and he was taken in some pomp to his residence.

These demonstrations were a mistake, from every point of view, as much as the public petition which was presented, by our Hindu brethren of the South to the Governor, for mercifully setting him at large when he was first convicted and sentenced to jail. There was not a single element of triumph in the business, on the contrary, there was every element of degradation and woe. As a Hindu gentleman, to say nothing of his ecclesiastical eminence, his future, if he would but accept it, was clear from the moment he was adjudged a felon.

We wish the Mahant Maharaj could say—

all is o'er

For me on earth, except some years to hide

My shame and sorrow deep in my heart's core ;
instead, we think we hear him sing to a different tune, scouting shame and sorrow,

These I could bear, but cannot cast aside

The passion which still rages as before.

Then Heaven help you, Mahantji ! For, if again you are caught tripping your disciples and clients will not soon have an opportunity of receiving you out of Government residence.

THE following appeared in the Englishman the other day :—

"A wellknown native gentleman writes to us :—It is with deep regret that I inform you of the precarious condition of our much beloved and venerable Pandit Iswar Chunder Vidyasagar. It was he who in conjunction with Lord and Lady Canning and Mr. D. Bethune established the Bethune School in Calcutta. It is he who is trying to raise the Santhals from their ignorant state by establishing a school in their midst. Our ex-Lieutenant Governors, Halliday, Grant, Beadon, Richard Temple, and men like Seton Keer, Wakoob were his pupils when he was a Professor in the Fort William College. He was for some time Principal of the Sanskrit College and greatly raised its character. He was the first to introduce the system of widow remarriage, was a personal friend of Sir William Mansfield, and is the proprietor of the Metropolitan College. Surely here is a man whom the enlightened among his countrymen should delight in honouring ; and their admiration might well take an enduring and commemorative shape."

Is the author of that wonderful contribution a wellknown native gentleman? Our contemporary must have taken him at his own description. He is a wellknown gentleman by himself, though, to be sure, he does not know those not to know whom argues himself unknown. That paragraph contains almost as many blunders about persons as there are names in it. Lord and Lady Canning had nothing to do with establishing the Bethune School, which was founded before their time. Of course, Pandit Iswar Chunder Vidyasagar could not have joined them in establishing it. Nor did he join Mr. Bethune in the work. The fact is at the time when the school was founded Vidyasagar was not yet the prominent person that he became since. Another Pandit occupied the position of vantage. The philanthropic Law Member's Pandit coadjutor was the late Madan Mohan Tarkalankar, wellknown as the Hon'ble Mr. Bethune's "My dear Madan Mohan." That it is Vidyasagar who is trying to raise the Santhals from their ignorance by education, will be news to most. We thought that that credit belongs to Christian missionaries. Vidyasagar has lived among the Santhals and may have assisted those of his neighbourhood, as he has assisted his countrymen in other parts. But if he had organized any large measures for the education of the aborigines, we should have heard.

The sentence about the galaxy of his pupils is a pointless exaggeration. We very much doubt that he taught them all. But even if he did, what then? There are dozens of Munshis whom nobody knows who can produce dozens of such certificates. And who is this Yacoob Khan? Vidyasagar might have given lessons to Yacoob's grandfather not to Yacoob.

Two of our most well-known men who had long been ailing have, of late, been brought very low, to the anxiety of their numerous friends. Both are still bad, but Raja Rajendralala Mitra is without any immediate fear, unless indeed some new complication supervene. Pandit Iswar Chunder Vidyasagar, however, is reported to be somewhat better. Having been given up by practitioners of different systems, he has reverted to his own. Unless it be a symptom of delirium, that is a good sign so far as it evidences stamina. His chief enemies may be his friends.

THE Government of India have forwarded the representation of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce for reform of the Sea Customs Act, to the Government of Bengal for consideration and report. We noticed the Chamber's letter in our issue of the 11th July. It will be found that the Chamber ask for revision generally of Act VIII of 1878, and lay special stress on the repeal of the fee of one per cent on the value leviable on goods shipped after the grant of port clearance to a vessel, and press for the replacement of the Indian by the English system, under which exporters of goods on which no drawback is payable are permitted within a week after the departure of a vessel to present a specification of the goods shipped by that vessel, the taking out of shipping bills beforehand being a great inconvenience and hindrance to trade.

In forwarding that representation to the Bengal Government, the Government of India indicate the direction wherein immediate reform is possible, and virtually reply to the whole letter. Their despatch alludes to the Departmental Committee which has been sitting in London for some time past, to consider and report upon a uniform method for obtaining and recording statistics of imports and exports throughout the British Empire. They would await the Committee's report for their own action in the present matter. Even if that Committee recommended the retention in the United Kingdom of the present system, the Government of India would then consider whether the English system is complete for all necessary information for Government purposes or applicable to the conditions in India. It is questionable whether the previous shipping bill system can be relaxed in favour of that substantial proportion of trade between India and other countries in the East carried on in a more or less small way by natives of India, by Chinese and other Asiatics whose business is in many cases occasional and retail rather than regular and wholesale. These and occasional shippers and such Europeans who ship goods on their own account when proceeding home in the same vessel with the goods, or leaving Calcutta immediately after transacting a business which brought them out, it would be difficult to get at. The English system may therefore, if at all, be applied to only established firms of merchants or agents. The Government letter says the proportion of relands and short shipments is small and the trouble saved by the abolition of these can not be so appreciable as to weigh against the disturbance of a system which certainly furnishes more accurate returns than can be expected from the proposed one.

The Government of Bengal are asked to consult the Collector of Customs, Mr. Scoble Armstrong, when he returns from England, where he is engaged on this very subject, enquiring into the working of the English system. The Government of India recognise the hardship of the fee of one per cent. leviable on goods shipped after the grant of port clearance, and enquire whether there are special reasons for its continuance. In the Government's opinion, however, there is not yet sufficient justification for a general revision of the Sea Customs Act and the appointment of an expensive Committee for an enquiry in that behalf. The Chamber must furnish specific illustrations to prove their general statement of the inappropriateness of the Act to present conditions and requirements to lead the Government to move in the matter.

THE following has been going the round of the Press throughout India :—

"'Camille' and the Governor of Brisbane. —Some sensation has been created in Brisbane by the incidents connected with the performance of 'Camille' by Mr. Charrington's Company. The acting Governor, Sir Arthur Palmer, had consented to attend, and a large and brilliant audience filled the theatre. After the fall of the curtain on the first Act, Mr. Charrington came forward and read a letter from the A. D. C. to the Governor stating that 'His Excellency, having read the book which the play "Camille" is written from, objects to be present with ladies at a play of its character'."

The anecdote, we hope, is all right in the main, having been taken presumably from some trustworthy original. It is evident, however, that those who are thus retailing it in this country have the haziest notion of the locality to which it refers. This geographical uncertainty has involved our good contemporaries in a conflict with grammar. We know no such appointment as that freely given to Sir Arthur Palmer. Where is the state, or island or colony of Brisbane? There is no Governor of Brisbane any more than of Calcutta. There is, of course, a town of that name, but of inferior importance, having, although a capital, only a population of some 70,000. Brisbane is the seat of the Governor of Queensland. Even as such we can scarcely reconcile ourselves to the "brilliant audience" at its theatre. It is not a land of, or for, "society" men and women. We doubt whether, with the exception of the Governor and the Chief Justice and one or two others lately imported from the Old Country, there are any gentlemen to be found in the Colony.

ALTHOUGH Mr. Rattigan has not yet taken his seat in the Supreme Legislative Council, we see that at the last meeting of the chamber, on Thursday morning, he was put on the Select Committee to which the Christian Marriage Amendment Bill was referred for report. Mr. Rattigan is not only not at Simla but is not even going there, just at present at all events. Our private advices from Lahore under date the 20th instant report that that gentleman had been suffering from influenza and that he was on the start for a change to Cashmere. It is understood that after a month's stay there he will proceed to Simla.

OH the times! Oh the manners! The venerable Father of the Indian Press has been elaborately hoaxed and neatly "sold." There is not the slightest foundation for the rumour in the Indian Daily News that "Nawab Abdool Luteef Bahadoor, C. I. E., is engaged as a Political Secretary to H. H. the Nizam's Government" and that he goes "to England by order of the Nizam's Government, in the interest of the Hyderabad State, about the middle of September."

We need scarcely say that the appointment, in the same paper, of the soi-disant Prince Zaigoomud Dowlah "as Chief Secretary to His Highness (the Nizam) in the Judicial and Political Departments of the State, on the monthly stipend of R. 3,000 with other allowances, as house rent, carriages," &c. &c. &c., is a mere paper appointment. Prince Zaigoomud Dowlah had the satisfaction of seeing himself similarly appointed, not many years ago, as Hindustani Tutor to Her Majesty herself. Next we will find him in Cabool as the chief adviser of the Ameer. All who know the Prince know what faith to place on these announcements. Dr. Pentecost's educator "Mr. T." ought to know him; he will discover that in drawing the long bow, Bengali Pandits, whether Professors or Principals of colleges or private tutors of Europeans, are but poor sportsmen before the bolder spirits of Upper India who, inheriting the traditions of degenerate Durbars, have attained perfection by constant practice.

The good Nawab's name, we are afraid, is dragged in to put an air of probability to an impossible story.

REIS & RAYYET.

THE THREATENED SIKH WAR IN CALCUTTA ARRESTED.

SINCE the Shambazar riot over a mosque, the Calcutta Police has had no respite from religious affrays. Last week we reported a threatened fight between the Sikhs and Mahomedans in Machooabazar Street, in connection with the Bakrid festival. The Mahomedans and Sikhs having become friends, the wise men of the Sikhs discovered that they had still one chance left them—that of falling out among themselves. They had already a little split in their body which they now deliberately proceeded to widen into a regular raging gulf. Commanding cash and enjoying leisure, the chief men among them readily caught the infection of the wealthy Oswals, who recently spent three lacs in proving whether or not one of their young men who, permitted by their own rashness to learn English, had been to England, had, on board and during his stay in Europe, subsisted on air or, at most, on Fruits and Farinacea the Proper Food of Jain Man, strengthened by a lacteal beverage drawn direct from Nature's taps, and washed down by Adam's ale, uncontaminated by foreign touch. There is a constitutional difference, however, between the two peoples. The Jains in their civil wars fight only in the legal field, and even there they confine themselves to the civil side. Men calling themselves Sikhs can scarcely be trusted to be always so moderate.

The Punjabees of Calcutta are divided into two parties over one of their community accused of unorthodox practices and therefore declared ineligible for admittance into the Temple—Sangat—at Narcoldanga within the jurisdiction of the Sealdah Magistracy. The Police apprehending a row, applied to the Deputy Magistrate Moulvi Syed Mahomed for process against some of the leading Sikhs to shew cause why they should not be bound down to keep the peace for one year. The parties summoned being residents of Calcutta, demurred, under a ruling of the High Court, to the Sealdah jurisdiction. That counsel should make the most of this plea was but natural. But it was a pity that an able advocate should forget the respect due to the court—the court even of a Deputy Magistrate. Mr. Garth pressed his point with extraordinary fury on Saturday last and, under taunts and threats, almost demanded the immediate dismissal of the complaint. Luckily for the morale of subordinate judicature, he had a strong presiding officer to deal with. Moulvi Syed Mahomed Khan maintained his temper, kept the enemy at bay by his intelligent urbanity, tortured him with his serene forbearance, and in fine adroitly preserved the dignity and credit of the court. It was true that the contention of Mr. Garth was nothing recondite, that the feeblest intellect could understand it, that, as he repeatedly loved to remind the court, a child of six years with just half an eye could see the point raised in favour of his clients. But as the authority relied upon was not the Code but a judicial ruling modifying the Code, and as there were many courts and numerous Judges, and there had been no argument on the other side, there was a possibility of mistake, and specially as the case was one of the last importance, involving the peace and safety of a populous suburb right on the skirt of the metropolis and near the terminus of a whole system of railways, it was necessary to be cautious. A few hours' delay surely, would prejudice no interest. Such, at any rate, we for one take to be the tenor of the reflections that passed through Moulvi Syed Mahomed's mind as he sat impassive through Mr. Garth's badgering. The Magistrate took time till Monday next for his final order. This exasperated the Counsel who characterized the order as ingenious, as he was come to march off his clients with triumph then and there. He now applied to the court for review of the order made, but to little purpose.

The final order was passed on Monday, when the Magistrate found that he had no jurisdiction. Thus set free, the parties prepared to celebrate their triumph and a religious feast in the Narcoldanga Sangat garden the next day. Immediately after the Magistrate's order was passed, an application from the less wealthy party was made to fix the hours for the respective parties to perform their religious ceremonies, which, under a ruling of the High Court, the Magistrate was competent to do. This the Magistrate would not do in the absence of the other party. But how to prevent a row between the two parties the next day in the garden? was the question for immediate solution of the Police and the Magistrate. The parties could not be bound down for peace. But a fight was imminent. The Police had information to that effect which there was no gainsaying. The Sikhs were openly saying that they would drain blood rather than be ousted from their temple. The situation was serious. The Magistrate was now put to his last resource, and made the extreme order, under section 144 of the Criminal Procedure Code, prohibiting any person professing the Sikh religion from being in or entering the garden. The matter being urgent, he himself drove to the Sangat to promulgate his order. The garden is now protected by the Police. The next day an application was made to amend the prohibitory order, but as there was still no disposition to settle the difference amicably among the parties, the Magistrate would not even moderate his order.

THE PERSECUTION OF THE PRESS.

THESE are hard times indeed for the Indian Press—native and English. It has always had a melancholy history. In its earlier days, it lived on sufferance and its annals were illustrated by the sufferings of every editor worth the name, from Hickey to Buckingham. With the enfranchising Act of Sir Charles since Lord Metcalfe, a new era dawned on the Press—an era of safety and honour and prosperity. In course of time, however, multiplication reduced the honour and competition whittled away the prosperity. So far as the native Press is concerned, it had never any prosperity to boast of. Still, there was safety for the Press—every side of it. Not so now. The Press has turned into a noxious trade most unfavorable to the liberty and substance of those that engage in it—specially the native part of it. The position of the Native Press was bad enough; of prospects it had none, but it was at least tolerably protected by the laws and public opinion, European and native. Now-a-days, it seems to be at the mercy of any vindictive man or any obscure magistrate. The higher courts may aggravate the mischief. The Executive looks on the wreck of institutions as though it enjoyed the fun. The Press, always a thankless occupation among us, has now become a truly hazardous one. Not only journalism does not pay, but journalists, proper and constructive, on all sides, are being heavily fined and sent to prison in shoals. The law of libel of the Indian Penal Code is harsh in all conscience. And its administration has been outrageous. The proprietor, the editor, the publisher, the printer, in fact every body connected with a journal, may be hauled up for defamation. They may be summoned to answer the charge in any part of British India, however distant from the place of publication. The word "publication" has been given free and unlimited interpretation. The presumption is always against a journal. Mere receipt of a paper in any place howsoever it may happen to get there, is its publication in that locality, and is by itself evidence against the journal without any other proof, or any proof to the contrary by the accused. Any person not directly connected with the bringing out of a paper may all the same be prosecuted as an abettor. Not only is the equity of the matter ignored but there is an entire confounding of the true nature of either journalism or defamation. Nor is the spirit of the law any better regarded. Surely, the writer of any defamatory matter is the real culprit, the publisher and printer being technically liable under the law. In the absence of the writer, these may be punished, but it is a waste of power and a cruelty to be severe with them. Such is the law, and its policy is plain. But why touch the poor editor? Nowadays, he is much in request—though not for his good.

The proprietor too has come in for a considerable share of attention and—in carceration. He might be perfectly innocent of what is being written in the paper, yet he must not only suffer in civil damages but must be hounded as a felon. The native press may originally be to blame for the present state of things. We are afraid it has been much to blame, though probably half a dozen or so of journals only are guilty of causing that exacerbation of feeling to which the dead set owes its origin. Be that as it may, can their laches, or the laches of the whole native Press, be any justification for distorting the law? It is a horrible distortion that we suffer from. No more melancholy travesty of judicature has ever been exhibited than the present administration of Chap. XXI, Act XLV of 1860. Nor can there be any propriety in amending the law so as to fit it into the present rulings. Justice lies the other way. The Press is under the evil eye of Power. Journalism needs protection.

THE TWO RECENT PRESS CONVICTIONS FOR LIBEL.

NOT long ago, native society throughout India received with a shock the news that all was up with Baboo Mahendra Nath Chatterjee of Mhow. The leader of the educated natives of the place and introducer of civilization in Central India, had at length been deposited within the four walls of the jail. As editor and proprietor of the Eastern Herald, he was sentenced by the Sessions Judge of the Indore Residency to 9 months' simple imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 1,500, for defaming Captain Norman Franks, English Secretary to the Maharaja Holkar. Baboo Chatterjee has appealed to the Viceroy for mercy. He complains that he has been hastily punished without being fairly allowed all opportunities for making his defence. True, all the formalities of the law were gone through, but there was a preceptancy which greatly prejudiced him. He received on Good Friday eve the summons for his appearance before the Residency Magistrate on the Saturday following. The same day, Saturday, the 28th march, 1891, the Magistrate committed him to the Sessions, binding him over in his personal recognizance of Rs. 500 to appear at the Sessions. On the 9th April, he was convicted and sentenced. On Saturday the 11th April, he put in a preliminary petition by way of appeal to the Agent to the Governor-General for Central India exercising the powers of a High Court, praying for suspension of sentence, and his release on bail, and for permission to file supplementary grounds of appeal. The Sessions Judge Mr. A. Tucker, as First Assistant to the Agent, at the presentation of the petition, enquired if the fine had been paid, and being informed that the prisoner wanted a few days to pay it in, on ample security being taken if necessary, refused to grant any time and threatened realization of the fine unless paid by noon of the following Monday, the 13th. The fine was duly paid, one thousand of the fifteen hundred going by order of the Judge to the Captain who was about to go home. A fine family sort of arrangement! Here then was disclosed the cause of the cruel speed with which the fine was realised. Two days after, on the 15th April, the Agent, Mr. R. J. Crosthwaite, without hearing Counsel, passed an ex parte order on the petition of the 11th, refusing the prayers and fixing Saturday—that is the 18th at 5 P.M., for hearing of the appeal. That order was received by the petitioner's solicitor on the 16th.

There was thus not enough time to engage and instruct Counsel from Bombay as the petitioner intended, or to prepare and submit the supplementary grounds of appeal. The petitioner was represented at the hearing of the appeal by a Pleader from Khandwa, who could not be fully and sufficiently instructed. That appeal was dismissed on the 20th following.

The offence of the petitioner was that he allowed two letters said to be defamatory and insulting of the Captain to appear in his paper, and for which original offence, the writer, one J. A. Manuel, was punished on the 20th March by the Residency Magistrate, at the instance of the Captain, with an aggregate imprisonment of 19½ months and fine of Rs. 650. Manuel had claimed the privileges of a British-born subject. He however had not the satisfaction of being tried by a British-born magistrate. In jail, the Baboo is being treated as a common felon and made to wear a convict's dress and put to as rigorous discipline, denied books and writing materials. The petitioner prays for his release and remission of the fine.

The petition is a modest document which prays simply for mercy and just adduces grounds for claiming it. We hope it may reach the Viceroy himself and that his Lordship may be in a mood for an act of statesmanlike generosity. A petition from the local residents supports the prayer.

After a protracted and costly trial, the Brahmo prosecution of the Banganibasi for libel closed on Saturday the 11th July. There were three informations—two on behalf of the Sadharan Brahmo Somaj and the third by Baboo Dwarkanath Gangooly, of the same fraternity in his individual capacity. Summonses were granted against the proprietor, the editor, the publisher and the printer. The person summoned as editor disclaimed all knowledge of the article complained of as he had not charge of the paper at the time the alleged defamatory matter appeared. He was let off at a later stage of the proceedings. To the first two informations, the proprietor, the publisher and the printer pleaded guilty and expressed regret. To the complaint of Mr. Gangooly, the pleas recorded by the defence were that the article was not directed against him or his wife, that if it be held that it was, the defendants were ready to apologize, and to give up the name of the writer, if that would satisfy the complainant. The prosecution would not accept the offer, as it shewed no disposition to settle the difference out of court. The court discharged the the accused on the charges to which they had pleaded guilty and sentenced them on the complaint of Mr. Gangooly, under section 500 of the Indian Penal Code. The proprietor is punished with 6 months' simple imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 100, the publisher with 3 months' imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 50 and the printer with only a fine of Rs. 50. Mr. Handley finds "the libel a very bad one indeed. It refers to somebody being the slave of his wife, a prostitute, and goes on to say that his passport is his prostitute, that he is known to society by the name of that prostitute, and that he is illumined by her light." That is the sting of the libel. The prosecution claimed the description as of complainant which the defence repudiated, and the Chief Magistrate held the prosecution justified in so fitting the cap. Among the objections taken by the defence were, that the proprietorship of the paper was not proved in the prosecution in which punishment has been awarded, that the true aggrieved party was the wife and not the husband, that the proprietor was not responsible, that the character of the complainant had not suffered by the article. The Magistrate found all these objections against the defence. We are afraid that in remarking that Mr. Allen of the Pioneer was punished, at the instance of Captain Harsey, as a proprietor of that journal, Mr. Handley was led away by the grossness of the libel. It was in evidence in the Harsey-Allen case that Mr. Allen was the writer of the defamatory words. A publisher may no doubt be punished for defamation under section 500. It is a gross abuse of the law to punish a proprietor under the same section. But in these easy-going days, High Courts are not particular in exacting strict obedience to the law, specially where they conceive that there is no failure of substantial justice.

MOORSHEBAD.

Moorshedabad, the 18th June, 1891.

1. A poor dealer of the Chowk, of the Sunni sect, had contracted Nikka, nearly two years ago, with a handsome young lady by name Sultani Begum a widow of the Shia sect. As the marriage was solemnized after a long courtship of three years, commencing a few months after the death of her first husband, their mutual love existed for about 5 years. During this long period of courtship, they both of them fell in love with each other, and had often meetings of each other in the house of the lady's uncle (the house belonging to the estate of the late Nazir Ali Khan) whenever opportunity suited them.

2. When her uncle came to know that she had contracted an intimacy and love with a man of the other sect than his, he expelled her out of his house; but she was kept by her lover in some private place. After a few days, he, with her full consent, contracted nikka with her, and the event was celebrated in a joyous gathering (Mahfil). The fair young lady was so enamoured of this man that she could not live a moment without his company. In loyalty to him, she abandoned the faith of her father and mother, receiving at his hands the Sunni Confession of Faith (the Kalama).

3. In due course she conceived. During this interesting condition, she suffered from an accident which brought on abortion, on account of which she became very weak and finally asked her husband's permission to go and live among her people in the scraglio of Bukrigully.

4. Prior to her going to the Dehori, she gave her husband instruction to sue in forma pauperis for the recovery of her dowry from the estate of her first husband, whose father's properties are said, whether truly or falsely, to be in the possession of her uncle Syud Moosa. Application was duly made in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Berhampore about six months ago. After the usual enquiry and the deposition of the lady and of a few witnesses, she was at the end of two or three months accepted as a pauper by the Court and permitted to sue as such. The claim was for Rs. 15,000. This news spread through the city and there was a sudden accession of interest in her favour. She will now stumble upon fortune and take rank among the thriving and wealthy of the city. This was the signal for the attentions of the whole Shia community of Moorshedabad towards her. Several big folks, such as sons of the late Nawab Nazim and other members of the Nizamat family, therefore, blind with covetousness, came forward to court a lady who to her personal charms joined the substantial attraction of as much as Rs. 15,000. But their hopes of marrying her, according to their own Shia rites, were dashed to pieces when they learnt that she is the well beloved wife of a sturdy Sunni, who will surely invoke the aid of the courts for his protection and satisfaction.

5. Still, as she lived in the Dehori of Bukrigully, which is the scraglio of an old lady (a Nizamat pensioner) who is sister to the late Nawab Nazim of Bengal, where many of the sons of His Highness the Nawab Nazim used to go to see their aunt, where there is no pardah (concealment) from such visitors for any of the ladies residing in the house, the lady in question was not only seen but some private intrigues were contrived to entice her away.

6. To return to the pauper suit. After the application to sue as a pauper was granted by the court, the husband went down to Calcutta in order to get some attested copies of documents from the Calcutta Registration office, some of which were executed in favour of the lady's deceased husband's father by some other parties, which were understood to be in the possession of the lady's uncle.

7. During the comparatively long absence of the husband on this mission, the wife used to go out of the Dehori to the house of one Kazi Mohamad Hossain at Raja Bazar, There one Mahamad

Ali alias Mungoo Saheb, a member of the Nizamat family and political pensioner, used to go to make love with the lady who is to be lord of Rs. 15,000. He laid persistent siege on her. The outer defences were carried by frequent attacks, but the citadel, as protected by law, long defied his efforts. At length, however, it was won by stratagem. The lady was made to understand that her marriage with a Sunni according to Shiaism--her early and true faith--was not legal. That was all nonsense. But so it was. Every art was employed to unsettle her mind, until the poor lady came to think that she could not be a wife of a Sunni. Thus prepared, she was removed to the seraglio of one of the sons of the Nawab Nazim, with whose Nikka wife she is distantly related. There she was hated by all the inmates of the house, until at last she was squeezed, pinched and compelled to contract a marriage with the Shia gentleman already mentioned, member of the Nizamat family, by name Mungoo Saheb. This took place last month very privately (3 or 4 persons only being present besides the parties, the priest, the agent, &c.) in the house of the aforesaid Kazi Mohamad Hossain, at Raja Bazar. It is said that for his share in the transaction, the Kazi has obtained a document granting him a two-anna share--one eighth--of the whole property which may or may not come into the lady's hands. This allurement of Rs. 15,000 was more charming to Mungoo Saheb than the fair lady.

8. When her lawful husband came back from Calcutta and heard how his wife had been tampered with and had left the protection of the respected old lady of the Bukrigully Palace, and was living at Kootubpore in the house of Mungoo Saheb, as his unlawfully married wife, his rage knew no bounds. He lost little time in instituting a case in the Civil Court for the vindication of his rights. The case is before the Subordinate Judge at Berhampore. He has sued his wife (1) Sultani, (the desertress) (2) Mungoo Saheb who contracted Nikka with her, and (3) Kazi Mohamad Hossain (the go-between) in whose house and by whose contrivance the matrimonial ceremony was solemnized, for the recovery of the possession of his wife and damage and loss of the dowry (which he had already paid to her in cash or ornaments, &c.)

9. Notices were duly served upon the three defendants. The second husband, Mungoo Saheb, finding himself in a fix, went, along with some other members of the Nizamat family (his relatives), to the Reis, to whom they all misrepresented the case basely, crying for pecuniary help in the matter, as the victim of Sunni intrigue, informing the Nawab Bahadoor that the contested wife is a true Shia who has contracted nikka with a true Shia (Mungoo Saheb), and as such was an worthy object of sympathy of all Shias. His Highness asked several of the family to get the case anyhow compromised as he felt it was a scandal which ought to be kept out of courts. They all tried very hard, and at last convening a meeting in the house of a respectable member of the Nizamat family at Raja Bazar, at which the Plaintiff was threatened with pains and penalties if he did not at once withdraw his suit. The distracted man would do nothing of the kind. He however succumbed to milder treatment. The delay and vexation of litigation was pointed out to him. However just his claim might be, it would undergo investigation in a regular way, and the ordinary delay might be indefinitely protracted. As for his wife, whether the second marriage was valid or not, she had proved faithless to him and he should not trust her again. He had better divorce her. If he will be so wise and good and will withdraw the case, he will gain the favour of the Reis, and get all his claims, loss and damages, and the fees of the pleaders, with the cost of the suit. He was satisfied and promised compliance.

10. Thereupon, next morning, when the date was fixed for hearing, a petition of withdrawal was filed by the Plaintiff. The petition mentions the compromise effected at the meeting but adds that if they would not do justice to him and would not satisfy the claim as promised by the members of the committee, he would not divorce her and would renew the case.

11. On this two applications are filed by the accused nullifying the circumstances, ignoring the proposal and result of the committee, and praying the court to dismiss or to hear the case, thinking that this method would weaken the suit. But they are quite ignorant of the fact, that the members of the committee may be called on to depose to the facts.

Berhampore, July 22.

It is a pity that nowadays the officials are at times hoodwinked in matters affecting the public interests. During the recent visit of His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal to the city Moorshedabad, an address from the Jain community of Moorshedabad was presented. The address contained seven signatures only. When the name of city Moorshedabad was associated, it might naturally be inferred that the address had at least the consent of all the Jains of the District. But in the present instance, nearly all the residents, even men holding Government titles, gentlemen of wealth and public spirit knew nothing about it. Some of those who signed it were in darkness till the last moment when they were obliged to join the movement to preserve decency. The great historical family of Jagat Sett who were and are still esteemed not only by the Jains of this District but by the people of the whole of Bengal, were discarded, and the present head of the family was conspicuous by his absence. He is not only the proper personage but is the person who can represent the whole community and give His Honor a cordial welcome on their behalf. Surely, this does not reflect credit either on the gentlemen who were pulling the strings from behind or the subordinate officers whose duty was to have made thorough enquiries before the presentation of the address to His Honor. I write this in consideration of public interests to prevent repetition of such tricks being played in future.

A MAHOMEDAN MEMORIAL.

28. It is only at poor, decayed, miserable Moorshedabad that the Tabarra nuisance is in force. And there it is a recent innovation. What the great Nawabs Nazim of the past had not dared, has now, in these latter days of feebleness, been compassed by the brood of Nawablings, against the express disavowal of the Nawab Bahadoor himself. It began in 1887 only. In that year, for the first time, the Shias indulged in curses on the holy Caliphs, with the usual consequences to the public peace. The Nawab Bahadoor from the first set his face against it, and promptly proclaimed his displeasure against whoever uttered the Tabarra. (See Notice dated the 6th November 1887, Appendix K.)

29. Notwithstanding, it was feared that there would be a repetition. From certain information received by him, the Magistrate (Mr. Gupta) on the 26th October 1888 notified a prohibition of the Tabarra and threatened the pains and penalties under section 144 of the Criminal Procedure Code and section 298 of the Indian Penal Code on all who disobeyed. (Appendix M.) In the face of that, the following year, 1889, on the 18th September, Ali Jan, a notorious character, shouted the Tabarra through the public thoroughfare, the Police keeping itself out of the way. The Deputy Magistrate of City Moorshedabad, hearing of it, directed the Police to keep a watchful eye to the preservation of peace and arrest whoever might pronounce the Tabarra on the public road. (Appendix N.) These repeated fiat of authority having been disregarded with impunity, the young bloods of Heterodoxy and the scapegraces of the Nizamat family grew bold. Four or five men, members of the Nizamat family, specially gave themselves unenviable prominence, namely, Iskander Ali Mirza,--the present Chairman of the City Moorshedabad Municipality--Naser Ali Mirza, Asad Ali Mirza, Wala Kudr Hossein Ali Mirza and Nawab Zainul Abdeen Khan. In conjunction with others, they resolved, in evasion and contempt of authoritative prohibition, to indulge in the Tabarra. The Sub-divisional Officer being a Mahomedan gentleman, living in the midst of Mahomedans, soon learnt of this mischievous compact, and on the 8th day of the Moharram, corresponding with the 25th August 1890, issued a Notice or Proclamation under section 144, Criminal Procedure Code--the express remedy of Indian Law for preventing riot. In that instrument, the Magistrate of City Moorshedabad, commencing with stating that no one is allowed to repeat the Tabarra on the public road, warned the public, under the section in question, against the pronouncing of the Tabarra as a sure provocative of breach of the peace by causing an affray between the Shias and the Sunnis, and denouncing punishment on whoever might be guilty of uttering the Tabarra after his prohibitory order. (Appendix O). All to no purpose! In spite of the proclamation of the City Magistracy, and, but two days after, on the 10th of the Moharram--the 27th August 1890, the Shias, in procession bound for their mock Kerbala at Amanigan, came out bravely and determinedly, not like men mourning for their masters or Imams but like men meaning mischief and courting a quarrel, and lustily pronounced the Tabarra, repeatedly shouting curses loud and deep on the heads of the holy Caliphs and other sainted Chiefs of the Faith. All this took place in the presence of the City Magistrate and the District Superintendent and his Police in great force. This profanation, aggravated by the insolence of the Shias and the apparent connivance of the agents of the Civil Power, the Sunnis could not possibly bear. They resisted--not of policy aforethought but simply on the spur of the moment, because they could not help. Without preparation or concert, or thought of consequences, good Mussulmans, exasperated by the speech and gestures of the Shias, flung themselves upon the procession. Two different fights took place that day at two different points of the route, in the very presence of the local and Police authorities. Then the latter interfered. The Sunnis being poor were arrested on the spot. The Shias, consisting mostly of members of the once ruling family, could not be laid hold of so summarily, but security for their appearance was exacted. Finally, the latter were all acquitted for want of unexceptional evidence. The same sort of evidence, however, was sufficient to convict the Sunnis. The Police sent up three cases, to wit, No. 9, against four young Nawabs of the Moorsheadabad family, Syed Faizuddin, Bundhu Sahab, Syed Sahab, and Munir Sahab, No. 10, Empress against Dad Khan and five other Sunnis, and No. 11, Empress v. Abbas Mirza, Supan Sahab, Mir Ali Jan, and Syed Faizuddin, a member of the Nizam family. (Appendices B., A., and C.) The Magistrate, however, took up the second case (Appendix A.)---that against Sunnis---first, and, notwithstanding proof of provocation from the uttering of the Tabarra, convicted four out of the six accused. After that, the way was easy for the disposal of the other cases. The remaining two were cases against Shias for having outraged the religious feelings of Sunnis, and attacked them with sticks. Both the cases were dismissed. (Appendices B. and C.) In justice to Mr. Luson it must be said that the Magistrate in the same way threw out the crowd of cross prosecutions between the two classes which arose out of these riots. He impartially dismissed them all, without distinction.

30. Great was the grief of the Mahomedan community. Great was the wonder of the whole population at the way in which the authority of Government was set at nought, as if with its consent. Mr. Luson seemed himself to have had qualms of remorse. So, on the 3rd October, he issued a notice prohibiting the Tabarra. As if these manifestoes had not been already brought to the lowest contempt in Moorsheadabad! These British officers seemed to have no other specific for riots and commotions than fulmination of notices and proclamations! But even in that document, Your Memorialists confess they were scandalised to see the care taken by the Magistrate to humour the Nizam pensioners who were the cause of all the trouble. The Magistrate actually discharged the offenders with a handsome certificate by averring in the recital that the Nawab Bahadur and all his relations were of opinion that there should be no Tabarra in the public road. What, then, is the necessity of Mr. Luson's prohibition at all and of all similar proclamations during these several years? It is not pretended that a new inspiration has seized them. Shjaism is not the creed of Mahomedan Moorsheadabad; the heresy is confined to the Nizam family and its connections and entourage. If the Nawab Bahadur and his brothers were so right-minded as Mr. Luson believes them to be, would there have been any difficulty? could there have been any riots? So far as the Nawab Bahadur himself is concerned, Mr. Luson's statement is true. But is it true of all his relations or any body of them? If Mr. Luson thinks so, it only shows how he has been worked upon. Everybody in the city knows that the whole body of Nizam pensioners, with almost the sole exception of the Chief, are pledged to the Tabarra in the procession. It is they that have introduced the Tabarra and they are in honour bound to maintain it.

31. Mr. Luson's proclamation can only have the effect of its numerous predecessors. The demoralization caused by the weakness of the official treatment of the riots cannot be cured by a feeble notice. What is in store for the next Moharram may even now be guessed from the preliminary symptoms already manifest. The Shias are adding fresh methods and occasions new---unknown in the District, and certainly without precedent in their own practice---for indulging in the pleasure of damning the heads of the Faith. (Appendix V.)

32. Under these circumstances, Your Memorialists appeal to the Temporal Power to keep the peace between subjects of different creeds. The justice of Your Memorialists's cause has, they trust, been sufficiently demonstrated in the foregoing pages. Historically, legally, politically, the Shias have not a leg to stand on. Indeed, they are disowned by their own leaders, secular and sacred. Themselves a Standing Minority in Islam, their house is divided within itself. Themselves a Schism, there is Dissent within Dissent. The progress of the world has not been wholly lost on them and Shiaism has been humanised. Its better spirits and most eminent exponents are evidently ashamed of the old bigotry and mean aggressiveness. They do not see the wisdom or glory of irritating the whole Orthodox World by low abuse and insults heaped upon the greatest names in Islam. The pretence of the Tabarra---the public demonstration of damning the souls of the venerated dead---has been exploded by the King of Oudh and the Shah of Persia. [Vide Translation of His Majesty Wajid Ali Shah's manifesto in the shape of a Letter to Moulvi Hafez Syud Jamaluddin marked I, and Translation of His Majesty Nasiruddin Ahmed Shah of Persia's Proclamation marked J, among the Annexures.] Here in Moorsheadabad, the Nawab Bahadur too has declared himself against it. [Vide Translation marked K.] Shia learning does not countenance it. The High Priest of the Shias in Calcutta, Shams-ul-Olema Moulvi Mahmud Jilani, has given a strong Opinion against it, a translation of which is hereunto annexed. (Appendix W.) It is nowhere allowed. In India, it is punished by British Magistrates and put down by High Courts. [Vide copy of Judgment of the City Magistrate of Lucknow, dated 28th June, 1879, convicting certain Shias accused of uttering the Tabarra. Also retranslation of an Urdu translation of a Decision of the High Court of the North-Western Provinces, of the 20th December, 1878, Criminal Appellate Side, F. B. Pearson, J., marked G. and H. in the Appendices.] Here, then, is the most formidable consensus imaginable against a barbarous exhibition. Yet, notwithstanding all, these minor Moorsheadabad Princes, proud of their influence, would not submit. Against Reason and Authority, against their own secular chiefs and religious teachers, they persist in defying the Law. It is for Government to make itself respected.

33. For Your Memorialists it is a more difficult question. It is a question of Faith. What consequences may follow from the Shias's persistence in the Tabarra they fear to calculate. The coming Moharram, which falls in the first week of August next, may cause a scene of bloodshed in the streets of Moorsheadabad such as has never occurred. Your Memorialists trust that suitable precautions will be taken. But the first measure, in their humble judgment, should be to allay the soreness of the Mahomedan mind by assurance from Head-Quarters that the Tabarra shall strictly cease, and that effectual measures will be taken to that end.

Your Memorialists pray that, after a careful consideration of their Statement and after such enquiries as may be required, Your Honor will be pleased to stop the Tabarra in every form and under all pretences as well as the other forms of outraging the religious feelings of the great majority of the Mahomedan world which the Shias, whenever they are intent on mischief and are allowed a chance, adopt.

A HINDU INHERITANCE CASE IN THE N.-W. P.

(Before the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Knox.)

In this case Radha Kishun and others appealed against the judgment of the District Judge of Farukhabad in a suit, in which the appellants were defendants, to recover possession of certain zemindari rights, the plaintiffs-respondents being Chandhri Raj Kuar and others. The case originally came before the Sudordinate Judge of Farukhabad but on an appeal to the High Court was remanded for trial to the District Judge.

Mr. Ajudhia Nath appeared for the appellants and Mr. Sunder Lal for the respondents.

The Chief Justice in giving judgment said:---This was a case for the recovery of possession of certain zemindari property and some houses and land and other property from the surviving sons of one Khaman and the mother of these sons and the widow of a deceased son. The other defendants are brothers of Khaman, who sold to the plaintiff. The facts of this case are peculiar. Khaman was a Brahmin, and having taken a bunia widow to live with him he was outcasted. He left his village, removed to another village, and there lived with the bunia widow. In course of time she bore children to him. The eldest of these is now thirty-five years old. She and her son and the widow of one of her sons are the first lot of defendants to whom we have referred. Khaman and his sons, as we infer from the judgment of the lower appellate court, carried on cultivation together, and Khaman, according to the finding of the lower court, acquired the property in dispute in this suit. It has been found by the first court that the plaintiff paid no consideration whatever for the sale to him. That finding is not dissented from in the judgment upon which the decree under appeal was founded. The judgment appeal gave the plaintiff the decree for possession. Against that decree this appeal has been brought. We have been referred to the texts of Manu, passages from West and Bühler and to several authorities. None of them seem to us precisely to govern this case. We have here a case of the illegitimate offspring of parents who belong to the twice-born class of Hindus, the father being a Brahmin and the mother a bunia. We have also to deal with a case in which the property in dispute, which was in possession of the offspring of these parents, was according to the finding of the lower appellate court, which we must accept, the self-acquired property of Khaman after he had been outcasted, after he had left his family and his village and had started in another village to make a livelihood for himself and the woman who lived with him and their family. If we were trying this case as a court of first instance or a court of first appeal we should come to the conclusion that Khaman, having lost his caste, had started a private family, altogether separate in the sense of total and absolute separation from the family of his birth and caste fellows. We cannot find amongst the authorities and texts cited to us any sure principle to guide us in this case. Under these circumstances we must act on the principle of equity and good conscience, and decline to oust from the possession of the property acquired by Khaman his sons, their mother, and the widow of the deceased son for the benefit of the vendee of brothers who were not parties to the acquisition of any portion of this property, which was not acquired by any ancestor of theirs. This is a very peculiar case, and the view we take of it might be absolutely inapplicable in other cases but, holding the opinion which we do as to what a good conscience dictates in the present case, we allow the appeal with costs and dismiss the suit with costs.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills. Coughs, Coughs, Shortness of Breath.—These maladies require early and unremitting attention, for if neglected they often end in asthma, bronchitis, or consumption. The Ointment well rubbed upon the chest and back, penetrating the skin, is absorbed and carried directly to the lungs, whence it expels all impurities. All the blood in the body is perpetually passing through the lungs, and there all noxious particles tending to disease can be quickly, thoroughly, and permanently neutralized, rendered harmless or ejected from the system. Holloway's Ointment and Pills perfectly accomplish this purification; and through the blood thus cleansed, the influence of these wonderful medicaments reaches the remotest parts of the human body, and thus cures all diseased action, whether internal or external.

THE CAPTIVE LADIE.

By THE LATE MICHAEL MADHUSUDAN DUTT.

Reprinted from the Madras edition of 1839.

"Or—how like to the sunny tide,
Of ocean rolling far and wide,
The Curu* came in all his pride,
And led the mighty and the brave,
But led them to a bloody grave,
When on the fiercest field the sun,
Hath ever shrunk to gaze upon,
He lost the throne—he died to save!
How fatal was that bloody field,
Where warriors came—but not to yield—
Where Lord—chief—vassal—serf—and all,
Wild carnage! swell'd thy festival!—
How loud the dirge, which o'er them peal'd!
For nations raised that bitter cry,
From peasant-shed,—from palace high—
The regal bride on vacant throne,
Midst scenes of splendour—yet how lone—
The widow'd wife in cottage low,
Now desolate—how darkly so!—

"The Rishi† fed the sacred flame
Lit to high Brim's mysterious name,
With delicate leaves o'er which the dew
Nightly caught its moon-lit hue,
For the fire-fly—on gay wing of light
To quaff it like a spout bright—
And in each hoary fane—and grove
Of Beauty—where e'en Gods might rove,
And think they were in Swerga's‡ bow'rs
With ceaseless founts—and deathless flow'rs—
The solemn chant—the tinkling bell—
Rose sweetly wild—as gladsome swell

* This is the subject of the well-known "Mahabarat" of Vyasa.—
"The Mahabharat details the dissensions of the Pandava and Kaurava Princes, who were cousins by birth, and rival competitors for the throne of Hastenapur. The latter were at first successful, and compelled the former to secrete themselves for a season, until they contracted an alliance with a powerful Prince in the Panjab, when a part of the kingdom was transferred to them. Subsequently this was lost by the Pandavas at dice, and they were driven into exile, from which they emerged to assert their rights in arms. All the Princes of India took part with one or other of the contending kinsmen, and a series of battles ensued at Kuru Kshetra, the modern Talnesar; which ended in the destruction of Daryodhana and the other Kaurava Princes, and the elevation of Yudhishtira, the elder of the Pandava brothers, to the supreme sovereignty over India." Wilson. As. Res. xvii. 609.

† Though the "Tchandi," the "Ramayana" and the "Mahabharat" have not escaped the Dramatist, yet they are oftener recited by Pundits than subjected to scenic representation.

‡ A holy Bramin—something like a "seraphic doctor" amongst the Hindus. "Brim" is the name of the Deity.

§ The Hindu Olympus.

Of hymned praise at twilight hours
From out some lone and silent dell!

"It was a scene—around—above—
All bright as Glory—sweet as Love—
Such as Husteena's palace high
Beheld—when ocean—earth and sky
Sent glittering hosts, at thy proud call,
Idasteer*!—to thy regal hall,
Where they all humbly bow'd the knee—
And own'd thy might—thy majesty!

"But there was one—a monarch he—
Came not to that high revelie:
They said—he once had sought to gain
That chieftain's daughter—but in vain—
And that his slighted love had taught
Hate deathless—deep—and unforget—
Such as the bosom's inmost core
Will darkly nurse for evermore—
Such as will ever fiercely blight
Love—Friendship—Mercy—all that's bright
And gilds Life's path with starry light—
And part but with the latest breath
That heaves the breast embrac'd by Death!
Perchance this was a whisper'd lie—
An idle tale—foul calumny.

Yet—tho' Inquiry all around
Breath'd from each hurried look and sound—
'Why comes he not? once in this hall,
'Now gay with blithesome festival,
'How oft he came—a welcome guest,
'Best lov'd—best cherish'd—honour'd best?'
Calm was that chieftain's brow and stern
From which Conjecture naught could learn
Yes—calm it was as is the grave—
Or some untrifl'd—slumbering wave!

* * *

"Now herald† from each skyey tow'r
Peal'd proudly forth o'er earth and sky,
The might—the grandeur of his pow'r—
The glory of his majesty!
And nations heard that haughty sound,
And bow'd them lowly to the ground,
As if on thunder-wings it came
Or on some lightning-wheeled car,
Burst from a dark cloud's womb of flame,
Appalling Nature from afar,

* Idasteer—one of the Pandu Princes, celebrated the "Raj shoon Jugum" Vid: Mahabarat lib. ii.

† This refers to the conclusion of the ceremony, when all present were expected to prostrate themselves and acknowledge the supremacy of their royal host.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

To chain the storm's death-dealing course
 To curb the madden'd whirlwind's force !
 And thus it came—that haughty sound,
 And roll'd with proudest accents round :
 'Let all the Sons of Earth,
 'The King—the vassal—and the slave—
 'From where the Sun receives his birth,
 'To where beneath the western wave
 'He seeks his azure—pearly cave,
 'Bow to the mightiest Lord of all !
 'And own his Majesty and thrall !
 'His sway is boundless as the sea—
 'A very God on earth is he !'
 Now rose the trumpet's shrilly yell,
 And music in her joyous swell—
 From battlement and turret high,
 The loudest shouts now rent the sky—
 And Echo—waken'd from her sleep,
 From sunny vale all green and deep—
 Prolong'd that sound in its onward sweep.
 The warriors bow'd them on their steeds—
 The Rishi paus'd to tell his beads—
 The maiden from her fairy bow'r,
 Started from dream of fount and flow'r—
 The very babe e'en ceas'd to cry,
 And look'd up to its mother's eye,
 As if in voiceless wonderment,
 It, too, its share of homage sent.—
 The bard now dropp'd his sounding lyre,
 And paus'd to wake its notes of fire—
 And at that monarch's proud behest,
 Throngs countless were now prostrate laid,
 From north to south—from east to west,
 All at his throne low homage paid !

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THE Government of India have decided to perpetuate the Manipur disaster by the erection of a memorial, at the public expense, on the spot in the Residency compound, where the remains of the massacred British officers lie buried. A useless expenditure in obedience to the sentiment of the hour. The storied obelisk raised over the remains of the victims of the Black Hole was pulled down sixty years after. In Calcutta, a tablet will be put up in the Cathedral to the memory of the victims in Manipur.

THE Maharaja of Patiala at Simla has caught the prevailing fever of that—shall we say infected? capital.

SPECULATIONS as to the date of return of the Public Works Minister have been set at rest. Sir Charles Crosthwaite has taken furlough till the 18th January 1892 and at the same time resigned his seat in the Viceroy's Council.

FROM pillar to post, Mr. P. C. Lyon has reverted from the Government of India to the Bengal Service, and been sent to the right about for the space of 2 months and 25 days—on leave.

BABOO Krishna Chandra Bandyopadhyay, C.E., Executive Engineer, Chittagong Division, has, we find, patented a calculating machine.

THREE natives have been accepted in the last Civil Service Examination—two Bengali and one Mahomedan. They are Satyendra Nath Palit, a son of Baboo Tarak Nath Palit of Amarapur in the Hoogly District better known to fame as Mr. T. Palit, of Calcutta, Barrister-at-law, Birendra Chandra Sen, son of Baboo Prosonno Chunder

Sen, of Panchdona, and Ahmed, son of M. Karimunnissa Chaudrani of Deldwar, Maimensing. The second, Mr. Sen, is a Gilchrist scholar and went to England only last winter.

AN old chief, up Baluchistan way, it is said, being asked if he would like to go through and examine the Khojah Tunnel, said—"Wah ! if you stick a dagger into a man's heart, do you think that he wants to look at the hole it makes ?" A pregnant remark.

A JAT, of Jagrawan, District Ludhiana, a good and kind man, murdered his unfaithful wife, then her paramour, and lastly his own self. He struck himself on the head with an axe, and, not being dead, jumped into a well where he expired. A characteristic Indian determination of individual domestic infelicity from conjugal infidelity. The justice executed is unexceptionable—in the men as well as the measures. There is not an Indian or true Oriental but will endorse this view. And this notwithstanding a century of education of British legislation, British administration and European example.

Well may our rulers despair of our people. Nor can we offer them any hope in the direction contemplated by them. That is not an isolated case but a typical instance—one of hundreds occurring every day in all parts. It is its commonness that gives the case its importance in the argument. It reveals the native bent—the national sentiment. It is another illustration of the truth that laws are nothing without manners. No legislation will make our people abandon their peculiar notion in favour of the value-payable to honour.

THE Governor-General in Council has exempted from the operation of any prohibition and direction of the Indian Arms Act, 1878, all Gurkha pensioners of Her Majesty's Indian Forces who reside in British India in respect of weapons known as Kukris.

A NEW Police district, under the Lieutenant-Governor of the N.-W. P. and Chief Commissioner of Oudh, has been created which embraces all the lands for the time being occupied by the portions of the East Indian Railway, including the Delhi-Umballa-Kalka Railway, which lie within the North-Western Provinces and the Punjab (including the lands occupied by stations, by out-buildings, and for other railway purposes). A Police force for service therein has been ordered for enrolment under Act V. of 1861. The order is made by the Governor-General in Council under the Police Act III of 1888.

IT is a pity we do not strive to read some papers which are without responsible conductors. We thereby simply deprive ourselves of a rare treat.

THERE is always something in the Hindoo Patriot. The last issue (July 27) being before us, we see on the first page, referring to the increase of suicides now remarked among the Parsees of Bombay, there having been ten cases among their whole body of 90,000 against 75 cases among 830,000 of all the other classes and creeds of the whole population—our contemporary gravely writes :—

"Servants in Europe and America have been lately telling us that suicide is an index to civilization."

Has our contemporary been slipping out by the backdoor for an extensive outing ?

TURNING over the leaves, we are arrested by a new word or perhaps a new disease. We are sorry to read that poor Baboo Kali Krishna Mitter of Baraset "is in the last stage of thisis"—whatever that may be. We are all the more anxious on account of the gentleman because it is added that "the end may not be very far." Surely, it must be a terrible malady, this "thisis," which is capable of so speedily reducing the sufferer to that was.

THAT reminds us of a Ruler of Turkey's obituary notice in Punch. It was announced that the Sultan As-is is the Sultan aswas.

THE many who had known Baboo Kali Krishna Mitter during the long period of his residence in Calcutta, would no doubt be glad to know something more about him, and some particulars are furnished—if anybody can make head or tail out of them. We are told that

"His last days are being enlivened and made easy as best as they may be by Babu Kali Charan Ghosh his nephew-in-law and his son by Babu Jadu Nath Ghosh with whom he is now stopping and who are unremitting in their care and attention."

"His son by Babu Jadu Nath Ghosh"! That is beyond our poor Brahmanic inspiration. It is a Kayastha business and therein the Sarvadhikaris must come to the rescue. We see they have in the same issue noticed at length Mr. H. H. Risley's unpublished book on the Tribes and Castes of Bengal, and have laid the butter thick on on the official ethnographer, in return apparently for having traced their origin to the veriest menials and slaves—Kahars and so forth. Here is a fine opportunity for a contribution from those who ought to know to the literature of the engendering of tribes and castes and their sexual relations.

THEY are not only rum ones on that establishment, but something more, besides. They are sharp fellows beyond question. They have reduced literature to a mechanical operation, and a very easy one in their hands. It is a matter of cutting and clipping, of paste and scissors. Thus we see the whole of the leading article on the "Tribes and Castes of Bengal" is a bodily reproduction without acknowledgment of the Resolution of the Bengal Government.

THE trial of the Benares "rioters" committed up to date is over. In the last batch, the jury convicted five, and the Judge sentenced two of them to five years' imprisonment including three months' solitary confinement for one, one to four years, another to nine months and the last to one day. The catalogue of the convicted is a long one, including all the punishments in the Indian Penal Code, except capital.

THE Criminal Sessions of the High Court closed last Saturday with the conviction of Ambica Churn Bose. The jury unanimously found him guilty of the murder of Girja Sundari, and Mr. Justice Wilson sentenced him to death. There was no direct evidence as to the identity of the accused as the murderer. His Counsel pleaded for him insanity—the madness of love.

THE sure cure for drought, among the Russian peasantry, is the throwing the dead body of a drunkard into the river. Accordingly, at Samara, six peasants disintered the body of a woman who had died of intoxication and floated it down the Volga. Whether rain fell or not, the six were tried criminally and sentenced to terms of imprisonment up to four months. Law is deaf to superstitious appeals.

SIR James Lyall's time will be up on the 3rd April next, but he lays down the Lieutenant-Governorship of the Punjab a month earlier on the 1st March.

SYED Ameer Hossein, the Northern Division Magistrate just returned to duty from leave, fined a milkman rupees ten for adulterating milk with water. He will have done a service to Calcutta, if he can maintain his law.

THEY are going to have an electric tramway at Madras. Four companies have tendered for the construction. That is just the thing for hot countries.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE mail brings gloomy prognostications of harvest in Russia taken as a whole. The Minister of Imperial Domains has instructed the stewards of the Crown lands and forests to allow the peasantry to enjoy free pasture and freely to gather mushrooms—a great article of food with the Russian lower classes—as well as wild fruits in the woods and forests of the State. At an extra meeting at Nijni Novgorod, the Zemstvo decided to ask for a grant of five million roubles for seed and victualling stores. According to an experienced landowner of Kastroma, there has not been seen such a "frightful famine, such a hopeless condition of the people in all the grain producing provinces of Russia." "There is no more old corn left and the new harvest will not suffice for the seed." The Exchange Gazette says that such a failure of the rye crops has not occurred in Russia for many years past. Rye forms the basis of the Russian peasant's food.

THE Times warns the English people of the quiet progress which both Russia and Turkey are making in certain quarters—the former in the direction of the Gulf of Iskanderan and the establishment of commercial colonies; and the latter in the Western valleys of Asia Minor under Turkish rule in the increase of population by Mussulman emigration from Thessaly and Bulgaria and the extension of railways.

THE Emperor William is touring in Norway. He has had a bad fall, having slipped on the deck of his yacht and injured his knee.

THE African explorer Stanley has fractured his ankle. Walking on "muerren," in Switzerland, he stumbled and fell some distance.

ON the 25th July, the Czar with his family visited the French Squadron now at Cronstadt. His Majesty entertained the officers at lunch on board his yacht and toasted the health of President Carnot. Four days after, on the 29th, the Mayor of St. Petersburg splendidly entertained the French officers. Dwelling on the importance of the Franco-Russian friendship, he presented to each vessel of the fleet a silver loving cup and to each officer a smaller one.

THERE was a frightful collision between two excursion trains at the Saint Maude, a suburb of Paris. Forty-nine persons were killed instantly and over a hundred injured, it is feared, fatally. Three carriages ignited and burned several of the passengers to death. A crowd of twenty thousand including friends and relatives of the excursionists made the night hideous with their shrieks and howls. Somebody must answer for so many deaths. Already, two railway officials are under arrest.

AT a banquet at the Mansion House, on the 29th July, Lord Salisbury breathed Peace. The political firmament of Europe was never so tranquil as now. Though the Eastern Question is still unsolved, it was for Egypt and Bulgaria—now rapidly developing—to settle the Question. The visit of the Emperor William to the Guildhall was for peace. The friendly reception that awaits the French fleet shortly expected in England is a guarantee of the amity of France.

THE day of triumph for Dr. Koch is over. That of humiliation has come. Owing to the failure of his cure for consumption, he has resigned all public offices.

THE Hon'ble Sir Philip P. Hutchins has introduced a law into the Supreme Legislative Council, giving what he calls a regular side to the Madras Court of Small Causes, and raising its jurisdiction to the immediate limit of Rs. 5,000 and a future one of Rs. 10,000. That is a move in the right direction. Notwithstanding the simplification of procedure in the High Courts in modern times, litigation in those courts is still unnecessarily costly and not unoften disproportionately so to the matter in dispute. We hope this is only the commencement of the great and needed reform in that direction in all the Presidencies. We will leave the Hon'ble Member to explain his measure. We give elsewhere the principal portion of his speech in moving for leave to introduce the Bill.

THE North British Borneo Government confess themselves beaten. Failing to weed out habit from the Chinese, they have decided to regulate gambling. Certain places will be recognized for the purpose, and gambling permitted therein from 6 A.M. to 10 P.M. but not to youths under sixteen. The proceedings must be with open doors with free access to the Police to all parts of the buildings. The stakes are to be only in current coin.

SIR Joseph Hooker, the famous botanist, had long been urging upon our neighbour Dr. King the desirability of a thorough botanical survey with a view to collection of specimens across the Sikkim frontier. Dr. King, being near the scene and familiar with its politics, could not act up to the representations of the eminent savant and ask Government to send a botanist to certain destruction in the mountains. With the close of war and the conclusion and ratification of peace, the time at last came when science as well as sport might be humoured. The Bengal Government now thinks the project feasible, if not absolutely free from danger. It has, accordingly, on the recommendation of the Superintendent, Royal Botanical Gardens, Calcutta, deputed, for six months, Mr. George Gammie, of the Chinchona Plantation, for the purpose. According to Dr. King, Mr. Gammie is an enthusiastic botanist and a good collector and no better man could be selected. He will draw a deputation allowance of Rs. 150 a month and Rs. 30 a month in addition for the collections. He will move about in such parts of the Eastern Himalayas as Mr. White, the Political Agent, thinks safe. In fact, Mr. Gammie will be under Mr. White's protection. We hope Gammie's enthusiasm in the cause of science will not land our Government in another difficulty.

ONE of the ablest writers of the day in military matters is Colonel Maurice. He had been contributing some excellent articles to the magazines. These, we see, have been republished as a book on War. From the notices of them, as well in their collected form as in their previous fugitive antecedents that we have read in the Army and Navy Gazette, the author seems to have well shown the difference between present and past fighting. The difference is not in degree only but also in kind. Thus, speaking of recent warfare, Colonel Maurice observes :—

"It is upon the surface of the facts that the extreme loss of life suddenly occasioned at particular points by the effectiveness of the fire of the new weapons, both of artillery and infantry, compelled the gradual abandonment of close formations of men, massed together in dense columns or even in closed lines, and the gradual adoption of what are known as skirmishing or open-order formations. In other words, when the French fire fell upon the solid columns of the Prussians, the columns instinctively scattered. The officers and non-commissioned officers were often lost in very large proportion, and during the actual course of the fighting a method of attack was adopted which proceeded by successive swarms of dispersed men taking advantage of such shelter as the ground permitted."

A great and radical change has come over the spirit of war. The progress of improvement in fire arms could not but have a great influence over the methods of fighting, and there has been improvement all round. The Armies have to adapt themselves to the change. We doubt whether the military authorities of all the Powers are sufficiently alive to the situation. England is far from ready with all the necessary adaptations.

STILL harping on their daughters twain killed by fall from the Clock Tower, are the Parsis! They have not accepted the verdict of the Jury, strengthened as it is by the full concurrence of Mr. Justice Farran, who presided at the High Court Sessions trial. And they have kept up their clamour and agitation. The most respectable journals like the Rust Gostar and the Indian Spectator have either lost their heads, or their free will. Either way they are driven down the irresistible current of sentiment in their community. Blood for blood! still cries the secret soul of our Zoroastrian brethren. They are behaving more like wild beasts of prey than rational and generous human beings, reminding one of the alligator or the tiger which has lost from its grip its prey and prowls in frenzy about the neighbourhood, till it has got back its own or a substitute or is killed. They scarcely conceal their disappointment at the escape of their intended victim. They would, if possible, again put poor Manockjee Aslajee on his trial—on fresh evidence, of some sort. They have not now eyes to see the injustice to the living such a proceeding would involve, to do justice to the dead. It is fortunate not only for Aslajee but also for his persecutors and all the subjects of the Empire in the long run, that, notwithstanding all Sir Fitz James Stephen's labours to destroy the integrity of British Jurisprudence for India, an acquitted prisoner cannot be repeatedly harrassed except at the instance of the Crown. But if not Aslajee, they would be content with any other. Somebody must dangle down the gallows, no matter who. They are determined to have their man—a man, apparently, will do, if not the man. They have decided to their satisfaction that there has been murder, murder most foul and brutal and unprovoked, yea, double murder of unoffending budding girlhood, and they must hang some one for it. It is madness—that is all we can say about it.

We suspect there is a respectable minority who have seen the error of their ways, but they are afraid to declare themselves for fear of boycotting. Only one man has had the courage to brave the inevitable storm, and he is a man of weight as of years, indeed the Nestor of the Parsis as a Hindu journal of the West calls him. We refer to Shapoorjee Bengallee who has written a very wise letter in a Gujrati paper. They are all down upon him, of course. The usual charge of inconsistency is made against him. He had been one of them—of the camp of the wild tribe. All the more honour to him! He was open to conviction. He saw his error and seceded from the rest. But then he was of the conference that got up the petition to the Governor, only by the time it was ready he was not to be found. He slunk away without notice. No great harm there, we fancy, nor dishonour. It was no organised society with well-defined duties, which he had joined in due form, that he was to resign formally. When the light was dawning on him, he could not speak out.

The Pioneer has a most able and wise article on the Police and the Parsis worthy of a leading journal in a mixed society like that of India. The writer is exemplary in his moderation to all parties and interests, while he does not compromise in the least the great interests of law and constitution and justice at stake. If anything, it is just such an article from the mouth-piece of the governing race and the higher civilization which is calculated to wean our deluded friends. The Parsis are treated almost with tenderness. We hope our brethren of Bombay will in an earnest spirit ponder well the remarks of our contemporary.

THE Police are capable of any crime in India. The power and facilities afforded them by law for detection of crimes and criminals are not always used for the protection of honest citizens and are oftentimes prostituted for personal gain and aggrandisement. The most efficient officers are usually the greatest licensed criminals. They escape punishment while innocent men are sacrificed for the glorification of unprincipled officers for crimes undetected. A horrible tale of Police iniquity comes from Travancore. The highest court has found the Police guilty of the highest crime. We give the facts as summarised in the Travancore Times. The case is nicknamed the Coolooray scandal :—

"Ashana of a well-to-do family was accused of a theft and he was arrested by the Police and was kept in the station lock up. The prisoner being a man of easy circumstances, the bobbies thought that an excellent opportunity had presented itself to reap a good harvest, they asked the prisoner for some 'tips'; he being conscious of his innocence and unwilling to part with his money for the purchase of natural freedom declined to come to terms. This considerably exasperated the blue bottles who, of course, were never at a loss for expedient. At once that night the deceased and the prisoners left the lock up and slowly bent their way to the river. (This was seen by the deceased's brother as was subsequently deposed by him.) Of course once beyond the haunts, the peelers were free to pursue their nefarious practices. All manner of the vilest tortures were attempted at the time so much so that the poor fellow who was, when he entered the lock up, in robust health was breathing his last in a few hours. This was not anticipated by the prisoners who of course when they saw matters had gone too far, hastened to the station with the dying man. No sooner was the man inside the lock up than he gave up his ghost. At once means were sought for to screen this, one of the trois who thought that he was more ingenious than the others said, that his death should be attributed to cholera. With this view some dirty things were done to give a show of the appearance of cholera in the premises of the station. The local vaccinator was fetched in the morning to see the dead body and administer medicines to it. Being a shrewd man he did not allow himself to be befooled by the police. By this time horizon in the east was slowly brightening up showing that day break was at no great distance. To remove all traces of suspicion and to be on the safe side the police removed the dead body to Parayachale for Post Mortem examination. While on their way to the Hospital the constables in charge of the dead body met Assistant Superintendent who was returning from the capital, and the matter was reported. Then was seen a vast deal of very serious movements between the Chattram where the Asst. Superintendent lodged and the Police station house—much whispering between constables and many consultations between officers. As the result of all this, the cart carrying the corpse was countermanded. And when the body was brought back an Yadast was prepared to the effect that death was the result of hanging and accordingly the body was submitted to a post mortem examination."

Public indignation was roused and the Maharaja was appealed to for justice. The District Magistrate was specially entrusted with the enquiry. After no end of obstruction from them, he found the facts against the Police. The chief culprit was committed for murder and found guilty. There was an appeal but the conviction stands good. The British Indian Police are equally up to any crime. As an instance of their ordinary peccadilloes, we refer our readers to a correspondence elsewhere under the title of Police Oppression at Barrackpore. The Police as maintained are more for creating offences than for their suppression. We have always thought that the country would fare better without than with the Police. With the present lower standard of personnel, the real culprits escape while the honest citizens suffer.

IT is a week of mourning in Bengal and for Bengalis and Indians in particular. Two of our greatest men have died in quick succession—within three days of one another. There has been no surprise, however, nor sorrow, unless of the sordid kind. They were two of our oldest men and had long since received their notice to quit. They were down with incurable disease, prostrate and helpless to serve even themselves. They had been suffering like martyrs, and it is a relief to know that the Great Healer has at last taken them under his ministrations.

We have given an outline of the career and character of Raja Rajendralala Mitra. We have neither time nor space for more. As regards Pandit Iswar Chunder Vidyasagar, we may say in one word that he was a most remarkable man, who rose from poverty to be not only a Prince of Pandits but a Prince among Pandits. He was one of the most munificent men of his generation. Money he knew was for expenditure, and he freely expended it, whenever he had an opportunity. He is justly esteemed as an improver of the Bengali language, though our opinion is rather that he has given it a pedantic bias, which will take long to recover from. Without genius or great learning or philosophical insight, he could not enrich his literature with permanent works. But he provided his countrymen with a series of educational primers which greatly facilitated their progress. His specific social reforms proved abortive, and their failure had the direst effect on his character and happiness. His charity became mechanical—a thing of habit. He who was so fitted to shed joy around him and enliven the dullest society, turned a prodigious misanthrope. For a good many years, in consequence, he had lost all relish for life, and it is well for him that he has been removed—to the activities of another region.

REIS & RAYYET.

Saturday, August 1, 1891.

THE LATE RAJA RAJENDRALALA MITRA, D.L., C.I.E.

THE deceased was in every respect a self-made man. Except his rudimentary schooling and his introduction to the world, and, we may add, his special pension, almost everything in life he owed to himself. His education, his rise in life, his knowledge, his distinction in letters, his fame, his position in the literary and political world, were all of his own acquiring. His pedigree no doubt served to round off the corners of his greatness. But, at first, it was more of an incubus, and probably it had an unfortunate lasting effect on the character. According to a vanity common among men, the aspirants to titles and rank have filled the world with spurious genealogies. The deceased, too, on this side was weak to a degree. Without anything like the same necessity as most, he carried his pretensions to absurd lengths, and, through sundry biographies, has allowed to be circulated as facts his speculations on the evolution of his ancestry. Those statements were of the wildest. Most men are content to be noble; he would be royal. Writing on the question whether the Sen dynasty of Bengal were Vaidyas or his own Kayasthas, he derides, from the vantage of high philosophy, the weakness of the controversialists of the castes to prove that the kings belonged to their respective classes. Yet, with an inconsistency by no means rare among the races of Adamite man, he himself evinced the utmost solicitude, and strained every argument and utilised every appearance, howsoever flimsy, to establish for himself a higher pedigree than all his fellows. More than twenty years ago, Dr. Max Muller committed the blunder of making Rajendralala Mitra a Brahman and hereditary

Pandit. As a foreigner, ignorant and helpless for all his knowledge and cleverness, the great European savant was doubtless deceived by his very studies in ancient Sanskrit literature and by our countryman's surname. He had known no vulgar Mitras. Instead of hastening to set Dr. Max Muller and the public right, the Bengali took it easy and proceeded leisurely to build on the foundation of error. He talked of Viswamitra, the Vedic Rishi, and the royal Mitras as among his ancestors. This was not only impertinent, but, from a Hindu point, a sinful presumption for a Sudra. Yet he, as the most illustrious of his family, only carried the family hobby farther than all his people. The Mitras of Soora—the village of the deceased's family house—claim to be a Raja family, and one of them at least—the great grandfather of the deceased—obtained a Mansab. This was his bane and that of his descendants to this day. He had gone, like many others, to the great world of Upper India in quest of fortune, and returned with enough for comfort. But he posed as an Omrah, pretended to rival Raja Nava Krishna, of Sobhabazar, and commenced building a palace to support his state. In a few years, he saw the hopelessness, with his limited and dwindling means, of maintaining the struggle. To retire from it with decency if not grace, he turned pious—a Vaishnav—posed as a re-ligieuse, a hermit, or a fakir. The way was thus opened for the final step in economy—the retirement to a humble house in the country, towards the Soonderbuns. There, in a few years, Pitamber went, leaving his unfinished mansion, to reside in a few one-storyed rooms, backed and fronted by some thatched sheds. For, by that time, he had dissipated his whole fortune. The ruling passion pursued him still, however, and he was made miserable for nothing. He would not receive any letters which did not address him as Raja, and he received more communications than necessary. Lucky for him that he did not live in the days of cheap postage and the cheap and nasty post card! Thus he lived several years at Soora, in the District of the 24-Pergannas, until he died, in 1806, leaving an only son. Brought up under such an example, the heir Brindaban did as much as he could to wind up the family affairs. In his time, the house in town—Pitambar's folly—was sold. Brindaban was so pinched that he at length took service with the Collector of Cuttack, then a recent British acquisition. Still the fortunes of the family went down and down. Poverty and Malthus leagued against it. For, without any diminution of property, the domestic population outran its supporting capacity. Brindaban was an only son, but his son Janmajay had six sons. The second of them was Rajendralala. In order to be relieved in some measure and to benefit the child, he made over his second son to the protection of his sister, a widow without any issue of her own. Thus, Rajendralala, born in February 1824, at Soora, went to live at Pathuriaghata in town, to be brought up in all the affection of a childless Hindu lady. His aunt would have adopted him and given him what little her husband had left her, had the law permitted it. Here he received the rudiments of his education—indeed his entire general, as distinguished from special, technical, or professional education. For his initial Bengali instruction, he was indebted to the family vernacular master—Gooroomohasoy—in Raja Baddynath's house. The foundations of his knowledge of English were laid at some of the petty local adventure schools which started up about the time in every quarter—first Khem Bose's, and afterwards Govind Basak's School. On the death of his aunt, poor Rajendralala returned to the coarse living and insufficient and indifferent accommodation and crowd of the Soora retreat in the "backwoods" of Beliaghata. It became a serious question what to do with him. He was the only promising one of all the six sons, and it were a shame to let such parts waste. There was only one resource for the aspiring poor—the Medical College—where not only a good professional education was given free of charge, but actually a solatium was given in the shape of a monthly stipend of Rs. 8 to each of the alumni. But then to study there entailed social degradation. However, there was no choice left. Unfortunately, Rajendra, now in his fifteenth year, fell into a nasty fever—caught probably from the miasma of his new residence and his changed conditions of living—which long kept possession of him, developing enlarged liver and spleen and reducing his life to a minimum. He suffered for more than a year. At first, there was some treatment, but, latterly, his recovery being despaired of, he was left pretty much to himself. But God is great and brings unexpected succour to his creatures. A poor Portuguese woman cured him, with her rude recipe. The difficulties of obtaining medical aid at a village so out of the way yet near Calcutta like Soora, gave the finishing to the considerations in favour of his medical training. Reestablished in health, he, in November 1839, at the age of sixteen, went to the Medical College and got himself enrolled as a stipendiary student. He made fair progress in his studies. The Principal, Dr. O'Shaughnessy, was an enthusiastic investigator, and Rajendralala, at his request, gave him, after due enquiry, some information about the medicines used by Hindu women for certain purposes. He had established such a reputation that, in 1841, Babu Dwarkanath Tagore was willing to add him to the four students of the same College he had selected for taking them with him for completing their education in England. The difficulty was whether his father would permit him to take that final step of breaking with Hindu society, namely, crossing the sea. Meanwhile, there was a great row in the College and there were serious charges of misconduct against the students. There was no charge against him in particular, but he had taken oath not to divulge what he knew, and at the inquiry he declined to accuse his fellows. So, notwithstanding the good graces of the Principal, Rajendralala, with many others, were rusticated. The door of Æsculapius closed against him, he turned towards the porch of Temis. If not a doctor, he would be a lawyer. He procured the books prescribed in the Pleadership Examination and studied them with diligence. He appeared and thought he had passed. But Cui bono? There were rumours of foul play, and at length it appeared that the questions had oozed out and the papers been tampered with, and the end of it all was that the whole examination was cancelled and nullified. These repeated disappointments might well have crushed a feeble soul, but they had, we suspect, without breaking his spirit, only a souring influence on Rajendralala's character. He threw up law—a study to which he never showed any leaning—for ever, and now as a man whose hopes of a professional career had been exhausted, he, like his other brothers, lowered his aims in life. He must do something to live upon. He was prepared for any employment. Broker or Bani-an's mate would be grand, but where was the interest for it? He was ready for any opening as a clerk in any public department, or private establishment.

He was thus exposed to a great danger. It was a critical point in his life. An accident—a slight incident—might make him or mar him for ever. Luckily for him, his was a making incident. While he was in search of employment or opening, there occurred a vacancy in the Asiatic Society's establishment, in the office of the Assistant Secretary and Librarian. He applied and got the post from the kindness of Dr. O'Shaughnessy, then Secretary, who knew and loved him at the Medical College and pitied him for the circumstances under which he had been virtually expelled from it. Dr. O'Shaughnessy had not to regret his recommendation, nor his colleagues their choice of this unwarranted animal. In a few years, they were reassured, without being conscious of the brilliant hit they had stumbled upon in this slender youth. Still less could they perceive that they had secured memorable service to the Society and to its cause and to the country. For Mitra himself, the paltry appointment saved him. It gave him direction for life. His career was now chalked out. Whatever else he might have the opportunity of being or doing, he would remain an Asiatic Society man. He would be an Orientalist and an antiquarian. It was not all of a sudden that his ambition was fired, or all at once that he felt all his latent powers, or realised all the possibilities of his career. At first, he was only frowned upon by the difficulties of his work. Without a proper equipment of liberal education—with but the rudiments of instruction of obscure native schools at which English is taught by men who know it most imperfectly and frequently wrongly—he had come among Englishmen who were all scholars and at a place where they were entirely occupied with learned matters. It would be foolish to suppose that Mitra was equal to his work. He was, we believe, less able than any of the seven or eight native gentlemen who have held the post from Ram Comul Sen to Pratap Chandra Ghosh. Had it not been for the kindness of the Secretary and others, his nakedness would have been exposed any day and he been compelled to beat a retreat. It must in justice to him be said that, if he could not suddenly make up for the deficiencies of early education, he strove manfully to supply them. Meanwhile, he was not useless, for he tried to be useful in various ways. Thus, he became a favorite as an humble assistant before he could show his intellectual mettle. At the same time, he plunged himself into study. The Society had a great literary collection, but he was not able to use the treasures on account of his linguistic deficiency. So he devoured the current literature—the newspapers and magazines—on the Library table—long before he attacked the tomes in the book-cases. He also gave special attention to the correspondence that passed or that was on record and tried his hand at composition—a thing he had never been called upon to do in the days of his formal education. His drafts and notes passed under the correction of the Secretaries, and he profited by the alterations and additions. He showed a notable promptitude in learning. He proved a valuable official on the establishment. He loved the Society and worked with enthusiasm for it. He catalogued its books and other collections and got the catalogues printed, and for the first time the valuable treasures in its library and its museum were made available to outside scholars, enquirers, and students. He also latterly commenced insinuating contributions to the Society's sittings. Thus he advanced in efficiency and in reputation. Of course, he made many friends among the European members of the Society, including high officials. His daily intercourse with Englishmen required him to talk English constantly, giving him such facility in the tongue and such fluency as to make Europeans stare in astonishment. In his special pursuits as an Asiatic-Society-man exploring the ancient literature of the country or poring over musty records or faded coins, he was alone among all his countrymen. In fine, in eight years' time, he had got looked upon by the leaders of our learned Society as a sort of prodigy among the natives.

But he could not live by this kind of pursuit—in this country at any rate. His pay was a pittance, good enough for a young man to begin with, but preposterous for a grown up gentleman with family. Nor were there any prospects at the Society. He might be taken in into the Subordinate Executive Service, but that would have meant his virtual abandonment of literature. He might be compelled to make it, but it were a tremendous sacrifice. The gods were more kind and had better taste than to see such a fine flower nipped in the bud—to blast such a promising career. About this time, the subject of the up-bringing of the minor sons of landlords whose estates on their death passed into the hands of the State, had attracted public attention. The Government in its capacity of Court of Wards managed the property of the deceased, but their sons were left to grow wild in ignorance and vice, and well fitted to squander away their estates when they came to possession, and maltreat their tenantry and otherwise abuse their position. Tutors were no doubt appointed, but living as these did with their pupils in the latter's houses, where the influence of the minors and their families were supreme, they were cowed into inaction at the best, but more often the tutors were reduced to mere Amla—servants of the house, and sometimes to panders. It was decided to mass the minors altogether in a single institution at the capital, and to bring them under organised influence. So the Wards' Institution was founded and Mitra was fortunate in obtaining the office of Director. Although he thereby got a larger pay, his position remained dubious. He was not enrolled as a public servant, being paid by contributions from the different estates of the minors who resided in the Institution and, of course, without the privilege of pension. His appointment is dated March, 1856.

The Wards' Institution was a godsend to the Soora Rajbansis. He and his people made the most of all the opportunities offered by it. Their passion for pomp and circumstance was at last gratified, however vicariously. The brood of Mitras billeted themselves on the several Rajalings and Baboolings. Their chief posed as a Prince. His morning and evening drives were more like royal progresses. He went out in his state coach, attended by a bodyguard—not of ordinary sowars but of gentleman—and even Raja troopers. But though unable to emancipate himself from a family failing, Mitra was no fool. He was not the man to give himself up to luxury because good living was open to him. He employed the opportunities of his place for cultivating letters. He not only pursued his Sanskrit and archæological studies, contributing papers of more or less value to the Journal of the Asiatic Society and editing Sanskrit MSS. and sometimes translating them for its Bibliotheca Indica, but he joined the Vernacular Literature Translation Society and the School Book Society and took an active part in their labours. With the help of a grant and other advantages from the former, he established and continued for many years an illustrated Bengali magazine called Bibhidharta Sangraha. But he neglected his legitimate duties to attend to pursuits more to his taste or to jobs to eke out his income. His administration was not one of which he might be proud. He left his elder brother a free hand in the stewardship. The wards were left very much to themselves. At any rate, in not a single case did they show that they had been under the daily and hourly influence of one of the most intellectual and learned men in the country. The Director apparently enforced no discipline over boys in his charge, surrounded by all the temptations of a great capital. At length, the scandal became too great to be ignored. Still, out of regard as well for his feelings as for the reputation of Government, inquiries were rather quietly and gingerly made, and, in the end, he was let off with a warning. It was in vain. The disease was radical from which the Institution suffered and no smelling salts could cure. There were repeated scandals, and complaints again and again, until at last, in 1880, the Government made an end of the Institution and pensioned the Director off.

As before, so now, great efforts were made by his influential friends to save the Institution and Mitra's honour. But the country had declared itself with one voice against it. He did not die without a struggle. The occasion could not but produce some good and trenchant writing. He defended himself in the Hindoo Patriot as well as officially.

The history of the Wards' Institution is a melancholy one. A momentous experiment, begun and pursued with every advantage, under the immediate charge of the most renowned scholar of the country, had to be abandoned under painful circumstances. The friends of the Director, however, contrived to convert his fall into a sort of triumph. Rajendralala Mitra was honourably dismissed with not only a pension—to which under the original terms he was not entitled—but a special pension, for his important services—not in destroying the Institution but in—astonishing the Germans. His loss of appointment on the abolition of the Institution involved him in no loss or diminution of income. For he continued to draw as much as his full salary, which was Rs. 500 a month. A pension he richly merited, although the transaction looked a huge and palpable job. It was effected by Sir Ashley Eden, then the head of the Bengal Government, not out of love for the person benefited, whom the Lieutenant-Governor hated, but under pressure from his friends, of whom we may mention one, the late Kristodas Pal.

Mitra was one of the earliest members of the British Indian Association, though not one of its founders. The Association, a revival of the old Landholders' Association, was established on the 29th October, 1851. We find Rajendralala Mitra seconding Babu Nilmoney Muttylal's motion proposing the office bearers for 1853. Not long after, he was admitted into the Committee. He was regular in attendance and attentive to the proceedings, but he never was a weighty member, until towards the end, when all the able men of practical experience of business and knowledge of the country had been carried off by death. He was more of a freelance in politics than one with convictions worked out by himself. For bearing down the enemy he was first-rate. The speech at the meeting, at the beginning of 1857, in favour of the Black Act, which made him famous, was characteristic. In it he denounced the whole non-official European community of India as made up of the "sweepings of England." It raised a storm against the orator. He was threatened with personal vengeance. He was more anxious about his situation, having heard that influence would be brought to bear upon his superiors to oust him. It was rather a vain anxiety, considering that the objectionable passage was an extreme expression of opinion in favour of a Government measure. Still he waited upon old Mr. Dampier, the senior member of the Board, and disclosed his fears. The Englishman gave a characteristic answer which thoroughly reassured him. He had no more opportunity for public speaking until he was made a Justice of the Peace, by virtue of which commission he sat as a Municipal Commissioner. In the Corporation, he found himself among friends and he delighted to try their patience to the utmost, forgetting that there were others and, above all, that there was work to do. Between the two Doctors—Mitra and Banerjea—they succeeded in driving the European element out of the Municipality. On some occasions, no doubt, they did good service, as on others they did ill.

Mitra was connected with the Press as an occasional contributor to the Hindoo Patriot in assistance of Kristodas Pal, or to air his own grievances or wreak his vengeance. His journalism was like his oratory, more slashing than sound. He not only excelled in abuse but he rarely went beyond it—speaking generally, that is. He never wrote on a large or important question of legislation, or administration, or policy. Yet he envied his friend Kristodas his position as editor, equally for its pecuniary and its social advantages. On the death of Kristodas, he allowed no proper successor to be appointed, apparently hoping to conduct the paper through some submissive go-between. And so it happened. His reign commenced with a gratuitous transformation of the paper in its essential features. Nor could he maintain the new order with spirit. Although he ever plumed himself in society on being a Sub Janta, he had not sufficient adaptability to apply himself to different departments of thought and different descriptions of questions, nor sufficient versatility even to supervise the work of others. Compelled to exertion to maintain his credit, not without the stimulus of good cash payment, he overwrote and exhausted himself. The savant ruined the humdrum, statistical, matter-of-fact journal. In his hands, it was neither the one thing nor the other; neither elegant nor useful. Had he died with his colleague Kristodas Pal, his local reputation all round would have stood higher.

But if he brought the famous old weekly to death's door, the newspaper was fully avenged. It proved his death. It prostrated him first and finally sent him to his last rest—drove him to a bed of sickness and afterwards laid him on his bier.

He was not made for a journalist and had never been one, in the proper sense. He was a brilliant guerilla warrior, and that was what he had ever been. He had not the facile pen that printers so admire and which Kristodas Pal possessed in full measure. He could never dash off an article or an editorial note at short notice. He had never been accustomed to write "as the boy waits," and it was a desperate game to try it in the sere and yellow leaf. He broke down under the heavy strain of journalism. All the more because, not content with mere direction of the policy of the paper and supervision over the work of others, he tried to put as much money as possible in his purse by working, as his principal contributor. Thus he brought on paralysis. Even then he would not take warning but continued in harness. Then the machine was peremptorily stopped.

His character was not such as his countrymen can contemplate with unmixed pleasure. He was an example of perseverance in the pursuit of knowledge under difficulties. But the example was not illumined by other virtues, specially by those of the amiable sort. Haughty, quarrelsome, implacable, unfair, he was more feared than loved. His ability and a certain sturdy fibre in his constitution saved him from vulgarity. Still he was not quite saved. We have already adverted to his hereditary weakness. That led him to prize such empty titles as a foreign Government grants to successful Rajmistris and assiduous dolly-givers. He would not be content to be the learned Sudra whom the great Max Muller mistook for a great Brahman Pandit, but merged the Doctor in the Rai Bahadoor and the Raja. Could vulgarity go farther?

Rajendralala Mitra's best title to respect is as a literary man. He was not a profound scholar in any language or in any branch of learning. His acquaintance with Sanskrit was commonplace and far from accurate. The stories about his Greek and Latin are fables. Of modern European languages, he knew only English—the English of the day. With the exception of a few choice authors, he had but scant familiarity with English literature. Poetry he no more understood than he heard music. Philosophy, jurisprudence, political economy, the science of government, even general history, he did not care about. Of science, he had the veriest smattering in certain branches. Yet what an amount of sterling work has he left! He had a genius for utilising all that he knew—the merest scraps of information picked up at random were instruments in his hands. His place among the savants of the world was very high. He investigated the antiquities of India and of Sanskrit literature shoulder to shoulder with the greatest, fighting with them at times but always assured of their respect. Both Weber and Max Muller had received hard blows from him. Fergusson was sent raving under his castigation. The whole republic of letters knew the power of this Bengali's English pen. But his very strength and his triumphs made him reckless, and, latterly, he hurt his reputation by his controversy with Messrs. Pedler and Elliot. There he had ventured out of his element, and he got a suffocating ducking. These Professors proved to him what Horne Tooke proved to Junius. He has left a large quantity of laborious and solid work in Indian archæology and in the editing and translating—with hired assistance—of old Sanskrit works, besides some popular essays. He had no constructive genius—no power of generalization, but he was a very able critic. He was the greatest native Indian author in English, and the only Indian who had achieved a world-wide fame. Let us console ourselves with the reflection that he will never be forgotten.

POLICE OPPRESSION AT BARRACKPORE.

SIR,—On the night of the 2nd June last, two young men, Nibaran Chunder Ghose and Sheikh Ismail were seated on the parapet of a bridge near their house, in Monerampore, smoking and enjoying the cool night air when two constables came up and in an insolent tone asked them "if they were concocting theft." Upon this an altercation ensued and the constable struck Nibaran with a stick. Nibaran raised a cry which brought the villagers to the spot, and, on their demanding names, the policemen took to their heels closely pursued by some of the villagers. Evidently, the constables went to the thannah and there with an acuteness peculiar to the police got hold of one Ram Parsad Passi and made him complain against Tokuray and Hurry Ghose, of theft of toddy from his garden. The man, simple as he was, felt some remorse, and next morning went to an Honorary Magistrate and made a clean breast of how he was pressed by the police to bring a charge of theft against the villagers. Armed with this complaint the Sub-Inspector proceeded to make arrests. Next day the Sub-Inspector arrested eight men, assaulted two, handcuffed six and marched them all to the thanna. The case came on for hearing in due time. Babu Hem Chunder Rai represented the Police and Babu Mohendra Nath Dutt, the defendant. Mr. Sterndale, in a lengthy judgment, discharged the defendants. In commenting upon the evidence for the prosecution, the Magistrate observes, "The statement of the witness Russick hardly calls for notice; he neither recognizes the men who were said to be in custody, nor those who are said to have rescued them; but he is brought in to speak to a very curious bit of corroboration of the arrest story. The constables on meeting him on the road somewhat inconsequently remark to their prisoner 'We will take you to the thannah,' to which the penitent thieves reply 'Let us go, we won't do so any more.' Could anything be more convincing? Here is a plain admission in the presence of an independent witness that they had done something, for which they were in lawful custody. One does not know which to admire most the ingenuity or the ingenuousness of the person who put this case together." Ram Pershad in his cross-examination admitted that he was in the thannah for 3 mortal hours before the Sub-Inspector could write or "conduct" the first information as the Magistrate puts it. Upon this the Magistrate observes, "If the Passi's evidence is to be believed the first information was a work of imagination." The Magistrate concludes by observing, "I am aware that this decision involves a condemnation of the Police officers concerned, but I cannot but come to the conclusion that having themselves offered an insult calculated to cause a breach of the peace to two unoffending men, followed by an assault, they trumped up this charge to cover their own wrongdoing." I understand that the executive are trying to screen this offending Sub-Inspector, but he deserves to be severely punished. Babu Mohendra Nath Dutt, of the Jaun Bazar Dutt family, Calcutta, being appealed to by the accused, took up their case gratuitously at a considerable pecuniary sacrifice, and got them released.

MADRAS SMALL CAUSE COURT BILL.

The Hon'ble Sir Philip Hutchins moved in the Supreme Legislative Council on the 23rd July, for leave to introduce a Bill to extend the jurisdiction of the Court of Small Causes of Madras. He said:

"As indicated by its title, the effects of this Bill, when it becomes law, will be to transfer the cognizance of certain original civil suits, arising within what is called the City of Madras, from the High Court to the Court of Small Causes. It will give to the Madras Small Cause Court a jurisdiction which is at present excluded from it by section 19 of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act of 1882, and that is the reason why it has to be introduced in this Council; but it is really a local measure only, and it has been framed in order to give effect to proposals which have been frequently pressed on the Government of India by the Governor of Madras in Council.

Last year, after we had obtained the approval of Her Majesty's Secretary of State to those proposals, we drew up a rough Bill and transmitted it to Madras in order that before its introduction we might be quite certain that it expressed the intentions of the local authorities. This rough sketch was unfortunately treated as a carefully prepared measure which the Government of India was determined, without any regard to local criticisms and at all hazards, to pass into law before the day which the Secretary in the Legislative Department had, in accordance with ordinary practice, tentatively inserted as the date on which it might come into force. The day thus fixed happened to fall within the High Court's vacation, and a cry was at once raised that our aim was to abrogate the Court's jurisdiction without allowing the Judges a chance of being heard. This point was immediately put right by its being explained that the 1st July was merely a tentative date; that we had no sort of desire to hurry on the Bill; and that in any case it would have to be circulated after introduction, when, according to rule, a reasonable time would be allowed for its consideration and criticism by every one concerned. I am afraid, however, that the idea which got abroad that we were trying to rush the Bill in spite of opposition has not even now been altogether dissipated; and it seems to have infected the mind of the High Court itself as then constituted, for the Hon'ble the Judges repeatedly declare that the measure has been launched without that serious attention and consideration which its gravity demands. I shall presently show that the outlines of the scheme had emanated from the High Court itself, and had been under the consideration of the local authorities for something close on twenty years. Those outlines, however, had perhaps been filled in by our sketch draft in a manner which was open to some objection; and before I proceed further it will be well to make clear both what the Bill which I now lay on the table contains and in what respects it differs from the rough draft to which I have referred.

"And, first, as to the date on which the measure is to come into force, in order to avoid all possibility of future misunderstanding I propose to allow the Governor in Council to appoint the day by notification in the Fort St. George Gazette.

"In the second place, I have cut out all reference to the insolvency jurisdiction. The Government of India recognize the disadvantage of a dual jurisdiction in such matters, and fully accept the assurance of the Hon'ble the Chief Justice that an alteration of the present practice would fail to afford any material relief to the High Court.

"In the third place, at the suggestion of my hon'ble and learned friend Sir Alexander Miller, I have preserved the concurrent jurisdiction of the High Court even in those cases which are to be brought within the cognizance of the Court of Small Causes. Personally I am inclined to agree with the Local Government in this matter, and to hold that we ought to apply the ordinary rule laid down in the Code of Civil Procedure, which is that, when a transfer of jurisdiction is made from a superior to an inferior Court, the power of the former to take cognizance of cases included in such jurisdiction, except by specially calling them up for trial, is ipso facto ousted. Section 15 of the Code enacts that every suit must be instituted in the Court of the lowest grade competent to try it, and therefore in no other Court. My own view with reference to the change of jurisdiction now under consideration is that, until the new tribunal has proved its ability to deal with cases involving difficult questions of mercantile law and usage, it would not only be right and proper for the High Court, but would even be its duty, to lend a favourable ear to an application that such a suit should be called up for trial by itself. The Hon'ble the Judges have, however, repudiated the idea of any understanding as to the course which they would adopt, and, as it is impossible to fetter their discretion upon such a point by legislation, the only alternative seems to be to allow plaintiffs for the present and under certain conditions to choose their own forum. The condition will be similar to that which already prevails in regard to suits cognizable by the Small Cause Court under the existing law. If the plaintiff chooses to resort to the High Court when he might go to the Small Cause Court, he will be debarred from recovering costs, and in case of failure he will have to pay costs as between attorney and client, unless the presiding Judge certifies that the suit was one fit to be brought in the High Court. According to my recollection, there is no class of plaintiffs who give the High Court more trouble than paupers, and I do not think that any provision as to costs is likely to influence them much in the choice of a forum. Perhaps the Hon'ble the Judges may wish to propose some special proviso for the exclusion of pauper suits from the High Court; but I will not venture to do more than suggest the matter for their consideration in this general way.

"Then as regards court-fees, the chief ground, and I think, I may say, the only ground, on which the High Court based its suggestion that the Bill had been launched without due consideration was that the sketch draft omitted to say in so many words what scale of court-fees should be levied. We intended that the scale which Chapter X of the Act lays down for small causes proper should be followed in regard to all suits which might be instituted in the Court of Small Causes. The High Court considers that this Chapter cannot apply to suits which are excluded by section 19 of the Act, and to meet this objection it has now been provided in the Bill that Chapter X of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act shall govern all proceedings which may be heard before the Court or any Judge thereof.

"I now come to another point about which the High Court as constituted last September has expressed itself with perhaps unnecessary warmth. The jurisdiction which the draft Bill before them, which, as I have so frequently pointed out, was only a rough attempt to sketch what was believed to be the intention of the local authorities and should have been so treated—the jurisdiction which that draft purported to make over to the Small Cause Court included suits up to the value of Rs. 2,500, but reserved power to the Local Government to extend this limit by notification. The idea was that the suits up to Rs. 2,500 might prove either too few to occupy one Judge of the Small Cause Court, or too many for one Judge, but not enough for two, and that the Legislature, having established the principle that the original jurisdiction should be reasonably divided between the High Court and the Court of Small Causes, might leave it to the Local Government to make the necessary adjustment from time to time with reference to the business to be done. There was certainly no thought of giving the Executive Government power to extinguish the High Court's original jurisdiction altogether; and, if at any time His Excellency the Governor in Council had been so ill-advised as to make any attempt to do this, it could easily have been defeated by the High Court calling up such cases as it thought proper to its own file. The fact was that we did not contemplate the possibility of the Executive Government exercising its powers without reference to the Judges and otherwise than substantially in concurrence with their advice. The High Court had itself proposed the transfer and might reasonably have been expected to give it effect as from time to time might seem reasonable. As, however, the objection has been raised, and it is perhaps within the bounds of possibility that a Governor in Council might go beyond what is reasonable, and even that he might succeed in securing that previous sanction of the Government of India which the sketch draft made indispensable, there can be no objection to the Legislature fixing any fair limit to his powers. The limit suggested in the Bill which I have laid on the table is Rs. 10,000, but the precise figure is open to revision, and will be a matter for the consideration of the Select Committee. On the other hand, now that the concurrent jurisdiction of the High Court is to be maintained, I think the pecuniary value of suits to be transferred to the Small Cause Court absolutely and without any special order of the Local Government may well be raised from Rs. 2,500 to Rs. 5,000.

"Hon'ble members will have now gathered the exact practical effect of the Bill which I have laid before them. Stated in a few words, it is this. There will be a regular side to the Court of Small Causes at Madras. It will try all ordinary suits up to a value of Rs. 5,000 which are not already cognizable on the small cause side of the Court. Some few classes of suits are excepted, and, speaking generally, it may be stated that the admiralty, matrimonial and testamentary jurisdiction of the High Court will remain unimpaired. It will be left to the Chief Judge to depute any member or members of the Court to preside from time to time on the regular side. The procedure will be governed by the Code of Civil Procedure, and the decrees will be subject to appeal to the High Court. Power is reserved to the Local Government to extend the pecuniary limit of this regular jurisdiction from Rs. 5,000 to any sum not exceeding Rs. 10,000; and it is intended that they should exercise this power with reference to the number of Judges who can be made available in the High Court and Small Cause Court respectively, and the business which has to be distributed between them. In other words, without going so far as to establish a District Court with fixed powers, which shall oust the jurisdiction of the High Court, and the Judge of which might not have enough work or might have too much, we shall make use of machinery which already exists, and apply it under conditions so elastic that it will be in the power of the Local Government to assign to the inferior Court just so much work as may fully occupy the one, one and a half, two or even three Judges whom it is prepared to employ over and above those required for small cause work proper, and to reserve for the High Court so much of the more important original civil business as with the criminal sessions and insolvency work will occupy the one Judge, or it may be one and a half, who can be spared from the appellate side of the High Court. My own view of the situation is that in all probability one Judge ought to be ample for the whole of the original work which deserves to be retained in the High Court. Whether a single Judge will be enough for the regular side of the Small Cause Court must depend on the effect which this legislation may have on the petty litigation of the City. It has been all along recognized that it is likely to cause a considerable increase in the number of suits, and it may well be that the work will be beyond the powers of a single Judge even with the occasional aid of a colleague not at the time required for the small cause work. Should this prove to be the case, the Local Government can at once apply an effectual remedy by appointing a temporary additional Judge, or by enlarging the jurisdiction to such extent as may seem desirable and giving another permanent Judge. This elasticity of the scheme is to my mind one of its chief recommendations. I need hardly remind any one conversant with the work of the Madras High Court in the last decade or two how extremely difficult it is to get an additional Judge appointed to the High Court by letters patent. Mr. Justice Innes' long and ineffectual struggle for the appointment of a fifth Puisne Judge must be well remembered in Madras; and, although in 1883 I had the advantage of entering into his labours, I might never have succeeded but for the fact of my having in 1886 become a Member of the Government and for a further happy concatenation of circumstances of which I was able to take advantage to overcome the very reasonable objections entertained by the Secretary of State.

"But now it may be asked—indeed it has been asked—even granted that the scheme is a good one, why press it at the present time? There is a fifth Puisne Judge at last, and if he is confirmed the High Court will probably be able to get through the work which will come before it for some years to come—why not get him confirmed and have done with it? The simple answer is that this puts the case on an entirely false issue. I am surprised and sorry to find this put forward as the only real issue in some of the newspapers which had no full knowledge of the facts; but I still more regret that the High Court itself, as constituted last September, should have ventured to say that 'the measure appears to have been designed with a purely financial object, simply and solely to relieve the High Court of a portion of its work, and thereby enable the Government to avoid appointing permanently a fifth Puisne Judge.' If this were the sole or even the main object in view, I should still think that the measure is one which deserves to be carried into effect, first, in order that we may ascertain whether after all the fifth Puisne Judge is really necessary; and, secondly, because in a few years' time we may have a sixth Judge proposed, and exactly the same trouble over again. But so far is this from being the main object in view that the Local Government in its last letter, while expressing 'a decided opinion that the present strength of the High Court will never admit of reduction,' is equally decided that the Bill is necessary in order to provide a tribunal both less expensive and less dilatory than a High Court.

"I may say, then, that the objects and reasons of this Bill are twofold. The first is to remove that 'practical denial of justice to a not insignificant portion of the inhabitants of the city' which the High Court admits to exist, and to be inevitable under the present system of judicial administration in the Presidency-town. And the second is to obviate the lamentable waste of judicial power involved in that system, which requires every petty dispute not technically a small cause to be fully investigated by so highly paid an officer as a Judge, or perhaps even a Chief Justice, of the High Court. This waste is more marked in Madras than in Bombay or Calcutta, because the litigation is pettier, and because the original jurisdiction of the Court extends over a far wider area, and one much less distinguishable from the outer Mufassal. It includes a large number of suburban hamlets, and there is no conceivable reason why a petty dispute arising in one of these hamlets should occupy the attention of a High Court Judge on Rs. 3,750 with all his paraphernalia when a similar dispute outside the toll-bar would be adequately dealt with by a Munsif drawing perhaps no more than Rs. 200.

"I say then that, quite apart from the question whether the fifth Puisne Judge should be retained permanently or not, there are the strongest possible reasons for amending the existing state of things in Madras. Even those Judges who deprecate the measure concede this much, for they distinctly 'approve of the measure so far as its effect will be to create a cheaper forum for certain classes of actions which will not endure the expense entailed on suitors' in the High Court. It is true that they add a rider to the effect that the result of establishing such a tribunal will be to multiply suits to an extent which will astonish the Government; but if their estimate turns out to be correct, what will it show? It will only prove that the present denial of justice is even more serious, and therefore that the measure which I am advocating is still more necessary, than had been supposed.

"I have seen it stated that the High Court has only recently been made aware what was really contemplated, and, as I have already mentioned, the Court itself has thought fit to denounce the measure as crude and ill-considered. It must, however, be remembered that three of the six Judges then on the Bench were officiating only, while the oldest and most experienced dissented from the majority. It must also be borne in mind that their remarks were directed to the original sketch which has since been modified in various material respects. I do not anticipate that the Court as now constituted will object to the Bill which I have placed on the table, and for that reason I abstain from any further criticism of its letter; but, all the same, it is right that I should show that the measure originated with the High Court itself, and has received from it, as well as from the Government, very ample consideration.

"When I had myself the honour of a seat among Their Lordships, I was greatly struck, coming as I did from the Mufassal and from a special enquiry with a view to reorganize the Mufassal Courts, by what I have ventured to describe as a lamentable waste of judicial power. The remedy which suggested itself to me is the very remedy which I now wish to apply. On submitting the matter to the Chief Justice, I learned that the same remedy had been suggested by Sir Walter Morgan and more than once urged by himself. I mention this partly because Sir Walter Morgan and Sir Charles Turner were specially remarkable among Chief Justices for their knowledge of the country and talent for organisation, and partly because it will help to explain a letter which Sir Charles Turner drafted embodying the Court's deliberate and unanimous proposals."

THE CAPTIVE LADIE.

By THE LATE MICHAEL MADHUSUDAN DUTT.

Reprinted from the Madras edition of 1849.

"But suddenly a warrior shell,
In loud defiance rose and fell;
As if the Thunderer from on high,
To crush vain mortals met below,
In pomp and grandeur which might vie,
With realms above the starry sky,
Came there to work fierce scenes of woe!
And loud it swell'd and hall and bow'r,
And turret high and skyeey tow'r,
Shook, for it was the call to war,
Wild, fierce, and rolling from afar!
The maiden's blushing cheek was pale,
And hush'd her lover's whisper'd tale;
The hand which strung the breathing lyre,
Seiz'd falchions, bright as blazing fire;
And thousands from that blithesome hall,
Rush'd madly forth to slay or fall!—
Loud was the trumpet's shrilly yell,
And loud the warrior's deafening shell,
And madden'd war-steed's whirlwind tread,
Which crush'd the dying and the dead!
As when within the starless gloom,
Of Himalaya's snowy womb,
Ten thousand torrents madly roll,
To burst from out its dark control;
They roar, as if each furious wave,
Writhed wild with life some Fury gave!

"But there came one on blackest steed,
And there was naught he seem'd to heed;
The proudest warriors from him fled,
His path was o'er the bravest dead!
Fierce was his bloody falchion's sweep,
And fierce his shell's loud blasts and deep,
As on he rush'd, like lightning ray,
To that high hall, erst blithe and gay.

"Beside his high and golden throne,
The Raja stood, but not alone,
For Beauty's wail was on his ear,
He saw her pallid cheek and tear;
And long th' embrace she wildly gave,
To chain his falchion'd arm, so brave,
To deal fierce death around, or save!
He stood him like a lion chain'd,
By victors, whom its pride disdain'd;
And from his wide, deserted hall,
Impatient heard the battle call,
As high it rose, and rolling fell,
Then rose again in fiercer swell!

But Beauty ask'd, can warrior-breast,
List, coldly list to her behest?
'Oh! go not to that bloody field,
'We want thee not thy blade to wield;—
'Hark! to that wild, tumultuous roar,
'Like ocean rous'd from shore to shore,
'When thousand billows proudly rise,
'Like mountains tow'ring to the skies!
'Oh! go not, do not leave us here,
'Defenceless as the timid deer,
'Within the Lion's bloody den!—
She faintly said, then wept again!

"Now o'er the battle's fainter cry,
Loud swell'd the shout of victory!
'They fly;' wild Echo caught that sound,
Which rung triumphant all around:
'Who fly?—oh! let me, let me free,
'The battle-cry is fainter now!—
He paus'd, and press'd his burning brow;—
Loud steps are heard, 'they come,—'tis he!
A youthful warrior there he stood,
His falchion bare,—'twas bath'd in blood!
'Raja! I come to claim my bride,
'Thro' blood, which flows like ocean-tide;
'This is the arm, and this the blade,
'Thy proudest warriors low hath laid;
'And made this day, of festal glee,
'A day of deathless grief to thee!
'My bride'—'is far where ne'er again
'She'll list to thy vile, perjur'd strain!
'But flee,'—he seized his blade, his eye
Glar'd round, but glar'd on vacancy,—
For he was gone, that warrior brave,
As some speed-wing'd, receding wave!

"Yes—he was gone, but that proud hall,
Erst glad with blithesome festival,
Where nations met, but met to die,
Now rung with sad, funereal cry!"

He ceas'd, that bard, and plaudits 'round
Swell'd high as died his Vm's soft sound;
But all unheeded; for his eye
Turn'd to that castle's lattice high,—
How soft the look which gently stole,
The silent eloquence of soul!—
But, lo! a sweet yet faded flow'er,
Dropp'd gently from a lofty tow'r,
Was it from Seraswatti's bow'r?—
Perchance it was;—he took and prest
Its hueless leaves upon his breast,

As if they spoke in tongue unknown
To all save him, and him alone !—

'Tis midnight—but the Moon is pale,
And there be clouds her brow to veil ;
And faint the light her pensive smile
Sheds on that dim and rocky isle :—
The lonely warder looks on high,
On dark-wing'd clouds and lightless sky ;
And dull and listless is his mood,
As his who dreams in solitude,
When softly as Night's lonely sigh
Which wakes the leaves to rustling stir,
Or Morn's sweet breath when passing by
To fan the silken gossamer,
Some undefin'd—and nameless spell
Awakes the aery thoughts that dwell,
And tenant—all embalm'd with tears,
The sepulchre of by-gone years—
Where Memory her vigil keeps,
And the lone Heart in sorrow weeps !—

Upon the far and darkling tide
A shadowy form now seem'd to glide,
But soon it pass'd—the warder's eye
Beheld it softly gliding by
Upon that dark—wide—liquid plain,—
When next he look'd—he look'd in vain.
Perchance it was some wandering shade
Of fair but love-lorn, hapless maid,
From out her cold and watery grave
Upon the dark and troubl'd wave,
On aery skiff to haunt the spot
Of perjur'd love—yet unforget !

He reck'd it not—that warder brave,—
Full soon it vanish'd o'er the wave,
But wistfully now turn'd his eye
To hail the smile of light on high,
Which faintly spread along the sky :—
Morn came—and rock and land and stream
Soon caught her glad some—rosy beam,
And there was beauty in her smile
E'en on that lone and rocky isle !
Morn came—but now her laughing ray
Chas'd not a Captive's sleep away,
As thro' that castle's lattice high
It peep'd and smiled all joyously,
For she was gone !—they sought in vain
In hall and tow'r—on rock and plain !
The minstrel, too, they found him not,
As eagerly around they sought.
"They've fled"—Truth whisper'd to the ear
Of pale Despair—in accents clear !—

Yes—they were gone :—but who was he,
That nameless son of Minstrelsie ?
Was it some being of heavenly birth,
Had stray'd below to woo the love
Of that fair, beautiful child of earth,—
Then winged her to the realms above ?
They ask'd—conjectur'd—question'd on,
Yet only knew that they were gone :—
Till as a tale whose accents fall
Like Death's all stern resistless call,—
They heard the bard whose minstrel-lay
Once sooth'd their lonely hours away,
Was proud Husteena's * monarch high,
Who came to win from lone captivity
The bride a ruthless father's wrath would doom
To desert-solitude and donjon-gloom !

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

BOTH Dr. Rajendralala Mitra and Pandit Iswara Chandra Vidyasagara, who had been long ailing, at length came to a full stop last week. The Doctor died at nine on the night of Sunday the 26th July. The event was not known to the general public till next Tuesday morning, when the papers announced the sad loss. Even his own journal—the Hindoo Patriot—was not aware of it, for, appearing in the forenoon of the next day, it still talked of his increasing illness, unaware that all cause for anxiety was over, that

The last of danger and distress had been passed. The Pandit, although older by four years and his disease of a more galloping nature, outlived the Doctor by as many days, dying at two on the morning of Wednesday. The schools and colleges, both Government and private, were closed in sad memory of the two deceased. The Government offices—Bengal and India—were half closed. The native share market transacted no business last Saturday. These are legitimate expressions of grief for the great departed. But some of the boys of the Pandit's own school, under injudicious advice, carried their demonstrations to absurdity. They resolved to go unshod for a space of ten days—the period of a Brahmin's mourning. Little did these juvenile gentlemen suspect that, by thus claiming by implication a superior pedigree with him to which they are not born, they simply insulted the dead, and did not advance their own position. It was an outrage on their own relatives and parents. The same boyish freak mourned Surendra Nath Banerjee as dead, with black ribbon on their breasts, when he was punished for contempt of the High Court. Public demonstrations of grief or sorrow for public men is quite a distinct business from a private mourning. The claims of the nearest and dearest dead are always superior and must not be equalled by or subordinated to the respect that may be due to public men no more. The distinction must always be drawn. Each to his own and within his limit.

Pandit Iswara Chandra Vidyasagar was born in 1821 and Dr. Rajendralala Mitra in 1824.

Sectional meetings of condolence have been held. The Presidency College Union, under the presidency of the much abused Mr. Tawney, and the Metropolitan Institution have, besides, passed resolutions to perpetuate the memory of the Pandit by some memorials the nature whereof will depend upon the subscriptions realized among the students and ex-students. The General Committee of the Calcutta Corporation have voted Rs. 500 for a portrait of the Doctor. The British Indian Association, following suit, have also decided for a portrait of their own Raja Rajendralala.

NOTWITHSTANDING the unseasonable weather and the season of sickness, there was no abatement in the festivities of gay Simla. The illness of the Viceroy himself was no bar to his Military Secretary celebrating his birthday anniversary with grandeur. At Ooty, Lord Wenlock waltzed the Devil valse while scarcity and famine stalked in his dominion, but it was expected they would shew better manners at Simla. Whatever the English etiquette, Oriental decorum cannot tolerate any demonstration of joy at the capital while the ruler is confined to a sick bed. To mark the difference as it were, the preparations for Lord William Beresford's birthday rejoicings on the 20th July were on an elaborate scale. Perhaps, at Simla they do not feel themselves in India and, being in a sort of no-man's-land, they do just as they like, according to a convention of their own. Barring that initial impropriety, all was in due form and everything was "tip top." To begin with, the little folks were first treated to music, dance, lunch, and magic lantern exhibition. The children numbered about one hundred. Lady Lansdowne, Lady Evelyn Fitzmaurice, Sir Frederick and Lady Roberts assisted at the entertainment to the little people by their presence and encouragement. The bigger folks were not neglected. Two hundred of them, guardians and friends of the boys, were regaled with a sumptuous dinner. Sir Frederick Roberts proposed the health of the host, which was, of course, most heartily received.

THE Deccan Times has shut up shop from the first of this month, being the commencement of the operation of the new Press regulations in places administered by the Governor-General in Council, but not forming part of British India.

* Delhi.

BABOO Bunkim Chunder Chatterjee, Deputy Magistrate, Alipore, 24-Pergunnahs, has come down sharp upon sharp practice. He has sentenced a Pleader of long standing, Annoda Prasad Roy Chowdhry, to four months' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 200, or, in default of payment, another two months' labor, for abstracting, in the interest of his client, from the record of a civil suit, a lease (pattah) of his own filing. On the application of the other side, he had been called upon by the Judge to shew cause why he should not be reported to the High Court. That matter stands over.

HERE is a story of progress of our Princes, in the unsophisticated language of British law reporting :—

"In the Glasgow Court of Sessions on the 28th June the case of Ross and another vs. Sir Bhagvat Sinhji came up for hearing. Lord Kyllachy heard proof on the question of jurisdiction in the action by Mrs. Elizabeth Sarah Williams or Ross, wife of, and residing with, George Ross, 109, Stamford Street, London, against His Highness Sir Bhagvat Sinhji, Thakore Sahib of Gondal in the Province of Gujerat, and Presidency of Bombay, India, K. C. S. I., LL.D., residing at 3, Belgrave Crescent, Edinburgh, for £1000s. of inlying expenses, £50 per annum as aliment, for her child, and £2,000 as reparation in respect of alleged seduction. The defender lived in London for some time, and the pursuer states that before her marriage she was one of his servants there. The defender says that he is an Indian by birth, and that his domicile and home are in India. He also states that the pursuer is English by birth and has all along lived in England. He pleads that the question between the parties fall to be determined by the law of England, and that in respect of that law, which excludes the pursuer's claims, he is entitled to be absolved. Mr. H. C. Asquith, M. P., a Member of English Bar, and Queen's Counsel, gave evidence as to the English law in regard to actions for seduction. Mr. Brodie Innes, a member both of the English and Scottish Bars, was held as concurring with Mr. Asquith's evidence. Mr. Salvesen (for the pursuers) said he did not propose to lead any evidence upon the point. Mr. Dickson, for the defender, then asked His Lordship for absolvitor, in respect that he had established completely that the pursuers had no right or title to sue for damages in respect of seduction of the female pursuer, that, quoad ultra, there was no relevant ground. Mr. Wilson, for the pursuers, maintained that they were entitled to an issue in this case. At the close of the hearing His Lordship made avizandum of the case."

Our readers no doubt will stare with us at the queer terms of Scotch jurisprudence. The nett result we take to be this. Having left his seraglio behind in Gujerat, the Prince was ready to be human, but he was not apparently prepared to be humane enough, to say nothing of princely.

THE Indian Daily News of August 7, contains the following leaderette :—

"We have received many communications during the last few days touching on the lives, merits, and deaths of two well-known citizens, Rajah Rajendralala Mitra and Pundit Vidyasagar. Most of these have consisted of indiscriminate laudation, which however grateful to the families and friends of the departed, are scarcely the notices which would best tell the story and moral of their lives. These notices are like the Indian sun, light and warm, but one feels them too strongly, and as Sydney Smith desired a few brilliant flashes of silence to modify Macaulay's incessant talk, so a few shadows on these sketches of the departed would have given a more correct representation of the men. Excepting one or two little errors in the notice of Rajah Rajendralala, the sketch of the man and his work in the last number of Reis and Rayyet is a far more correct portrait of the inner man than the more laboured but less truthful accounts which have been printed and written by other hands. The mistakes referred to are of a slight character, not affecting the substantive merits of the biography. The Rajah was the third son of his father, not the second, the third of six brothers, of whom three survive him. We have not for a long time read a better biographical sketch than the one under notice, which bears evidence of the master's hand, which has preferred to draw a truthful picture rather than one out of perspective in deference to the somewhat sickly sentiment that fears or fails to do justice on both sides of a character. The Editor has painted the pimples and the warts on 'Cromwell's' face, as well as his comely features, and we see the man as he was. There is no fulsome adoration of powers which were not possessed, and no fear of pointing out the angularities and the littleness as well as the greatness of the man. We are shown his capacities as well as his achievements; the means as well as the ends attained. While there is much seen that shows an example of perseverance, there is no attempt to conceal the weaknesses of his character. While full credit is given for what he was and all he did, his merits are not exaggerated, nor his faults magnified. It is a model biography, and there is more credit due to such correct expression of facts than could honestly be accorded to the most laboured panegyrics."

THE Moharram Festival commenced on Thursday evening and Mutthiaboorj, the place of His late Majesty the King of Oudh, was quite a scene of beauty and bustle. The Tazia procession is still an attraction, and the street from Hushmat Munzil up to Imambara Sibtainabad was crowded with a large number of spectators. People flocked in from Calcutta, and all the Mahomedans of Mutthiaboorj took a lively interest on the occasion. A large number of men formed the procession with torch lights and flags. Prince Mirza Jahan Kadar Bahadoor with other princes followed the zareeh on foot. The Band and Nowbat played music. Among those who took part were Princes Sultan Mirza, Kamyab Mirza, Furtookh Mirza, Tajool Mulook, Mirza Mohamed Askari, Dilawar Jah, Ibrahim Mirza, Akhtar Jah, Akram Hossain, Abbas Mirza, Humayoon Jah, Fareedoon Jah, Maimanat Mirza, Pydray Mirza. Although it was nothing in comparison with the festival that took place in the time of His late Majesty, yet something is better than nothing, and it is a great thing that Government has permitted this shadow of former glory to stay after the substance has been withdrawn.

PARLIAMENT was prorogued on the 5th. The Times expects another session before dissolution. The closing of the session was, as usual, preceded by the presentation of and the debate as it is on, the Indian Budget in a thin house. Mr. Andrew Provan, member for the Blackfriars Division, Glasgow, demanded further reforms in the factory laws of India. Mr. Samuel Smith, member for Flintshire, was to have moved for the elective principle in the legislative Councils, but he was not technically in order. Mr. Maclean moved that it is desirable, in the interests of Indian and Afghan trade, to extend the railway to Candahar, which, if necessary, could be placed under the control of the Amir. The motion was seconded by Sir Roper Lethbridge, who thought that such a railway would lead to economies and promote trade. Sir Richard Temple was of a different opinion. He feared the commercial advantages were overrated and apprehended a difficulty with the Amir. Sir John Gorst, in reply, said that it was against the policy of the Government of India to interfere with independent frontier tribes or to extend the frontier. It was concerned only to bring the tribes into friendly relations with India. The Amir, he further said, was an independent ruler, not a vassal, and the Government had no right to interfere with his fiscal policy. Mr. Maclean's motion was ultimately negatived without a division.

Sir John Gorst presented a hopeful prospect of the Indian finance and a prosperous condition of the country. All the receipts showed an increase except those from opium. There was no prospect of any frontier expeditions and the danger of famine had ceased.

THE British Medical Association has decided to urge that cremation should be made general. The Hindu mode of disposal of the dead is undoubtedly the best for the living.

DROUGHT is being succeeded by flood. In the Western Presidency, at one place, the rain fall was registered eighteen inches in twentyfour hours, with its attendant disasters. Long stretches of the Bombay, Baroda line were breached, several bridges collapsed and the mail service was at a stand still. The greatest calamity is reported from the Bhoynagar State. At the town of Mithva, on the coast, fifteen inches of rain fell in twentyfour hours. The streets were breast high in water, 1,027 houses fell and 74 lives and 305 head of cattle were lost.

A TELEGRAM from Simla, dated the 6th, speaks of 14 inches of rain in 30 hours, of fall of a house in Chota Simla burying three natives two of them to death, of collapse of a stable on Elysium Hill burying to death a syce and two horses, of heavy slip, throughout the station, of the whole face of the hill below Yarrows being in a dangerous condition, of the occupants of Stirling Cottage taking refuge in the Elysium Hotel in the middle of the night. On the night of the 5th, seven inches of rain fell between 4 and 8 o'clock.

THE following two paragraphs, with many others, were in type for our last issue but were elbowed out of it by the length of the obituary notice of Raja Rajendralala Mitra.

News comes to us from Hyderabad, that the marriage of one of the unmarried sisters of His Highness the Nizam has been arranged with Nawab Imam Jung Bahadur, a son of Nawab Sir Khoorshed Jah Bahadur, by a wife other than an elder sister of the Nizam, by whom he has another son, named Nawab Zuffer Jung Bahadur.

Sir Khoorshed Jah, who was staying out of town, was sent for by His Highness, and, at the interview which followed, he presented, in connection with the proposed match, the customary Nuzzur, which His Highness duly accepted.

EARLY this week, we received the following telegram from Hyderabad :

Nawab Imam Jung Khurshed-ul Mulk Bahadur, elder son of Nawab Sir Khurshed Jah Bahadur, is going to be married to the elder sister of His Highness the Nizam. The mangni or betrothal ceremony took place Saturday last with great pomp and circumstance. Nawab Sir Khurshed Jah, Nawab Vicarul Omra, Nawab Zuffer Jung and other members of Shums-ul-Omra family, proceeded on foot to the Nizam's Chowmahalla Palace in grand procession, the Nawab's forces, Cavalry and Infantry, going in front. The bridegroom was on horseback. The distance between Khurshed Jah's Palace and the Chowmahalla Palace is more than a mile. The procession started at sunset and by the time the bridegroom reached the Chowmahalla Palace it was passed eight. The bridegroom and party were received by Rajah Giridhar Pershad on behalf of His Highness and conducted to the Durbar Hall, where they were entertained to nautches. His Highness, who was in a separate building, having sent for the bridegroom, Nawab Sir Khurshed Jah, Nawab Sir Asman Jah, Nawab Vicar-ul-Omra and Nawab Zuffer Jung escorted him to His Highness and presented nuzzurs, while in the zenana the ladies performed the usual religious ceremonies. The nautches continued till two in the morning after which the party returned home in the same order as before. Sir Asman Jah had visited the bridegroom at Khurshed Jah's Palace before the procession started. The proposed alliance has given great satisfaction to the public.

SINCE the receipt of that telegram, we have received a letter from which we learn that the marriage itself will take place in November, and will doubtless be celebrated with befitting grandeur.

NEARER home, there will be a marriage in high life in Behar, in the ensuing cold weather, provided a suitable match may be negotiated. The Maharaja of Doomraon is anxious to marry and settle his daughter, and the active Dewan of the Raj, Lala Jai Prakash Lal, is engaged in finding a desirable alliance. As he has devoted himself with his whole soul to this subject, we may be sure he is sure to succeed. Indeed, we hear he has already offers, but he is very particular, and, besides, would not spend more money than he can help.

SIR John Macdonald, the Canadian Premier, who has lately died, was one of the most remarkable men of the age. He was the Colonial Disraeli—no Brummagem imitation but a true chip of the same block. He was a man of rare courage and indomitable energy. Scotch by birth and American by training, it was his destiny to get on, and got he on, not swimmingly perhaps, still bravely. He resolved to climb to the top and he climbed to the top soon enough, despite all difficulties. Educated at Kingston in Ontario, he chose the law for profession. He early mixed himself with politics, first local and then general. Meanwhile, between his ability and his political connections, he extended his practice and his reputation. By 1847 he obtained the office of Receiver-General and entered the Executive Council. He next became Commissioner of Crown Lands, and afterwards Attorney-General, then Minister of Militia, and finally in 1858 Prime Minister. After he was driven from power he still maintained his prominent position in the House. When the project of uniting Upper and Lower Canada was broached, he advocated the principles of the measure, and, when the union was accomplished in 1867, he easily rose to the head of the administration. He earned great distinction as the leader of the Conservative Party in the Dominion. But he was not above the frailty of the politicians of his Continent. He patronised the Canadian Pacific Railroad as an undertaking likely to advance the prosperity of British North America, but he was accused of having, as head of the Administration, agreed, for a private consideration to himself, to subsidise the Company. A Committee of the colonial Parliament was appointed to enquire and the change was proved. He had to resign, but he was under a brief cloud. The people there are not particular. He soon emerged and regained his old position.

IN a libel suit at Montreal, the defence proved that the character of the plaintiff was so high that no amount of traducing would injure his business. The jury thereupon found for the defendant. In India, as is the law now administered, a mere constructive publication of what a judge conceives to be defamatory is enough for conviction and wholesale punishment. Whether the complainant suffers or not, is not allowed to be an issue. Even when the defendant declares that the alleged defamatory matter was not intended for the plaintiff, the plaintiff is allowed to appropriate the imputation to himself and there is no escape for the defendant. As the law stands or is enforced, the greatest scoundrel, by a resort to our law courts, can stop the mouth of him who ventures to warn his fellow brethren of the miscreant. Only sing praises, never breathe aught that may in any way be distasteful—such seems to be the verdict of our law courts. It does not matter if society is rendered unsafe by allowing free access to it of dangerous characters, or history falsified by absolute misrepresentation. Truly, it is the Age, and this the Land—of Unveracities. O for a Carlyle to lash the multitudinous humbugs blatant of our times into compunction! O for a Cobbet or a Hunt to go to jail pro bono publico and the reform of the Press Law and its administration!

It is wellknown that Eve's fair daughters have a sneaking partiality for the wicked. That they should hang on the lips of roués may be understood. But it now appears that of all h—l's host they have a decided preference for rogues, specially gambling rogues. Some twenty years ago, Captain the Hon. Walter Harbord was exposed cheating at baccarat at the Circle Méditerranée, at Nice. There could be no doubt about it in England. Still on his telegraphing to a lady there, she actually left her husband on his death-bed, and proceeded to Paris to meet the sharp man. She knew the cost of her unwifely conduct. Her husband soon after died, cutting her with a shilling. She did not care, apparently recompensed by the freer opportunity to follow her knave of cards' fortunes. In due course, she married him, and possibly now gives tone to ton somewhere as Lady Eleanor Harbord.

THE Effective Advertiser is not only true to its name but is a very good publication indeed. It is a business serial, the full name being The World's Printers, Stationers, and kindred Traders' Effective Advertiser, and an excellent one of its kind, most useful to all professionally or commercially connected with the Press or printing. But it is something more and better. It is an interesting monthly which may be read with profit by the general reader. That it is a model of typographic art goes without saying. It is withal written with singular ability and force, being evidently conducted by accomplished literary men. Its statement of the claims of the craft is so neat that we reproduce it:—

"What are printers? What have printers done? What are printers doing now? Printers have educated the world, or most of it. Printers' books guide commerce across the seas, scare ignorance away, make and maintain liberty, elevate mankind above all its old levels, and a copy of the Bible may be bought for a shilling. Printing maintains law and order, printing keeps the free man free, and liberates the slave. Printing enables dead giants in history and debate, dead warriors, dead statesmen to speak to us again and again in their own words, giving us the benefit of their knowledge to assist ours, of their deeds to inspire us."

As a specimen of the fun of the journal, we cull a consolidated "goak," combining the characteristics of Irish and American humour, with a genial poke at Sambo, to wit:—

"A journalist who was reporting things in one of the Southern States happened, by a lamentable accident, to be mortally shot by a negro. The journalist was an Irish joker, and the shooting hurt. His last words were: 'This is the darkey's day of my existence'; and immediately after: 'I die a meggerminious death.'"

HERE, from the American Press, is the Mirror of the Ages—of English Premiers:—

"Since 1800 there have been 18 Premiers and one remarkable characteristic about them is that they are peculiarly long-lived. Mr. Spencer Percival was assassinated at the age of 50, and Sir Robert Peel died in consequence of a fall from his horse at the age of 62. Pitt is an exception to the rule, as he died at 46, and Canning only reached 57. Lord Beaconsfield was 74 when he died, and Mr. Gladstone is past 80; and the remaining twelve who have held office since 1800, average over 75 years of age, though the average is much decreased by Lord Liverpool, who died at 58. Lord Sidmouth, who quitted office as Premier in 1804, died at 87, in 1844. Lord Granville left office in 1807, and died, aged 75, in 1834. The Duke of Portland died at 71. Viscount Goderich resigned office in January, 1828, and died in 1859, aged 67. The Duke of Wellington quitted office in November, 1830, and died in 1852, aged 83. Earl Grey left office in 1834, and died in 1845, aged 81. Viscount Melbourne left office, the second term of tenure, September, 1841, and died, aged 69, in 1848. Earl Russell resigned the Premiership last in July, 1866, and died in 1877, aged 85. Lord Derby was last in office in June, 1859, and died in 1869, aged 70. The Earl of Aberdeen resigned office in February, 1855, and died, at the age of 76, in 1860. Viscount Palmerston died in office in November, 1865, aged 81."

We wonder at the taste of the men who, without any definite purpose in view, hunt up such statistics. Never was drudgery less useful. There is not a single idea to be drawn—not a single generalization to be made—from the laboriously collected mass of facts. Is it the object of the collector to show that the English Prime Ministers have been a set of old fogeys? Some,* by his own showing, were young enough when they retired. But admitting that many of them ruled the empire at an advanced period in life, it must be remembered that mere age does not constitute fogeyism. The real test is intellectual power. Can any of the great ministers be said to have been in their dotage? Not in the least; not one. They all retained the full vigor of their minds, however much they might suffer from the gout and other complaints. And Palmerston at eighty was as hale and hearty at the head of Government as Gladstone is in Opposition at eighty-three.

MOHESH CHUNDER PAL has paid too dearly for his new venture—the Ranganibasi. He went into no small expense in floating the concern. Soon he was drawn into a whirlpool of a litigation which has lodged him in jail. He was out of pocket to the tune of about Rs. 8,000 in the Police Court, in the now famous prosecution of his paper by the Sadharan Brahmo fraternity. All the lengthened advocacy of Mr. Palit could not save him imprisonment. He then engaged the famous defender of O'Hara to move for him the High Court. That means another Rs. 2,000. Mr. Woodroffe made his motion on a Tuesday. He would have appeared earlier, but the Criminal Appellate Bench was not sitting on account of the illness of one of the Judges, and the Chief Justice would not take up a motion unless it was an extraordinarily urgent one. Pal loses nothing by the delay except the subsequent costs. For the Court—the Hon'ble Justices O'Kinealy and Trevelyan—rejected the application. The principal contention of the learned counsel was whether any person in this country by reason of his being proprietor of a newspaper in which a libel was published, was responsible therefor, unless it could be shown, within the meaning of the Act, that he intended to harm, or knew, or had reason to believe that the imputations contained in that would harm. Mr. Woodroffe argued that the evidence in the case pointed to Pal being the proprietor but it went farther and proved that he never in any way interfered with the conduct of the paper, or saw or superintended what was contained in it, and certainly it was not shewn that he was in the least aware that the paper of the 19th April (containing the defamatory matter) contained any libel at all. All the evidence against him was that he had ordered a peon to sell four copies to a purchaser. Whereupon—

Mr. Justice Trevelyan.—The mere selling of a paper was publication.

Mr. Woodroffe.—In one sense that that was so, and in another it was not so. Under the law publication meant making public, intending to harm, or knowing or having reason to believe, that such information would harm. The question was whether a Judge would direct a Jury to find, on such evidence as this, a defendant guilty of publication with intent to harm the reputation of another.

Mr. Justice Trevelyan.—There was no question that these libels would attract the attention of any person reading the newspaper. Here was a case of a man who was proprietor of a paper, who sold copies the day after it was published, and who knew Bengali, and speaking for himself he thought that he would put it to a Jury that the man must have known what was in that paper.

Mr. Justice O'Kinealy delivered the following judgment:—

"This is an application made on behalf of Mohesh Chunder Pal, said to be the owner of a paper, and now suffering imprisonment on conviction for a libel before the Presidency Magistrate. Learned Counsel, who appears on behalf of the petitioner, has impugned the decision arrived at by the Magistrate, and has raised several points for our consideration. In the first place he asserts that the ownership of the paper has not been brought home to him; and secondly, he says even if this were considered to have been proved, yet his client took no direct part in the management of the paper, or the editing of it, and therefore he neither knew, nor had reason to believe, that any libel was published against the complainant in the Court below, and as a deduction from that, he has argued generally that his client made no imputation against the complainant that would injure, or would affect him injuriously. Now there can be no doubt, and it has been admitted at the bar that the imputation made amounts to libel, and a libel of a very serious character. It had the double fault of being extremely offensively personal, and an attempt to libel a whole community through one individual of it. This was, indeed, the defence raised by themselves, but we have no hesitation in saying that the libel was very gross and incapable of being justified, nor can we think that there can be much doubt as to who was the owner of the paper. The Presidency Magistrate relied somewhat on the notice issued in the name, or under the same name as that of the prisoner in the paper, saying that the responsibility lay on him. But he also said there was abundant evidence irrespective of this notice to prove the ownership. We think that is so. Looking at the evidence of Mr. Moore alone, which was referred to by Counsel on behalf of the applicant, we think there can be no doubt that the applicant was the owner of the paper. We now come to the last point raised by Counsel, namely, was there any evidence that the Magistrate would be justified in finding, as he has found, that the applicant knew, or had reason to believe, in the existence of this libel? Mr. Moore tells us that on the death of the previous editor, the prisoner made all arrangements for carrying on the paper. Immediately after that a dispute arose between the complainant and the paper, and the libel complained of was dated 17th April. On the 18th the prisoner sold the paper himself. He also sold papers subsequently on the 28th of April, that is to say we find the dispute beginning immediately after he made arrangements for carrying on the paper. He was the owner, and he sold it. We think, even taking that part of the evidence to which attention has been drawn by Counsel, that the learned Magistrate in the Court below was perfectly justified in convicting the prisoner. The result is that his application is rejected."

In the absence of the writer of the defamatory matter, the proprietor of the newspaper in which it appears must answer for the unconscious sin. Mr. Justice O'Kinealy bases his judgment on the seriousness of the libel. That libel no doubt deserves castigation, but it is not enough that the publisher and the printer are punished, the proprietor too must suffer. He has been proved to be the owner and to have sold or ordered the sale of copies of the paper containing the libel. He must be presumed to know and understand the contents and must be punished for the libel accordingly.

YESTERDAY, on the application of the Standing Counsel, the Chief Magistrate issued warrants against Babu Jugendro Chunder Bose, proprietor, Babu Brojoraj Banerjee, manager, Babu Kristo Chunder Banerjee, editor, and Aroonodoy Roy, printer and publisher, of the weekly Bengali newspaper the Bangabasi. Mr. Pugh applied for processes under sections 124 A and 500 of the Indian Penal Code, but Mr. Handley issued the warrants under section 124 A only. That section was added to the Penal Code in 1870, when the Vernacular Press Act of Lord Lytton was repealed by Lord Ripon, and runs thus:—

"Whoever by words, either spoken or intended to be read, or by signs, or by visible representation, or otherwise, excites or attempts to excite feelings of disaffection to the Government established by law in British India, shall be punished with transportation for life or for any term, to which fine may be added, or with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three years, to which fine may be added, or with fine." There is, however, a saving clause—"Such a disapprobation of the measures of the Government as is compatible with a disposition to render obedience to the lawful authority of the Government, and to support the lawful authority of the Government against unlawful attempts to subvert or resist that authority, is not disaffection. Therefore, the making of comments on the measures of the Government, with the intention of exciting only this species of disapprobation, is not an offence within this clause." Mr. Pugh examined two witnesses in support of his application—Babu Durga Dass Lahiri, proprietor and editor of the Anusandhan, and Sarat Chunder Roy, an ex-employee in the Bangabasi office, to prove that the four persons against whom he wanted to proceed were the proprietor, the manager, the editor and the printer of that weekly. The Standing Counsel then read translations of extracts from the issues of that journal of the 20th March, 16th May, and 6th June last. The Magistrate seemed to doubt whether the evidence tendered was strictly legal and regularly put in. Mr. Pugh replied that that was only the preliminary evidence for issue of the processes, and that he would place ample and satisfactory evidence at the enquiry. The Magistrate then passed the order for the warrants. Search warrant was next asked for and granted. It was now the turn of the Police. Superintendents Lamb and Robertson, and Inspectors Macready, J. C. Mitter and B. N. Chatterjee marched to the office of the journal in Colootolla Street at about 12-30 to arrest the four men and to take charge of such papers as might support the prosecution, and left the place at about 3 in the afternoon. They arrested the printer on his way to the office but the other three were not there nor at their private residences. Later in the day, Baboo Kanyelal Mookerjee, Pleader, Police Court, applied for release of the printer on bail. Superintendent Lamb opposed the application. The Magistrate, observing that the offence charged was non-bailable, asked the Pleader to renew the application the next day when he would pass orders in the presence of both sides.

To-day, the parties surrendered themselves and through Mr. Hill and Mr. Lal Mohun Ghose applied for bail, which the Magistrate refused. Mr. Hill made an excellent preliminary address, putting as good a face on the matter as he was allowed to do with the translations of the offending writings. But the Standing Counsel spoiled his game by insisting on the prisoners being sent to confinement. In view of section 497 of the Criminal Procedure Code, Mr. Pugh warned the Magistrate against prejudging the prosecution at the outset by a step which could be justified only on a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the accused. In justice to Mr. Handley as well as to the defence, it ought to be added that the Magistrate distinctly avowed that, were it not for the Standing Counsel's objection, he would have allowed bail. There was certainly no fear of the accused not being forthcoming at the trial.

The court was crowded. It was a sad spectacle to see so many brave men packed in that ugly box on wheels marked "V. I." and carried away. Such are the liabilities of journalism.

SIR Charles Elliott cut away from his tour and passed Wednesday in Calcutta. He arrived in the morning and left at night. In the forenoon, he held an extraordinary session of the Bengal Legislative Council and passed the Hackney Carriage Bill, with several amendments of his own motion recommended by the Calcutta Corporation, without the formality of a reference to the Select Committee.

During his flying visit to town, the Lieutenant-Governor, we hear, held a consultation with the Crown lawyers and the other eminent Counsel who have given their opinion in favour of the prosecution of the Bangabasi. We suspect it was not without an eye to this more important and pressing business that he came. The regulation of the affairs of Jehudom might easily have waited till the regular sessions of the Council.

The Chief Secretary has doubtless been left behind on the same business in court, to be ready at hand.

ONE more unfortunate of the Manipur Royal family and a leading official in the State, Tokendra Birajit Singh alias Dangkai Rakpal, has been condemned—not to death but to transportation for life and forfeit of all his property. He was not tried by the Special Court but by the Chief Political Officer Major Maxwell. Tokendra Birajit suffers not for murder of the British officers or for abetment thereof but for omission to use his influence for prevention of the murder.

THE PROSECUTION OF A BENGALI NEWSPAPER FOR SEDITION.

THE event of the week is the Government action in regard to the Native Press. Yesterday, Calcutta was startled by the news that the office of the leading vernacular journal in Bengal had been invaded by the Police, its printer seized and its records overhauled, and that its conductors are in hiding. As usual on such occasions, many wild rumours were afloat. One account was that the Police went without warrants, another that the High Court, moved by Government, had issued warrants, and a third that the Government had directed the Police executively. These rumours, we need scarcely say, were without the slightest foundation. There has been no contre-temps—nothing of the nature of a coup d'état. There has been nothing startling or extraordinary, or even hasty. Everything has been deliberate and proper and in due form. There was even a sort of preparation of the minds of the native town. On Thursday, there was a rumour that the proprietor and the editor of the Bangabasi Bengali weekly newspaper had been arrested. Although the specific statement was false, it was not absolutely unfounded in so far that it only anticipated the event. That rumour only proves that the official preparation had by that got wind. It now appears further that the matter had leaked out a few days before. There was, therefore, not much ground for legitimate surprise at the event when it did take place. Under the circumstances, wonder may be condemned as an affectation. And yet there is no doubt that the metropolis and the country have been taken by surprise. The swoop upon the Bangabasi camp is looked upon in the light of a sudden coup. The action taken is aboveboard and regular to the extent of humdrum. And yet people would have it that it is extraordinary.

Nor can we quite blame. We see how it is. At any rate, there is colourable excuse enough for the feeling. The people wonder because they cannot help. They are surprised because they did not expect it. The preparation they had was nothing to speak of. A day or even half a week's warning cannot reconcile them to the novelty of the phenomenon. Yes, it is the strangeness of the thing that strikes the people. The Government have made a departure and taken a long leap. The vernacular Press, because working away from the master's eye, as it were, is everywhere bad; we are afraid it is very bad in Great Britain—the Cambrian press, for example. The vernacular press in this country has perhaps never been our strong point. Debased in the hands of the Ganri Sankars and Iswar Guptas of old by obscenity, it has of late years been reduced to an instrument of political mischief. We offer no opinion on the merits of the present prosecution, but we think we may, without prejudice to the particular individuals accused, say that the Bangabasi and its complementary daily the Dainik, have long since established an evil preeminence. Yet nobody took them to account, any more than their prototypes in the English language, until an opinion grew that Government avoided an encounter from prudence, that they were shy of scotching, for fear of not killing, the serpent. Thus ensured, these papers proceeded valiantly in their career. No notice was taken of them and none, it was concluded, would ever be taken. What wonder then, that the people should be astonished when they saw the Government send the Standing Counsel to the Chief Magistrate to apply for warrants against the conductors of the Bangabasi for seditious writing?

It is a grave departure. It has been taken after long and earnest deliberation, and even then taken with far from a light heart. This is the first instance of the liberal and confiding British Government taking such serious notice of the sins of the Native Press at a time of peace. Since the Metcalfe Act, the Indian Press has enjoyed an amount of freedom which is the envy of journalists in Europe. The Native Press, which was scarcely in existence in Metcalfe's time, specially the vernacular branch thereof, has been more free than the Press of any other country. Except for the brief period of the operation of the Lytton Act, it has been allowed to revel in license. Before that Act, there was absolutely no law against inflammatory preaching through the press. By some extraordinary mischance, the provision in section 113 of the Criminal Code as drafted by the Indian Law Commission was not enacted in the Indian Penal Code. It was when the Vernacular Press Gagging Act of the Lytton Administration was repealed that the lost section, which was the handiwork of Macaulay and his colleagues, was restored to our Penal Code. It is under that section that the conductors of the Bangabasi are charged. At the best, it is a bad business, this State prosecution of a native newspaper. The worst part of it is that it shows that the Government are not at all pleased with our conduct as leaders of thought.

THE INDIAN CHRISTIAN MARRIAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

A LEGISLATIVE DILEMMA.

THE meeting of the Supreme Legislative Council, at the Viceregal Lodge, Simla, on Thursday, the 16th July, presents our law-makers on the horns of as awkward a dilemma as has ever been witnessed. The Viceroy being down with influenza, the chair was taken by Sir Philip P. Hutchins. The only matter of importance was the introduction, by the Law Member, of a Bill to validate certain marriages solemnized under Part VI of the Indian Christian Marriage Act, 1872. The matter was so urgent that it could not be deferred, like the motion by the president of the day for leave to introduce a Bill for authorizing the transfer of certain jurisdiction from the High Court of Judicature of Madras to the Court of Small Causes of Madras, which was put off to the next week. Sir Alexander Miller, in moving for leave to introduce his Bill, simply remarked that "Part VI of the Indian Christian Marriage Act is only adapted for a case in which both parties being married are Christians, and it appears that some of the Registrars appointed, not having noticed that, have solemnized marriages under this Part in certain cases where only one of the parties was a Christian; consequently, under the existing law, these marriages are invalid. The object of the Bill is to validate those marriages which have already taken place, and to take steps to prevent the possibility of the same thing happening in the future." The motion being agreed to, the Bill was introduced and, on further motion, ordered to be published. The Bill, contrary to modern practice, opens with a preamble of three clauses—explanatory of the object and necessity of the measure, which may be taken as the Statement of Object and Reasons. It starts with mentioning marriages solemnized, contrary to the intention of Part VI of the Indian Christian Marriage Act, 1872, between persons of whom one only is a Native Christian, in divers parts of British India, and then recognizes the necessity of validating such marriages, solemnized in good faith though in opposition to the law. The Statement of Objects and Reasons is brevity itself. It is like the preamble of modern enactments, which takes for granted the expediency of a proposed measure. "The objects and reasons of this Bill are set forth in its preamble. Marriages between persons who are Christians and persons who are not Christians must be solemnized under some other Part of the Indian Christian Marriage Act, 1872 than Part VI." The Bill is composed of six sections, and provides, among other things,

"3. All marriages which have already been solemnized under Part VI of the Indian Christian Marriage Act, 1872, or which may within three months after the commencement of this Act be solemnized under that Part between persons of whom one only was or shall have been a Native Christian, shall be as good and valid in law as if such marriages had been solemnized between persons of whom both were Native Christians.

"4. Certificates of marriages which are declared by the last foregoing section to be good and valid in law and register-books, and certified copies of true and duly authenticated extracts therefrom, deposited in compliance with the law for the time being in force, in so far as the register-books and extracts relate to such marriages as aforesaid, shall be received as evidence of such marriages as if such marriages had been solemnized between persons of whom both were Native Christians."

The Bill thus validates marriages under Part VI of the Indian Christian Marriage Act between a Christian and a non-Christian, not by declaring that the Registrar was competent to solemnize them, but by declaring a non-Christian a Christian. It legalizes such marriages from the commencement of the existing Act to the period of three months from the commencement of the amending law. Marriages between Christians and non-Christians are to be solemnized, according to the Statement of Objects and Reasons, under some other Part than Part VI of the Act, XV of 1872. The Bill is not intended to validate marriages under Part VI between Christians and non-Christians hereafter. Only the Registrars or persons licensed to grant certificates of such marriages are to be brought to book for their mistakes. That is no consolation to the married. Their wrong will remain unredressed.

"6. If any person licensed under section 9 of the said Act to grant certificates of marriage between Native Christians shall at any time after the passing of this Act solemnize or affect to solemnize any marriage under Part VI of the said Act or grant any such certificate as therein mentioned, knowing that one of the parties to such marriage or affected marriage was at the date of such solemnization not a Christian, he shall be liable to have his license cancelled, and in addition thereto he shall be deemed to have been guilty of an offence prohibited by section 73 of the said Act, and shall be punishable accordingly."

The penalty of section 73 is four years' or less imprisonment and liability to fine. It could scarcely have failed to strike the Law Member that, in declaring an illegality and seeking to legalize that illegality, allowing it continued life, though for a fixed period, he has involved himself in inconsistency. The reason for three months' grace is not given, either in the Bill, the Statement of Objects and Reasons, or the speech of the Member in charge of the Bill. If it be to give publicity to the measure and thereby to allow time to erring Registrars to realize their error, the less objectionable course, it seems to us, would be to fix the commencement of the new law after three months from its passing. Even then, the objection on the score of anomaly remains. It is the toils of the situation—impossible to escape the inherent difficulty of legalizing a perpetrated illegality. The Bill purports to condone a wrong. It strives to whitewash offence. It is an arduous, not to say desperate, struggle. Nothing can obliterate the difference between a normal command and a condonation—between sanction before an act and its acceptance afterwards. The position of the issue of legalized illegal marriages cannot, under any subsequent enactment, be thoroughly identical with that of the issue of thoroughly legal marriages. The legislature can only do its best. It would, perhaps, be more to the purpose if the marriages sought to be legalized could be declared valid, as being solemnized in good faith, instead of declaring them invalid to be validated. A Registrar of marriages, if he is competent to solemnize a marriage under one Part, may well be competent to solemnize it under another Part of the same Marriage Act, unless when clearly and specifically excluded from performing the function. Under the Act, every marriage between persons, one, or both of whom is or are a Christian or Christians, may be solemnized by, among others, persons licensed to grant certificates of marriage between Native Christians (Secs. 4 and 5.) Part VI treats of "Marriage of Native Christians." Under the same Part, "Every marriage between Native Christians applying for a certificate, shall,....., be certified under this Part (VI), if the following conditions be fulfilled, and not otherwise." (Sec. 60). If these conditions have been fulfilled in a marriage under Part VI, is it absolutely unwarrantable, having regard to the words of Secs. 4 and 5, not only to suppose but also to authoritatively declare that such a license-holder is competent under the Act to solemnize a marriage between a couple one only of whom is a Christian? The bond fide mistake of the Registrar is visited on the innocent married couple and their issue of a marriage believed to be, and accepted as, legal.

The present is an instance of the danger of an ill-expressed and too microscopic legislation. In matters like these, the law should be plain and explicit, short and simple, and so worded as to be easily understood of the ordinary understanding, unless the Government were prepared to entrust the working of it to men better qualified to interpret the law.

At the next meeting of the Council, on the 23rd, the Bill was referred to a Select Committee consisting of Sir Philip Hutchins, Mr. Rattigan and the mover.

GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS IN CONNECTION WITH PUBLIC COMPANIES.

By a despatch No. 25, dated 7th February 1889, the Secretary of State for India decided that no officer holding a permanent appointment under Government, whether pensionable or not, should be permitted to serve as a Director of any Bank or Public Company without previous reference to that functionary. That order was circulated in India in June of that year and an enquiry made as to how far that rule was being observed. The enquiry disclosed several breaches. Thus:—

In Madras—Mr. E. Barclay, Government Solicitor, Mr. F. Rowlandson, Registrar of the Diocese, and Mr. W. Grant, Crown Prosecutor, as Directors of Companies.

In Bombay—Mr. T. Blaney, Coroner of Bombay, as a Director of three Public Companies.

In Bengal—the Secretaries to the Local Government in the Financial and Public Works Departments are ex officio Government Directors of the Darjeeling-Himalayan Railway; Mr. R. L. Upton, Solicitor to Government, is a Director of several Companies; Mr. C. H. Reily, Registrar of the Diocese and in receipt of a retaining fee as Assistant Secretary in the Legislative Department is a Director of the Calcutta Branch of the Universal Life Assurance Company; Baboo Jogendro Nath Ghose, Demonstrator of Anatomy in the Campbell Medical School, and Babu Behari Lal Chandra, Special Sub-Registrar of the 24-Pergunnahs, are Directors of the Hindu Family Annuity Fund and the Bengal Christian Family Pension Fund, respectively; several Ministerial Officers serving in the Pubna, Tipperah, Dacca, Faridpur and Hazaribagh districts are Directors of Banks, Loan Offices, and Carrying Companies in those districts; and two Government Pleaders in the Faridpur and Lohardaga districts are Directors of the Faridpur Loan office and the Chutia Nagpur Carrying Company, Limited. The Administrator-General has been permitted by the Government of India to be a Director of the Bank of Bengal.

In the North-Western Provinces and Oudh, there was one and in the Central Provinces another such appointment, but the holders resigned on promulgation of the order. There was no such appointment in the Punjab, Assam, Coorg and Hyderabad.

In Burma, there were four officers as Directors of the Burma Building Association Company, Limited, one of them died and the remaining three resigned.

On the recommendation of the Government of India, the Secretary of State has sanctioned the retention of the Directorships, by the Solicitors to Government at Madras and Calcutta, of Messrs. Rowlandson and Reily, who are Registrars of the Dioceses of Madras and Calcutta, respectively, of Mr. Grant, Crown Prosecutor at Madras, of Dr. Blaney, Coroner of Bombay, and of the Administrator General of Bengal. General exemption applies to Solicitors to Government, either in Calcutta, Madras or Bombay, to Government Pleaders as of Faridpur and Lohardaga and to Diocesan Registrars, Crown Prosecutors and Coroners, so long as the public service in no way suffers, and the interests of the Companies are not antagonistic to those of the Government.

Lord Cross's despatch of the 7th February 1889 had special reference to the appointment of a Director of a Presidency Bank. It was not intended to cancel or alter any orders of Lord Kimberley in his despatch No. 73 of the 19th July 1883, which permits public servants to engage in the management of Associations for the purpose of mutual supply and not of trade and trade profit, always provided that such employment is not prejudicial to their work as Government servants. The older order, therefore, applies to The Eurasian and Anglo-Indian Association of Western India.

The Eurasian and Anglo-Indian Deposit and Loan Society Limited.

The Hindu Family Annuity Fund.

The Bengal Christian Family Pension Fund.

The Services Co-operative Association, Limited, Rangoon

The Burma Building Association Company, Limited,

Local Banks and Loan Offices.

A TRIBUTE TO THE LATE VIDYASAGARA. TO THE EDITOR.

The struggle is over. Fell disease racks no more; neither hope nor disappointment troubles any longer; it is all calm and quiet now. The very atmosphere around seems hushed into a silence deep and melancholy, in keeping with the event of the hour. The Grand Old Man is no more. Yes, he has left this ingrate, selfish world of woe for that ever blissful port where ingratitude is a thing unknown, where there is no room for aught that is base and mean, where virtue and Heaven alone reside.

They say he is gone. But is it true that he is gone, he whose most loving care it was to help the needy and the suffering, who consecrated his very life to raise the lowly, whose most cherished ambition was to see that each tomorrow might find us farther than today? Can he have ceased to exist who lived to see that others lived, who learned to see that others learned, who taught to see that others caught, the boldest regenerator of modern India, the sincerest reformer that India can boast of? But for him, Bengal had scarcely any language worth the name: Through him was it sustained, through him was it nourished, and it is to him that we owe the development that it has now attained. Although the credit of first promulgation belongs to the late Raja Ram Mohan Roy, the question of "widow remarriage" found its loudest expression and received the widest sympathy through him. Boldly did he stand out by his cause, patiently did he bear the brunt of the onslaught on his devoted head, and ultimately scored what measure of success was possible under the circumstances. Can he have been dead and gone, the venerable Pandit Iswara Chundra Vidyasagara, whose name has been sung in praise and echoed and re-echoed back from coast to coast, from mount to mount, from the Himalayas to the Cape Comorin, whose lasting monuments are his deathless work of charity and benevolence, whose glorious tablet is inscribed in the grateful affection of a people? Ah! no. Though the pulses beat no more, though the warmth and vitality is gone, he will yet continue to strike responsive chords in every breast, his memory shed a lasting lustre on the path to duty, his bright self-denying example teach and illumine.

JAYKRISHNA BANERJEE.

DEMONOLOGY AND WITCHCRAFT IN CHUTTRISGAR.

[A lecture by Baboo Bhupat Dey, read at the Town Hall, Raipur, C. P.]
Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen---The time at my disposal is short. I have only attempted to give you a mere sketch of the subject. I hope you will look upon my essay with indulgence.

I shall not inflict on you the definition of a "Demon" as the wise heads of the ancients did. Suffice it to say that the general opinion of the ancients on the subject was that the departed souls of good men became good demons and the departed souls of bad men became evil demons. The former were the hero gods or demigods of the ancients, such as Hercules and Bacchus. In the legends of Chuttrigar, there may be a number of instances, but I know only of one. More than a century ago, there lived a kaler (liquor-dealer) by name Bahadur, in Monja Sorer, Tehsil Dhumteri. All the men of his tribe worship him as a demigod. He was a rich man and famous for acts of piety. A kaler will not ordinarily swear by the name of Bahadur, just as a Gond will not by the name of Barhadeo, because his memory is preserved with great sanctity. The evil demons were considered by the ancients as exiles from heaven. Hence we see Satan reigning in Hell amidst his numerous comrades. The evil demon of Chuttrigar is manifest in what is called the "Baghdeo." The spirit of the man who is eaten by a tiger is called "Baghdeo." It is supposed to sit on the head of the tiger and induce it often to kill human beings. The spirit runs away, when the tiger is killed. These evil spirits are said to possess not material bodies like man but bodies of a fine and subtle texture such as would not bear the light of day. Hence they are said to haunt in the darkness of night. Thus we find the ghost in Hamlet saying:---

My hour is almost come,
When I to sulphurous and tormenting flames
Must render up myself.

But the witches are living beings. In Chuttrigar they consist mostly, if not entirely, of women. The reason is not far to seek. The Hindu lawgiver, Manu, has described a woman of this country to be in a state of tutelage all her life. He has enjoined that she should be under the guardianship of her parents in girlhood, under that of her husband in her youth, and under that of her son in old age. Thus, a helpless and inferior person would be the most maligned of all. In Europe, the Fathers of the early Christian church displayed their hatred of womankind by adopting celibacy. In Europe, the majority of those accused of sorcery were women, because they were thought to be wicked. Cato, they said, had declared that "if the world were only free from women, men would not be without the converse of the gods." Cicero had said that "many motives will urge men to one crime but one passion will impel women to all crimes." Solomon who had great experience in such matters, whose knowledge of feminine nature was almost perfect, did not speak well of them. St. Chrysostom pronounced woman to be "a necessary evil, a natural temptation, a desirable calamity, a domestic peril, a deadly fascination and a painted ill." It is not therefore a wonder that, in an uncivilised country, such would be the idea of men regarding women. Thus we find Chuttrigar witches to be mostly women. They go by the name of "Tony." It is said that the "Tony" mantra or incantation has been derived like all other "mantras" from god "Mahadeo," the destroyer of the universe. When I enquired what the "mantra" was, no one would tell me. I at last prevailed upon a friend, who took me out into the fields and whispered it into my ears. He said it was a sacred thing and should not be divulged. When I asked him the meaning of the word, he could not say. Nor can an ordinary mortal make out the meaning. The word is "Kokminjara." But the "Tony Mantra" of Sambalpur was probably invented by a wiser head. It runs thus:---

"Thuti pauki, thuti dá, Cháti basi kolejá khá."

(With a broken iron-cutter, with a broken chopper, sit upon the chest and eat the vitals.) This of course means that the witch should sit upon the chest of her victim and, by torturing him, suck up his life-blood. Do not think for a moment that by simply uttering the above a person will be a qualified witch. It is said the mantras will be repeated day by day like the monk counting his bead until a time will come when the person repeating the same will become successful, that is, a regular witch. The advantage of this hard earned knowledge is great. For it is said she can command the stars, the wind, wave, thunder, lightning and rain. She can do evil to mankind, cattle and plants. She can also command hosts of evil spirits. The subjugation of evil spirits is the great aim of the witch. She thinks that by so doing she will be able to strike terror into mankind and do them harm. With this object in view, an ill-disposed countrywoman will do her best to learn the art. In the Districts of Raipur and Bilaspur, a professed witch will take her pupils out into the burial ground or the burning ghat at dead of night and there, without any clothes on, they will perform the worship of a demon or demoness by erecting a figure with the dung of cattle and other vile substances as the 1st witch in Macbeth prepared her charm:---

Round about the cauldron go;
In the poison'd entrails throw---
Toad, that under cold stone,
Days and nights has thirty-one
Swelter'd venom sleeping got
Boil thou first i' the charmed pot.
Ail. Double, double toil and trouble;
Fire, burn; and, cauldron, bubble.

The learner chews the root of a plant called "sufed surfok," which can be had in the forest and repeats the mantra, while earthen lamps burn before her eyes. It is said, by frequent chewing the mouth waters and the color of this water assumes as dazzling an appearance as the lamplight. When this is the case---the learner becomes successful, i.e., a qualified witch. A witch is said to keep in her possession a long piece of cotton thread 100 yards long or even 500 yards long) soaked in blood. She is said to obtain supernatural eyesight which can see the circulation of the blood in man and animal. It is said, if she wished to take the life of a person, she mounts the roof of the room in which the person sleeps. She then holds one end of the charmed thread by her mouth and drops the other end by tying it up with a stone on the body of her victim through a loophole in the roof. By this process she is said to suck up all the pure blood and then to wend her way. In secret she throws up all this blood and, by mixing it up with butter, she prepares a sort of omelet and satiates her god with it. The person whose life blood is thus taken away is supposed to die soon. He then becomes an evil spirit and lives under the control of the witch. In this manner she commands an army of devils. She becomes a terror to the people and levies blackmail on them. Thus we find Prospero say to Ariel:---

Hast thou, spirit,

Perform'd to point the tempest that I bade thee?

Witches are universally looked upon with great abhorrence. The national outburst of anger becomes manifest during a season of cholera or other epidemics. Illiterate classes attribute all epidemics not to natural causes but to the evil influence of witchcraft. At this time they summon the aid of the "Boiga." The Boiga is a man supposed to possess preternatural powers. The "Boiga" undergoes the same course of training as a witch, with this difference that his vocation is simply to counteract the evil influence of a witch and protect people from harm. The "Boiga," by shaking his head violently, as if he is an inspired being, points out the witch who has done all the mischief. Sometimes the "Boiga" takes vengeance for any wrongs done him by any woman in this manner. Very often he is innocently led by prejudice to point out women with whom he has no concern, as the supposed witches.

Thus led, the illiterate people catch hold of the supposed witches and torture them. It is believed that these witches frequent haunted places at dead of night and, by propitiating evil spirits by incantation, introduce them into the village and, by throwing charmed rice and arid* (a kind of pulse) into a flowing stream, channel or tank, used for drinking purposes, defile the water and set the evil spirits to watch. It is said people become subject to epidemics by drinking the water thus polluted.

What is the remedy? People run to the fields and bring boughs of the castor-oil plants. With these they strike the back of the supposed witch. This method they believe exorcises the devil out of the witch whom she is supposed to be possessed of. It is believed that these boughs pain the back like a sharp-edged sword. It is no wonder then that the witch will be compelled to confess her crimes. Historical researches will tell us:—That during the outbreak of the pestilence called "Black Death" in the 14th century which carried away 25 millions or a fourth part of the then population of Europe, people readily ascribed the cause of it to witchcraft, and "trials for witchcraft multiplied with a fearful rapidity."

Under the native rule, a sort of "trial by ordeal" was very often resorted to. When the "Boiga" pronounced a woman to be a witch she was taken to the neighbouring tank or river and there being put into a gunny bag with the mouth sewn up, was thrown into it. If the body floated—the person was considered a witch. She was then taken to the bank, one side of her face was painted black and the other side white. She was made to mount on an ass and, being taken round the village, she was turned out for good. The above described treatment is the most humiliating. But now times are altered. The dread of penal law has stopped this barbarous practice. Now the witch is made to promise to behave better and to send away the evil spirit that was set to watch the stream or tank.

It is said in the Sambalpur District, a witch goes to the burial ground, raises her legs above, and puts her head down like a juggler, and then puts a burning lamp on her chin and mutters the mantra as described above. In this manner she invokes the spirit, sometimes she is said to bring into life the dead body of a virgin by raising it from the burial ground and by operating on its throat with the sharp blade of a kind of grass. She is said to drink its blood and offer some of it to the goddess Kali. It is said that the eyes of the witch are baneful. Thus, if she will see a person to extract butter from milk, the milk will go bad and no butter will be got. The housewife will scold the daughter or daughter-in-law who churns the milk and remonstrate with her for not propitiating the witch by making some offerings. Again, it is said, the "Tony" can assume various forms according to her choice, sometimes she becomes a serpent, at other times she assumes the shape of a child or one of the brute creation. It is said she charms a lime by putting vermilion on it, cuts it into two and throws the pieces on the cross roads of the village. The belief is that those who pass along shall fall sick. Thus, in Midsummer Night's Dream:—

Fairy. Are you not he
That frights the maidens of the villagery;
Skims milk, and sometimes labours in the quern,
And bootless makes the breathless housewife churn;
And sometime makes the drink to bear no barm;
Misleads night-wanderers, laughing at their harm?
Those that Hobgoblin call you, and sweet Puck,
You do their work, and they shall have good luck:
Are you not he?

Puck. Thou speak'st aright;
I am that merry wanderer of the night.
I jest to Oberon, and make him smile,
When I a fat and bean-fed horse beguile,
Neighing in likeness of a filly foal;
And sometime lurk I in a gossip's bowl,
In very likeness of a roasted crab;
And, when she drinks, against her lips I bob,
And on her wither'd dew-lap pour the ale.

The "Ponguia" is a male witch and is peculiar to Sambalpur, but unknown to Raipur or Bilaspur.

The Baija of Raipur is the same as the Goonea of Sambalpur. Either of them is supposed to do good to the villagers by counteracting the evil influence of the witch. He cures cholera and smallpox from the village. He cures cattle diseases. When the cattle are attacked by what are called foot and mouth diseases, he writes his Mantras on banian leaves and then ties them in a piece of rope. This rope is then taken over the thoroughfare of the village over which it is made to hang. All the cattle of the village while crossing the road are made to pass underneath, so that the rope might touch their backs. This touch is believed to cure the disease.

When smallpox attacks the cattle—the Boiga leaps a place with cowdung, marks it with a boundary line, plants iron-nails across.

* The same as the arhar of Hindustan, we suppose, under a provincial pronunciation.—ED. R. & R.

A small quantity of vermilion is placed inside the boundary line, and treacle and butter are offered as sacrifice to fire. He then takes out the nails, goes to the boundary line of the village, where he buries them. It is said that by so doing, the cattle living within the village are saved from smallpox.

During an epidemic, the Boiga holds his worship with great eclat. He leaps the place with cowdung, plants iron nails along the boundary mark up the sacred spot. A trident with a small lime stuck to its head is planted in the place. Betel leaves, betel-nuts, cocoanuts, rice, hemp and a piece of country cloth are dedicated to this trident. Before it are sacrificed fowls, pigs, goats. The God is supposed to sit on the piece of country cloth described above. The worship is thus continued for days together until the epidemic in the village abates. The Boiga like the Goonia holds his worship generally on auspicious days, such as the hureli, the pola, the holec, the Dussara.

The Goonia appears to be more learned than his brother the Boiga. In the Sambalpur district, indigenous education has spread far and wide. In the time of Colonel Bowie and Mr. Goodridge, almost every village had a vernacular school. Uryas as a rule are educated in their vernacular from the prince to the peasant. Hence a Goonia must be a man of education before he can command the respect of his brethren.

The Goonia reads his sacred books before his gods. Every song he sings has for its burden the following couplet:—

Issur Parbattee delabor

Kanchá odá jalipor.

(If the God Mahadeo and his wife Parbati give their blessings, what is raw or wet shall be burnt away.) The drift is that by the grace of the God and his wife, all calamities shall be removed. The Goonia removes the evils created by the Toni or the Ponguia, the male witch. When a child suddenly falls ill of cough, croup or convulsion, the parents call the Goonia who very often says that the child is possessed of some "Toni" or "Ponguia." He utters mantras and gives the patient a little salt to eat. If the illness is serious, he comes at midnight, worships the goddess Kali by offering rice, some country liquors and killing a black fowl. The goddess is presented with a piece of black cloth, black boughs and vermilion. He then begins to count the rice by twos and threes as long as the disease does not take a favorable turn. This takes some hour. At last the Goonia goes to the cross road of the village and buries there the head of the fowl and goes home with the drink and the headless fowl as his perquisite. If a black fowl be not available, a black pigeon or black goat will be substituted. The Goonia informs the relatives of the patient that a particular Toni or Ponguia possessed him. The Goonia is related to cure snake-bites. Every village knows its Toni or Ponguia, Boiga or Goonia.

The Toni or Ponguia is discovered by a curious method in the villages of the Sambalpur district. On the day of the Hureli festival in the month of July or August, the village herdsman fetches from the jungle leaves of the trees called "Isvar jata," shoves into the thatched roof of the verandah of each house a few such leaves, the object being that the children of every house will be protected from the evil influence of the Toni or Ponguia. It is also said that the latter will avoid standing under the roof where these leaves are shoved in. Thus the villagers are able to find out the Toni or Ponguia. The Boiga gets his village dhan varying from 5 to 10 kattas per plough of land once a year. In addition he gets 3 or 4 fields from malguzur rent free. This is the custom of almost every village. During an epidemic the Boiga gets cash from 100 to 2000 in the shape of reward. The Gond chamar, Dhewur (fisherman), Kalar (liquor-distiller), Ieli (oilman) and Kurmi (cultivator) castes supply the Boigas. The wives of Gond Boigas ply the occupation of their husbands, but not the wives of Boigas of other castes.

In Sambalpur, the Goonia hails from the Dhobi, Soondiz, Lohar, Kooli, Mahara, Now and Gond castes, while the Tonics and Ponguias hail from the herdsman's tribe, viz, the Domal and Kolongia.

Allied to witchcraft is the "Striaraj" custom. When cholera rages, men and women in numbers run together into the afflicted village with turban on head and sword in hand, and there kill a goat. Severing its head on the spot, they retire with the body as their perquisite. It is said they do all this under inspiration. A few men and women of an afflicted village catch the inspiration and run into the next afflicted village where they perform the same operation. Thus the inspiration is said to spread from village to village, until the disappearance of cholera. As at present advised, I am not able to throw any light on this custom.

In conclusion, I may state that although the belief in witchcraft may be checked by the enforcement of penal laws, it were too much to expect that it should die out altogether. It is one of those evils that will vanish with the march of civilisation. In the early history of every country in Europe, witchcraft was believed in by the noblest in the land. Sir Mathew Hale, the Lord Chief Justice of England condemned a witch to death. Even so late as 1850, the civil tribunal of Farbes tried a man and a woman named Bouverie for having caused the death of a woman by witchcraft, and condemned them to die in extreme agony.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—The combined ill-effects of overcrowding, sedentary occupations and monotony of life are only too well known to those who have to pass the best part of their lives labouring in factories and crowded workrooms. The compulsory confinement weakens the general health and induces chronic constipation, indigestion, and various forms of skin diseases. Holloway's remedies are of priceless value to persons of this class, for they can be used without entailing loss of work, being purely vegetable in their composition, and consequently act without harshness on the most delicate system. The experience of more than fifty years proves that no means surpasses Holloway's remedies for curing bad legs, bad breasts, piles, and wounds of all kinds.

THE CAPTIVE LADIE.

By THE LATE MICHAEL MADHUSUDAN DUTT.

Reprinted from the Madras edition of 1849.

CANTO II.

Round proud Husteena's* tow'r-crown'd wall,
Fierce foe-men throng to work her fall;
And on fair Jumna's purpl'd stream,
The Crescent flings its blood-red gleam,
As high it waves on wing of pride,
Fann'd by the breath of Even-tide,
Which faintly comes, as murmur'd sigh,
Of lonely mourner wafted high:
And there be blood on land and wave,
And many a dead without a grave—
And there be blood in grove and bow'r,
And fane and altar, leaf and flow'r,
For wild and dire and long the fray,
Hath rag'd around full many a day,
And well hath Valour battled there,
With fiery hope,—in calm despair,
To conquer, save, or proudly die,
For deathless fame—or liberty!

High in his tent of costliest shawl,
Which tow'rs midst thousands, glittering all,
Like fair pavilions Fancy's eyes
View limn'd on sun-set eastern skies,
The Moslem-chief holds glad divan,
Nor fasts and lists to alcoran,
And that grim brow where bigot zeal,†
Oft set its sternest—fiercest seal,
Smiles gaily like a lightless stream,
When Chandra sheds her silver beam,
As sweetly sounds the gay Sittar,]
Like voice of Home when heard afar,
Or wild and thrilling rolls along,
Ferdousi's high, heroic song :||—
For ceaseless onison and fast,
Have won Heaven's favouring smile at last,
And when tomorrow's sun shall rise,
On car of light from orient skies,
The first, faint blushing of his ray,
Will lead proud Conquest to her prey,
And see the Crescent's blood-red wave,
Gild fall'n Husteena's lowly grave!

A thousand lamps all gaily shine,
Along the wide extended line;—

* Husteena—Delhi. It is often confounded with Indraput built by the Pandû Princes, Vid : Mahobarat, lib. I. (latter part.)

† Mahammed of Ghizni was a fierce bigot.

‡ Sittar, a musical instrument.

|| Ferdousi. The Chaucer of Persia;—author of the "Shahnameh."—He was contemporary with Mohammed.

And loud the laugh and proud the boast,
Swells from that fierce, unnumber'd host,
And wild the prayer ascends on high,
Dark Vengeance! thine impatient cry—
"Oh! for a glimpse of Day's fair brow,
To crush yon city tow'ring now,
To make each cafir-bosom feel,
Th' unerring blade of Moslem steel!—
By Alla! how I long to be,
Where myriads writhe in agony,
And mark each wretch with rolling eye,
Call on false gods,—then curse and die,
Meet pilgrim for the dire domain,
Where Eblis* holds his sunless reign!—
Tomorrow—oh!—why wilt thou, Night!
Thus veil the smile of Day so bright?
We want not now thy Moon and Star,
In pensive beauty shrin'd afar,—
We want not now thy pearly dew
To dim our falchion's blood red hue—
Thy lonely breath thus passing by,
Like Beauty's whispered, farewell-sigh—
Go—hie thee hence—where Rocabad,†—
With murmuring waters wildly glad,
Doth woo thy stars to silver rest,
Upon its gently-heaving breast—
Or, where soon as the sun hath set,
And dome, kiosk and minaret
Glow with thy pale moon's gentler beam,
Like the bright limnings of some dream,
The lover gaily tunes his lay—
The rosy bow'rs of Mosellay!—
We want thee not,—the brightest flood,
The fiery sun can ever shed,
Must blaze o'er warrior's deeds of blood,
And light him on when'er he tread,
The field where foemen fierce and brave,
Meet—slay—or win a bloody grave!"

But must she fall,—that city fair,
Who sits her like an empress there,—
The tow'r-tiara'd bride of Time,—
The brightest of her sunny clime,—
Mother‡ of heroes, once whose name,
Like thunder-winged whirlwinds came,
And shook the mightiest thrones below,
And pal'd the brow of proudest foe?—
Alas!—fierce Famine and her train,—
Parch'd Thirst—and famished Hunger—Pain,

* Eblis—the angel of Hell.

† Rocabad—Mosellay.

‡ Kenara ab rocnabad o gûl gushîe mosellay ra" as sung by Hafiz.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

IN Ram Sharma's poem on the deaths of Raja Rajendralala Mitra and Pandit Iswar Chandra Vidyasagar, published in our last issue, two lines were too long. Stanza X, line 2, should therefore be read as Lifted him far above his peers; (.)

and stanza XVI, line 2, as

Let thy sons keep their mem'ry green, (.)

THE tragedy in Manipur is complete. Whatever the justice of the final orders, British prestige has been maintained. The inviolability of the British person is formally established. The Government of India upheld the sentences of death on Senapati Tikendrajit for waging war against the Queen and abetment of murder of the British officers and on the Tongal General who ordered their execution. The Regent Kula Chandra and Angao Sena, though properly convicted of waging war and capitally sentenced, were mere tools in the hands of the brother Tikendrajit. Hence their sentences have been commuted to transportation for life and forfeiture of property. The executioners and other underlings will not be hanged but transported during the Queen's pleasure. The Secretary of State approved of the orders of the Government of India and both the Senapati and the Tongal General were sent to their last account on the gallows on Thursday. They were hanged vis-a-vis with all possible publicity. They were allowed a long rope while living, and they were given a long drop after death. They remained dangling for one hour, before the bodies were made over to the relations for such honors as they cared. A large crowd of Manipuris, with a sprinkling of Nagas, attended the double execution. Probably like the Hindus at the hanging of Maharaja Nundcomar, they to the last believed that the execution would not take place, either by order of man or interposition of Hari. Like those Hindus, they were undeceived. But they had no sacred stream to wash themselves off the sin of seeing such a sight as they saw, and were obliged to content themselves with Manipuri interjections for the expression of their feelings, unless they preferred simply to gape in perfect silence. The women, more human, broke out in loud lamentations and possibly curses.

It is a mistake to take the Indian Mirror seriously. It should not be forgotten that our contemporary is, mechanically and unconsciously, a journal of amusement. It is distinguished for a quaint pleasantness not easily differentiated from unsomber seriousness or blunder. Thus the Indian Mirror announces the Nizam's sanction of marriage of one of his sisters with Nawab Imam Jung, a son of the Ameer-i-Kabeer Koorshed Jah, under the head of Money Market and Trade. This is a sally worthy of Jean Paul Richter. Laugh as you may at the spectacle, you cannot help admiring the profundity of the jest. A royal marriage undoubtedly means money and is an impetus to trade.

THE Congress Press is engaged in discussing the important question, Where will the next session of the patriots' palaver be held? Some of the journals are for taking the concern over to England next year. The Patrika, which, notwithstanding its conversion to the Hume cult, retains its head, puts to its friends these plain questions—

"Whether the holding of the Congress in England will do any good? Whether the men that are willing to go are competent? Whether the funds will be forthcoming? Whether the funds, if raised, could not be better utilized than by holding a Congress in London?"

Our contemporary might have added another—How will they all come back?

For our part, we should rather insist on the prior question.

THE Muhammadian of Madras is rich in its vocabulary but far from choice. Our contemporary gives protection to all sorts of waifs and strays and queer customers. The treasury is full but there is a lot of poor coppers and bad shillings in it. On the 3rd August, the Muham-

madan has a leading article in its best manner headed "More Babu Boutades." Therein, we meet with such expressions as "medeful compensation" and "knows noughty of."

THE vacancy in the Executive Council of the Governor General of India, occasioned by the resignation of the Honorable Sir Charles Haukes Todd Crosthwaite, K. C. S. I., has been temporarily filled by the appointment of Colonel Robert Charles Boileau Pemberton, R.E., as Public Works Minister, until the arrival of a permanent successor. Colonel Pemberton had been officiating for Sir Charles Crosthwaite.

SIR Dennis Fitzpatrick from Hyderabad succeeds Sir James Lyall as Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab in March next.

IN continuation of the Financial Resolution No. 4539, dated the 17th August 1888, the Governor-General in Council has directed that Stock Notes shall be received on the terms described in that Resolution only up to the 31st January 1892.

THE Governor-General in Council has sanctioned the formation of a corps of volunteers in the Chhota Nagpur Division, to be designated "The Chhota Nagpur Mounted Rifles," under William Henry Grimley, Esq., Commissioner of the Chota Nagpur Division, as Captain-Commandant. The corps will be under the orders of the Commander-in-Chief in India.

MR. E. J. Martin having retired, Mr. F. J. Johnstone has been confirmed as Chief Engineer and Joint Secretary to the Government of Bengal in the Public Works Department.

THE Director General of Railways has orders to make a survey for a Railway line on the standard 5' 6" gauge from Bareilly Junction via Rampur to the Moradabad Station on the Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway, a distance of about 56 miles. The project will be known as the Bareilly-Rampur-Moradabad Railway Survey.

THE Secretary of State has accorded sanction to the revised estimates amounting to Rs. 1,91,00,025 of the cost of construction of the Villupuram-Dharmavaram Section and of the Pakala-Tirupati Branch of the Villupuram-Guntakal State Railway.

AT the sitting of the Supreme Legislative Council, on Thursday, the 6th August, Sir David Barbour presented the Report of the Select Committee on the Bill to amend the Indian Merchant Shipping Act, 1880; Sir Philip Hutchins obtained permission to refer the Bill to extend the jurisdiction of the Court of Small Causes of Madras to a Select Committee consisting of Sir Alexander Miller, Mr. Rattigan and the Mover. The Home Member also, on leave obtained, introduced a Bill to make better provision for the administration of the Municipalities in the Punjab. Mr. Rattigan was to have moved for leave to introduce the Bill, but he is away in Cashmere recruiting his health.

THE next Criminal Sessions of the High Court will commence on Wednesday the 19th August, and will be divided between the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Beverley. It is expected that Sir Comer Petheram will take up the Bangabasi sedition case.

THE High Court goes into vacation from the 3rd September, reopening on the 11th November. Mr. Justice Beverley and Mr. Justice Ali have been told off as Vacation Judges.

THE High Court of the N.-W. P. has set right the atrocious sentences beyond the law of the Sessions Judge in the Benares riots. Judge Nicholls sentenced Gija Pershad to 3 years' rigorous imprisonment, including 3 months' solitary confinement and Rs. 3,000 fine, or nine months' further rigorous imprisonment; Rameshwar Datt and Sukhnandan, each to the same periods of rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 1,000; Lachman Dass to the same periods of imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 5,000; Raghunath Dass to 3 years' rigorous imprisonment, including 3 months' solitary confinement; Gopal Dass to 3 years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 10,000, or in default 9 months' additional hard labor; Goverdhan Dass to 3 years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 25,000, in default 9 months' further rigorous imprisonment. These seven persons were charged under sections 395, 397, 398, 147 and 148, but convicted, by the Sessions Judge of Benares, under sections 147-109 and 114 and 148-109 and 114 of the Indian Penal Code. Rameshwar was further charged under section 412. The Judge and the majority of the Jury differed. All the seven prisoners appealed. The Sessions Judge also referred the proceedings to the High Court as he considered some of the verdicts of the Jury perverse and opposed to the evidence on the record. The appeals were argued for two days before the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Tyrrell. After the conclusion of the hearing, the Chief Justice delivered a long judgment. The Judges were satisfied that all the seven men were present and took part in the riot at the temple and to some extent incited the crowd. Still the Court would not take a serious view of the culpability of the convicted, excepting that of Grija Pershad, because of the circumstances under which the prisoners acted. They were interested in the preservation of the temple, and they thought that they were being tricked, while the mischievous message of Suchit Pershad proved the spark which set everything in a blaze. Still they were liable to punishment under section 147 of the Code. The High Court accordingly set aside the sentences of the Sessions Judge and sentenced the six prisoners each to eighteen months' rigorous imprisonment, and ordered refund of the fines. The sentence on Grija remains unaltered. The Sessions Judge gave lame reasons for the infliction of the heavy fines, and none at all for his family arrangement sort of distribution of the proceeds. Thus :—

"In respect of the offences of which, disagreeing with the assessors or the majority of them, I convict the prisoners, I impose large fines as well as imprisonment. There is, I think, every prospect of the fines being paid. The damage done comes, altogether, to about fifty thousand rupees, of which some thousands will fall on the Municipal taxpayers or the Municipal Board. After due reflection I do not feel called upon to award any part of the fines if realised to meet that loss. I order that out of the fines, if realised the cost of this prosecution be first defrayed, and after that so far as the fund may go, that such amount be paid to Babus Sita Ram and Brijmohan as may cover their ascertained losses as certified by the executive authorities."

Whereupon, the Chief Justice :—

"Now the damage done to the Municipality and the taxpayers amounted to Rs. 18,000. The riot related to their property. No part of the funds was to go to them, and the funds were to be applied to compensate Sita Ram and Brijmohan for their losses in the dacoities committed at their houses. The Sessions Judge had no right to inflict fines for an offence of which the jury had acquitted the prisoners. If any court had any power to inflict fines for dacoity after the acquittal by the jury it was this court, and this court alone, on a reference made by the Sessions Judge."

The High Court in disposing of the reference thoroughly vindicates the Jurors :—

"It now only remains for us to dispose of the reference under section 309 of the Criminal Procedure Code with regard to the charge against Rameshwar under section 412 of the Indian Penal Code. We have had placed before us a shawl which he is said to have received, well knowing it to be the proceeds of a dacoity. It is admittedly a common description of shawl. Those who should have known it best for the prosecution were unable to point to any mark upon it by which they could identify it. We certainly do not think the verdict of the jury was wrong under which Rameshwar was acquitted on the charge under section 412."

In our judgment in the appeal we have indicated what our opinion is as to the evidence as to these men, so far as the attack and looting on Sita Ram's and Brijmohan's house is concerned, and again we are not only not disposed to interfere with the finding of the jury as to this, but it is probably a verdict which we should have arrived at on this evidence ourselves. The notices to these persons to show cause why they should not be convicted of the offence under reference is dismissed, and we acquit these men and each of them of the offence relating to the dacoity and of offences other than those of which we convicted them."

The Chief Justice takes note of the order for prosecution for perjury, remarking :—

"We were informed from the bar during the hearing of this case that some of the witnesses who were called to prove alibis in the Sessions trial are to be prosecuted for perjury. We hope the information is incorrect, as in our opinion it would have been wiser that the excitement which has existed in Benares should not be kept alive by prosecutions for perjury, which very possibly would be abortive."

For the attack on the Telegraph office, the Sessions Judge sentenced, for dacoity, under Section 395, I. P. C., Parbhu Damodhar and Sheikh Kallu each to fourteen years' transportation, Parshatam and Narotam Singh each to twelve, and Kassim to ten years' transportation. They all appealed for reduction of their sentences. The Jury had found them guilty and there was no dispute about the facts. The High Court upheld the conviction but reduced the sentences of 14 years' to 10 years' transportation. Section 395 prescribes transportation for life or rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to 10 years. Thus the Sessions Judge could either order transportation for life, or if he fell upon Section 59, for as many years' transportation as the number of years' imprisonment which section 395 allows, namely, ten years.

Sir John Elge and Mr. Justice Tyrrell have well maintained the credit of the High Court of the Upper Province, and they talk foolishly and, we are afraid, mischievously who affect to find fault. The High Courts are our most precious institutions—the only defence of the subject against the abuses of power—and we should know how to cherish them.

WITH the death of Jehu, Jack Cad has become Coachee. But it is all the same. Cad is Cad, and will remain so to the end of the chapter, whether trembling below the door or installed high up on the dickey. And Cad, like woman, will be out.

THE Indian Daily News of the 13th August writes :—

"A correspondent who seems to have some acquaintance with the inner life of the British Indian Association states that the organ of that body has greatly fallen from the position it attained under the editorship of Kristodas Pal. This, notwithstanding that it has been largely under the guidance of the great member of the Association who has recently passed away, and who was frequently placed at the head of that body. There is no doubt that the honey of Kristodas has been superseded by the vinegar of subsequent editorship. The moderation of old has given place to a waspish spirit that is spiteful as well as waspish. This was specially observable in the last issue showing that the spirit of vindictiveness has not died with Rajendralala. A very well-written and appreciative notice of the latter appeared in Reis and Rayyet, and the Patriot not content with a reasonable note of dissent, where men may honestly differ, rakes up incidents which have no connection with the subject, and recalls the prosecution and conviction of the Editor of the former paper in a spiteful manner. The Editor may have erred, and the Court thought so. We did not consider that he had said much more than was deserved, though it might have been said less offensively. He paid the penalty, and having done that, he has fulfilled the requirement of the law. It ill becomes the Patriot to reproduce the report, and to dwell unctiously on the misfortunes of a brother journalist, to gloat over a past and satisfied judgment in a spirit of wanton spite that shows an utter absence of a generous feeling that should never be wanting towards a man who, in the discharge of what he deemed a duty, brought himself within the meshes of the law. We conceive it to be far more advantageous to give both sides of a man's character than to paint him altogether in false colours which fail to convey the lessons of his life. It is a misfortune for the man if his character requires the use of colours that make the picture of sombre hue. But that is not the fault of the artist, and he should not be gibbeted if he uses the colours with a pre-Raphaelite brush. In some of these late cases there has been too much of verbal flattery for truth to put in appearance, and too little imitation of the virtues that have been so highly extolled but rarely practised. It is this which makes the more correct drawings of Reis and Rayyet so much more conspicuous by being almost alone in the independence of the treatment and the discrimination with which the judgments are formed. We have no idea of a man being hounded to death on account of his opinions, provided they are expressed with reasonable care, and when differences arise as to the merits of a subject, they should be expressed without the betrayal of unworthy spitefulness."

THE Overland Mail thus notices Nawab Abdool Lutef's pamphlet on the Age of Consent Act :—

"The Mahomedan Literary Society of Calcutta, which, under the enlightened lead of Nawab Abdool Lutef and his coadjutors has done so much to place the relations of the Mahomedans to the Government and their native fellow-citizens on a sounder footing, has issued a memorandum in the vernacular language, entitled 'A practical view of the Age of Consent Act, for the benefit of the Mahomedan community in general.' It is unhappily too long for reprint in our columns, but we have read it with interest and can commend it as a clear and concise statement of the law and its object, for the information of Mahomedans not acquainted with legal technicalities. The Society says that one of the motives of its issue is to 'disabuse the Mahomedans of any suspicion of interference by Government with their Religion that may have been raised in their minds by misrepresentations' which have been widely circulated by 'men insufficiently acquainted with the requirements of the Mahomedan Religion.' This patriotic effort to remove popular misunderstandings must be highly appreciated by the Indian Government, and should be recognised in this country as a proof, were any wanted, of the increasing enlightenment of the Mahomedan community in India under our rule."

The Government of India thus acknowledge the receipt of the pamphlet :—

"No. 1411.

From—S. Harvey James, Esq., Secretary to the Government of India, Legislative Department.

To—Nawab Abdool Lutef Bahadur, C.I.E. Calcutta.

Dated Simla the 7th August 1891.

SIR,—I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 22nd July, with which you forwarded copy of a Memorandum, with Urdu translation, published by the Mahomedan Literary Society of Calcutta, containing an exposition of the object and scope of the Age of Consent Act.

2. The Governor-General in Council desires me to say that he duly appreciates the efforts of the Society to prevent misconception, especially among the ignorant classes, in regard to the Act, and has learnt with satisfaction that it is intended to circulate copies of the Memorandum, in the different vernacular languages, throughout the country."

NOTWITHSTANDING the rains, the weather at Simla is far from pleasant. We quote from a private letter dated the 10th instant from that capital:—

"We have had any amount of rain and plenty of landslips and a few of them have been the cause of death to both man and beast, yet the weather is very close as yet."

WE cull the following anecdote of the late Premier of Canada:—

"Lord Dufferin delivered an address before the Greek class of the McGill University, about which a reporter wrote: 'His lordship spoke to the class in the purest ancient Greek, without mispronouncing a word or making the slightest grammatical solecism.' 'Good heavens!' remarked Sir Hector Langevin to Sir John, 'how did the reporter know that?' 'I told him,' was the answer. 'But you don't know Greek.' 'True; but I know a little about politics.'"

That is, American politics.

THE Bangabasi's demented varlet protests his independence. He is "I by myself I." Anything, indeed, to save his skin. And no wonder. That is the very way of unfaithful servitors. This poor fellow will certainly never emulate the heroic Choonnee who, in the romance of the death of Jagat Sett, offered his life to save his master, and, failing, died voluntarily in the same element in which, and at the same place where, the other was killed, not only not to survive his master but also to attend on him in the shades. Our Bengali Choonnee may, in stress of weather, be found to turn Queen's evidence.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE new destructive Ecrasite, which is to be adopted for the Austrian Army, is said to be twice as explosive as dynamite.

DISTRESS is increasing in Russia. The failure of crops in many places has reduced the peasants to live on boiled grass. There is a partial prohibition on the export of corn, and absolute restriction on rye, ryemeal and all descriptions of bran. It is suspected in some quarters that the distress is not such as to justify suspension of exports. The prohibition is talked of as a political move against Germany, which largely depends on Russia for rye.

THE Duke of Connaught has been Gazetted Colonel of the 1st Bombay Lancers.

THE International Congress of Hygiene and Demography was opened on the 10th by the Prince of Wales in St. James's Hall. There were present several savants of Europe and seventy delegates from India, the total of those present being two thousand. Eighteen sections are at work. A paper on cancer read on the 11th shewed that the disease is on the increase, there being nineteen thousand deaths from it in England in 1890. Dr. Cunningham spoke on the various methods for prevention of the spread of epidemics from one country to another, and urged the absolute futility of quarantine. The Congress has resolved to ask all European States to make a collective enquiry into the cause of diphtheria. The collective wisdom of sanitarians has declared in favor of burning of the dead. To begin with, they have decided upon compulsory cremation in all cases of death from infectious diseases.

ON Tuesday Mr. Handley committed, under section 124A of the Indian Penal Code, for seditious writing, the four persons connected with the Bangabasi respectively as proprietor, editor, manager, and publisher and printer, against whom warrants had been issued on Friday week. The same day, Mr. Hill applied to the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Beverley—who will divide the next sessions between them—for release of the prisoners on bail. The Advocate General, on behalf of Government, did not wish to be vindictive. He admitted that the law allowed the High Court the discretion to grant the release prayed for, and only stated the facts as they appeared in the lower Court and the circumstances that might guide the Judges in the exercise of that discretion. Sir Comer Petheram thought that section 497 of the Criminal Procedure Code which was construed to debar the Magistrate in the lower Court from granting bail, was no bar to the High Court's exercising that discretion, if disposed to release prisoners during or pending trial. Mr. Handley was willing to grant bail if it were not opposed on behalf of the prosecution. This fact evidently weighed in favour of the accused, and the Chief Justice justly conceived that there was no fear of the accused not appearing at their trial if allowed their liberty. He, accordingly, ordered that each of the four accused do execute a bond for Rs. 10,000 and find two sureties of Rs. 10,000 each. This document was to be of such a character that the sureties must forfeit Rs. 20,000 for each of the prisoners if they fail to enter appearance at the trial. Both the amounts for personal recognizance and surety bonds are excessive, especially for the poor printer. But in being merciful almost in the teeth of law, the court had need to be cautious. Next day, sureties were produced before Mr. Belchambers, the Registrar in the Original Side, who examined them and accepted Gungaprasad Sen and his worthy grandson Bejoy Kristo Sen for the proprietor Jogendat Chunder Bose; Gangadhar Banerjee and Sujo Cant Roy Chowdry for the editor Kristo Chunder Banerjee; Gungaprasad Sen and Jodoonath Banerjee for the manager Brojaraj Banerjee; and Jogesh Chunder Banerjee and Jodoonath Sanyal for the printer and publisher Aronoroy Roy. The surety bonds being executed, Mr. Hill, later in the day, applied to the Bench that made the order for bail, for an order on the Superintendent of the Presidency Jail to produce the four accused before the Court, to sign their recognizance bonds and to be set free, which order was granted. It was lucky that the preliminary investigation in the Police Court was hurried through, or the four persons whom the Chief Justice spared the unnecessary hardship of confinement before trial, would have been in jail more than four days from Saturday. They would have been spared those four days had not the Criminal Procedure Code fettered the Magisterial discretion. We hope the Legislative Department of the Government of India will take a note of the unnecessary harshness of section 497 for the next amendment of the Criminal Procedure Code. Sedition in every form ought to be punished, but care should be taken that honest, if perhaps unwary, literary men were not in hot haste sent to jail on the mere accusation of—say, Sir Vicary Gibbs. Meanwhile, the country and the press in particular ought to be grateful to Sir Comer Petheram and Mr. Beverley for almost going out of their way as it were to soften the extraordinary rigour of the law in favour of prisoners committed in a state trial. Nor should we fail to appreciate the conduct of the leading Crown lawyer. Had the Advocate-General been faint-hearted or less liberal in his professional view of the situation or in his interpretation of the law, the Court could scarcely, in the face of the Criminal Procedure Code, have granted the relief prayed for.

GREAT praise is due to the Sen Dynasty of Bikrampur. It is a shame to the Patriots and Defenders of the Faith, who were so loud at the Maudan and were ready to give their blood to Mother Kali at Kalighat, to skulk at this hour and leave to these generous strangers from East Bengal the duty of friendship.

HARDLY had the excitement on the preliminary trial of the Bangabasi for sedition been lulled to rest, when another sensation was started. On Thursday, the Standing Counsel applied to the Chief Justice's Bench for a rule against the editor of the Indian Mirror to shew cause why he shall not be punished for contempt of court for an article published on Wednesday. We publish the proceedings elsewhere. Baboo Norendernath Sen being in Court and his Counsel ready, the matter was decided then and there without issue of any process. The Chief Justice let off the Editor with a kindly warning.

SENSATION upon sensation, to-day's Gazette of India announces the resignation by Sir Romesh Chunder Mitter of his seat as an Additional Member of the Governor-General's Council for making laws and regulations.

LAST week we reported the conviction at the Alipore Magistracy of a native Pleader for extracting a record from a Munsiff's Court. This week, it is our painful duty to notice the misdeed of another Bengali Pleader in the court of the Munsiff of Bagirhat. Poreshnath Roy was convicted, by the Deputy Magistrate of Khoolna, under section 466 of the Penal Code, of altering a record of his own filing—a list of witnesses—and sentenced to one year's rigorous imprisonment. The convicted Pleader appealed to the High Court and the Criminal Appellate Bench—Messrs. Justices O'Knealy and Trevelyn—have confirmed the conviction and sentence. It was contended on behalf of the convicted that the alteration was not after but before the filing of the list, and that section 466 did not apply, in that the element of fraud—the basis of a charge of forgery—was wanting and that a conviction under that section could not stand. The High Court Judges find on the evidence that the alteration was made after the institution of the suit. Regarding the legal contention, Mr. Justice Trevelyn, in delivering the judgment of the Court, says :—

"We do not think it material to consider that question in this case, inasmuch as the accused is undoubtedly guilty of an offence under section 193 of the Penal Code, fabricating false evidence, and there can be no question about that. Inasmuch as the sentence which has been passed is far less than the maximum sentence even under that section, we do not think it necessary to make any alteration in the conviction."

Commenting on the sentence, the judgment concludes thus :—

"We think that the one passed is wholly inadequate to the offence which has been committed. This alteration of a court record is an exceedingly serious offence. It is one of the effects of which are far-reaching. It is very necessary, in all these proceedings for the purity of the administration of justice, that court records should be kept intact, and we think that the sentence of one year's rigorous imprisonment is exceedingly small and wholly inadequate for such an offence as this man has committed. It is not a punishment which will be sufficient to deter people from contemplating similar offences, and it is exceedingly light in comparison to the offence committed."

All this indignation goes for nothing, though. The Judges simply dismiss the appeal. If it is necessary to heavily punish a serious wrongdoing, it is also essential for the ends of justice that the guilty should know under what definite section of the Penal Code he is sentenced.

A far worse case is that of Baboo Anand Chunder Roy, the distinguished Pleader of Dacca. He is being prosecuted for having tampered with the Jury who acquitted the prisoners in the Bahati murder case.

MUCH was being made of a case under the Age of Consent Amendment Act which lately cropped up at Santipore in the Ranaghat Sub-division. It was represented by the Garbhadhanist press as a typical illustration of the evil effect of the new law. The Bengal Government has, we are glad to find, promptly set the public right. The facts are : "A girl named Bishu Bibi, at the instance of her father and mother, brought a charge in the Court of the Sub-divisional officer of Ranaghat against her husband, Kamal Sheikh, of having committed rape upon her. It was alleged that the girl was under the age of 10 and had never menstruated. It was also said that the husband had caused considerable injuries to her." None but the District Magistrate having jurisdiction, the matter went up to the Magistrate of Nuddea, who ordered a personal enquiry by the sub-divisional magistrate and himself privately enquired into the matter. The girl would not consent to a medical examination, and, on such other evidence as was available, the girl was reported to be over 12 years of age, and the complaint dismissed without the husband being either arrested or put on his trial.

If the case be in any sense an outcome of the new law, it is the result of the insane agitation against the Consent Bill. At the same time, it proves the superiority of the new to the old law. The Police enquiry was avoided and the husband saved the disgrace and harassment of a trial.

Nothing could be a more unfur suggestion. It was rather an illustration of the recklessness of a large proportion of the litigation in our courts. In fact, one was astonished at the assurance which would lay at the door of the new law a case which could just as well have been instituted under the old, only under the old law the unfortunate accused as well as the helpless girl who allowed herself to be the accuser would have been in a far worse position than they would be under the present Act.

KHAN BAHADUR Kazi Kamrudin, First Class Magistrate in Khandeish, convicted two Bhils of robbing two young married girls, in a highway, of their ornaments, and sentenced them each to two years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 500, or in default of payment, an addition of six months' hard labour. The District Judge, Mr. C. G. Dodgson, referred the case to the High Court for reduction of the fine to Rs. 50 or Rs. 100.

He reported that the fine was excessive and beyond all possible means of the convicted. True, a long stretch of time—six years—was allowed for realising the fine, but was there any reasonable prospect of payment? Was it expedient to enforce the payment? Each accused earned only rupees seven a month, and recovery of rupees 500 meant the deprivation of all income during six years. There would thus be only four years' income available towards payment of the fine, and still it would not be fully recovered. The fining Magistrate explained that the heavy fine was intended to deter village patels or others, who were supposed to be backers up and encouragers of the criminal tribe, for, in many cases, the fine virtually fell on them as the protectors of the Bhils. The High Court—Mr. Justice Jardine and Mr. Justice Parsons—thought such a consideration quite irrelevant and the magistrate was prevented by section 63 of the Penal Code from inflicting an excessive fine. Mr. Justice Jardine, who pronounced the judgment of the High Court, continued :—"This provision is mentioned in Lord Macaulay's report as taken from the Bill of Rights. It is also apparent from that report that the intention of the framers of the Code was that fines excessively disproportionate to all possible means of the criminals should not be inflicted." The High Court reduced the fines to Rs. 50 with the alternative rigorous imprisonment of as many days.

The intentions of the Penal Code are how little observed by Magistrates. The words rather than the intentions of the framers of the Code are followed. Wholesale and heavy punishment is ordered. In the Benares riots cases, says the Englishman, "no fewer than one hundred and thirty one persons were committed to the sessions. Of these 84 were convicted and 42 acquitted, while the cases of eight were referred to the High Court against the Jury's verdict of acquittal. Some others were convicted of rioting and further charged with dacoity. Seven of the rioters were sentenced to transportation for life, and seven for terms of more than ten years. Thirteen were sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for ten years, fourteen for seven years, two for five years, and thirty for lesser terms. Eight received thirty stripes each, and eight paid fines aggregating Rs. 45,100. Of this sum one fine was Rs. 25,000 and another Rs. 10,000."

In the defamation case against the Eastern Herald, the writer of the matter complained of was sentenced to 19½ months' imprisonment and fine of Rs. 650. That did not save the editor and proprietor, who, in his turn, was punished with 9 months' imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 1,500. In the Bangambasi prosecution, the writer escaped punishment, but the printer, the publisher and the proprietor were all sentenced.

Defamation has—for our sins—been made penal in India. But it is in its nature more a civil than a criminal offence, and the Penal Code punishes it with only simple imprisonment. The unfortunate journalist who is condemned to prison, however, is there considered a felon and treated as an ordinary criminal with rigorous jail discipline, jail diet, jail dress, and put to other inconveniences and indignities. Yet, all the same he is liable to civil annoyance. He must pay damages as well as suffer loss of liberty under law and personal indignities superadded by executive authority.

It is not sufficient that the word of the law are tortured into misual lengths. The law is invoked to stifle expression of social sentiments and for recovery of caste. Witne is the "carnival of foolish, wanton, mischievous, and pettifogging litigation"—the Jain defamation case in the Calcutta High Court.

At the present moment in India, the law of libel is undergoing a change in the hands of Judges and lawyers. That law is an English importation and yet how different from the English law! Lord Macaulay's Draft Penal Code for India protects true imputation as "producing a wholesome effect on the person who has, by his misconduct, exposed himself to it," and "detering others from imitating his example." That was not accepted, and now justification itself is an offence.

PERGUNNAH Tahirpur, Zilla Rajshahye, was the Zemindary of the late Rajas Chandra Sekhressur Roy and Maheswar Roy. On their death, it devolved upon their sons, who being minors, it came under the Court of Wards. These sons have, for some time, come to their shares of the property. Of these, one is a half shareholder and the remaining half is divided among three brothers. Under the Government management, the tenants knew only one master, the manager on behalf of the Court of Wards. Now they have to make payments to four distinct Catcheries. Just now a share in the said property has passed to an outsider. The feeling between the rayyets and the new Zemindar is far from satisfactory. There has already been a criminal case and the Collector has been appealed to by the rayyets. During his visit to Rampore Beaulah, the Lieutenant-Governor himself was besieged by a large number of them.

The Tahipur tenantry may well sigh for the old days of the manager Baboo Harakali—under the Court of Wards—who was an exceptionally good officer. But, how, under present circumstances, can such a régime be revived? The tenants pray for the appointment of a single manager for the whole estate, on the ground of the differences subsisting among the several shareholders. That is matter for the courts. How the Lieutenant-Governor can interfere, we do not understand. The appointment of a single manager as the solution of the mutual differences of landlords, is a wellknown recipe of our Revenue Pharmacopœia, descending down from the Regulations, as far back as 1812. According to circumstances, one of the parties or the Collector may move the Judge of the District who may call upon all the shareholders to show cause why a single manager shall not be appointed, and, on failure of objection, may direct them to appoint a sole manager, and, on their neglect to do so, may, if the Court of Wards agree to it, make the management of the estate over to the Court of Wards, or appoint a manager himself. (Bengal Tenancy Act, VIII of 1885, Sections 93-95.)

But who is to move in the matter? who will set the machinery to work? By law, the Collector, in case of inconvenience to the public, or any of the coparceners only, when there is any apprehension of injury to private rights, is permitted to apply to the Judge. True that "any one having an interest in the estate or tenure" can do so. But the rayyet is debarred. At any rate, these poor are entitled to protection. Now that they have brought their case to the notice of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, it will be a pity if their grievance is not removed.

WE are indebted to the courtesy of the eminent Counsel for the Manipur Princes for a copy of their appeals and his arguments in their behalf, together with the affidavits of Janaki Nath Bysak and Brojo Mohun Sing, the judgments of the Special Court, and the evidence adduced before it. In forwarding to us, under instructions from Mr. Ghose, a complimentary copy of the rather bulky pamphlet, Messrs. W. Newman and Co. inform us that the Appeals of the Manipur Princes with a Memorandum of Arguments submitted on their behalf to the Government of India by Manomohan Ghose, of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-law and Advocate of the Calcutta High Court. With an Appendix containing the Evidence adduced at the trial of Tikendrajit Sing, Jubraj or Senapati, is being printed and published by them and will be ready for sale at Re. 1-8 on Friday (yesterday). The work, beautifully turned out by the Caxton Press, with its dainty sky-blue cover scarcely suggests, the matters of dark import within—the life and death struggle of a princely house which its contents represent.

THE Act which added section 124A. to the Indian Penal Code was passed during the viceroyalty of Lord Mayo and is therefore an earlier enactment than the repeal of Lord Lytton's Vernacular Press gagging law. Our readers will please make the necessary corrections in the leader "The Prosecution of a Bengali Newspaper for Sedition," (page 379) and in the note on the Bangabasi prosecution (page 377) of our last issue.

A BLUNDER RECTIFIED.

THE British Power in the East is a great success. That is patent. Therein, indeed, it is a miracle in history. Indeed, the Anglo-Saxon race is endowed with a gift for founding colonies and dependencies. It has certainly beaten all competitors in the field, in every quarter of the globe. Yet, it is but human and has manifold imperfections and weaknesses, only, under God's Providence, these do not interfere with the nett result. In India, we observe the British making mistakes upon mistakes which, in the case of a ruling people less gifted or sound at core, might be dangerously embarrassing. Through all their false steps, one redeeming feature goes far to protect the British and their interests—we refer to their capacity to improve and their courage to amend. The cloud of one day is dispersed by the light of another. Like all strong and successful races, they are wilful, but still there is an amount of docility and practical humility which leavens the national obstinacy, while the frequent changes in the repositories of authority in the East favour the amending hand without compromise of individual self respect. Just now, there is a case in point.

The Government of India have modified their orders about courtesy titles. To those unacquainted with the history of the subject, that brief announcement will convey no meaning. It means that the administration of the Marquis of Lansdowne have confessed the blunder of the administration of the Marquis of Ripon and have done their best to wash their hands off it and to relieve the State from the evils of its continuance. As usual with the British, the blunder was no result of a blind resolve to do the wrong, but rather the outcome of a passionate determination to do good without adequate knowledge how to proceed about it. Our readers cannot have forgotten the loud blast of opposition which Lord Ripon's scheme of Local Self-Government encountered, specially from the officials, who took alarm at what they regarded as an attack on their power and privileges. It were vain, however, to avow their hostility or its true grounds. So they masked their rage behind the presumed or presumable opposition of the superior classes—the leaders of society. The landed magnates, the big wiggery of the high castes, and the reverend fathers of the Church, it was confidently asserted, would have nothing to do with your essentially vulgar system of appointment by voting. To the good Viceroy who had set his heart upon the scheme, such vaticination was torture. All the more that it was not to be pooh-poohed. The noble Lord must have been sorely perplexed. Thus thrown upon his resources to prevent that prophecy proving true, he hit upon a notable expedient. Lord Ripon offered titles for members of Municipalities and Local Boards. The bait took. The truly respectable are, of course, nowhere to be bought by tin trumpets. But all anxieties as to the destruction of the Local Self-Government scheme from sheer neglect of the people disappeared. By its order of May 1882, the Home Department directed the use of the courtesy title of Rai or Rao Bahadur or Khan Bahadur for native members of Local Boards. This was objected to at the time by the Government of Bombay. That Government thought that it was no good policy that honors should be scattered broadcast over the land. As hitherto conferred, titles were so many special recognitions for service done to the State, and they should not be prostituted by indiscriminate admissions. The Government of India saw the validity of the objection, but it was too late. They were committed, with their reputation and all, to a great policy, for whose success they were prepared to make sacrifices, and, if we understand rightly, to do some wrong, if required. At any rate, they had gone too far to retrace their steps. The Government of Bombay, however, which led the opposition on the new policy, and had, in consequence, received many hard blows from the superior power, having a real flaw in the Supreme Governmental scheme, was not prepared to abandon the advantage, and kept harrassing the Government of India. After a correspondence, it was decided, in January 1883, to grade the honorary titles for the Bombay Presidency into three classes. Thus: Non-official Presidents and Chairmen of District Local Fund Committees were honored with Rao or Khan Bahadur; non-official Presidents and Chairmen of Taluka Local Fund Committees and non-official members other than Presidents and Chairmen of District Local Fund Committees, with Rao or Khan Saheb; non-official members other than Presidents or Chairmen of Taluka Local Fund Committees, with Azam. In this classification, the Municipalities find no place. Thus was Local Government inaugurated in the West. In the course of two years, the Bombay Government became reconciled to it, so much so that, in 1885, it recommended to the Government of India the claims of the members of Municipal Boards for titular distinctions. The Government of Lord Dufferin, to preserve the continuity of the policy of 1882 and possibly not to appear antagonistic to Local Self-Government, which was still in its infantile stage, accepted the recommendation and, in June 1885, ordered that non-official Presidents and Vice-Presidents of Municipalities with a population of 18,000 and more might be called Rao or Khan Bahadurs, and the other Municipal Commissioners of such Municipalities and non-official Presidents and Vice-Presidents of minor municipalities, Rao or Khan Sahebs, and the Commissioners of minor Municipalities Azams. The Southern Presidency took up the cue of the Western, and, in May 1885, Madras, weary of the burden of empty baubles, wanted to limit the titles to only Vice-Presidents of Local Boards and Municipalities. The same course that was adopted for Bombay was decided upon for Madras. It was thereupon ordered that Vice-Presidents of District Boards and Chairmen of Municipalities with over 20,000 inhabitants should have the honorary title of Khan or Rao Bahadur, and the members of District Boards, Presidents and Vice-Presidents of Taluk Boards, and members of Municipalities with over 20,000 inhabitants and Chairmen of smaller ones, had better be humoured with the complimentary distinction of Khan or Rao Saheb.

The Government of India now fully recognise the validity of the objection in 1882 of the Government of Bombay to the cheapening of honorary titles, and find, with the advance Local Self-Government has made in the country, that it is no longer expedient to continue these honors. The native members of the Public Works Department have for some time ceased to enjoy the privilege of ex-officio titles. That rule is now made applicable to Municipal Commissioners and Members of Local Boards. It will, of course, have no retrospective effect. The present members will not be disturbed, but will enjoy the privilege until they quit office.

Thus our Government washes its hands off a nonsense.

SIR AUCKLAND COLVIN ON THE MALCONTENTS.

THE Government of India has long since been called —by Burke or Brougham, we forget whom—a Government of Paragraphs. It is a happy phrase and a correct characterization which aptly differentiates the machinery of our constitutional despotism as a régime of writing from the Government by Public Meeting at home in England as a régime of speaking. From the first Governor-General downwards, India has been ruled on the spot by a succession of able penmen, under whose hands has been produced a mass of official papers remarkable both for manner and matter which, if they were properly edited for popular use, would be an excellent substitute for an Anglo-Indian literature. Of course, our Anglo-Indian rulers are no speakers. There is little room for those opportunities on which debaters and declaimers thrive. The gift of the gab is soon crushed in an uncongenial soil. The practised speakers, who, from time to time, find themselves in India, generally degenerate into paragraphists. Lord Wellesley, who was an accomplished orator at home, is scarcely remembered for any oratorical efforts in this country beyond some addresses to students. Of late years, there are signs of a notable departure, however. The great Indian Civil Service still sticks exclusively to the pen. The Lieutenant-Governor of the North Western Provinces forms a brilliant exception. He has signalled his term of office by not only a large mass of able and spirited writing, but also a quantity of spirited speaking. In the latter line, he has now almost transcended himself. In laying the foundation stone of a Dufferin Hospital lately, Sir Auckland Colvin delivered a speech of great force as well as extraordinary brilliancy, of which his Service may ever be proud. The cream of it is contained in the following:—

"The principle which is a main principle of the administration of the British Government, and which distinguishes it from all previous rules which have existed here, is a common effort for a common end, not merely for the benefit of a privileged few, but for the benefit of all classes. I am glad to have this opportunity of saying a few words on this subject because, as you know, there has been some misapprehension—happily now allayed—in regard to the attitude of the Government in respect of works of this nature, a misunderstanding which was evident on your part and very evident on the part of those who make it their business to sow the wind in the hope that others will reap the whirlwind. The principle that underlies the action of the Government in these matters is the principle of co-operation which obtains in all parts of the world. It is a main duty of Municipalities to provide for a sufficient supply of water and for sanitation. The Legislature in this country has imposed duties of this nature upon local Municipalities; but I was aware from the first, as I could not but be aware, that Municipalities were not able from their own funds to discharge the obligations imposed upon them. It was necessary that they should receive aid, and substantial aid, from the Provincial funds from the treasury of Government. But I did not on that account consider that it is incumbent on the Government to precede the efforts of the Municipalities, to anticipate their own resources, or to find from the Provincial purse the entire sum necessary to enable them to carry out the works imposed upon them by the position in which they found themselves. The several Municipalities concerned were therefore called upon to inform the Government what in their opinion was the amount of revenue which, with a due regard to the circumstances of their fellow-townsmen, they could raise and on learning that, with one exception only, the Government proceeded to take into consideration the amount that it was necessary to give them and to make that amount over to them. In Benares the Government has put down six lakhs of rupees; in Agra it has assigned to the Municipality an annual subsidy of a very considerable sum, derived from resources which may fairly and reasonably be regarded as accruing to the Municipality. In Allahabad at this moment it is engaged in common with the Municipality in ascertaining the amount of its contributions and the sources from which they should be met. I said there was an exception, and that exception was your own case. In March last your chairman was at Allahabad and told me what was necessary in order to give you that confidence which at that time you seemed to require. He was told that the Government was prepared to pay out in your case the sum of six lakhs. What followed we all know, nor is it necessary to dwell upon it. But it showed me the mistake I had made in allowing an exception to the rule of procedure, and as soon as possible I withdrew that offer but we have now fallen back to the normal and proper position which I think we should relatively occupy. You have told me what you consider the sum you can contribute, and I have on my part told you that, as soon as I have considered the scheme and plans of the Engineer, which are now before me, I will find from the Provincial revenue the sum necessary to carry out an adequate system of drainage for the benefit of your town.

"I have stated on this occasion at some little length the principles by which the Government is guided in matters of this kind, that is to say, in the assistance it gives to municipal works of public utility, because I think that some declaration of the policy of the Government was evidently required. It will obviate misapprehension in future, and will enable any Municipality which may be inclined to undertake works similar to yours to know what their position is likely to be. It was also necessary because, as I have stated, there are those who make it their business to sow the wind in the hope that others may reap the whirlwind, who had taken advantage of the misunderstanding which had arisen, and were pursuing their congenial task. There is a lying spirit abroad in these Provinces as in other Provinces of India, a spirit whose boast is to identify itself with progress and with public spirit, but which is in truth a spirit of envy, and of hatred and malice. When I say this you will not for one moment suppose that I am my remarks at any one here present, or that I have in my mind honourable and sincere men who hold their opinions and express them from motives which I understand and esteem. Heaven forbid, for example, that I should say such thing of my lamented friend and colleague, Babu Bireswar Mitter, than whom a more enlightened man I have never met with in India or out of it. It is not honourable men of whatever shade of opinion I refer to, but men who under the pretence of disinterestedness seek to impede good: men whose only method is misrepresentation and whose only aim is the sowing of discord between the Government and the people of this country. In this matter of your municipal outlay and finance these men have laboured as they labour wherever the foot of the Government is heard. To set class against class: race against race: to plant the bitter herb of mistrust, to hinder a good understanding: to prevent cordiality and co-operation between those whose ears are tickled by their flattery or inflamed by their falsehoods on the one hand, and those on the other who repose confidence in the Government. This is their labour as misrepresentation and all untruthfulness is their method. These are the men who live under the protection of our strong Government, amassing their fortunes under it, and whom we hear saying that Government is no better than a Moloch. They tell us day by day that famine follows in the footsteps of that Government, that the servants of the Crown are its ministering spirits, furnishing it with hecatombs of Indian lives and offering a congenial incense of smoking homesteads. I ask you if there is any word of exaggeration in my report of their language. You know that it is absolutely true. These men have lately been occupying themselves with the affairs of your Municipality. You were not altogether able or free to withstand their insinuations, but I am glad to think, and to recognise, that you have made up your minds to put them behind you, and I earnestly advise you until you have carried out the great works now in progress to give no ear to anything that may emanate from that quarter, but to cast the unclean thing behind you, and to leave it to wallow in its mire. It is, as I have said, a lying spirit, a spirit which is the enemy of all that it recognises as the superior of itself, a spirit that seeks to sow discord where harmony should prevail, and to delay the coming together and the mutual understanding of those who only need to come together to have a mutual understanding. It was one of these men who characterised these schemes for water supply and drainage as 'iniquitous schemes.' I commend that phrase 'iniquitous schemes' to your consideration. Think of what it conveys, you who know that the object of the schemes is to preserve the lives and health of your fellow-countrymen, and who are aware with what caution the Government has approached the carrying out of these schemes and with what liberality it has come to your assistance. 'Iniquitous schemes!' It is pitiful to see the English language brought to such ignoble use. These men acquire that language as rogues acquire drugs, not for their therapeutic purposes but for poisonous uses."

We shall not add one word which may have the effect of arresting the full force of that powerful, incisive eloquence. It is a tremendous onslaught, weighted with the scorn of years, and bristling with point and the elegant graces. Yet, it is no party speech. The speaker maintains his calmness and candour of mind. He feels no hatred but only contempt, withal a benevolent contempt. Since the departure of Sir M. Grant Duff, Sir Auckland is probably the only Anglo-Indian statesman we have left here who has the courage of his convictions. But even he would scarcely have ventured on such outspoken utterance, unless assured in his heart of kindly feelings towards the Indian people.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD IN ENGLAND AND IN INDIA.

THE subject of adulteration is so important to the health and well-being of the community, that it may be interesting to take an occasional glance at the law for checking it obtaining in England and in this country.

An inspector under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vic., C. 63), prosecuted the Farmers and Cleveland Dairy Company Limited, for having unlawfully sold milk which was not of the nature and substance and quality of the article demanded by the purchaser. As much as twenty per cent. of its original fat had been abstracted so as to affect injuriously its quality, substance, &c., and in this state the accused had quietly delivered the article in its altered state without notice. In their defence, the Company stated that they had sold the article exactly as they had received it from the Higham Dairy Company who had contracted with them, under a written agreement, to supply the defendants with "100 to 120 gallons daily of genuine good new milk of the best quality with all its cream on." They proved that, on the day of the sale, the Higham Dairy Produce Company consigned a certain large quantity of milk to the Farmers and Cleveland Dairy Company from Alfreton in Derbyshire, in certain churns, to each of which churns was attached a label printed "7 cans, 101 imp. gals.,

March 12th 1890, of warranted genuine new milk, and with all its cream on." Two of such cans were forwarded by the Agent of the defendants from the platform at St. Pancras Station, where he had received them, to their Nunhead depôt, and out of one of them one gallon was sold—the subject of the complaint. The question for adjudication then turned on the construction of sec. 25 of the Adulteration Act, which runs thus:—

"If the defendant in any prosecution under this Act prove to the satisfaction of the Justices or Court that he had purchased the article in question as the same in nature, substance, and quality as that demanded of him by the prosecutor, and with a written warranty to that effect, that he had no reason to believe at the time when he sold it that the article was otherwise, and that he sold it in the same state as when he purchased it, he shall be discharged from the prosecution."

It was contended for the defence that there was no question that at the time of the sale, the Company had no reason to believe that the milk was otherwise than of the quality demanded. It was further submitted that the facts found shewed that there was a written warranty which took the case out of the operation of the Act. The Magistrate held that the label constituted a description only and not a warranty and convicted the Company. He at the same time stated the case for superior opinion. Justices Hawkins and Stephen overruled the Magistrate and held that there was a warranty on the part of the producers of the milk large enough to fulfil the requirements of the statute and that the Company were entitled to the protection of section 25. Mr. Justice Stephen further added that there was a written warranty that the milk to be delivered was to be pure, genuine, and new milk, unadulterated, and with all its cream on, and the fact that the milk was not to be delivered at one time did not make any difference. The conviction was accordingly quashed.

But what of the poor joint-stock goalas who narrowly escaped punishment? Have the Cleveland Company any redress against the Higham Company for not supplying milk according to the contract? At any rate, the statute leaves a wide loophole for fraud. The Calcutta Act is more stringent. The vendor is protected:—

"(1) Where any matter or ingredient not injurious to health has been added to the food, because the same is required for the production or preparation thereof as an article of commerce, in a state fit for carriage or consumption, and not fraudulently to increase the bulk, weight or measure of the food or conceal the inferior quality thereof."

"(2) Where the food is unavoidably mixed with some extraneous matter in the process of collection or preparation."

Otherwise, "no person shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food (the term food includes every article used for food or drink by man other than drugs or water) which is not of the nature, substance or quality of the article demanded by such purchaser." It is "no defence to allege that the vendor was ignorant of the nature, substance or quality of the article sold by him, or that the purchaser, having bought only for analysis, was not prejudiced by the sale." A guarantee or a warranty by the producer will not protect a vendor from the penalties of the law. Yet we hardly hear of prosecutions in Calcutta. It must not, however, be supposed that no adulterated food is sold in Calcutta. On the contrary, adulteration is on the increase and needs a strong hand to check it.

The other day, Mr. Ameer Hossein fined a seller for diluting milk. But there are worse forms of adulteration which thrive from the indifference of the public. We notice that at Rowal Pindi they have adopted a method which goes far not only to secure unadulterated food for man but also for birds and beasts. The head clerk of the Deputy Commissioner's office sued a bunniah for Rs. 35 being the value of 70 pigeons said to have died from the effects of the grain supplied by the bunniah. The Canonment Magistrate gave a decree for the full amount presuming that the pigeons owed their death to the bad grain of the bunniah. He wished that as the first Judge to decide such a case, he had been familiar with the diseases of pigeons or that a post mortem examination of some of the deceased had been made to ascertain the real cause of death. Evidently, the judgment has not given him satisfaction. At the same time, he feels the necessity of checking adulteration, and does not scruple to do so with a vigour beyond the law.

APPLICATION AGAINST THE INDIAN MIRROR FOR CONTEMPT OF COURT.

At the rising of the Court yesterday (Aug. 13) the officiating Standing Counsel, Mr. Pugh, applied to the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Beverley for a rule calling on Babu Narendra Nath Sen, editor and proprietor of the Indian Mirror, to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt of Court. This alleged contempt was the publication, in the Indian Mirror for Wednesday last, of a leading article, of which the material parts were as follows :—

"The prorogation of Parliament has apparently left the Government of India in the full exercise and enjoyment of irresponsible power, and it seems to be making the most of the opportunity. The Government has just put on a tremendous spurt, as if it meant to finish its present unhandicapped race before the re-opening of Parliament in October. It must be said that the Government has been showing unusual vigour and strength; not the strength that will commend itself to the approval of all right-thinking men, but the strength, that is a mere display of rude physical force. The first feat of strength or, more correctly speaking, of force in the arena has been, of course, the prosecution of the Bangabasi newspaper on a charge of preaching sedition."

The article then referred to the Manipur affair, after dealing with which it continued :—

"Not so as regards the State prosecution of the Bangabasi newspaper. It is for a Judge and Jury to decide, if the Bangabasi really preached sedition, while the controversy on the Age of Consent Bill was at its height. But when we have said that, we must say that to the ordinary public mind it seems to be an unnecessarily hard measure, and one which rather proves the weakness, than the strength of the Government. We cannot be accused of undue sympathy with the Bangabasi at any time. We were heartily opposed to that journal, and were altogether divided in the issues, raised by the Age of Consent Bill controversy. But the same inflexible feeling, which made us range against the Bangabasi, and on the side of the Government, the same feeling, we say, now prompts us to declare unequivocally that the present action of the Government in prosecuting the Bangabasi has every appearance of an attempt to stifle the voice of Indian public criticism. And we are compelled to adhere to this belief from the fact that by a stroke of the pen, the Government has suppressed the organs of public opinion in the Feudatory States. The Deccan Times, which rendered great public services in the course of its existence of a quarter of a century, has been the first and most notable victim; and what should prevent us from thinking that if officials were jealous of the newspapers in the Feudatory States, the Government of India has itself become impatient of criticism by newspapers in its own territories of its public acts and measures, and that it believes that a prosecution by the State such as that of the Bangabasi, will strike terror in the rest of the Indian Press, so that in future, all acts and measures of the Government may go unchallenged. We are profoundly sorry to speak thus of a Government to which only five or six months back, we gave every credit for courage and humanity. But we refuse to act complacently towards an act of the same Government, which is not merely a blunder, but which has every appearance of an attempt at terrorism. Let us, however, fearlessly tell Lord Lansdowne and his Councillors that whatever may be the upshot of the present case, we for one and other honourable members of the Indian Press will go on criticising all measures of Government, as we have hitherto done, without fear or favour or regard of consequences."

Mr. Pugh, after reading these portions of the article, continued :—There is also a paragraph in to-day's issue about the special jury, but I am not going to base any application on that. I confine myself to the article in yesterday's Mirror, which speaks of this prosecution as an attempt at terrorism and at stifling the voice of the Native Press.

Petheram, C. J.—Would that be contempt? It is not an attack on the Court. It says that the prosecution ought not to have been started. The Court has nothing to do with terrorism nor with the stifling of the Native Press.

Mr. Pugh.—I submit that it is a contempt. The article, I submit, is written with the deliberate intention of prejudicing the prosecution's case, written to show that this is a prosecution brought, not with the object of punishing a particular paper, but with the view of striking terror and stifling the Native Press. At p. 496, Odgers on Libel, it is laid down on the authority of a number of cases that "any article in a newspaper commenting on a case still before the Court is a contempt, if it in any way tends to pervert the course of justice, though written temperately and respectfully, and in all other respects such an article as might properly and legitimately be written and published after the trial is ended." In Skipworth's Case, L. R. 9 Q. B. at p. 223, Blackburn, J., in pointing out how persons might become guilty of contempt by interfering for the purpose of preventing the ordinary course of justice, said: "More commonly the mode adopted has been that of an attempt to influence the trial by attacking, deterring, and frightening witnesses, or by commenting on the case, or, as it is called, appealing to the public, and endeavouring, by statements made ex-parte, without the other side being heard and without the means of testing the matter which the law requires, to prejudice the case and prejudice the trial, and in all those ways great mischief may be done by interfering with the due and ordinary course of law; and causing justice, whether criminal or civil, not to be administered in the way which is ordinarily pursued." In Tichborne vs. Tichborne, 39 L. J. Ch. 398, it is laid down that it is a contempt of Court to publish anything in reference to the parties to, or the subject matter of, a pending litigation, which tends to excite a prejudice against those parties or their litigation. That was a civil suit, but the reasons for holding such acts to be contempts apply with even greater force to the case of a prosecution.

Mr. Manomohan Ghose.—I appear for Babu Norendro Nath Sen. I do not for one moment admit the propriety of this application, nor do I admit that there is anything in the article complained of which amounts in the slightest degree to contempt of Court.

Petheram, C. J.—Of course you do not admit it, but that is not the question. Will Babu Norendro Nath Sen give an undertaking that he will not write on this case before it is ended?

Mr. Ghose, on behalf of his client, then gave an undertaking by him not to write on the case pending the trial.—The Englishman.

IRREGULARITIES IN A SESSIONS COURT IN THE N.W. P.

(Before Mr. Justice Straight and Mr. Justice Knox.)

On Tuesday the court gave judgment in the appeal by Chuttan, Ahsan Ali, Nathu, Murada and Tika against the decision of the Sessions Judge of Aligarh convicting them under sections 304 and 108 of the Indian Penal Code of culpable homicide and abetment of the same. An explanation was called for from the Sessions Judge with regard to his procedure in the case. That explanation was before the court on Saturday, and on Monday Mr. Dillon, the Public Prosecutor, supported the explanation, and Mr. Jogindro Nath appeared for the appellants.

Mr. Justice Knox in giving judgment reviewed the evidence in the case. Upon this evidence, he continued, the learned Sessions Judge had convicted the four appellants and sentenced them to transportation for life. In his judgment he observed, but without assigning any reason, that the evidence of Ram Lal and Sundar was worth but little, and that the prosecution did not rely on it. He made no attempt whatever to reconcile the difference between the statements of Bindu and his father. Practically, therefore, the appellants were convicted and sentenced to transportation for life on the evidence of two witnesses, Bindu and Chandan, and that evidence was at conflict on most vital points. The Sessions Judge had no jurisdiction whatever to try any of the appellants, save Chuttan and Murada, and for that additional reason the case as regarded Tika, Nathu and Ahsan Ali must fall to the ground. Putting aside, however, for the time the question of jurisdiction, and after giving the case the most careful consideration, his lordship could only say that it would be impossible for him to convict any of the appellants upon the evidence of the nature of that adduced.

He might here leave the case as far as the appellants Chuttan and Murada were concerned. As regards the others he was compelled to travel beyond the actual trial in the Sessions Court and to comment upon the procedure adopted by the learned Sessions Judge to bring the accused before him. That procedure was of the most extraordinary, and he regretted to have to add, irregular nature. This was apparent from the record, and was so strongly pressed upon them by the learned vakil who appeared on behalf of the appellants, that his lordship concurred with Mr. Justice Straight in the order requiring the learned Sessions Judge to explain his procedure. That explanation had been furnished and was, if possible, of a nature still more extraordinary than the procedure which the Judge attempted to defend.

The information given to the police on the 10th of September mentioned as the assailants of Tejpal the appellants Ahsan Ali and Murada. The names of the assailants according to that information were Behari, Murlidhar, Bansi and Chandan. The police went to the spot on the 11th September, and after making an inquiry they arrested and brought before the magistrate, who tried the case, as accused persons the appellants Chuttan and Murada, Nathu and Tika and one Bansi, who was put on his trial by the Sessions Judge and acquitted. As a good deal turned on the exact way in which the trial commenced and proceeded, he had consulted the police diaries and found that the Magistrate, presumably Mr. Bishambar Das, was cognisant of the investigation as it proceeded, and that in the end the accused were brought before the Magistrate in accordance with the procedure prescribed under section 208. He then proceeded to take all the evidence produced by the police, and eventually he discharged the accused, acting under section 209 of the Code. On the 15th November Sunder, Tejpal's widow, presented a petition to the Sessions Judge in which she named Chuttan and Murada as the murderers of her husband, and asked that the record might be sent for and these persons committed for trial. Up to this point in the case and up to the very last day when the appellants were convicted and sentenced, there never was a complaint made in the case. The word "complaint," said his lordship, had ever since 1872 received a definite meaning for the purpose of the Criminal Procedure Code. It meant, vide section 4 (a) of the code, "the allegation made orally or in writing to a Magistrate with a view to his taking action under this code, that some person, whether known or unknown, has committed an offence; but does not include the report of a police officer." The Sessions Judge apparently looked upon the statement made to the police during the investigation or to a Magistrate during the inquiry previous to commitment by the relatives of the deceased and their witnesses as complainants. The Public Prosecutor had been unable to refer them to any allegation made orally or in writing to any Magistrate with a view to his taking action under the Code. The case was one instituted upon police report and investigated by the police in accord with section 106 of the Code, and the Magistrate was seized of it upon police report, section 191 (b). There having been no complaint the court of Sessions, after examining the record of the inquiry held by Mr. Bishambar Das, and if it considered that any of the accused brought before him and discharged had been improperly discharged, could have caused them to be arrested, and have ordered them to be committed for trial. This he did not do. The Judge could under section 437 have directed the District Magistrate to make further inquiry into the case of any of the five accused who had been brought before and discharged by Mr. Bishambar Das. This he did do in the case of Chuttan and Murada. He directed the Magistrate to make inquiry regarding Behari, Murlidhar, Hira Lal and Chandan and this he could not do, and so far the order of the 10th December 1890 was without jurisdiction and bad. He need hardly add, his lordship said, that they had never for an instant supposed that he was actuated by any desire other than that of doing what he conceived to be his duty. He had put forward what he was pleased to term a common-sense view of the policy of the legislature, but his lordship hardly needed to remind him that his duty as a Judge was not to make law but to administer the law as made by those who framed it. The Magistrate held the inquiry ordered by the Sessions Judge and convicted two men, Chuttan and Murada, and discharged the others. Upon receipt of this commitment the Judge ordered the arrest of Tika, Nathu and Bansi, and ordered the Magistrate to make inquiry into the case of Ahsan Ali. It was obvious, said his lordship that this order was bad and without jurisdiction. The only record which the Judge had before him at this stage was the record of the District Magistrate and in that record none of these persons were accused persons. Tika, Nathu and Bansi were arrested and called upon to show cause why they should not be committed for trial. Upon this an order in the vernacular was made by the Sessions Judge, which, if intended to be an order directing the accused to be committed, was in the opinion of his lordship, unhappily worded. The District Magistrate understood it to mean "upon the charge under section 302 Indian Penal Code, let Nathu, Tika and Bansi be committed for trial," and the wording fully justified the interpretation. He accepted the learned Judge's explanation that he intended that the Magistrate should make the commitment. In this he was perfectly right, and he should have taken care that his order was complied with. The Magistrate never made any commitment. The Judge took cognizance without commitment, and secondly without jurisdiction. The learned Sessions Judge considered the case reported at L. L. R. 10 Bom. p. 319 was an authority in favour of his view that under section 436 a Sessions Judge might commit an accused person. His lordship had examined the case, and was unable to accept the view therein laid down. In these Provinces no other rule had obtained since circuit or sessions courts were first formed in 1795 than that Sessions Judges should deal with accused persons only upon commitment duly made by a magistrate competent to commit, cases of contempt being always excepted.

He fully agreed with the learned Sessions Judge that the trying of cases by instalments was to be deprecated, but it was also clear law that no court had power to adjourn proceedings except by the presiding judge or magistrate, and giving reasons for such adjournment. Had the learned Sessions Judge in this case stated the reasons which actuated him in postponing the trial as he did from the 20th January to the 17th February, no notice would have been taken of this defect in his procedure.

He would set aside the proceedings against the appellants Tika, Nathu and Ahsan Ali, as being proceedings held without jurisdiction, and therefore void ab initio. As regarded Chuttan and Murada he would find that they were not guilty of the offence with which they stood charged, and would direct their acquittal and immediate release. Tika and Nathu should be discharged from their bonds and Ahsan Ali forthwith released.

Mr. Justice Straight said: I concur in the very clear, cogent and exhaustive judgment of my brother Knox and in the orders that he has proposed. I cannot leave this case, however, without adding one or two observations. In no sense did I for one moment entertain a doubt as to the intellectual capacity and perfect honesty of the learned Judge who tried this case. What I did say in the order I originally passed calling for an explanation, and what I repeat now, after having read that explanation, is that the Legislature passes statutes of procedure for the purpose of their provisions being observed by the courts, and not for the purpose of judges of this court or any other court, or Magistrates on various occasions, seeking to drive a coach and six through the provisions of the Act, and when found fault with for doing so, saying that after all they are mere matters of form. I have now spent twenty-six years of my life in courts of justice, and may claim some experience of the practice of these courts, and I certainly never found that the interests of justice, let alone the interests of accused persons, were advanced or benefited by slackness and carelessness in procedure. The learned Judge in the view he has expressed in his explanation imagines, apparently, that he occupies the post in which he is to take cognizance of all wrong-doings and offences committed, irrespective of necessary and regular steps being taken which the statute of criminal procedure provides. It is to be hoped that in future cases in discharging the duties of the important office he fills that he will follow the law as laid down and not what he thinks should be the law of the land.—The Pioneer, August 5, 1891.

THE CEYLON SUPREME COURT AND THE CEYLON OBSERVER.

CONTEMPT OF COURT.

On Tuesday, the 30th June, the Supreme Court ordered a rule to be issued calling on Messrs. A. M. and J. Ferguson proprietors of the "Ceylon Observer" to appear and shew cause why they should not be committed for contempt of that court, in having published letters which imputed motives to the Supreme Court in its recent cool decisions. The editors of the paper promptly apologised. The Court accepted the apology and discharged the rule with the following remarks from the Chief Justice.

The Chief Justice said that he and his brother judges had deliberated upon this matter and in reference to this rule which they had seen fit to issue upon the editors of the "Observer," calling upon them to show cause why they should not be punished for contempt of court, the judges felt that in a matter of this kind, where the editors of a public paper took upon themselves to publish in the columns of their paper a letter coming, as it would appear to do, not from the editors themselves, but from a person who might be one of their constituents or who might take a particular interest in a matter which was before the public, when they undertook to allow their columns to be used by such persons, they assumed the sole responsibility of the person or persons who might write the letters. Now in this instance the editors of the paper had come candidly forward and said "we do assume that responsibility; we recognise the fact that in inserting those letters we ourselves were assuming the responsibility which an anonymous writer had avoided under the anonymous signature which he appended to the letter." The judges had in most cases felt it would be their duty to publicly assert that persons could not in this anonymous way either libel individuals, or courts of justice, nor any one, and their first impression in this case was that, until the Editors of the "Ceylon Observer" had put that court in a position to deal with a person who had thus so grossly libelled the judges and so grossly libelled that court by imputations which could not be true, it would be their duty to hold the editors liable until they were in that position. His learned brothers and himself had very carefully considered the candid and ample manner in which the editors had come forward at once to assume that responsibility, and to make themselves liable for it, and to state to the court the reasons which they had given that the judges should consider what had been done by the editors was sufficient vindication, not only of the rights of the court, but was sufficient to relieve themselves also from the grave accusation which rested upon them of having wilfully cast an imputation upon the judges, which they themselves had been the first to say could not be justified. Under these circumstances the judges had decided to accept the apology that had been tendered, which had been tendered spontaneously and which had been candidly tendered; but they did wish to point out that, whilst it should be, and was, the endeavour of the judges of that court that their judicial acts should be canvassed, and in every possible way reviewed by the public, whose servants they were, the motives which actuated them on that bench should not be attributed to be mean, low, or corrupt, and they should not be accused of mean and disreputable conduct. It was there where the libel began, it was there where the injury was done to the courts of justice; and it must be remembered that, in a country like this, if the integrity of the courts of that colony was not insured to the public, the courts had better be closed. He was quite sure it was the opinion of all good men that it was not good to impeach the character of the judges, and therefore, in now accepting the ample apology which had been tendered spontaneously and freely and candidly by the editors of the "Observer," they at the same time felt that it was unfortunate that gentlemen, if they were gentlemen, under the security of anonymous signatures, might throw upon the editors of the public press the responsibility which had been thrown upon the defendants in this case, and which had subjected them undoubtedly to a great deal of discomfort and annoyance, and which had resulted in the proceedings which the judges thought it right, and their duty, to make public as they had made them public. If that court was a corrupt court, it should no longer exist; if it was not a corrupt court, it was the bounden duty of every citizen to uphold it, and to respect it in every possible way. With these observations they discharged the respondents.—The Ceylon Patriot, July 10, 1891.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Abscesses, Erysipelas, Piles.—Unvarying success attends all who treat these diseases according to the simple printed directions wrapped round each pot and box. They are invaluable to the young and timid, whose bashfulness sometimes endangers life. Though apparently local, diseases of this nature are essentially blood diseases, but a little attention, moderate perseverance, and trifling expense will enable the most diffident to conduct any case to a happy issue without exposing secret infirmities to any one. The Ointment checks the local inflammation and alleviates the throbbing pains. These directions also clearly point out when and how Holloway's Pills are to be taken, that their purifying and regulating powers may assist by adjusting and strengthening the constitution.

THE CAPTIVE LADIE.

By THE LATE MICHAEL MADHUSUDAN DUTT.

Reprinted from the Madras edition of 1849.

Oh!—who can look upon the plain,
Where sleep the glorious—mighty slain,—
Brave hearts that for their country bled,
And read upon their eyes tho' seal'd,
The proud defiance there reveal'd,
Lit by each spirit ere it fled—
Or, mark the fierce disdain that lies,
Upon their lips and yet defies,— Unquench'd by Death,—like the last ray,
Of the set sun, still lingering there,
As if too loath to pass away,
But scorch and blast with lightning glare,—
Nor feel his blood within his vein,
Rage like the tempest-stirred main,
As if to burst—to gush—to flow—
And sweep away fair Freedom's foe,—
Nor madly long to wield the brand,
To save—defend his Native Land,—
Nor sigh his heart's best blood to shed,—
And make on glory's lap his bed!

"Twas thus they felt—the warriors brave,
Husteena nurs'd but for the grave!
"Twas thus they felt—and thus they died,
As well beseemed their warrior pride,—
But wild and dire the tide of war,
Had roll'd on conquest-wheeled car,
And fierce the foe whose ruthless creed,
Taught he but wins the Heaven's brightest meed,
Who shrinks not—never fears to bleed!
Days, months have pass'd, and feebler grown,
She stands alas!—as one alone,
'Midst serried ranks of foe-men fell,
Who aim her fall and aim but well.—
A boundless grave—a widening tomb,
Where all is wilderness and gloom,—
Where rending sob—and mournful sighs—
The widows' and the orphans' cries.—
The parting spirits' farewell groan,
The wounded, writhing warriors' moan,
Fall darkly on the startled ear,
And freeze the bravest heart with fear!
And hope hath fled—and bleak despair,
Is on her brow—deep darkling there,
Such as unnerves the boldest hand,
And blunts the edge of sharpest brand!

Yes—she must fall—and when again,
Yon Moon asserts his silver reign,

She'll smile on crumbling—blackened tow'r,
And ruin'd dome,—blood-delug'd bow'r!
And when yon stars, which look so bright,
Shall gem again the locks of Night,
They'll shine like lamps lit in the gloom,
Of some dark, lonely, silent tomb,
Where midst the wild and desert-scene,
Sleeps—lowly sleeps—an eastern queen!

Within Husteena's tow'r-crown'd wall,
And in his dim—tho' gorgeous hall,
Upon the proud, gem-studded throne,
Which soon must cease to be his own,
The Rajah sits,—and small the band,
Doth 'round in moody silence stand,
As if each fear'd to breathe the thought,
Within his bosom widely wrought!

'We part, brave friends,—there is a clime,
'Beyond the rolling tide of Time,—
'A sweet and bright and blissful shore,
'Where we shall meet to part no more!—
'Nay—let not maiden tears bedew
'The warrior cheek of sterner hue:
'Yes—we must part, a fiery grave,
'Must blaze o'er him who dies no slave!
'Ye know the rest—farewell!—and now—
Why came that shade upon his brow,
As on he hastened from his throne,
And vanish'd from that hall alone?

As o'er some desert, dreary plain,—
Grim Desolation's wide domain,
The silver sands' bright sun-nurs'd child,*
So beautiful—so sweetly wild—
Oft to the thirsty pilgrim's eye,
Displays her luring witchery,
And becks him on with promised bliss,
To cool his lips with liquid kiss,
Till solemnly dim Twilight gray,
Frowns her to nothingness away,
And on her dupe, thus spell betray'd
Doth spread a soft and dewy shade,
And gently fan his burning brow,
With balmy breath,—so welcome now,
And in soft, soothing accents tell,
Of that wild witch, so bright yet fell,
Who, when she smil'd and seem'd to save
But led him to a hideous grave!

* The Mirage is not unknown in India. Elphinstone, in describing his passage through the Great Desert, says, "On the 25th November, we marched twenty-seven miles to two wells in the Desert.—In the way we saw a most magnificent mirage."—Historical and descriptive Account of British India. Thus on Life's darksome vale, the ray
Of hope will falsely light the way,
And deck dim Future's brow afar,
With many a gay and light-eyed star,
Till cold Reality, as fair-brow'd Light,
Dispels the rainbow dreams of Night,—
Unveils her face, and calls Despair,
To crush the vision false but fair !
Oh then, how cold the solitude,
Comes on the bosom's starry mood,—
How bleak, O God ! 'tis then to feel,
There's nought above,—below,—can heal,
Or, even lull the bleeding breast,
To sweet and calm—tho' short-liv'd rest !—

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

LORD Lansdowne has thoroughly shaken off the effects of influenza and has gone to Mahasu for a change.

SIR Dennis FitzPatrick, before assuming charge of the Lieutenant-Government of the Punjab, goes home on leave in October. During his absence, Mr. T. G. Chichele-Plowden, Commissioner of the Beáns, will act the British Resident at Hyderabad. The Englishman contradicts the rumour that Sir John Ware Edgar, Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal, has been selected for the Hyderabad Residency when Sir Dennis vacates the place. The news ought to be true, at any rate. Sir John would make an excellent Resident at Hyderabad.

THE Pioneer is enabled to announce that the decision of the Government of India regarding the Manipur princes, was unanimous.

HARI MAITI, the cause of the Consent Act and of the new politico-religious fervour among a certain section of our community, has been released from jail, on completion of his term of imprisonment.

THE famous Jain defamation case has taken a new turn. It has cropped up in the High Court in civil guise, with the tables turned. A plaint has been filed against the prosecutors in the defamation case in which the Jury acquitted Chatterput Sing and a nolle prosequi was entered against the others. The acquitted defendant claims rupees two lacs as damages against Inder Chand Nahatta, Bood Sing and Bissen Chand Doodoria for malicious prosecution.

MR. C. J. Lyall and Dr. Lethbridge made a report on the Andamans penal settlement. In considering that report, the Government of India have decided that only life convicts shall be transported, that there is no necessity for re-transporting convicts from Port Blair to Indian jails to complete the last two months of their sentences. There will be classification of criminals, habitual criminals being segregated as much as possible. Females will be absolutely segregated. The commission have found that more women are wanted in Port Blair as wives for self-supporting convicts. The Government of India have accordingly ordered the sending of women eligible for marriage and sentenced to seven years' or more transportation, the conditions of marriage being the same as with female life convicts after five years' good conduct in jail.

TEN years ago, a Brahman girl of seven years, now a pupil in the Maharani's School, Mysore, was married to a boy of twelve. Shortly after marriage he disappeared, and was not heard of till recently. It was rumoured that the boy was living at Benares. The mother of the girl arrived there in search of the boy and brought him to Mysore. Although the mother-in-law was satisfied that he was the lost son-in-law, the brother of the boy disclaimed his identity and refused to acknowledge him as his brother. The mother of the girl was not dissuaded by such disclaimer but celebrated the nuptials of her daughter.

At the opening of the Antrim Assizes on the 13th July, the Chief Justice, Sir Peter O'Brien, complimented the city of Belfast on the reduction of crime to the very smallest dimensions, and its advance by leaps and bounds in trade, commerce and population. Mr. Justice-Murphy opened the Carrickfergus Assizes only to receive a pair of white gloves from the Sheriff, for there was no case to try.

THREE of the prisoners in Lower Bengal are put down as "highly educated." Whereupon a Madras law paper exclaims "Are these graduates, and was it the necessity of maintaining B. A. dignity on an empty pocket which led them into the House of Correction?" Is poverty alone responsible for all crimes? Can there never be an unjust conviction or a conviction on a false charge. Does residence in jail always presuppose dishonesty or crime? It is not the residence but the cause that leads to it that should be considered in condemning. Are we to believe that the educated of the Southern Presidency are never in prison, except when they are poverty-stricken? According to our contemporary, wealth goes beyond Charity. It not only covers a multitude of sins but all serious offences.

At St. Petersburg, a family physician, after several prescriptions, drew out a powerful one which, so he informed the husband of the patient, he hoped would cure her. The wife, however, died in spite of the powerful medicine, and the husband, who was led to hope for the recovery of the wife, labelled the physician on the tomb of the patient. He hung the prescription upon the cross "as the medicine she died of." This enraged the doctor, and he flew into Court suing the widower for defamation. Whatever the result of the suit, the lesson taught by the sorrowing husband cannot be lost. It is a warning to all against raising false hopes for purposes of trade—to put money in ones' purse. At the same time, the doctor acted humanly when he gave hopes of recovery. That kept up the husband's hopes and prevented his seeking another doctor. He would have been miserable and have cursed the doctor, if he had been told that there was no hope of recovery. That is the weakness of human nature, and they are truly great who are above it. But how few are they? Yet it is this weakness that perpetuates the universal fraud.

A LADY at Pau has left, at her death, a hundred thousand francs for any person of whatever nationality who, in ten years, shall discover the means of communicating with a star or planet and receive a reply from the same. The testator particularly names Mars. She herself had devoted all her life to the attempt. It were interesting to know how far she preserved to the last "unfractured integrity of limbs."

At the banquet given by the Queen-Empress to the Emperor, the guests dined off golden thalis. The gold plate used on the occasion was worth nearly four crores of Rupees (£30,00,000). That is like Majesty of England and India and the owner of the Kohinoor.

THE Police in India are famous for their discreet valour—their remarkable success in avoiding danger in a service wherein much difficult work is often not only thrown upon, but expected of, them. In other countries, such avoidance is not so easy. In Europe, America and Australasia, it is a profession of hard enterprize. In certain districts and localities, poor Bobby acts with his life in his hand. What sort of men and manners the Police have to meet in the West, may be imagined from the following glimpse of life in Kentucky:—

"An extraordinary attempt was made yesterday (July 17) by a gang of disreputable characters who frequent Gun springs, a low drinking and gambling resort just outside this city, to effect the wholesale assassination of the members of the Middlesboro' police force, and a stirring encounter between the officers of the law and the desperadoes took place. A plot seems to have been deliberately concocted to entrap the police into an ambush and murder them. A gang of about 15 men were stationed along the Louisville Nashville railroad. They were all armed with Winchester rifles, and when the police appeared two of the ruffians opened fire upon them. Chief Constable Maples, with a posse of constables, set out in pursuit of these men, who were named Gills Johnson and Frank Rossmus. They had not proceeded far before they found themselves in the middle of the ambush which had been prepared for them, and an exciting skirmish ensued. Over 100 shots were exchanged. Special officer Dorsey Williams was shot through both thighs, and Patrolman Todeker was shot in the leg. The police were worsted in the encounter, and were forced to retire. They returned to this city, and a fresh expedition against the desperadoes was organised without loss of time. About a hundred citizens, armed with rifles, set out in pursuit, and, after scouring the country in all directions, a party of them suddenly came upon Johnson and Rossmus at a sharp bend of the road. Both men instantly took aim with their Winchester rifles and fired. The pursuers fired back, and after About seventy shots had been discharged, the ruffians took to the bush. Rossimus was caught a few minutes later, and seeing that his comrades had been captured, Johnson surrendered himself, and both men were lodged in jail. The affair created great popular indignation, and a party of citizens resolved to take the law into their own hands. At an early hour in the morning a large body of men, disguised with masks, entered the jailer's sleeping apartment, and placing pistols to his head demanded the keys of the prison. These were given up by their terrified custodian. The crowd then made their way to the cell in which Rossimus was confined, opened it, and took the prisoner out. They led him to a bridge hard by, and there shot him, fairly riddling his body with bullets. A rope was then fastened round the dead man's neck, and the corpse was swung over the side of the bridge, where it remained until 7 o'clock, when it was cut down."

WE do not intend to notice—at this stage, at all events—the cruel, and, in some cases, we are afraid, wilful, misrepresentation with which our notices of the two eminent Bengalis who have lately passed away have been received. For giving proper direction to our countrymen and moderating the high fever of blind lip-appreciation now raging, we prefer to prescribe in the language of our soberer contemporaries. The following discriminate passage is from the contribution of "A Bengali Journalist," to the columns of the Indian Spectator of Bombay:—

"Hero worship is a good thing no doubt, but it is difficult for many not to see the faults of a hero. Our late lamented heroes, Rajendra-lala and Vidyasagar, have, I am glad to see, many worshippers among us, but with the inevitable weakness of an idolatrous people they refuse to see the shortcomings of the objects of their love and veneration. That they abstain from shewing the weaknesses of the great departed may have some justification, but when some of them speak approvingly of these weaknesses they betray that they are without that balance of mind which may, at any moment, drive a hero-worshipper down to the level of idolatry. The most devout hero-worshipper must have the calmness to realise that the greatest of our heroes must have a dark side of their character, and that the bright side is, in fact, rendered the brighter when represented in juxtaposition with its counterpart of darkness, however deep it may be, so that they may know that the world must yet wait long for a perfect man to appear."

There are in that paragraph both conscience and judgment—qualities which are becoming rarer every day in our journalism.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

At the Mansion House, Lord Salisbury, alluding to the aspect of foreign affairs, said that he "never knew a period when there was less foreign difficulty or trouble to ripple the tranquil surface of the time." While making that statement, he felt that the stereotyped assurance of peace—the byword of Kings and ministers—was not sufficient, and to emphasise that he meant only peace, he immediately said: "It is, perhaps, a dangerous observation to make, for that was precisely the observation that I believe Lord Hammond made to Lord Granville a few days before the Franco-German War. Without attending to that ominous reflection, I will repeat that I never knew European politics so tranquil as they are now." Further on, he says: "Do not pay too much attention to the talk that you may have heard of alliances and treaties for us. We have a simple rule. Our allies are all those who wish to maintain territorial distribution as it is without risking any frightful dangers or the terrible arbitrament of war. Our allies are all those who desire peace and good-will. During the years we have been in office, to maintain that has been our principal object, and the retrospect that so far we have been successful in maintaining it will not be among the least satisfactory which will attend our ministerial experience."

THE Congress of Hygiene and Demography closed on the 17th. The leading delegates had a reception by the Queen at Osborne on the 14th. The Native delegates and Native Princes were specially thanked by Mr. Douglas Galton for their support. The question of hygiene in India was discussed on the 13th at a special meeting under the presidency of Sir M. Grant Duff. He urged that it was essential for Native feeling to be in unison with the European in improving sanitation. Sir William Moore presented a hopeful sketch of sanitary progress in India, specially referring to the spread of vaccination. Surgeon Major Hendley deprecated elaborate Western systems as irritating to Native sentiment. Mr. Holt Hallet, at the demographic section, drew a dark picture of Indian factory operatives, which the Native delegates repudiated. The Special Meeting of the Congress resolved upon the formation of a tropical section at future Congresses for fuller discussion of sanitation and disease in tropical countries.

THE long expected French Squadron, passing Dover on the 18th, arrived in the Solent on the 19th, and received a hearty welcome. The English welcome was not less enthusiastic than that to the German Emperor who had preceded the fleet. The Queen herself cordially received the Admiral and officers at Osborne on the 20th, and there was the same evening at the same palace a grand banquet in honor of the visitors. The Admiral had his seat on the left and M. Waddington on the right of Her Majesty. The officers will be specially honored by admittance to parts of the Arsenal and Dockyard from which foreigners are usually excluded. The French press are delighted with the English reception of the French fleet. They at once jump to the delightful conclusion that England is not partial to Germany—God help them!

A TERRIBLE cyclone passed over Martinique. No less than 12 vessels, chiefly French-owned, foundered. Every house in the town of St. Pierre, the commercial capital of the island, was wrecked. Sixty persons are known to have perished—a large proportion.

THE curtain has dropped on Manipur. Maharaja Kula Chandra and the Senapati Angao Sena are on their way to the Andamans. Their departure from Manipur was as secret as the hanging of Senapati Tikendrajit and the Tongal General was open. While all possible publicity was given to the execution of the latter, the deportation of the former was most secretly planned and carried out. At 11 O'clock on the night of Wednesday the 19th August, the Maharaja, the Senapati and the man who led the attack on the Residency were taken out of prison and handed over to a party of the 2nd Gorkhas, 200 rifles under Major Newell, and marched off at midnight to Seingmai, which they reached the next day, and then, after a short rest, were taken to Kaitemabi, the second camp from Manipur on the Kohima road. The Maharaja was allowed a pony to ride, one sepoy leading the animal and two more marching by the side. The Senapati and the leader of the attack were joined together by hand-cuffs. There was not a single Manipuri to witness the exodus of the princes. The moon shone bright and full.

'The silent moon, the silent moon
Careering now through cloudless sky!
Ah! who can tell what varied scenes
Have passed beneath her placid eye
Since first to light this wayward earth
She walked in tranquil beauty forth.

CIVILIZATION as it breeds new diseases raises unheard of crimes or rather methods thereof. The last mail brings news of the narrow escape of some of the highest in France,—the Home Minister, the Colonial Under-Secretary, and the Director of the Colonial Sanitary Service, with their respective families, from a horrible death by the most dastardly assassination. On the 23rd July, these officers—M. Constans, M. Etienne, and Dr. Treille—received by post a packet each. The last two—the Under-Secretary for the Colonies and the Director of the Colonial Sanitary Service—did not care to open theirs. Only Mr. Constans, the Minister of the Interior's packet was opened. As the direction on the parcel was indistinct, so on opening the packet it was found to contain a book with a soiled cover. Luckily, the book was not opened by inquisitive Eve. And thus was the family and house of Adam saved. Suspicion being excited, parcel and all were sent to the Town Laboratory, where it was discovered that the book had had a quantity of letter-press in the middle removed and a sardine tin introduced in the place containing the explosive, much used in percussion caps, called fulminate of mercury, together with shot. The thing was so arranged that the very opening of the volume would have been followed by a tremendous explosion, destroying the whole house and all its inmates. It is a great pity that the source of this bloodthirsty trick has not been traced. Assassination in general is base enough, but here it is of the basest, most cowardly, as not incurring the slightest risk. There is no safety to civilization unless this sort of crime be made difficult and assured of punishment.

ON the 27th July, the conduct of Mr. Atkinson, M.P., for Boston, who had been labouring under the imputation of having frivolously challenged a division on Friday the 24th July, was brought before the House by the Speaker who, after relating the circumstances, complained of the member's rudeness to him. Mr. Atkinson had sent letters questioning the truth of the minutes of the House, protesting against the persecution with which he was treated while his motion respecting the Speaker's discourtesy was pending, and ending with a threat to appeal to the Press unless he received a satisfactory answer by a given time. For himself, the Speaker could not go on enduring the insults which he had been treated to during the whole of the previous week. He had done his best to abate the scandal by seeking the good offices of the gentleman's friends, but to no purpose. He had no other resource left than to put the matter in the hands of the House. Mr. Atkinson, as before, complained of the conduct of the officials of the House. If he had been rude to the Speaker, that was without intention, and he apologised for it. But he would not be browbeaten, as he was ready to go with his grievance to his constituents for re-election. He asked for a Committee of Inquiry. On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, seconded by Sir W. Harcourt, Mr. Atkinson was suspended for the rest of the session and banished from the precincts of the House. The condemned member at once left, leaving his friends to get him out of his hole as best they could. They knew their business. The usual explanations and apologies by third parties were offered for the erring brother who would not himself moderate his uncompromising tone of incrimination. The benevolent suggestion that the gentleman was labouring under a fit of temporary insanity was accepted. A plea which excuses suicide and murder, may well suffice for pardoning insolence and boisterousness in the national assembly of one of the members. The Speaker relented towards the week's madman, and at last the motion was reduced to one of suspension for a week, it being decided that the perturbed spirit of politics wanted rest for that period. Thus it was adopted.

Some of the explanations were noteworthy. Mr. Halley Stewart, in support of the recommendation to merciful treatment on the ground that Mr. Atkinson's conduct was an exceptional departure, said that Mr. Atkinson was a wild man and habitually rude to his colleagues and associates. In fine, it was all an Irish business. John Bull must have been amused at the exhibition of Paddy's bull.

THERE is panic in Madras on account of cholera. Several cases have occurred in Black Town. The Regimental Lines at Washermanpetta are not free. Several coolies have deserted the Emigration Depot at Causemode. In four days, from Thursday to Sunday the 16th August, there were 14 deaths among prisoners in the Penitentiary. The Criminal Sessions of the High Court was postponed from Friday the 14th to Monday the 17th, and, on Saturday the 15th, the court buildings were thoroughly cleaned and washed out and fumigated with sulphur and tar to keep out the invasion of the dread disease.

IN Madras, they have requisitioned the Sheriff for a public meeting to protest against the Bill to extend the jurisdiction of the local Court of Small Causes, introduced in the Supreme Legislative Council and referred to Select Committee.

WE read in the Madras Standard, in the News letter dated Madura, August 12, that in the great Sivaganga Zemindary, the relations between the lessees and the rayyets are strained. The former want, by means of new pattabs, to curtail the existing rights of the tenantry—the latter resist. The result is the institution of suits, prosecutions and other proceedings against the rayyets. The rayyets too have combined to meet them. Negotiations for compromise have been opened.

THEY talk of the establishment, in the Rooms of the British Indian Association, of a native Press Association under the presidency of the Secretary of the B. I. A., Sarvadhicari Bahadur. Such a society was founded at Delhi during the Imperial Assemblage. Is the new society to supersede the old organization of native editors? Life is proverbially short, but the life of these and similar associations which start up every day with every passing breath of baffled patriotism or ambitious whim, is the shortest on record. They are born to be buried—betimes. The birth is grandiloquently announced in the papers, and—you hear no more of them. The new Association may not justify its existence, but it may justify a new law.

PUNDITA Ramabai, Superintendent of the Sharada Sadan, Poona, has withdrawn her charge of defamation against Mr. Shunkar Vishwanath Kelker, editor and printer of the local vernacular newspaper, Poona Waibhav, on the following apology tendered by the editor:—

"Pundita Ramabai.—In writing the article complained by you as defamatory I assure you that I had no intention of hurting your feelings and injuring your reputation. I find, however, that I have unintentionally done wrong in using those expressions, for which I admit there was no justification, and for which I express my sincere regret. I further promise not to offend in like manner again. I agree to publish this letter in the next issue of my paper.—I am yours sincerely, S. V. Kelkar."

The Magistrate, Mr. Plunkett, was disposed to take the case up under section 504 of the Indian Penal Code, the section of intentional insult with intent to provoke a breach of the peace, the punishment for which is the same as under the defamation sections, except that imprisonment under section 504 may be of either description. Mr. Sydenham Smith, on behalf of the Pundita, contended that it was a case of pure and gross defamation. The accused had used the most abominable language towards a lady of respectable and high character, intentionally to hurt her feelings and injure her reputation, and it was a direct and deliberate attack upon her reputation. Nor was it the 1st, the 2nd, the 3rd, the 4th, or even the 10th occasion that the accused had used objectionable language towards her. Mr. Bal Gangadhar Tilak, for the defence, was not prepared to admit either annoyance or defamation until the complainant was examined and cross-examined. This statement, Mr. Smith contended, was itself an insult to the Pundita. The Magistrate was still of opinion that section 504 applied and suggested a compromise, which was agreed upon after repeated conferences. At Poona, they are not evidently carried away by mere words.

DURING the late visit, the Emperor astonished the natives by his English—so different from the jargon in that direction of other princely visitors. It is not only unexceptionable for grammar and sound idiom but, what is most remarkable of all, accurate in pronunciation and, above all, native in accent. Wonder upon wonder, it is now added that the Kaiser's written English is as good as his spoken. The explanation has since been offered. English is both his and his mother's mother-tongue. His mother, the Empress Frederick, herself an English lady, a daughter of the reigning house, at the time she was Crown Princess, made it a rule to converse with her son every day for however short a time in English. For sometime, too, he had an English tutor. These little facts scarcely account for the phenomenon.

THE literature of Light Science has sustained a distinct loss in the death of the Rev. J. G. Wood. Who has not heard of Single-speech Hamilton? Mr. Wood was virtually a single-book author, having exhausted himself as it were in the publication which drew him out of obscurity. But herein he has been preceded by many greater than he. Cervantes, Rabelais, and Butler among gay writers and Buckle among the grave, are each famous on the strength of one performance. Like theirs, Mr. Wood's single performance was very good of its kind. His Homes without Hands did more to popularise the study of Natural History than any other work in the language.

Mr. Alexander Young relates the following anecdote:—

"I recall some informal talks which the deceased naturalist gave at the St. Botolph Club, as throwing light on the uses of rather unpopular creatures, such as the cockroach and the moth. The sketches which he made, in different coloured chalks, of the interior economy of the former insect gave me a new idea of its adaptation to its mission as a scavenger, and a story which he told of its bibulous propensities clearly indicated a link between cockroaches and men. Mr. Wood was called upon by his neighbour Mr. Sims Reeves to throw light upon the mysterious disappearance of the champagne from the bottles in cellar, which he found nearly empty, though the corks had apparently not been tampered with. The observant naturalist declared that the wine had been extracted by cockroaches, who had inserted their feelers at the side of the corks. On setting a watch in the wine-cellar, Mr. Wood's solution of the mystery was confirmed. Some cockroaches were caught in the suction act; others were seen crawling away in a fuddled condition; and others were lying about in a state of intoxication."

One can scarcely help feeling a respect for these repulsive representatives of the grovelling feathery tribe. Their taste is certainly superior to that of many members of humanity. From our early days we were acquainted with bovine bacchanals, grave philosophers who went their way with light hearts if heavy steps, or simply lounged away in blissful unconcern. Before the concentration of the manufacture of rum at a single state distillery at or near the capital, there used to be colonies of these honest toppers around each private distillery, sustaining their lives in patience waiting for the daily washing of the manufactory for their shares of Lush. That monkeys should take kindly to all forms of stimulation, is not to be wondered at, seeing that the monkey is nothing but a caricature of man. This is the first time we hear of the inebriation so far down in Nature. Ruinart is scarcely honored by the patronage of flies and insects.

UNPAID or insufficiently paid letters or packets are a double nuisance. Not only you have to pay for them but at double the prepaid rate or the deficiency. There is no extra liability on an unpaid parcel. The cost for its carriage is the same whether paid in advance or on delivery. Its weight regulates the postage, not the time of payment. If any extra precautions are taken with regard to unpaid or insufficiently paid letters or packets, there is also the risk of their late delivery. The Post Office itself advises prepayment of correspondence intended for delivery from a Sub or Branch office, which receives unpaid or insufficiently paid correspondence only through its Head Office, even though the route may be circuitous. With the present development of the Post Office of India such a distinction between a fully paid and an unpaid or insufficiently paid letter or packet is an anomaly. There is an advantage to the public in continuing the two systems, but the inconvenience of a letter for which you have to pay is immediate and may defeat the object for which the "unpaid" or "insufficient" system is maintained. There is no delivery without payment. Non-payment is visited not only with the recovery of the amount due as fine but the receiver of the letter may be permanently punished with non-delivery of all subsequent articles to his address, they not being on Her Majesty's Service. There is an impression that bearing letters are sure of their destination specially in the remote mofussil. We fear that is a mistake. Paid or unpaid or insufficiently paid, a letter must be carried, and at the present day it is an injustice to the great department to suppose that a letter which will bring in an additional income is attended to to the neglect of the one which has been fully paid for already. As regards carriage or delivery, one letter is as much the subject of care as the other. The negligence of the post peon is equally punishable in either case. Such is the present efficiency of the Post Office, that it is free to grant certificates of posting and postal acknowledgments. It bespeaks confidence and safe delivery. The extra postage for such purposes is not meant for extra care but extra labor.

IN our issue of August 1, we noticed the project of a Government Memorial over the remains of the massacred officers in the Residency compound at Manipur, characterising it as useless expenditure and giving a pretty plain hint that, in course of time, the British might be ashamed of the whole thing. Indeed, it is a queer taste that raises monuments to disgrace and disaster. We see that the matter has attracted notice in England. Our own people there particularly have taken umbrage at the project. We give in another column a powerfully written letter of indignant remonstrance published in the Star of the 29th ultimo. That letter although confined to the immediate topic, has far wider bearings. Its tone of bitter sadness will, we are afraid, repel British readers, but the wise will stay to listen and profit. The sincerity of the writer is beyond question.

THE Native Press has by no means the monopoly of misrepresentation. Even the most respectable European papers are not above dealing in reckless assertion. The Civil and Military Gazette has just made the Maharaja of Durbhanga the victim of an unfounded statement. That paper announces that His Highness goes to the Continent next year. There is not the slightest foundation for the announcement. His Highness has never contemplated any such enterprise. Our contemporary scarcely realises the gravity of its statement. It has laid itself liable to heavy damages.

LORD Esmé Gordon had had repeated notice of where he was riding himself to, but he would not mind. He has now fairly outrun the constable. He had been living upon his rank. He was a Kulin Brahman, of the English species, that is. Besides the £1,200 a year he enjoys under his marriage settlement, he got from poor Brown the father-in-law £800 a year. Poor Brown indeed! Over and above this income of £2,000 a year, he paid for the glory reflected on him by an aristocratic son-in-law, during the thirteen years of the connection, no less than £24,664 to or for Lord Esmé Gordon. For all that, the latter has been reduced to liquidation. Nay, truth to say, for that very reason, he has been hurried down the Avenue of Fortune to bankruptcy. Such liberality as Brown's could not but have quickly demoralised the nobleman. The schedule of debts is suggestive.

"The list of creditors includes moneylenders (£4,600), tradesmen (£2,000), horsedalers (£860), bookmakers (£765), and 'friends for money borrowed' (£1,132). Among the items are: Cigars, £196; photographs, £22; jewellery, £214; wine and spirits, £106; oysters, £26; and 'stall in Peterborough Cathedral,' £125."

From the dealings with the bookmakers, let not any of our unsophisticated native readers carry off the notion that this nobleman in difficulties is a man of reading habits, addicted to literary pursuits. The schedule rather discloses a "horsy" character not averse to gambling. There is evidence of religion rather than reading. A large amount stands for stall in the neighbouring cathedral. Assuming that Lord Esmé Gordon himself regularly attended church, the question still remains whether he went for the service or the music there. A truly religious man would scarcely leave such a debt to, or at, the church.

A PARAGRAPH is going round to the effect that a recently deceased member of the New York bar,

"Roscoe Conkling, abandoning politics for the bar, paid off all his debts amounting to £30,000, in a twelvemonth, and succeeded in establishing himself in such extensive and lucrative practice that at the time of his death his annual income approximated £40,000. Mention is also made of four eminent lawyers, Robert Sewell, Henry Clinton, John Parsons and William Cromwell, each of whom received as fabulously high a fee as twenty-five, thirty, fifty and sixty thousand pounds respectively in four separate cases in which they were separately engaged."

We do not know how far the above account is free from the element of Transatlantic "talk talk." It seems probable enough. Without boasting the possession of springs of oil and mountains of silver, India plays her leading lawyers handsomely, not to say richly.

IN the afternoon of Monday, the 17th August, Lady Lansdowne opened the Simla Fine Arts Exhibition. The inaugural address was delivered by General Brackenbury. There were present, among others, Sir Frederick Roberts and Sir James Lyall. The military member concluded his address with the following graceful eulogy on Lord and Lady Lansdowne:—

"When I undertook to represent the Committee on this occasion, it was hoped that his Excellency the Viceroy would be present, and that the speech would be his, not mine, and that he would instruct and amuse us with some of those remarks, pregnant with food for thought, and lit by flashes of humour, that have characterised his previous addresses. For all our sakes, his Excellency's absence is to be greatly regretted; but we must all regret it the less because we know that he is enjoying a brief rest and change after an illness, for his recovery from which we heartily thank God, and after a time of special anxiety in public affairs; and because we trust that this rest will give him renewed vigour to carry on the Government with that firmness, that fearlessness, and that independence of character of which in these days India has so great need. We regret his absence the less also, because it is the cause of your Excellency's consenting to open this Exhibition, and thus casting upon our opening ceremony, not only that bright light which shines from your exalted position, but also that softer and more chastened light which beams from your sweet and gracious womanhood."

The two facts in the Exhibition which struck the speaker were that the best work was the work of soldiers and that there was so little by the natives of India, and thus he went on to moralize:—

"Coupling these two facts, I am tempted to quote the lecture given by Ruskin to which I just now alluded (Crown of Wild Olive). No great art, says Ruskin, ever yet rose on earth but it was among a nation of soldiers; there is no art among a shepherd people, if it remains at peace; there is no art among an agricultural people, if it remains at peace. Commerce is barely consistent with fine art, but cannot produce it. Manufacture is not only unable to produce it, but invariably destroys whatever seeds of it exist. There is no great art possible to a nation but that which is based on battle. If this, which the master says, be true, does it not account for the artistic talent of our soldiers? Does it not account for what I fear is the case, the decadence of fine arts in India? In proportion as we have brought the people from their former warlike habits to habits of peaceful industry, has not their artistic power decayed? Can they now produce such buildings as we see at Delhi, Agra, and in Rajputana? Are their textile fabrics, their gold and silver work, or even their carving, such as they were in the days of internecine war?"

Nothing like leather, of course!

STARTLING as the Homœopathic theory of medicine is, the founder of Homœopathy himself showed how glimpses of the truth had struck great minds before him. The father of medicine in the West, Hippocrates, in the very act of founding the contrary system which to this day retains its sovereign influence on medical thought and practice, admitted, however reluctantly, the truth of the principle of similia similibus curantur. The prior Hippocrates and Galens of the East in India did the same thing when they declared that poison is the cure for poison. Still more remarkable is the unconscious support given by the higher universal literature. The Poet and the Prophet are twin recipients of the same spirit of inspiration. All the noblest ideas and grandest discoveries of the latest and highest Civilization were distinctly adumbrated in previous song or saga. The discovery of America and the triumphs of the Telegraph were foretold by the Muses. So of the Art of Healing. Shakespeare, the encyclopedist of human thought and aspiration, distances in this as in every other matter all the great masters. Some years back we showed how Hahnemann's doctrine of similars had been clearly anticipated by the English playwright who is the Poet of all times and countries. Great wits jump together, and there is no ground for surprise that the same claim should be preferred in behalf of another English Poet of the first rank. The difference is that Milton speaks in prose whereas his sweetest Shakespeare, Fancy's child, delivers his view in his fine dramatic verse. The Poet's own preface or Introduction to Samson Agonistes, entitled "Of that sort of Dramatic Poem which is called Tragedy," thus begins:—

"Tragedy, as it was anciently composed, hath been ever held the gravest, moralest, and most profitable of all other poems: therefore said by Aristotle to be of power by raising pity and fear, or terror, to purge the mind of those and such like passions; that is, to temper and reduce them to just measure with a kind of delight, stirred up by reading or seeing those passions well imitated. Nor is Nature wanting in her own effects to make good his assertion; for so in phisic things of melancholy hue and quality are used against melancholy, sour against sour, salt to remove salt humours."

The Statesman of August 18 writes:—

"The Amrita Bazar Patrika, in its yesterday's issue, recalls an incident connected with the management of the Friend of India during the early days of the Mutiny, for the purpose of strengthening its contention that the Government ought have warned the Bangabasi before directing the institution of criminal proceedings against that journal. Our contemporary, however, has stated but a part of the facts. At the time of the Mutiny, and until long afterwards, the Friend of India was the property of the late Mr. J. C. Marshman, and was published in Serampore. On the first outbreak of the Mutiny, the Friend published an article, entitled 'The Centenary of Plassey,' which elicited the letter from the then Home Secretary, published by our native contemporary. This letter was commented on in severe terms in the Friend of India, in an article headed 'A First Warning;' and this led to a second threat from the Government, which in turn was as freely criticised, in an article entitled 'A Second Warning.' The license of the Friend was about to be withdrawn when Mr. Marshman, who had but just returned from Europe, interposed and, by removing Mr. Meade, the editor, from his office, succeeded in saving the paper from suppression. It will thus appear that it was not one but practically three warnings that were administered to that journal, shewing clearly the leniency with which Lord Canning's administration treated the press, even at a time of exceptional political danger. Had the Home Office to-day been aware of this precedent, it is possible that the present prosecution might not have been instituted."

They are all wrong. And it is singular that the Friend of India, as the Statesman daily professes to be, does not know its own! At the time of the Mutiny, Mr. Townsend rather than Mr. Marshman was the chief proprietor. The article "The Centenary of Plassey" did not appear "on the first outbreak of the Mutiny," but at its height, on the 25th June 1857. Before that it would have been an anachronism. The article in which Secretary Beadon's letter was criticised was headed, naturally enough, "The First Warning;" (instead of "A First Warning,") and published on the 2nd July. The next threat, however, was not "as freely criticised," nor was the article entitled "A Second Warning." The matter had by that time become serious and the editor contented himself with the heading "Under the Act." Mr. Marshman never returned during the Mutiny or since and did not remove Mr. Meade (not Meade.) We may go into the history of the matter some other day.

THE TRIAL OF THE MANIPUR PRINCES.

It is time to wind up Manipur affairs. So far at any rate as the unfortunate mission of Mr. Quinton and its consequences are concerned, the book is near its close. Only the final step remains to be taken. Last week, we announced the confirmation by the Government of India of the sentence of death passed by the Special Court on the Jubraj or "Senapati" Tikendrajit and the Tongal General and their public execution at Manipur. With respect to the reigning Maharaja Kula Chandra, usually called the Regent, and the Prince Angao Sena, both convicted by the Special Tribunal, of waging war against the Queen and sentenced to capital punishment, the Governor-General in Council, while upholding the justice of the Court, had, in consideration of their feebleness of character which rendered them tools in the hands of the more powerful Jubraj, spared their lives, and they are already on the march to their island-home for the rest of their lives. This commutation is the only effect of Mr. Manomohan Ghose's elaborate appeal in behalf of the prisoners, though even in this particular the Government decision appears to have been arrived at independently. In these days, it is not usual, either in the East or the West, to execute capital punishment on political offenders. There are exceptions to all rules, and Manipur is an exceptional business. Still the Government of India have shown no exceptional blood-thirstiness on this occasion. On the contrary, there is every disposition to avoid unnecessary harshness.

Mr. Ghose has no reason either for shame or sorrow. He did his best, and if he failed he failed in the impossible. It can be no reproach to any one that he does not perform miracles. The odds were tremendously against him. He had to put a good face on a bad business. He had a vile case, the vileness whereof was on the face of it—a plain matter of public notoriety. The advocate's only chance lay in the direction of technicality and refinement. This he utilised to the best of his power. But it was a desperate game. It was fortunate for the prisoners that their fate did not lie in the hands of the twelve honest men of average intelligence provided for the safety of the subject by the time-honoured British Constitution. In that case, they would scarcely have received any trial at all. But though the members of the Government of India are above any unworthy passions, they are also above cajoling or mystifying by able criminal lawyers. An experienced defender of the faithless, the malignant and the murderous—the saviour of the vile and reprobate of sorts. Mr. Ghose knew perfectly well that it would never do, and do it did not. He has experienced no disappointment and, we take it, he feels no regret. We go even further and assume that he is satisfied with the event. He is a citizen and subject and, above all, a man, before he is one of the Honourable Society of Lincoln's Inn, and an advocate of the High Court of Bengal. His professional engagement thoroughly discharged, his allegiance to the Manipur Dynasty is over, and he is free to indulge the satisfaction that as precious a batch of treacherous and remorseless savages as ever disguised themselves in silk and lace and scarlet, have received their respective dues.

All this, of course, on the supposition that the Manipur Princes have been fairly tried and justly convicted and sentenced. There is not much doubt in the matter. What much of it exists, is, for the most part, of character far too recondite and transcendental for the occasion. The most serious objection was to the tribunal. But is not that objection sentimental, if not technical? We ourselves have been unhappy at the spectacle; we have repeatedly railed at the court of the avenging invaders. And yet when in our calmer moments we ask ourselves the practical question Were the Princes really prejudged in their defence by the court? our heart does not give an affirmative answer. The Government might, no doubt, have kept up appearances better; perhaps it shrunk from the expense; but it was impossible to avoid prejudice or misrepresentation altogether. No possible British Court would have been free from blame or above suspicion. It is easy to complain of the cynical contempt for appearances and feelings manifest in the constitution and personnel of the Special Court. No doubt, for the credit of England and the good of the Empire, this criticism ought to have been provided against. And it would assuredly have been, if such a thing were at all possible. But there was no way out of it, we fear. Strictly speaking, there were no eligible judges. Every Briton might be challenged on the ground of prejudice, for the whole nation was inflamed against the Manipuris. It was a situation in which the prisoners must depend upon the generosity of the Government and upon such measure of impartiality as officials might command. And now at the end of it all, we are bound to say that there has been no prejudice. The Court conducted itself in a manner to disarm all suspicion. Whatever in their disappointment the friends of the prisoners may say, it preserved an impartial bearing and was fair and courteous to the defence. The weak point in the trial was the provision for the defence. Yet the prisoners had given them the benefit of the best assistance, however unprofessional, available in the country. The secret of it all is, we suspect, that the Government went on the cheap. To have granted the prisoners a barrister or a clever pleader without securing vakils and barristers for the prosecution, were madness. To have a bar there without a court to match, were folly indeed. To start up in the heart of Manipur the whole machinery of British judicature—Judges, barristers, attorneys, prothonotary, sheriff, messengers, and the rest—was out of the question. The expense was forbidding. It was simply impossible, within a reasonable time, to transport the plant to that inaccessible Asiatic Switzerland. Considering the poverty and rudeness of the country, which has scarcely a revenue, the prisoners got as magnificent a judicial treatment as they had a right to expect. And after reading the two judgments of the Special Court, we are convinced that they were not prejudiced. The judgment of the Court in the case of the Maharaja and that in the case of the Jubraj, are highly creditable performances. Without periphrasis or pretension of any kind, they modestly recite the circumstances as disclosed in evidence and point out how they connect the particular prisoner with the crime laid at his door, brushing away with unanswerable reasoning the pleas put forward and suggestions thrown out in defence. The Special Court have done themselves and the Services honour. They have certainly not tarnished the name of British justice. The officers constituting the Court—Lieutenant-Colonel Maxwell, Assistant Adjutant-General, the President, and Mr A. W. Davis, Deputy Commissioner, Naga Hills, and Major R. K. Ridgeway, Commandant, 44 G. R., members—deserve the best thanks of Government and the public for having performed a difficult service in a trying situation as befits British officers and gentlemen.

SNAKE POISON AND ITS ANTIDOTE.

Dr. Mueller, of Yackandandah, Victoria, in a letter to the "Pharmaceutical Journal," puts forward nitrate of strychnine as the antidote for snake poison.

He is using a solution of this medicine in 240 parts of water mixed with a little glycerine. Twenty minims of this solution is hypodermically injected in any part of the body, but Dr. Mueller prefers the direct bitten portion or its immediate neighbourhood. On the urgency of the threatening symptoms, the injection is to be repeated, say from ten to twenty minutes. After the disappearance of the poisoning symptom, the physiological action of strychnine is shown by slight muscular spasms, and then the injection must be discontinued, unless, after a time, the snake poison reasserts itself. Out of about 100 cases treated by this method, some of them at the point of death, there has been but one failure.

"Dr." is always a recommendation—to us at any rate. Mueller is a good German surname, and long a favorite among us. But what a horrid place does the poor man hail from! To the Indian mind it cannot but prove forbidding, meaning as it does in the Indian dialects "Immediate Bastinado." Nomenclology apart, we are not disposed to congratulate ourselves upon the discovery at last of the cure for snake-bite. So many infallible remedies for all sorts of ailments have been exploded, that it behoves us to be careful in accepting a new announcement. Even in respect of snake poison, there have been not a few claimants to the possession of antidotes. Australia itself has furnished at least one claimant before. Some years ago, the world was filled with stories of Dr. Halford's successful experiment in snake poisoning at Melbourne. We procured from there a number of copies of the Doctor's pamphlet for circulation in this country, so that the benefits of the method might be made available here. There was nothing particularly novel in the Victorian recipe. Ammonia as an antidote had been suggested here before, and is still employed in the absence of anything better. The peculiarity of Dr. Halford's cure was in its mode of administration, which was injection by the hypodermic syringe. This too was tried without any great results. The advocates of Halford's remedy still cried it up. Under the circumstance, we in India could only conclude that the snakes of Australia are far less deadly than those of this country. It would now seem that they are as bad or nearly so. Evidently, Halford's ammonia has utterly failed in making any impression on the poison of Australian snakes, otherwise there was no occasion for the rise of Mueller of Yackandandah. We hope this Doctor's antidote may have a more enduring repute than his Melbourne predecessor's, though, after repeated disappointments in the past, we scarcely dare to expect for it such a destiny. The new cure is not absolutely new, any more than the old. If not strychnine—which is unknown to indigenous Hindu chemistry—at least nux vomica, of which it is the active principle, is familiar to the people of this country and has been in use from time immemorial as an antidote against snake-bite—with some success, perhaps in lighter cases, but without any effect on the perfect bites of the cobras and keraits. Of course, a dose of crude nux vomica is not the same as the exhibition of the powerful alkaloid, and the hypodermic injection of the nitrate of strychnine may produce the most desirable effects. We are therefore anxious that the new Australian recipe may not be neglected. It is well worth trying. We hope Government will draw the attention of the medicine department to the subject, with a view to follow up Dr. Mueller's experiments with similar ones in this country.

THE STATE TRIAL.

CROWN v. THE "BANGABASI."

THE State prosecution of the Bangabasi commenced on Wednesday in the Sessions Court presided over by Chief Justice Petheram. Mr. Pugh, Standing Counsel, and Messrs. Woodroffe, Evans and Dunne represented the Crown. Messrs. Jackson, N. N. Ghose, S. P. Sinha and Graham appeared for the four defendants. The accused pleaded not guilty and were allowed by the Chief Justice to take their seats behind their Counsel. The charges were under sections 124A (exciting disaffection) and 500 (defamation) of the Indian Penal Code. The Magistrate had sent up the case on the first charge only, though the application was on both. But in the Crown Office, the defamation charge was added.

Before there was a call to plead, Mr. Jackson applied for adjournment of the trial to the next sessions or for ten days, to enable him to prepare his defence. The principal ground was that the translations of the articles on which the prosecution rested and copies of charges were supplied to him too late. Besides, he had not sufficient notice that the prosecution intended to put in certain articles which were not filed in the Police Court. The application was opposed on the ground that Baboo Kalnath Mitter, attorney for the defence, had sworn an affidavit which avers that the prosecution is not prepared to go on. The Chief Justice held that there was no reasonable fear that, unless time was granted, there would not be a fair trial, and since it was open to Mr. Jackson to use arguments to shew that the new articles did not bear the meaning sought to be put upon them, he saw no reason for adjournment.

This application falling through, the leading counsel for the defence took exception, under section 273 of the Criminal Procedure Code, to the 2nd or defamation count of the indictment. It was not open to Government, argued he, as the Penal Code is framed, to seek protection against defamation under that law. The definition of the word "person" in the Code does not include Government. Sir Comer Petheram thought Mr. Jackson right, and quashed the charge for defamation. Then the trial commenced. Mr. Pugh opened the case for the prosecution in a pretty long address. He of course spoke of the liberty of the press. We quote his allusion as disclosing the views of Government:—

"Now a great deal, he had no doubt, would be said in the course of this case with reference to the liberty of the press, and it would be urged that this prosecution was an attempt to infringe the liberty of the press. The liberty of the press in this country was an undoubted fact, and with the exception of three years it had never been affected since the year 1835. It was unnecessary to go into the question of what the position of the press in this country prior to 1835 was, but in that year, under Lord Metcalfe's Government, the press in this country became a free press, and, with the exception of the three years from 1878 to 1881, he was right in saying that it continued to be a free press. He hoped that this would still continue. But whether it was continued, or whether it was not, he ventured to say that it would depend upon whether the Government would get juries to do their duty with reference to this matter so as to curb the license of the press without interfering with its liberty. It was only upon the jury that the Government of the country depended for protection against defamation, and the maintenance of a free press in India appeared to depend upon juries doing their duty. Now if any one speaking for the liberty of the press claimed, in the name of the liberty of the press, the right to libel the Government, all he could say was that this was a novel and entirely new doctrine in regard to the liberty of the press. He did not think that it could be said that the press was not perfectly free in this country; but supposing a paper had, as in this instance, gone beyond that liberty, and had brought itself within the sections of the Penal Code, then he asserted that not only was it in the interest of the Government, but also in the interest of the press itself, that a jury should bring in a verdict of guilty against that paper.

With reference to the Government itself, it was necessary that the Government should have protection. It was impossible, he put it, for any Government in any country, supposing that the press was at liberty to hold it up from time to time to public execration, to point to that Government as being destroyers and persecutors of the people, to point to that Government as having a settled design to destroy the religion of the people, to point to it as a Government which was the cause of famines, cholera, and various other calamities; it was impossible, he repeated, that the Government of the country could be carried on, supposing this free press was to be allowed to give circulation to those stories, inciting the people to acts of violence, riots by repeated allegations that the religion of the people was to be destroyed! Was not all this inspiring against the Government feelings of disloyalty, feelings of loathing, feelings of hatred, and feelings of contempt—feelings which at the present time especially have found vent in riots at Calcutta, Benares, and elsewhere? Now if this was so, it was quite clear that the Government was bound to protect itself—bound not only in its own interest, but also in the interests of the country, in the interests of those whom it governed. It must not be taken that the remarks which he made with regard to the freedom of the press applied generally to the press of this country; neither did they apply to the Native press generally, because he was satisfied that the great body of the Native press had recognized the good which has resulted to them from English rule, and that they were loyal to the Government. He would repeat, and say sincerely, with regard to a large portion of the Native press, that it was conducted in a highly respectable and trustworthy manner. It discussed all measures of Government in the widest possible sense, and assigned sensible reasons when they dissented. This, he thought, was a great blessing, and it would be a very sad day, when authorities thought it necessary, owing to the foul character of some of these papers, that repressive measures should be taken. With regard to the rest of them, supposing any measures of this kind had to be taken, it would be impossible to single out any particular papers, and the measures would have to be applied to the whole of the Native press, and, he presumed, to the European Press also."

The opening address was continued the next day. The principal witnesses examined were the editor of the Anusandhan, the ex-employee of the Bangabasi, the landlord of the Bangabasi office, and the Bengali translator to Government, who had all deposed in the Police Court. The prosecution closed on Friday with a spirited address from Mr. Evans, Mr. Jackson declining to call any witness. Mr. Jackson commenced his address in reply with the sitting of the court this day. And first the leading counsel for the defence addressed the bench. Seizing the admission of the prosecution that they had not been able to trace the author of the articles, he argued that there was no case to go to the jury. The words of the section "whoever by words either spoken or intended to be read attempts to excite feelings of disaffection against the Government" referred to the actual speaker and the actual writer of the words. It was a serious charge involving the heaviest punishment, and the statute ought to be rigorously interpreted. The indictment was bad, and in England Mr. Jackson would have moved for arrest of judgment. It was the writing of the seditious libel that was the offence under section 124A, Indian Penal Code. The Chief Justice ruled otherwise. His Lordship understood Mr. Jackson as saying that you may excite feelings of disaffection as much as you please, provided you do it with other people's words. Mr. Jackson was not terrified by the aspect of the formidable-looking reductio ad absurdum. He argued and argued and cited Lord Campbell's Act and English cases. But all in vain. Then he asked the Court to reserve the point for a Full Bench. The Chief Justice declined to refer so plain a matter to the other Judges. Mr. Jackson now inquired whether Sir Comer Petheram when he came to charge the jury would lay down the law. An affirmative answer being given, Mr. Jackson argued how that could not be, and reminded the Chief of what his Lordship had himself said previously in that case. Sir Comer now made a distinction between sedition and ordinary libel. Then Mr. Jackson began his address to the jury, and kept the court engaged the whole day, giving it hot (in common parlance) to Mr. Evans. That address is expected to close on Monday, when the Chief Justice will deliver charge to the jury.

A WARNING VOICE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE STAR."

SIR,—In an inconspicuous corner the Daily News gives this morning the following cablegram from Reuter:—"The Government has notified its intention of erecting a memorial at the public expense to mark the spot where the victims of the Manipur massacre were buried." It would be a fatal mistake if this measure be carried out. It does not require weird prescience in the present case to "... look into the seeds of time, and say which grain will grow and which will not." I appeal to you most solemnly, therefore, to do what you can to stop while there is yet time the resurrection of that upas tree which, hardly a generation ago, Lord Dalhousie planted under the Jingo incubus of impartial aggrandisement, little dreaming that that same plant, so soon as he turned his back on India, would be watered with the blood of Englishmen and English children shed in the shambles of Cawnpore and a hundred different places.

A memorial at the public expense in honor of the victims of the Manipur massacre is plain enough English. But time changes the significance of words, and notions of meum and tuum become every day clearer. There is a reverse side of the shield. It is best to go behind it, to go all round it if necessary, and then to judge whether any other interpretation is possible of those seeming simple words viewed from other standpoints. That the public expense is borne by the semi-nude, half-starved Indian; that the honor proposed to be rendered is an honor to an alien who, in his treacherous attempts to do mortal injury to one of this same Indian's chiefs, caught a Tartar, and paid the penalty with his life; and that the darkie must now be made to pay for all future post-mortem glorifications; and that the real victims of the Manipur massacre, not as man but are the Royal Family of Manipur, princes, ministers, everybody from the Maharajah downwards, to kick away all of whom to outward darkness the sacred name of justice is even at the present moment being prostituted in India.

AS GOD WILL JUDGE.

It would be a "blunder, worse than crime," if too much is made of the Indian's loyalty as long as he is weak, or of his peace-loving disposition as long as quiet gives him opportunities to benefit himself and his country by a close and intimate contact with the western world, with its high standard of freedom and humanity. English education is not chloroform to lull the Indian into an eternal sleep, for his English ruler to do the eternal vampire bat; it is a galvanic battery which makes a dead frog leap. Besides, let this, above all, be kept prominently in view. You command our fear. You do not, can never, command our respect. When the political relationship of the two peoples is so very strained, what fatuity it is to tighten it further. India is the only country under the sun where there is a premium on tyranny and crime. Break one-half of the Decalogue, you are transferred from one town to another; break one-half of the remainder, you are reprimanded; break, one by one, the rest, and through the different gradations of censure, degradation, and dismissal, you find yourself at last in one of the seaside places of England in the quiet enjoyment of your pension and allowance which range from hundreds to thousands of pounds a year. The Anglo Indian's pension is sure as long as there is an ounce of gunpowder and a pound of lead in any English arsenal. It is in the "bond." But where does the money come from?

And if the Indian rayyet, the whole of whose inward and outward demand is perforce satisfied with nothing grander than a pound of rice and a yard of calico, must needs contribute towards this cheap immortality, let it not be overlooked that even mute marble has a language of its own. The French have got a statue of Strasbourg like some other cities. Underneath all the rest are the dates when they were acquired; the fatal figure, 1871, is only on Strasbourg, and under "when acquired" a blank. And does not a Frenchman feel the concentrated fire of a limitless Sahara when he looks at that short blank space underneath an ordinary stone statue. Or is the lesson confined to France and Frenchmen alone? You rule over than the French, and take good care to brush them on the wrong side. The portrait of Sir Elijah Impey, the paid hangman of Warren Hastings, adorns the noble staircase of the Calcutta High Court. The Calcutta Maidan is full of statues of English soldiers and statesmen, underneath engraven their name and fame. But what, written in invisible characters, now lies enveloped in a Sibylline shroud, only the next generation of Indians with the knife which you yourselves are supplying them will rip open the veil and read:—"To perpetuate the disgrace of a conquered nation this effigy in brass is raised. It is in honor of an Englishman who killed a few thousand Indians, a few thousand more of whom were eventually made to contribute towards immortalising the glory of the conquest and slaughter." Take the best of the lot, Lord Lawrence. Was not he the first to send a commendatory and congratulatory letter to Mr. Cook, Commissioner of the Punjab, when exactly after a century he repeated the massacre of Black-hole? Was not he the toady of Lord Dalhousie in the spoilation of the Punjab, when his elder brother would not act the dirty jackal and for which the righteous Sir Henry was kicked away to the Central Indian Agency?

It is not that we cannot appreciate the service Englishmen have rendered us. But how many? How many worthy to be recognised by marble or bronze? If to-day it is proposed to raise a statue to the Rev. Long, or to David Hare, even the poorest of us would feel pride and pleasure in contributing his cowny.

We do not blame you for recognising the merits of your own people, honor them by all means (would to God we ourselves had a little of that sovereign virtue to-day); and if Mr. Quinton must needs be immortalised, vote him a statue in Trafalgar Square, with a copy of Carlyle's "Hudson's Statue" in his hand, and written underneath, "The lineal descendant of Bob Clive in the last decade of the nineteenth century."—Yours, &c.

PUBLICATION OF LIBEL.

IN THE COURT OF APPEAL.

Before Lord Esher, M. R. Lopez, L. J., and Kay, L. J.
Pullman and another vs. Walter Hill and Company, Limited.
Application for new trial in action to recover damages for libel.
The plaintiffs John and Henry Pullman, who, in partnership with three other persons, carried on the business of leather-dresser in Greek street, Soho, under the style of "R. & I. Pullman," were, early in 1889, the owners, apart from the business of the firm, of property in the Borough Road, on which building operations were proceeding.

The defendants, a limited liability Company, carrying on the business of advertising Agents, opened negotiations with them with a view to the erection of a hoarding in front of the property for advertisement purposes, and an agreement was entered into empowering the defendants to erect a hoarding and affix advertisements thereto, upon the payment of a rent of £ 5 per month.

The defendants paid this rent to the plaintiffs for four months, until, about the end of August, they were informed that the plaintiffs had parted with their interest in the property, and a claim was made upon them on behalf of the purchasers of the property, and a builder employed by them, for the rent of the hoarding from the month of May.

It afterwards appeared that there was a bonâ fide dispute between the plaintiffs and the purchasers of the property, as to the right to the rent of the hoarding; but in the meantime the defendants claimed from the plaintiffs the return of a part of the rent paid, and, not receiving the response to which they considered themselves entitled, on the 14th of September, wrote a letter to the plaintiffs in which they said: "The builders state distinctly that you had no right to this money whatever; consequently it has been obtained from us by you under false pretences."

The letter was dictated by the defendants' managing director to the defendants' confidential shorthand- and type-writer in the ordinary course of business, by whom it was type-written. It was then press-copied by another clerk, placed in an envelope addressed to Messrs. Pullman & Co., 17 Greek street, Soho, and posted. Upon its delivery it was opened by one, and read by three, of the clerks in the service of the firm of "R. & I. Pullman."

The plaintiffs having thereupon sued the defendants for libel, the defendants denied that in these circumstances there was any publication of the letter by them, and pleaded that, if there was publication, the occasion thereof was privileged.

At the trial before Day, J., and a special jury, it was submitted at the conclusion of the plaintiffs' case that there was no evidence to go to the jury, and the learned Judge thereupon held that, as there was no evidence that the defendants had any reason to suppose that the letter would be opened by the plaintiffs' clerks, there was no publication to them; that, as the defendants were a company only capable of acting by their agents, the occasion of the publication to their own clerks was privileged; and that there was no evidence of express malice to take away such privilege. The learned Judge, therefore, directed the jury to find a verdict for the defendants, and entered judgment for them.

The plaintiffs applied for a new trial.

Luckwood, Q. C., and Oswald for the plaintiffs.—The letter containing the libel was published by the defendants when it was dictated by the manager to the short-hand writer. The King v. Paine (1). It was further published when it was handed to the copying clerk, and again when it was opened by the clerks of Messrs. R. and I. Pullman. The property in respect of which the letter was written was the private property of the plaintiffs, and had nothing to do with the business of the firm, and the agreement for the letting of the hoarding was in writing and signed by John and Henry Pullman. There was, therefore, no justification for the defendants addressing the letter to the firm, thereby assuring in the ordinary course of business its publication to the clerks. In Williamson v. Frier (2) it was held that a communication which would be privileged if made by letter becomes unprivileged if sent through the telegraph office, because it is necessarily communicated to all the clerks through whose hands it passes. In the same way this letter was necessarily communicated by the manner in which it was sent to the clerks of Messrs. R. & I. Pullman. There was no duty upon the defendants to communicate the letter either to their own or to the plaintiffs' clerks, and the clerks had no common interest with the writer of the letter in its subject-matter. The occasion of the communication was therefore not privileged—Harrison v. Bush (3) and Thompson v. Dabwood (4). Moreover, even if the occasion were privileged, the charge made in the letter was more than commensurate with the occasion, and there was evidence of express malice, which would take away the protection on the ground of privilege—Fox v. Braderick (5). He also cited Shipard v. Whitaker (6).

Murphy, Q. C., and R. M. Bray, for the defendants.—The dictation of the letter by the manager of the defendant company to the short-hand writer does not amount to publication of the letter. It is the ordinary course of business in merchants' offices to dictate letters in this manner to a clerk, who subsequently transcribes them by the aid of a typewriting machine. The letter so transcribed is then given to a clerk to press-copy. If these circumstances amount to publication, it is submitted that the occasion was privileged—Lawless v. The Anglo-Egyptian Cotton and Oil Company (7). Toogood v. Spryng (8), Jones v. Thomas (9), Davies v. Sneed (10), and Wright v. Woodgate (11).

[Lopez, L. J.]—Surely the defendants must shew, in order to establish privilege, that—first, there was a duty cast upon the defendants to communicate this letter to their clerks; and secondly, that the clerks had a corresponding interest with them in the subject-matter of the letter.]

From the cases cited it is clear that the communication of a letter to a clerk in the ordinary course of business is privileged. The letters of companies are necessarily always written by clerks. It would not, indeed, be reasonable to communicate a true, but defamatory, statement which it becomes necessary to write, to the whole staff of a company's clerks; but it has never been held that the mere copying of a letter by the copying clerk takes away the privilege which would otherwise exist—Lake v. King (12). So long as the instruments used by a company for the purpose of writing its communications are reasonable, the use of those instruments does not debar them from setting up a defence of privilege to which they are entitled.

Lockwood, Q. C., and Oswald were not called upon to reply.

Lord Esher, M. R.—In an action to recover damages for libel, the question whether the document sued upon is capable at all of being a libel is a question for the Judge; and if he decides in the affirmative, then the question whether the document is in fact a libel or not is for the jury. But these points are not at the present moment material here, because this case was withdrawn at the trial from the jury upon other grounds; and upon the new trial, to which, in our opinion, the plaintiffs are entitled, it will be quite open to the Judge to say whether the letter set out in the statement of claim is capable of being a libel, and, if it is, for the jury to find whether it is in fact a libel or not.

The first question for our decision is whether, assuming the letter to be a defamatory writing, there was a publication of it. The publication of a writing is the making it known after it is written to some person other than the person to whom it is written. If the writer straightway sends the writing to the person of whom it is written and no one else sees it, there is no publication. Or if the writer locks it up securely then, even though a thief steals it and thereby it is known to others, there is no publication of it by the writer. Is there publication if the writer shews it to a copying clerk? That is the question we have to decide. Now the writing is certainly made known in such a case to a third person. The case, therefore, falls in terms within the definition given. Why, then, is there not publication? The writer by his act puts it out of his power to say that he only made it known to the person of whom it was written, and his clerk may soon spread the contents of the writing very widely. I am of opinion, therefore, that if a man shews a defamatory writing to his clerk, there is publication.

Upon publication being proved, a further question arises. Was the communication to the clerk in this case privileged? A privileged communication is a communication made upon a privileged occasion. Was, then, the occasion on which this defamatory writing, if it be defamatory, was published, a privileged occasion? A privileged occasion is one on which it is the duty of the person making a communication to a third person, to make that communication to the third person, the third person at the same time having an interest in the subject-matter of the communication. Both these things must co-exist in order to render the occasion privileged. An ordinary instance of such an occasion occurs when any one gives a character to a servant, the occasion of such a communication being privileged because the person making the communication has a duty—a moral or social duty—being sufficient—and the person receiving it has an interest in the matter. Where, then, a defamatory writing is communicated to a type-writer, is the occasion privileged? Leaving out of consideration for a moment the fact that the defendants in this case are a company, was there any duty upon the defendant to communicate the letter to the typewriter? It cannot be suggested there was. Had the typewriter any interest in the subject-matter of the communication? That, again, is not suggested. How then could the occasion be privileged?

But does the circumstance that the defendants are a limited company make any difference? The letter was written by the manager of the company. Now the manager of such a company is appointed to do for the company all those things which the company by reason of being a company cannot do for themselves, and the company are responsible for all he does for them, within reasonable limits. In my opinion, in such a case as this, the manager must be considered to be in the same position as the principal of a firm, and if he wishes a defamatory writing to be copied, he must copy it himself; and if he copies it in a book, must keep the book in a place where it will not, in the ordinary course, be seen by others. But there is another point in this case. The letter, when written, was not addressed to the plaintiffs in their private character, but to Messrs. Pullman and Co., at the place of business of a firm of which they are partners. When the letter arrived it was opened and seen by the clerks of the firm. If it had been addressed to them in their private capacity, it might, or might not, have, been wrong for the clerks to open it; but it is at any rate common knowledge that tradesmen in a large way of business have, and must have, persons who are authorized to open letters addressed in the firm's name. By addressing and sending the letter in the way he did, the defendants' manager, in my opinion, put the letter out of his own possession and into the possession of third parties, by whom it might be, and was opened and read; and I agree with the Irish case of Fox v. Broderick (5), and think that when the letter was opened by the plaintiffs' clerk there was a publication of the letter to him by the defendants. Upon this publication no question of privilege can arise. There were therefore two publications of this letter by the defendants, neither of them upon a privileged occasion. Then, publication upon a non-privileged occasion being proved, no evidence of express malice is requisite, and, if the jury think that the letter is a libel, the plaintiffs will be entitled to succeed.

The necessity or luxury of writing letters by the aid of a type-writer cannot, in my opinion, alter the law of England, and I think the learned Judge in the Court below was misled by an erroneous idea of the requirements of modern systems of carrying on business. In my view, if a merchant or the manager of a company wishes to write libels, he must copy them himself and keep the copies in a secure place, and it would be monstrous if the character of the plaintiff could be taken away by the idle talk of clerks, and he should then be told that he has no remedy, because the system necessary for the carrying on of the business of the defendants entails the publication to their clerks of libels written by them. That is not the law of England, and I think, therefore, that there must in this case be a new trial.

Lopez, L. J.—I am of the same opinion. The publication of a libel consists in its communication to a third person. Here there was, in the first place, a communication to the typewriter, and in the second place the defendant did not address the letter to the plaintiffs in their private capacity, but in their firm's name, and they must have known that, in the ordinary course of business, letters addressed to firms in the firms' names are commonly opened by clerks. The letter in this case was so opened, and I think with the Master of the Rolls that the defendants, by sending the letter as they did, placed it out of their own control, and that there was a publication of it by them, not only to their own typewriter, but to the plaintiffs' clerks.

But then, assuming publication, the question arises whether the occasion was privileged. The question whether the occasion upon which a communication is made is privileged is for the Judge. The question does not arise until publication is proved; but when that has been done, the Judge, if the facts are undisputed, determines this question. If he decides that the occasion is privileged, there is an end of the case in favour of the defendant, unless the plaintiff can prove that there was express malice on the part of the defendant. Here the defendant voluntarily, and not by any accident or mistake, placed the letter sued upon in the hands of a typewriter. Now the rule as to privilege is that an occasion is privileged when a duty is cast upon the defendant to make a communication to another person; and furthermore, when the defendant has an interest in the subject-matter of the communication; and thirdly, when the person to whom he makes the communication has a corresponding interest. It is impossible to say in this case either that there was a duty cast upon the defendants to make the communication either to their own typewriter or to the plaintiffs' clerks, or that the typewriter or clerks had any interest in the matter. The ground, therefore, of privilege entirely fails.

It has been argued that great inconvenience will result if merchants cannot have their letters written by typewriters, and that the amount of correspondence in their offices is so vast that it is absolutely necessary for these communications to be made. I do not agree, and my answer is that if merchants or solicitors deem it to be their duty to write any defamatory matter, they must take copies of it in their own handwriting. I think that the plaintiffs are entitled to have a new trial.

Kay, L. J.—In my opinion it is quite impossible for the defendants to claim any privilege for the publication of this libel. The person who composed it dictated it to a typewriter. I cannot conceive how privilege can be claimed for such an occasion. It is true that the defendant company has no hands, and so cannot write letters for itself; but that does not, in my opinion, justify a communication of the libel by the person who wrote it for the company to a typewriter and also to a copying clerk. The learned counsel who have argued the case for the defendants were asked for authority to shew that privilege exists in such a case; but they have not succeeded in doing so, and it has never, I feel assured, been held that the occasion of such a communication is privileged.

The consequence of extending privilege to such a case would be that every merchant, solicitor, or company carrying on business by agents, would be privileged to communicate to and disseminate by those agents libels concerning any third person they pleased. In my opinion this extraordinary alteration of the law of libel, enabling persons to defame the characters of others with impunity, has not yet been brought about, and I think, therefore, that there should in this case be a new trial.

Order for new trial.

THE CAPTIVE LADIE.

By THE LATE MICHAEL MADHUSUDAN DUTT.

Reprinted from the Madras edition of 1849.

He pass'd thro' high and pillar'd halls,
And flow'r-gemm'd courts with fountain-falls,
Which echo'd to his hurried tread,
Like lonely Mansions of the Dead,
All lightless,—save, where moon-beams slept,
O'er flow'rs which blush'd and smil'd and wept,
Or, by sweet founts which rose and fell,
Sleepless,—as if some fairy-spell,
Did in their diamond-bosoms dwell ;—
He reck'd them not,—their silent gloom,
Was but the shadow of the doom,
Which soon must burst—and crush—and rend,
And with the Past's dim shadow blend,
Pride—Beauty—Glory—all that be,
Of high and sovran Majesty !
He reck'd them not,—but swiftly pass'd,
As thro' a bow'r some speed-wing'd blast,
Uncheck'd by tears and sighs the rose,
Doth shed and breathe as on he goes !—
But when within the Haram-gate,
Which gap'd—all lone and desolate,
He near'd the chambers high and fair,—
The shrines of Beauty, worshipp'd there,—
He paus'd like wild, tho' calm Despair,
Ere yet she plunges to the wave,
• Which rolls below—a hideous grave ;—
As if to hush the mournful plaint,
Regret still breath'd in accents faint !—
' O God ! and is there naught to steel,
' The timid heart which shrinks to feel,
' And lock the founts whose murmurings still,
' Unnerve each strong resolve of Will !
' But it must be ?'—The corridor,
Is cross'd,—he treads the marble-floor ;
But, ere the gentlest Echo woke,
Or softly in that chamber spoke,
Upon his wildly heaving breast,
He prest,—O Love !—how fondly prest,
Thy fairest daughter,—blessing,—blest !

" Oh ! hast thou conquer'd—have they fled,—
And is he come,—and are they dead ?
My God !—but why that hueless check,
Must Victory thus to true Love speak !—
Oh ! tell me, for thy tale must be,
Of joy since thou art come to me !
For fearful visions in my sleep,
Have made me shudder—shriek—and weep !

When wearied with long Vigils kept,
I laid me down and thought I slept :
Methought there came a warrior-maid,*
With blood-stain'd brow and sheathless blade ;
Dark was her hue, as darkest cloud,
Which comes the Moon's fair face to shroud,—
And 'round her waist a hideous zone,
Of hands with charnal lightnings shone,
And long the garland which she wore,
Of heads all bath'd in streaming gore,
How fierce the eyes by Death unseal'd,
And blasting gleams which they reveal'd !—
I shudder'd—tho' I knew 'twas she,
The awful, ruthless Deity,
On whose dread altar like a flood,
There flows for aye her victims' blood !
I shudder'd—for, methought, she came,
With eyes of bright consuming flame,—
' Daughter,'—she said,—' farewell !—I go—
' The time is come,—it must be so—
' Leave thee and thine I must to-night,'—
Then vanish'd like a flash of light !—

" I wept when, lo !—before me stood—
Onset girt with snakes of flow'r-crown'd hood,—
Tall as the loftest palm that be,
Beneath yon heav'n's blue canopy :—
His hue was pale,—and wild his eyes,
Roll'd bright like meteors of the skies,—
A fiery trident† high he bore,—
Methought, it, too, was bath'd in gore—
And from his golden crown aloft,—
There came still murmurs|| sweet and soft,
Like the low plaints of some young till,
When check'd its thoughtless, wandering will !
' Daughter,' he said, ' farewell !—I go,—
' But bless thee not,—for thine is woe !'
He pass'd— I shrank—his look, his word,
Placed like a sharp, unerring sword !—

* This is the goddess Cali.—"She (Cali) is black, with four arms, wearing two dead bodies as ear rings,—a necklace of skulls, and the hands of several slaughtered giants round her waist as a girdle," &c. British India. Vol. II. There are some inaccuracies in this description, Cali does not "wear two dead bodies as ear-rings." I have in my description omitted the circumstance of her having "four arms."

† This is the god Sheva—the third person of the Hindu-triad. The Hindus believe that the impression of a lotus adorns the hood of the Cobra de Capella on account of its having been trodden upon by the god Krishna. Sheva is always represented as under the influence of Bang—an intoxicating stuff.

‡ Like Neptune Sheva wears a trident called in Sanscrit "Trisulam."

|| The River Ganges is fabled to be on the head of Sheva whence she issues into three streams—one flowing through Heaven, and the other two through the Earth and Hell respectively.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

HERE is the closing scene, from the Gazette of India of August 22, 1891, in the Manipur Tragedy:—

"PROCLAMATION.

Whereas the State of Manipur has recently been in armed rebellion against the authority of Her Majesty the Queen, Empress of India; and whereas, during such rebellion, Her Majesty's Representative and other officers were murdered at Imphal on the 24th of March last; and whereas by a Proclamation bearing date the 19th April 1891 the authority of the Regent, Kula Chandra Singh, was declared to be at an end, and the administration of the State was assumed by the General Officer Commanding Her Majesty's forces in Manipur territory:

It is hereby notified that the Manipur State has become liable to the penalty of annexation, and is now at the disposal of the Crown:

It is further notified that Her Majesty the Queen, Empress of India, has been pleased to forego Her right to annex to Her Indian Dominions the territories of the Manipur State; and has graciously assented to the reestablishment of Native rule under such conditions as the Governor-General in Council may consider desirable, and in the person of such ruler as the Governor-General in Council may select.

Her Majesty has been moved to this act of clemency by the belief that the punishment inflicted upon the leaders of the revolt, together with the imposition upon the State of suitable conditions of regnant, will afford an adequate vindication of Her authority.

The Governor-General in Council will make known hereafter the name of the person selected to rule the State, and the conditions under which he will be invested with power.

H. M. DURAND,
Secretary to the Government of India."

That Proclamation will be hailed in Manipur and reassure all India.

THE Amir of Cabool is said to have betrothed himself to the daughter of Mir Abu Talib, Kizilbash. While the alliance endears the Amir to his Shia subjects, it introduces a fresh complication in the Afghan politics.

EXCEPTING two or three regiments in isolated stations, the Native Infantry in the Bengal Presidency have received their Martinis.

THE Indian Spectator thus rebukes our countrymen of Bengal for their way in which they are behaving on the death of the two eminent Bengalis:—

"The Bengal papers are loud in praise of Vidyasagar, and they cannot praise him too much. But may we ask if they did anything to cheer up the old man during his last years of bitter sadness? It is no secret that Vidyasagar despised his countrymen and was utterly sick of their double-facedness and hypocrisy. Diwan Bahadur Raghunath Row is in this respect like Vidyasagar. He, also, after years of toil, has become a confirmed pessimist. When he dies Madras will, no doubt, praise him and mourn his loss. But what is Madras now doing to cheer up its grand old man? It is doing what Bengal did to Vidyasagar. It knows that nothing will delight the veteran reformer so much as self-sacrifice and action. But self-sacrifice and action are as little thought of there as in Bengal. A paltry sum will, no doubt, be collected after years to raise some kind of memorial to Vidyasagar. And when Raghunath Row dies, there is no doubt a similar paltry sum will be collected for the same purpose. But does Raghunath Row care for such posthumous honours? And does the shade of the great Vidyasagar care for the subscriptions that are now being raised in Calcutta? He would have been pleased if the men now loud in his praise had subscribed to his programme of reform and helped him in carrying out his noble mission. But in his life-time they poured cold water on his burning soul, instead of utilising it to the utmost; and now, 'slowly wise and meanly just,' they are trying to make up for their past neglect by kicking up a little dust of praise. If they really revere the patriot and the sage, let them follow in his footsteps and put forth earnest efforts to purge their religion of rubbish and to restore Hindu society to its pristine health. If they have any shred of real respect for Vidyasagar, they should band themselves to advance the cause which he had so much at heart, instead of wasting no end of breath in lip-professions. The Hindus celebrate the Shradhs of their dead, and the Bengalis cannot celebrate Vidyasagar's Shradh in a better manner than by founding a social reform mission for their Presidency. But this, of course, means self-sacrifice, and therefore vain, oil and butter is all that the spirit of the deceased is likely to get; and we will be surprised if an offering of the kind indicated above is made."—The Indian Spectator, Aug. 23, 1891.

THIS is the decision of Mr. Justice Wilson in the Star Theatre vs. the City Theatre:—

"This case came on for settlement of issues, and the question arose whether the plaintiff disclosed a cause of action. The facts as alleged in the plaint are in substance these: The plaintiffs allege that they are proprietors of certain dramatic plays, and that the defendants have acted these pieces without their permission. In answer to a question by me, the plaintiffs' counsel stated that the plays had been printed and published for sale. It was clear that, according to common law, no such suit would lie, Murray vs. Elliston. In England the right to represent plays is prohibited by certain statutes, 3 and 4 William IV, and 5 and 6 Victoria. It is clear that those statutes do not apply to works published in India, Ruilboge vs. Low. There is no such Act in India, but there is a Copyright Act passed by the Indian Legislature, which protects copyright, properly so called, but not the right to represent plays. The result is that there is no law in India under which such right can exist. The plaint discloses no cause of action, and the suit will be dismissed with costs."

WE have a lot of schoolmasters and schoolboys about us for whose behoof we copy the following morceau:—

"Schoolmaster, to his wife: 'My dear, I wish you would speak more carefully. You say that "Henry Jones came to this town from Sunderland?"' Wife: 'Yes.' Schoolmaster: 'Well, now, wouldn't it be better to say that "he came from Sunderland to this town?"' Wife: 'I don't see any difference in the two expressions.' Schoolmaster: 'But there is a difference—a rhetorical difference. You don't hear me make use of such awkward expressions. By-the-way, I have a letter from your father in my pocket.' Wife: 'But my father is not in your pocket. You mean you have in your pocket a letter from my father.' Schoolmaster: 'There you go with your little quibbles! You take a delight in harassing me. You are always taking up a thread, and representing it as a rope.' Wife: 'Representing it to be a rope,' you mean.' Schoolmaster: 'For goodness sake, be quiet! Never saw such a quarrelsome woman in my life!'"

POTATOES and beets planted between plates of copper thrust upright into the earth and connected by wires with similarly placed zinc plates about one hundred feet distant—an electric battery being thus formed, with the earth between the copper and zinc in the circuit—increase the yield of beets fifteen per cent. and of potatoes twenty-five per cent. Such is the latest discovery in scientific agriculture. It is the result of Professor Holdeleiss's experiments in Germany.

COMPELLED to give up Baboo Jogesh Chunder Pal Chowdry, the Municipal Commissioners of Ranaghat have elected Baboo Bhuban Mohun Mittra, B. L., as their Chairman. He has been accepted by the Local Government. We see Baboo Surendranath Pal Chowdry has rejoined the municipality. Has he taken farewell of the Zemindari Panchayet? We hear little of this body nowadays.

SEQUAH, we read, has been arrested at Kurache for forcibly extracting three of the teeth of a native tailor's son and for abusing and insulting one Framorze. May not this be another advertisement for the man that speaks?

HERE is a recipe for cleaning marble. Mix quicklime with strong lye, so as to form a mixture having the consistency of cream, and apply immediately with a brush. Let this composition be allowed to remain on a day or two, and be then washed off with soap and water.

THE constitution of a typical South African household is thus given:—

"The father English, the mother half Dutch, with a French name, the governess a Scotch woman, the cook a Zulu, the housemaid a Hottentot, the stable-boy a Kaffir, and the little girl who waits at table a Basuto."

RAI Bahadur Trailakhya Nath Mitter, Subordinate Judge of Gya, under a cloud for being charged with taking bribes, has so far disproved the imputation that he has been allowed leave of absence and permission of Government to prosecute his accuser criminally to establish his own perfect innocence.

LORD Wenlock has ordered an enquiry into the advisability of establishing agricultural banks by Government.

WE read:—

"Many members of the Calcutta Bar were ready to defend, if the rule for contempt of Court had been issued against the Indian Mirror. Besides Mr. Monmohun Ghose, who actually appeared, there were several leading members of the Bar, watching the application. This is the glory of the bar which is noted for its independence."

Needless to say that that is the expression of the wisdom of our Native Press. It is all native business, unmistakably. Both news and comments are thoroughly characteristic, constituting together the glory of the Native Bar and the Native Press.

By the bye, where were the great lights of Asia Minor when Surrender Not got into trouble for his wild rhetoric? We suspect the mute inglorious Erskines and Cockburns are too wide awake to place themselves in a position in which they must discharge the obligation of learning and talent.

LET Hercules himself do what he may,

The cat will mew, and dog will have his day.

And his bark into the bargain.

Ever since we pointed out the blunders of the Hindoo Patriot, that paper has been exhibiting the most alarming symptoms, until we begin to be half sorry for having given any the least provocation. But what could we do? If the blunders were so many and so bad, that surely was not our fault. So far as we were concerned, it will be remembered how generously we treated the matter, laying the fault on the typographic department, which we might have charged upon the literary staff. Next time, we treated such blunders in the same quarter with good-humoured "chaff." We still left the queer literary band the door open to escape, if they would, by an injustice to the poor printer. What more could we do? It was in vain, however. Conscientious guilt was not to be humoured. This conductor of the old rickety 'Bus (since formally installed in the driver's dickey) knew from the first that the late Baboo Kali Kissen Mitter was suffering from no new or strange complaint. At least after our notice of the Patriot's statement he discovered that "thisis" was but his own phonographic rendering of the wellknown disease Phthisis. Hence the rage against the irreverent man who laughs at the absurdity. Hence the rabies. The wild incessant barking followed in due pathological course, culminating in the savage bite.

It was all Hate's Labour Lost, however.

The dog, to gain some private ends,

Went mad, and bit the man.

The man recovered of the bite,

TO extract foreign substances from the ear, a large syringe holding four or six ounces, a basin of rain-water soap-suds as hot as can be borne, and a steady hand are all that is required. With this simple apparatus, a medical man says that he has, over and over again, removed cherry-stones, beads, buttons, slate-pencils, &c., from the ears of children, and always without pain. A few injections suffice.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

FROM the report of the Currency department, it appears that the total amount of currency notes in circulation at the end of last year, was considerably in excess of the average of previous years. This certainly is not an indication of the diminution of public confidence in the stability of British Government in India on account of the Consent Act.

IN the Warburton second prosecution for libel against the proprietor, Sir Dyal Singh, and the late editor, Baboo Sitala Kant Chatterjee, of the Tribune, Mr. Goode has framed charges against both the defendants. The charges against the proprietor are for abetment of publication and abetment of the sale of defamatory matter in respect of each of the three charges specified in the complaint, and against the late editor for publication and abetment of publication of each of the libels under sections 500-109 or 502-109, and 500 or 500-109 respectively of the Penal Code. Both the defendants pleaded not guilty. The defence commences on the 4th September.

THE Dacca Bribery case, arising out of the Belati murder trial, has been committed to the sessions. After the closing of the case by Mr. Allen, Barrister-at-law, for the prosecution, Mr. Hill, Barrister-at-law, for the defence, asked the Magistrate not to try the case himself but to send it to the sessions, as the trial by men of his client's nationality would be more fitting. "The importance of the case," he argued, "renders it essential that it must not be tried by a single individual but by an unbiassed and unprejudiced number of men. Influence may be exerted easily on one man, however powerful that man may be." "A Jury is a safer tribunal than one Judge.....The best judges are the people of the same race for the administration of criminal justice." As there are two factions at Dacca, some of the principal witnesses for the prosecution being leaders of one faction and the chief defendant being the leader of the other, Mr. Hill pressed that the jury must be of a different district. "The Sessions Judge also took statements of certain witnesses for the prosecution, and he is connected with this case one way or the other. The Magistrate is the prosecutor. Therefore it is essential for the criminal administration of justice that no official subordinate to him should try the case. The trying Magistrate ought to be unbiassed and unprejudiced."

Mr. Allen, who had at first asked the Magistrate to dispose of the case himself, did not oppose this application of Mr. Hill. He was willing that the trial be full, fair and free.

Both the accused Ananda Chunder Roy and his servant Madhub Chunder Das pleaded not guilty and denied to the Magistrate, on his questioning, that they induced Guru Churn Bhattacharjee, the foreman of the Jury in the Belati murder case, to return a corrupt verdict or gave him a loan of Rs. 4,000 during the trial or wrote to him offering Rs. 5,000, or that the money was ever returned to them.

THERE is at present a plethora of Rupee in the money market, which is quite unprecedented. The amount of cash in the coffers of the Bank of Bengal alone exceeds seven crores of rupees, in spite of the reduction of its rate of interest to two per cent. The threatened rise in the price of silver last year encouraged speculative purchases, the result of which was the import of a much larger quantity of silver than was necessary to meet the trade requirements of the country. At such a time the apathy of our statesmen fills us with disgust. We cannot understand why advantage is not being taken of the present superabundance of the rupee for the extension of Railways and the pushing on of public works on a larger scale than was possible when the Bank minimum was 12 per cent, and there was, what may be called, a Rupee famine. Considering the amount of misery and loss caused by inundations almost every year in districts like Nuddea, Moorshedabad, Burdwan and Midnapore, embankment and drainage schemes ought to receive the immediate attention of Government.

THE Bank rate of interest becoming lower and lower, the premium on Government securities is steadily rising - the present quotations being very nearly 8 per cent. The abundance of the rupee in the market, coupled with the low rate of interest prevailing, has made it possible for the dealers to make large speculative purchases with a very small amount of capital, and some of them have, it is said, been clearing very large profits. Babu Nilamber Mookerjee, late Finance Minister of Cashmere, has already become a regular member of the Calcutta Bialto. We congratulate him on the success that he has attained in the line.

THE manufacturing season of Bengal indigo is just over. The total outturn this year is expected to be a lac and thirty thousand maunds against a lac of maunds brought into the market last year. In 1889-90, the total quantity of "the beautiful blue dye" produced in the country was a lac and forty thousand maunds, and the glut in the market was such as to lead to a fall in its prices to the extent of more than 25 per cent. The prices did not improve last year on account of the rise in the rate of exchange. With a low exchange again this year, there seems to be a better prospect for the planter.

THE jute crop this year has been a rather short one on account of the prolonged drought in June last. Last year, there was an abundant crop. But the demand for the fibre being practically unlimited, the fall in its price was not due to over production. The depression in the jute trade last year, was due solely to the exchange. This year, the exchange is low again. But, owing to its unsettled state, there has not yet been any marked improvement in the price of commodities of export for which there is no exceptional demand. A bale of good jute, which sold for Rs. 20 last year, fetched more than Rs. 35 in the previous season. This year, the price of a similar bale is quoted at Rs. 25.

THE affairs of the Baraganda Copper Company do not seem to be in the prosperous condition in which they ought to be. So far as we are aware, the agents have not paid any dividend as yet to the shareholders, and the shares, according to present quotations, have become practically valueless. There was a talk recently about the company going into liquidation, or its affairs being placed under the management of other agents. If the Baraganda, with all its resources, fail to be a successful concern, the future of the mineral industry of the country is gloomy indeed. The public are deeply interested in the prosperity of the enterprise, and it is to be hoped that the agents, Messrs. Bird and Co., will enlighten us to a greater extent than they have hitherto done.

ABOUT seven lacs of rupees is spent by the Bengal Government annually in the encouragement of vernacular education. But the good intentions of Government are completely frustrated by enforcing the study of the most worthless text books in the vernacular schools of the country. There is a standing Text Book Committee under the Director of Public Instruction or rather under his lieutenant Rai Radhika Prosunno Mookerjee Bahadoor. But practically the selection of text books for the vernacular schools rests with the Inspectors and their Deputies. Whoever may be answerable for the abuse that has grown up, the fact is that the books usually patronised by the department are the works of the Inspectors, their relatives and their portiffs. While in no other department, is a Government official allowed to use the patronage at his disposal for his own benefit or that of his relatives, the practice and usage of the education department are altogether different, and allow nepotism to flourish without restraint. Some of the authors favoured by the department are absolute idiots. We say this advisedly, that the subject may receive the amount of attention from Sir Alfred Croft which it deserves. We can well see the difficulties that surround him in the way. But we think that, without going out of his way or wounding the susceptibilities of his immediate subordinates, he may invite independent opinion as to the merit of the books patronised by them.

SIR Walter Scott, thus speaks in his recently published Journal, of his remarkable mental peculiarities:—

"There is one thing I believe peculiar to me—I work, that is, meditate for the purpose of working best, when I have a quasi-engagement with some other book, for example. When I find myself doing nil, or like to come to a standstill in writing, I take up some light book, a novel or the like, and usually have not read far ere my difficulties are removed, and I am ready to write again. There must be two currents of ideas going on in my mind at the same time; or perhaps the slighter occupation serves, like a woman's wheel or stocking, to ballast the mind as it were by preventing the thoughts from wandering, and so give the deeper current the power to flow undisturbed. I always laugh when I hear people say Do one thing at once. I have done a dozen things at once all my life."

Of his personal peculiarities he says:—

"The half hour between waking and rising has all my life proved propitious to any task which was exercising my invention. When I go over any knotty difficulty in a story, or have had in former times to fill up a passage in a poem, it was always when I first opened my eyes that the desired ideas thronged upon me. This is so much the case that I am in the habit of relying upon it, and saying to myself when I am at a loss, 'Never mind, we shall have it at seven o'clock to-morrow morning.'"

Another superstition is thus exploded on the highest authority. Every young learner who is seen with a copy of Todd's Student's Manual and books of the kind, ought to be fined—for his good.

A LIVE Iclander out of Iceland is a curiosity. We never come across any such except in the books of Lord Dufferin and other voyagers. The State of Michigan in America has, however, had the distinction of counting among its population a visitor from that Ultima Thule beyond the North Atlantic. We wonder whether the stranger arrived during an unprecedented frost throughout all North America in a sledge drawn by a Polar bear. We are told he is a doctor and has been practising medicine in Detroit for the last two years. Dr. Vondolcke—such is his name—is a remarkable man, of great originality and boldness. He has started a scheme which takes one's breath away. But he is not to be summarily dismissed as a visionary, being supported by a number of capitalists—coolheaded financiers and experienced speculators of the new territory of Alaska. The United States Government is also understood to favour the scheme. He has returned to Iceland for the purpose of interviewing the Government with a view to transporting the entire population to Alaska, and establishing a colony there under the United States.

MRS. Besant is well known as a freethinker. She does not believe in God, but she believes in Madame Blavatsky and her Himalayan Mahatmas, Messrs. Koot Hoomi and Co. The faithful F. T. S. may take this as evidence conclusive as to the Russian Satima's power of working miracles.

THE following is from a report of an interview with Mrs. Besant which is going the round of the press:—

"Interviewer.—I shall now assume Madame Blavatsky's absolute honesty and truthfulness. You will admit in that case that she was, to say the least of it, very injudicious.

Mr. B.—How so?

Interviewer.—In her choice of methods and her people. In setting a hollow place in the wall as the place to hang the Adyar shrine, for instance; or, at any rate, in putting the Coulombs into the position which they betrayed.

Mrs. B.—I don't admit that. I think she knew quite well that the Coulombs would betray her. They came to her in distress and she thought it her duty to help them—

Interviewer.—Even though she knew that the result would be the trap doors and the exposure, covering with suspicion herself and her cause?

Mr. B.—With the suffering that might be brought on herself in doing her duty of helping the distressed, she had no right to concern herself. For her cause the so called exposure only lost those who had been attracted by idle curiosity and sensation-seeking.

Interviewer.—Just those in fact who had been attracted by the phenomenon?

Mrs. B.—Those who had a wrong idea of the phenomenon—and who could not bear the brunt of ridicule and persecution.

Interviewer.—But, Mrs. Besant, if you say that Madame foresaw all this, and yet employed the Coulombs, do not you make her practically a party to their deception? Had she the right to allow herself and Theosophy profit by their trap doors?

Mrs. B.—She did not. The trap doors, as I have explained, were made on purpose for the exposure, after Madame Blavatsky had left and come to England. They were fabricated by discharged servants, who to get money from the missionaries, made the trap door as the material basis of their story.

Interviewer.—But if you believe in the Mahatmas, do you not think that they might have detected and foiled the Coulomb plot before the incriminating letters in Madame's handwriting had been forged and before the incriminating trap doors into Madame's bedroom had been made?

Mrs. B.—It is no part of the duty of the Mahatmas to interfere with the people's free will and turn them into puppets."

The credulity of woman is proverbial, and like that of some easy-natured Babus amongst us, is not much affected by education or culture. The answers and explanations given by Mrs. Besant to her interviewer clearly show, that the sect founded by the Russian matayi acquired, under her guidance, very considerable proficiency in the art of the modern Hindu Gurus and their chelas. The reference to the "duty of helping the distressed" is couched in a language which is better understood in Europe than in this country. But the rest of Mrs. Besant's deliverance is clearly in the style in which an Indian spiritual Guide's shortcomings and failures would be explained by his disciples.

MR. Cuzon, M.P., charges Russia with a state offence by no means uncommon. According to him, British letters in course of transit from Persia to Great Britain, while passing through Russian territory, have been cut open, detained and otherwise tampered with. This is bad and irritating and, in ordinary times, utterly inexcusable. But the British had better not be over indignant over this revelation, as their own statesmen are quite up to the trick. They once suffered for their vanity of righteousness, when Mazzini and the Italian refugees complained of their correspondence being tampered with.

THE entire amount of tolls levied in the Nuddea rivers is, if we are rightly informed, devoted to keeping the channels of these rivers open during the dry weather. The toll offices in these highways of inland traffic are a positive nuisance, and sometimes a source of actual tyranny. The use to which the money is devoted hardly justifies the tax and the obstruction to traffic. In some years the rivers remain open by the force of their own currents, and the general opinion is that the good done by the operations of the Engineer, Nuddea Rivers, is very nearly nil. Our own opinion is that the toll offices at Jangipur and at the other stations ought to be abolished altogether, the loss of income being made up by a light taxation on all country boats of a certain size. If the present state of things be allowed to continue, efforts ought to be made to solve the engineering problem of keeping the Nuddea rivers open in a more satisfactory manner than is at present done every year by bamboo piles and mats which are washed away immediately at the commencement of the monsoon.

It is a curious fact that the very men who are loud in their complaint against the paper currency as the greatest grievance of India under British rule, do not hesitate to part with their gold and silver for what they speak of as worthless pieces of paper. The inconsistencies between the beliefs and practice of not only the cannaille but of men of light and leading, are so numerous and of such a palpable kind as to afford more than ample ground for the character given by Carlyle to the majority of human beings. Popular fallacies of the kind we refer to are most conspicuous in connection with the religious beliefs of men. But instances of such inconsistencies are not wanting in other departments of human thought and action. Some of these erroneous notions are a standing source of danger to the good government of the country, and can be rectified only by a sound system of education. But our educational authorities are so enamoured of Rama's Banavas and Rama's Rajyabhishek that there is no chance of the bulk of our countrymen ever having correct notions about matters relating to public finance or the political economy of the country.

ON Monday, the Bangabasi prosecution for inciting sedition came to a conclusion in which nothing was concluded as regards the guilt or innocence of the four accused. That day, Mr. Jackson concluded his address to the Jury and the Chief Justice delivered his charge to the Jury. The Jury consisting of seven Europeans, one Armenian and one Bengali, retired and considered the verdict for full one hour. The nine could not agree but were divided into seven and two. The foreman was asked if there was any chance of the Jury being unanimous. The reply being in the negative, the Chief Justice discharged the jury, without enquiring of the opinion of the majority, and refusing to accept anything but a unanimous verdict in a case of this kind. This order of discharge of the Jury was taken by the assembled crowd in Court as a discharge of the prisoners, who clapped their hands in joy, even as they had taken the plea of Not Guilty by the accused at the commencement of the trial for verdict to that effect by the Jury. The ignorant demonstration of the crowd being put down by order of the presiding Judge by their as unseemly expulsion from the court room, the Chief Justice asked the Standing Counsel what course he meant to pursue now that the Jury was discharged. Mr. Pugh was not ready with his reply, specially as he wanted to consult the Advocate-General. Sir Comer Petheram then remanded the case to the next Sessions, releasing the prisoners on the old bail.

The opinion of the majority of the jury was not asked, nor was it delivered in court, and will always remain a mystery.

INDIA'S LOSS AND GAIN BY FOREIGN COMMERCE.

For the first time perhaps in the history of British India, the value of the merchandise imported into the country exceeded our exports last year. This result was due in part at least to the fact that the upward tendency in the value of the rupee made Indian securities more popular in the London Exchange, and led to the transfer of a large amount of these securities from the hands of the Indian to English capitalists. But the most important cause which affected the relative value of our exports and imports last year, was the enhanced value of the rupee that led to a fall in the price of most of the articles of export. As the merchandise that passes out of a country represents the price which is paid for what is brought into it, the exports and imports of a country, in the normal state of things, ought to be of equal value. But we have to pay every year a very large amount to England for what are called the Home charges, and thus during the last hundred years our exports have exceeded our imports by nearly a thousand crores. What we lose in this way is gained by England, and it appears that her imports are very much in excess of her exports. If what we give and receive in the way of foreign commerce, continued to be of equal value for a few years, the country would be literally overflowing with money. While India has been made, within the last hundred years, to give her masters more than twice the amount of the fine that France had to pay to get rid of the iron grip of Germany after the last Franco-Prussian war, our liability to English capitalists within the same period has amounted to another thousand crores at the least. A great deal is said now and then about the necessity of British capital for the development of the resources of our country. As a matter of fact, India never has been, nor can she possibly be, in need of being financed by foreign capital. Her own resources are more than sufficient for her purposes, if only the lion's share of her wealth be not appropriated by her foreign masters. No doubt that, for her railways, jute mills, tea gardens, coffee gardens, &c., she is indebted to the extent of more than a thousand crores of rupees to English capitalists. But not a pice of the capital subscribed by them ever reached India. The entire amount was spent by the Home Government, and India had had only to sign the bonds and pay the interest—at the same time that she paid another thousand crores in food grains, oilseeds, fibres, &c.

If we could set up a sufficient number of cotton mills in the country to meet our home requirements; if we ceased to import Liverpool salt; if we worked our iron mines on a scale large enough to supply the wants of our Railways, and, last of all, if we could stop the import of French wines and English beer—the necessity of our buying foreign merchandise would almost cease, and our exports too would diminish in a corresponding degree. If in addition to all these changes in the economical situation of the country, the Home charges were reduced to a reasonable limit by our rulers, then the countries requiring our tea, indigo and jute would be obliged to pay for these in gold and silver. In that case there would be no want of capital in the country for the development of our industrial resources, and as silver would regain its normal value, the exchange difficulty, which means a tax of 30 per cent. on our English friends out here, would cease.

But our Babu Hampdens and Cromwells are as little concerned about the true interests of the country as the child just born. The hollowness of their patriotism ought to be apparent from the fact that, while they moved heaven and earth, and raved like madmen to induce the Government to give up the Consent Bill, they had not one word to say about the abolition of the import duties on cotton piece goods or about the Factory Bill, which, by a curious coincidence, was passed into law on the same date. The Manchester cotton spinners are not satisfied with the mischief that they have already done to us, and they are now getting up fresh agitations to complete the ruin of the few cotton mills that have been set up in India. In these matters, our cause is fought not by our Babu politicians, but by the very countrymen of the enemies of our manufacturing industries. The following is taken from the report of a debate on the subject at the close of the last session of Parliament :

"Mr. Provand, who had on the paper a resolution to the effect. 'That further reforms are necessary in the laws of India dealing with native labour in factories and workshops,' said his chief object was to draw attention to the totally inadequate provisions of the Act which would come into operation on Jan. 1 next in regard to the amount of protection it afforded to the employees in Indian factories. The present position of labour in India was that it was almost entirely without legislative protection of any kind except in the case of children. Any person over twelve years of age might be employed in India for as many hours every day as the employer pleased.

Sir G. Campbell said the hon. member had assumed that all sorts of terrible abominations had been going on in the Indian factories, whereas there was no evidence whatever to justify such an assumption; but, on the other hand, it went to show that there was nothing of the kind. No doubt some precautions were required as to the fencing of machinery and regulations for the health of the operatives; but it must be remembered that the system of factory life and working in India was entirely different from that of this country. As regarded the greater part of what had been said by the hon. member for Glasgow (Mr. Provand), he must say that he did not think the representatives of Lancashire manufacturers were the people to deal with factory legislation in India.

Mr. Provand, with some heat, denied that he had any interest whatever in Lancashire, or had ever communicated with Lancashire manufacturers on the subject. It was true that he had an interest in a company which sold Indian spinnings in India and large quantities of American and Lancashire manufactures.

Sir G. Campbell: I said my hon. friend had a cotton business in Lancashire, and he admits he is interested in a large business of that kind.

Mr. Provand (who remained seated): You are wrong again. Ascertain the facts.

The Speaker: Order, order.

Sir G. Campbell, continuing, said that the question was always being brought forward by the Lancashire cotton manufacturers, who pressed upon the Indian Government the advisability of restraining the Indian manufacturers. It seemed to him that the Government of India had gone as far as they reasonably could—in fact, it was a moot point whether they had not conceded too much at the instigation of the Lancashire manufacturers as regarded the restriction of women's hours. If it was the fact that they had put clogs and hindrances on the women of India they had done a great wrong, as what was wanted in India was to give the women an opportunity of doing fair work and of raising themselves to a higher scale in the social system."

An agitation properly got up at the right time, would have made it simply impossible for the Government of Lord Lytton and Lord Ripon to abolish the import duties. Our countrymen, however, not only remained indifferent at the time, but, in their strange infatuation, actually deified Lord Ripon although he it was who gave the finishing touch to the mischief that had been initiated by his predecessor. When pressure is brought to bear upon the authorities to pass an obviously unrighteous measure, opposition strengthens their hands, and is therefore welcomed. But as yet, we do not know wherein lies the true interest of the country, and it will take some time before we shall learn so to regulate our political agitations as to be able to achieve success.

Under the direct government of the crown, the military expenditure of the country has assumed a proportion which is simply scandalous. The amount payable to the Home Government on account of military pensions alone exceeds the entire pay of the native army. The matter is serious enough in all conscience, though beneath the notice of Babu patriotism. The development of our foreign commerce is looked upon with satisfaction not only by our rulers but even by some of our own politicians. But to the extent of at least 20 crores of Rupees we get no material equivalent for what we give. For the remaining 60 crores of our exports we get certain things in return. But we could without any difficulty manufacture those things here, and if we are prevented by our political situation, or by our want of enterprise, to give sufficient impetus to our national industries, surely we do not deserve to be congratulated on that account. Rightly understood, our foreign commerce is our greatest grievance under British rule, and not the Consent Act.

NATIONAL HEROWORSHIP CONSOLIDATED FUND.

THE numerous meetings of sorts in the country in sorrow for the death of Pandit Iswara Chandra Vidyasagara culminated at last in a crowded promiscuous gathering in the metropolis, in honour of the two great Indians—Dr. Rajendralala Mitra and Pandit Iswara Chandra Vidyasagara. We are afraid we are perilously near a bull; but how are we to help when something very like a bull in action has been perpetrated by the promoters. This is the time that two great men of different kinds of eminence in different spheres of life, simply because they happened to die within a short time of each other, have been bound up together for sacrifice as it were at a common memorial meeting. No friend or true admirer of either worthy can regard the insult to the dead with indifference. All good citizens who care to preserve the integrity and meaning of public memorials must protest against this sort of treatment of great men as a lot of sundries at an auction. The reason of the act is not far to seek. It concerned the credit of our big wigs to do something towards perpetuating the memory of Raja Mitra and Pandit Vidyasagar. It was doubted whether there was sufficient general enthusiasm in their favour. Accordingly, after frequent consultation and long cogitation, it was considered expedient to lump up the whole departed worth and unite all the scattered forces of appreciation and attachment. This is the ne plus ultra of vulgar utilitarianism. Thus the double barrelled memorial demonstration was resorted to in much the same principle on which backward localities are joined to thriving municipalities. But it was easier to think the nonsense than to do it. The carrying out of the game involved a world of anomalies. It was lucky for the promoters that they had a native Sheriff and an obliging gentleman into the bargain, to deal with. We can imagine how he must have been goaded before, in response to two distinct requisitions, he called two different meetings of the inhabitants of the town and suburbs of Calcutta at the same place and the same day and hour, for two different objects. The absurdity of such a proceeding goes without saying. But, apart from the ludicrousness of the situation, Sheriff Shah (as our friend the Prince loves to call himself), we are afraid, incurred some positive risk in issuing such contradictory calls upon Her Majesty's lieges. He was doubtless ensured, and practically he was safe—in purse and person.

This consolidated joint stock meeting on the limited liability principle came on in the Town Hall, on Thursday, the 27th August, under the presidency of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal. The attendance, though not select, was large. From 2 o'clock, the boys from Vidyasagar's and Baboo Surendra Nath Banerjee's colleges and schools and, doubtless, other institutions too, poured in until the whole hall was packed. The platform was occupied by a few of the notabilities. It was, however, a Hindu demonstration. Not a single Mahomedan was there. Mr. Rustomjee was the only Parsee. There was no Jew. The Chairman and Sir Comer Petheram between them represented the European and Eurasian communities.

And now to summarise the proceedings of Thursday. Prince Mahomed Furrokh Shah, as Sheriff, declared the meeting open and left it to those who had responded to his call. On the motion of Raja Durga Churn Law, seconded by Mr. H. M. Rustomjee, Sir Charles Elliott was voted to the chair. In addressing the assembly, he said the object of the meeting "so large, so influential, and so representative of the wealth and position and public spirit of the capital" "had his warmest sympathy, and if all he heard and read of the departed worthies was correct, the least that the people of the province could do was to raise some lasting monument to the memory of each of the great men gone." Sir Comer Petheram moved the first resolution recording "profound grief at the irreparable loss which the country has sustained by the death of two such distinguished men as Raja Rajendralala Mitra and Pandit Iswara Chandra Vidyasagara." His reading of the two lives was that they reflected the highest credit on the people of Bengal and the least that the latter could do was to perpetuate their memories. Maharaja Jotendromohun Tagore followed, as befitted an old friend and political associate of at least one of the two subjects of the meeting, with tears—in his heart if not eyes. He "groaned" "with the unexpressed eloquence of silent sorrow" quoting the lines—

"Light sufferings give us leisure to complain,
We groan, but cannot speak in greater pain."

That is a fine quotation, but for all true purpose it was wasted. At a memorial meeting we can understand it as the expression of grief of a single soul for a particular bereavement, but not as a reflection over a mortuary return.

The next turn was Dr. Mahendralal Sircar's. It was a turn indeed. He was the first to speak with ample knowledge of both the deceased and with the responsibility of a thinker. It is not much to say that his was the best speech of the meeting. It was one of Dr. Sircar's best orations. We may be partial in our criticism. We give it in another column for the reading public to judge. That speech did more true honour to the deceased gentlemen than the random adoration of professional orators or the stereotyped platitudes of exalted lips. And the speaker was treated by the crowd as an intruder and twice hissed. No wonder. He seemed to be discriminating.

Maharaja Narendra Krishna introduced, with sketches of the two lives, the second resolution for "suitable memorials" "to commemorate in an adequate manner the eminent services which these two illustrious men have rendered to the country" with public subscriptions. Dr. Gurudas Bajerjee, in seconding the motion, discharged a "solemn and a sacred duty, a duty of doing honor to departed worth—to the two noble and rare specimens of humanity." Baboo Surendra Nath Banerjee next spoke. The boys cheered him lustily as he rose. He was all loyalty to the Lieutenant-Governor, to the British Government and the English people.

Two more resolutions were carried—forming two memorial committees for the two dead, moved by Raja Pearymohun Mookerjee and Baboo Protap Chunder Mozoomdar.

THE TOWN HALL MEMORIAL MEETING.

DR. SIRCAR'S SPEECH.

Your Honour, Mr. Sheriff, Maharajas, and Gentlemen,—

I have been asked to support the Resolution which has been moved and seconded, and I rise to do so in fulfilment of a mournful duty.

One of the distinguished men, to do honor to whose memories we have met here this evening, thus spoke at a public meeting held in 1867 in honor of Raja Sir Radha Kant:

"Respect for the dead has been a characteristic of man in all ages and in every state of society, and it is eminently due to those who have been benefactors to their race. It is a tribute to worth which it should be our pride, as it is our duty to pay. Even in an utilitarian—a low utilitarian—sense it is of use, for it does more good to the living than it can possibly do to those who have passed away from amongst us."

The lips which uttered these words are now closed for ever in death, but the words continue to live in our midst pointing to a most tender and lovely side of human nature, which distinguishes man far above the inferior animals, and teaching a duty which, it is no exaggeration to say, is almost a sacred one. This duty, it is easy to see, is threefold in character, for besides being essentially a duty we owe to our benefactors who are dead and gone from amongst us, it involves in its fulfilment, the fulfilment of a duty we owe to the present and a duty we owe to future generations. The fulfilment of this duty is a part of higher education. The remembrance of the dead with feelings of the reverence and gratitude due to them is calculated in the highest degree to elevate our own natures. And nothing teaches so well as example. Example, said Bacon, is a globe of precepts. But the force of example is greater in proportion as it is nearer home. It is questionable if education would ever succeed in effacing all distinctions between the races and nations of men. But even if it did, the law of the inverse square of the distance will continue to prevail with regard to the force of example as a law of human nature for a long time to come. The example of parents is infinitely more effective than all other examples put together. Then come in order the example of our preceptors, the example of our neighbours, the example of our countrymen in general, the example of strangers and foreigners. This law is susceptible of manifold applications. One is, remembering its reality, how parents ought to be careful as to what example they set before their children, how the preceptor ought to see that his own conduct harmonize with his precepts, and how every man ought to conduct himself so that his example may operate beneficially and not injuriously upon any one. Another application leads to the duty of the preservation of all worthy examples, especially from our own midst. We have reasons to believe that in days of our glory, examples of every virtue, intellectual and moral, were abundant in our country. In these degenerate times but few are found who work out their destiny in such a way as to be worthy of being held up as examples. It behoves us therefore to preserve any such as do arise, snatch them from the hands of the relentless destroyer.

Gentlemen, we have met here this evening to perform this function as regards two most eminent examples which the providence of God had set up in our midst in these latter days. Both possessed intellectual gifts and moral qualities which may well serve as models for imitation to their countrymen. It is not maintained that both or either were perfect. No man ever was, and they were not. They were men, and had many frailties and imperfections. Both, for instance, were men of fearless independence and strong convictions, and they would have been superhuman if that independence had not at times degenerated into doggedness and obstinacy and impatience of contradiction. Both were men possessed of great self-respect, and in consequence were respecters of their words, and it would have been a marvel indeed if a natural anxiety for consistency had not occasionally landed them in persistency in error. Both were men of very great warmth and impulsiveness of disposition, and it was to be expected that they would now and again be betrayed into conduct which could not be justified and might even be reprehensible. Indeed, Gentlemen, we should be doing unwarrantable violence to truth and fact, if, in the acuteness and intensity of our grief, we become oblivious of their faults and hold them up as patterns of every virtue with which man could be endowed. I am constrained to speak thus at this moment, because I have reasons to fear there is this danger from exaggeration in our country, where warmth of the heart and the imagination forms such a marked characteristic of the national mind, a characteristic which is mainly responsible for a monstrous pantheon of thirty-three millions of gods and goddesses who are to this day ruling over the destinies of two hundred and eighty millions of human beings. But, Gentlemen, it is my conviction that there is no need of exaggeration in the present case. I have every confidence that if we take a just estimate of the characters of the distinguished men who have just passed away from among us, far from suffering in the estimation of the outside world, they would shine the more brightly, and be appreciated and admired the more sincerely, and when thus correctly set forth their examples will exert their legitimate, abiding influence on their countrymen.

The late Kristodas Pal often delighted to speak of his friend Dr. Rajendralala Mitra as the most intellectual Bengali of the age. Without either dissenting from or subscribing to this friendly opinion, we may say without exaggeration that the Raja of all his countrymen had displayed the greatest intellectual activity in his time. This was the product of his insatiable thirst for knowledge, of his untiring industry in collecting and of his singular powers of assimilating information, and of that healthy ambition which would not allow him to lag behind others in any intellectual race. He had abundance of conceit, I might almost say, unbounded conceit, but it was more of that species of conceit which inspires a man with faith in his own powers, and thus acts as a spur to exertion, than of that species which fills a man with delusions not only as to his powers but also as to his acquirements, and thus acts as a deterrent to all exertion as unnecessary. Raja Rajendralala was a genuine, ardent patriot, and he had never in his long life missed an opportunity to serve his country. He was not blind to the faults of his countrymen, but his vast knowledge showed him that other nations had faults not less numerous and grave than ours, and therefore he would never brook any unfair comparison, but would resent such comparisons to the utmost of his power. I have given you, Gentlemen, what I consider were the distinguishing qualities of Rajendralala's head and heart, qualities which, in my humble opinion were the key to his whole character and career;—qualities which enabled him to acquire a mastery over a foreign language which has commanded the admiration of those whose mother tongue it is; which helped him in those indefatigable researches into the antiquities of his country which have been acknowledged and appreciated throughout the world of learning; and which prompted and fired and sustained him in making those fearless and uncompromising vindications of his country and countrymen against unworthy attacks, which very often wrung the sincerest respect from his adversaries.

Now as regards the other distinguished man whose death has enveloped the whole country in apparently deeper gloom and filled the nation with almost inconsolable grief, it is not difficult to point out the distinguishing features of his character. Gifted with an intellect scarcely less able and capable than that of Raja Rajendralala, the amount of intellectual activity displayed by Vidyasagar, though great, certainly falls far short of the Raja's. But this was because, in my humble opinion, the Pandit's time was absorbed in the exercise of the most active benevolence and philanthropy, in relieving distress and in attempting to correct and eradicate some of the most barbarous and inhuman social customs of our country. Could he devote more time for it than he did, he could have done more for Sanskrit literature and scholarship than most of his contemporaries. But his heart eclipsed his head, and he cared more for the alleviation of human suffering than for anything else. He strove more after the moral amelioration than after the intellectual advancement of his countrymen. He subordinated everything to this supreme object of his life. It is not to be wondered at that, with the sensitive heart that he possessed, at times when the wickedness of the world seemed to him incorrigible and irremediable he should have turned from it in disgust. This was the main reason of his retirement from public life. But his benevolence which was a first nature with him, a gift and not a mere acquired habit, would never cease to assert its supremacy over his whole being, and Vidyasagar would be himself again. The sight of distress in whatever shape would never fail to draw forth his tears, his purse, and the most active and untiring exertions of body and mind. The feature of his character which struck me as the noblest was the absolute negation of pride of birth, from which, I am sorry to say, even some of the most enlightened and educated of my countrymen have not been able to emancipate themselves. He delighted to see intellectual eminence and moral excellence in persons born of what are blasphemously called the lower castes. He had, in his school in his native village, appointed a man of the lowest caste to be a Pandit, that is, a teacher of Sanskrit to Brahmans and Sudras alike. His love of the aboriginal races, such as the Santhals, was scarcely less than his love of his own immediate kith and kin. Indeed his immediate kith and kin were the whole race of mankind. He had the loftiest conception of man and of his capabilities, a conception which it has been the prerogative of our own Shastras to give to the world. He knew no distinction of caste or race. His heart throbbed alike for all. His charity knew no bounds. It was that charity of which it has been truly said that it is long-suffering and faileth not, and that it covereth a multitude of sins.

Such were Rajendralala Mitra and Iswar Chandra Vidyasagar, whom the hand of death has almost simultaneously removed from amongst us. They were men of whom any nation would be justly proud, and of whom, in the present condition of our country, we have reasons to be specially proud. They were verily our own. We saw them, we heard them, we spoke to them, we mixed with them in the most intimate manner, we watched their lives, we felt their influence. Their examples to us were of greater importance because of greater influence than similar or even greater examples in other countries. Their lives remind us that the old Aryan vigor of intellect and loftiness of heart are only dormant in the present Hindu race and not altogether dead, capable of almost any development under proper nursing and care. We cannot cease to mourn their loss, but we must do more, forgetting their faults we should endeavour to imitate them in their best qualities.

THE INDIA OFFICE AND MANIPUR.

LORD CROSS TO LORD LANSDOWNE.

(Secret.) No. 25.

India Office, London, 24th July 1891.

To His Excellency the Most Honourable the Governor-General of India in Council.

My lord Marquis.—The letter of Your Lordship's Government, No. 36 (Secret), dated 4th March last, has received my careful consideration, and has been the subject of discussion in both Houses of Parliament. I am now in a position to express an opinion on the policy adopted by your Government in regard to the revolution which led to the expulsion and abdication of the Maharaja Sur Chandra Singh of Manipur, and on the measures which you ordered to be adopted in consequence of those events.

2. I propose in the present Despatch to deal with this part of the correspondence only; for while the papers before me are adequate in regard to the policy adopted by your Government and to the instructions which you issued, the case is otherwise in regard to the action taken by the local authorities in giving effect to your instructions. Until I shall have received the proceedings of the Committee of Inquiry which you have constituted at Manipur and your orders on those proceedings, I am not in a position to comment on the later phases of the question and their results.

3. It is needless to recapitulate at any length the events of the 22nd and 23rd September last. It is sufficient to say that the Maharaja fled from the palace owing to a rising of two of his younger brothers; that the Senapati seized the palace and magazine and placed them in a condition of defence against recapture by the Maharaja, who, finding himself unequal to a contest with his younger brother, determined, in opposition to the advice of the Political Agent, Mr. Grimwood, and his own Ministers, to abdicate and proceed to a place of pilgrimage.

4. On this the Jubraj, or heir apparent, who had been absent during the revolution, returned to Manipur and assumed the Raj. The Maharaja, however, changed his mind on reaching British territory, and telegraphed to the Chief Commissioner of Assam that he proposed to forward a memorial, and asked for assistance to re-occupy Manipur. Mr. Quinton, who had already informed you by telegraph of the circumstances, and of his having acknowledged the Jubraj as Regent, but only pending your orders, requested you on 9th October to defer passing any orders in regard to the succession of the Jubraj till the Maharaja's representation should be received.

5. This representation was not forwarded to Mr. Quinton till the middle of November, and it was not laid before you, with the comments of the Political Agent and the Chief Commissioner, till the following January. This delay, for which your Government was not responsible, is none the less to be regretted, as the consequence of it, and of the time occupied by subsequent discussions with the Chief Commissioner, was to allow a state of things which had been accepted only provisionally to endure for a period of six months.

6. Mr. Quinton's report of 31st December was addressed mainly to the question of the Maharaja's claim to restoration; and he, following the opinion of Mr. Grimwood, recommended that the Maharaja should not be restored, but that the Jubraj should be accepted by Government as his successor. He recognized that the attack on the palace was apparently unjustifiable, but otherwise made no remarks on the conduct of the Senapati or other leaders of the rebellion.

7. In your letter of 24th January to the Chief Commissioner of Assam, you recapitulated the facts of the case, and, after commenting on certain deficiencies in the steps taken by Mr. Grimwood for dealing with the crisis, you pointed out that the rebellion owed its success to the action of the Senapati, whose violent conduct had previously incurred your displeasure; and that, if the British Government should acquiesce in the present state of affairs and recognize the Jubraj as ruler of Manipur, the Senapati would wield the real power of the State. You explained that the Government of India had now a very close interest in maintaining tranquillity in Manipur, and could not tolerate disorder there, and you inclined at that time to the opinion that if the Maharaja was likely to receive a reasonable amount of support from the people of Manipur, he should be re-instated, and that in any case the Senapati should be removed. But before acting on these views you asked the Chief Commissioner for an early expression of his own opinion on the proposed course.

8. Mr. Quinton expressed his opinion on the 9th February that the Maharaja should not on account of his weakness and inability to rule be restored, but that the Jubraj should be recognized as ruler, and that the Senapati might at the same time after due inquiry be adequately punished. After further conferring personally with Your Excellency in Council, Mr. Quinton repeated these views in his letter of 19th February, and your final instructions to him were issued on the 21st February.

9. You then repeated your opinion that, "while the Senapati remains in Manipur unpunished for his treachery against his eldest brother, the Maharaja, the real power in the State will be in the Senapati's hands," and that it would not be to the credit of the British power any more than to the interests of the people of Manipur itself that the Government of India should acquiesce in such a settlement of the case. You accepted Mr. Quinton's opinion that, in view of the Maharaja's character, it would be to the advantage of Manipur and to the furtherance of British interests to recognize the Jubraj rather than to restore the Maharaja, and you adhered to your decision that the Senapati should be removed from Manipur on account of his lawless conduct. You asked where he should be interned, and what steps were considered necessary for removing him without affording him the opportunity of making any forcible opposition; and, finally, you directed the Chief Commissioner to visit Manipur, and to make known on the spot the decision of the Government of India, taking with him a sufficient force, even though opposition might not be expected.

10. It only remains to add that Mr. Quinton decided, in communication with the Officer Commanding the North-East Frontier District, to take an escort of 400 men from Golaghat, to be further strengthened by the addition of 200 men from Cachar; and that on the 18th March he telegraphed proposing to require the Regent and the Durbar to meet him on arrival, to announce the decision of Government, to arrest the Senapati, and bring him away with him on the 25th March. These proposals you approved, having already communicated to the ex-Maharaja your decision to acknowledge the Jubraj as Maharaja, and to punish the persons directly responsible for the insurrection.

11. Of the right of the Government of India to interfere after the forcible dispossession of the Maharaja there can be no question. It is admittedly the right and duty of the Government to settle successions in the protected States of India generally, and this is in a very marked way the case in regard to Manipur, which indeed owes its existence to our intervention. In 1851 the Government of India gave a somewhat special undertaking "to uphold the present Rajah, and to punish any parties attempting to dispossess him," and both before and since that period, and even during the reign of Maharaja Sur Chandra Singh, the history of Manipur is replete with instances of your Government having interfered forcibly to suppress attempts at usurpation, and of your having interned rebellious princes in British India at a safe distance from Manipur.

12. Your Government would undoubtedly be been justified in restoring the Maharaja by force in September, when the revolution took place, and had he not fled precipitately this course would probably have been adopted; nor, in my opinion, would either the delay that occurred or the fact that the local officers were content to accept the results of the revolution without comment have justified you in abstaining from considering the ex-Maharaja's application when it came before you, and vindicating the right of the Paramount Power to decide the question of succession on its merits. Your interference was necessary, not only in the interest of the Manipur State, where the character of the Senapati and the traditions of the succession indicated the probability of this attempt, if allowed to go unpunished, being frequently repeated; it was necessary also in the interests of the British Government, which has of late years been brought into much closer relations with the State and its subject tribes than was formerly the case, and cannot safely tolerate disorders therein; but, above all, it was necessary in the interests of the other protected States of India, for every Chief would have felt that the stability of his power was compromised had you passed over without notice an unprovoked and successful rebellion proceeding only from family quarrels.

13. I am satisfied, therefore, that your Government were right in deciding to interfere. I am equally satisfied that no interference which left the successful head of the rebellion—a man notorious for his turbulent and violent character—in possession of the real power of the State would have been adequate, and that your decision to remove the Senapati from Manipur and intern him in India was sound and politic.

14. The question whether the ex-Maharaja should be restored, or whether the Jubraj should be acknowledged as Maharaja, was by no means so clear as that of the Senapati's removal. Your Government were at first inclined to restore him, and only yielded to the strong remonstrances which the Chief Commissioner urged against that course. I have very carefully considered the subject in the light of the objections urged by Mr. Quinton to the restoration of the expelled Maharaja, and am of opinion that your Government was (sic) justified in yielding to those objections. The obligations imposed on you by the declaration of the Government of India in 1857, though not limited to Maharaja Kirti Chandra, were necessarily dependent on the Maharaja's capacity to govern, and on his willingness to abide by our advice. In this case the Maharaja's abandonment of his throne and territory (for I am satisfied that his abdication was deliberate and complete), and his unreadiness to follow the advice of your Government, absolved you from looking to any other considerations than those demanded by the interests of peace and good government, while the representations of the local authorities, as well as the Maharaja's previous history, indicated that these interests would in all probability be better served by the acknowledgment as Maharaja of the heir apparent than by the forcible restoration of one who had shown himself incapable of properly exercising the authority conferred upon him.

15. The decision to accept the Jubraj as Maharaja if Sur Chandra Singh was not to be restored followed as a matter of course. He had not taken part in the insurrection; he was the heir apparent; he was supposed to be capable; he had shown himself amenable to advice, and there was practically no other competitor.

16. So far then as the policy of your Government is concerned, I am glad that Her Majesty's Government have been able to afford it their full support. It was honourable; it asserted the rights of the Government of India, and it was calculated to give assurance to feudatory Chiefs. Nor do I doubt that you were right in leaving to the discretion of the Chief Commissioner the details of the method of enforcing your decision.

17. One question remains, which I think may be better dealt with in considering the orders of your Government than in considering the action of your subordinates. I refer to Mr. Quinton's intention for causing the Senapati, should he not surrender, to be arrested in Durbār. I have considered this subject very carefully in the light of your telegram of 11th May last, in which you explained that you had no specific information on this point until the receipt of Mr. Gurdon's telegram of 7th May, and I am satisfied that in giving your sanction to the proposals formulated in Mr. Quinton's telegram of 18th March, you had no reason to contemplate, and in fact did not contemplate, this action. I fully concur with you that nothing like treachery can be imputed to Mr. Quinton in this matter, but care should be taken that persons summoned to attend Durbars, which are almost universally understood to be held for ceremonial purposes, should not be subjected therein to measures of personal restraint.

THE MANIPUR RESOLUTION.

Foreign Department, Simla, the 21st August, 1891.

In March last the Manipur State openly resisted by force of arms the troops of Her Majesty the Queen, Empress of India; and, while this resistance was in progress, Her Majesty's Representative and other British officers were seized and put to death. The Manipur State was thereupon occupied by a British force; and the officer commanding was instructed to place upon their trial all persons suspected of murder or abetment of murder or of having acted as leaders or instigators of revolt. In pursuance of this order the Regent, Kula Chandra Singh, and his brothers, Tikendrajit Singh and Angao Singh, and other persons, were made prisoners and placed upon their trial.

Having regard to the great importance of the question raised in these cases, His Excellency the Governor-General in Council has resolved to draw up a statement of the reasons which have led him to the conclusion that all the accused have committed heinous offences against the State, and deserve exemplary punishment.

2. It is true that these accused persons were with one exception not amenable for the acts charged against them to the municipal law of British India, and that the Courts by which they were tried derived their authority solely from the special Commission under which they were constituted. This Commission issued, as has been correctly apprehended by Mr. Man Mohan Ghose, in the exercise of the prerogative of the Government of India as the Sovereign Power, "for the purpose of bringing to justice persons accused of grave offences, but who not being British subjects were not triable by British Courts," and in consequence of the anxious desire of the Government "to secure to all persons, whether subjects or aliens, that fairness of treatment and that strict justice which a public trial, conducted according to civilised methods and principles, can alone ensure." The Court by which the Regent and his brothers were tried was composed of two of the senior Military Officers on the spot, aided by a civil officer with judicial experience as Deputy Commissioner, and the Governor-General in Council expressly reserved to himself the final determination of the sentences to be passed upon the accused in the event of their being adjudged guilty. The other accused were tried by the Chief Political Officer in Manipur, his sentences being subject to confirmation by the General Officer Commanding the Manipur Field Force. The Government of India called for a report on each case.

3. The Regent, Kula Chandra Singh, was convicted of waging war against the Queen, and was sentenced to death.

Tikendrajit Singh, the Senapati, was convicted both of waging war against the Queen and of abetting the murder of the Chief Commissioner of Assam and other officers, and was sentenced to death.

Angao Singh was convicted of waging war against the Queen and of abetting the murder of the Chief Commissioner and other officers, and was also sentenced to death.

These sentences were submitted to the Government of India for confirmation.

The following were the persons tried by the Chief Political Officer:—

Tongal Singh alias Tongal General; Kajao Manipuri; Niranjan Subadar; Samu Singh, alias Luang Ningthao, Colonel; Nilmoni Singh alias Aiya Parel, Major; Miya Singh, Major; Lokendra Birjit Singh alias Wang Khai Lakpa; Uroo Singh Usurba; Abungjao Yenkorbā; Chowbi Hider Machahal; Ghun Singh Kangdra; Kumba Singh Laisraba; Dhojo Singh Myenba; Noni Singh Nepra Machahal; Trilok Singh Nongtholba Sutwal; Dhan Singh Sugol Senba.

Tongal Singh was convicted of the murder of the Chief Commissioner and other officers, and was sentenced to death.

Kajao Manipuri was convicted of the murder of Mr. Grimwood, and was sentenced to death.

Samu Singh, Colonel, and Aiya Parel, Major, were convicted of waging war against the Queen and of abetment of murder, and were sentenced to death.

Niya Singh, Major, and Niranjan, Subadar, a British subject and an ex-sepoy of Her Majesty's Native Army, were convicted of waging war against the Queen, and were sentenced to death.

Lokendra Birjit Singh alias Wangkhalakpa was convicted of waging war against the Queen, and was sentenced to transportation for life.

Uroo Singh Usurba, Abungjao Yenkorbā, Chowbi Hider Machahal, Ghun Singh Kangdra, Kumba Singh Laisraba, Dhojo Singh Myenba, Noni Singh Nepra Machahal, Trilok Singh Nongtholba Sutwal, and Dhan Singh Sugol Senba were convicted of the murder of the Chief Commissioner and other officers, and were sentenced to death.

4. After being sentenced to death, two of the accused, namely, the Regent, Kula Chandra Singh, and the Senapati, Tikendrajit, asked and received permission to submit petitions to the Governor-General in Council under legal advice, and the Government of India also agreed to receive from their legal adviser a statement of arguments in their defence. These petitions and arguments, together with the records of the various trials mentioned above, have now been before the Governor-General in Council.

5. It has been urged on behalf of the Regent and the Senapati that they had no opportunity of being defended by Counsel. This is an error. Special instructions were given by the Government of India that they should have all reasonable opportunity in this respect, but no application was made by them for professional assistance before their trials began. Since then ample time has been allowed them to represent their case by Counsel, and the papers prepared by Mr. Man Mohan Ghose have been brought before the Government of India everything that can be urged in their defence.

6. Mr. Man Mohan Ghose, as Counsel for the accused, has complained that the language of the written statement of defence put in on behalf of the Senapati has been revised and altered by a British officer since it was signed by him, and has commented upon the inquisitorial character of his oral examination.

The revision of the statement, if it took place as described, was certainly irregular, but the Government of India were careful to understand the passages which are said to have been altered in the sense which they were intended to convey, and Tikendrajit Singh has in no way suffered by the alleged alterations. As regards the oral examination, His Excellency in Council observes that the law of British India not only permits, but requires, that an accused person shall be questioned "for the purpose of enabling him to explain any circumstances appearing against him." The questions were scrupulously recorded, and most of them put before the accused some fact which was either proved or generally known in Manipur, and which, if not explained, might have borne hardly against him. The case against the Senapati, however, in no way depends on anything extracted from himself.

7. It has been urged by the Counsel for the accused that the State of Manipur was independent, and that its rulers were not liable to be tried for waging war against the Queen-Empress, and it is contended that they were justified in repelling an attack made upon the Senapati's house "without even a declaration of war by the British Government."

The Governor-General in Council cannot admit this argument. The degree of subordination in which the Manipur State stood towards the Indian Empire has been more than once explained in connection with these cases; and it must be taken to be proved conclusively that Manipur was a subordinate and protected State which owed submission to the Paramount Power, and that its forcible resistance to a lawful order, whether it be called waging war, treason, rebellion, or by any other name, is an offence, the commission of which justifies the exacting of adequate penalties from individuals concerned in such resistance as well as from the State as a whole. The principles of international law have no bearing upon the relations between the Government of India as representing the Queen-Empress on the one hand, and the Native States under the suzerainty of Her Majesty on the other. The paramount supremacy of the former presupposes and implies the subordination of the latter. In the exercise of their high prerogative, the Government of India have, in Manipur as in other protected States, the unquestioned right to remove by administrative order any person whose presence in the State may seem objectionable. They also had the right to summon a Darbar through their Political representative for the purpose of declaring their decision upon matters connected with the expulsion of the ex-Maharaja, and if their order for the deportation of the Senapati were not obeyed, it was their officer's duty to take proper steps for his forcible apprehension. In the opinion of the Governor-General in Council any armed and violent resistance to such arrest was an act of rebellion, and can no more be justified by a plea of self-defence than could resistance to a police officer armed with a Magistrate's warrant in British India.

8. The Governor-General in Council holds, therefore, that the accused persons were liable to be tried for waging war against the Queen; that they had full opportunity of being represented by Counsel; and that their trial was not prejudiced by any irregularity of procedure.

9. It remains to state the conclusions formed by the Governor-General in Council as to the propriety of the several convictions upon the evidence adduced.

10. The Regent, Kula Chandra Singh, has been convicted of what is in fact rebellion, though acquitted of any complicity in the murders. He was the recognized ruler of Manipur when the occurrences in question took place. He had been the Jubraj or heir-apparent, and, whatever may have been the Maharaja's secret intentions, the evidence clearly shows that His Highness went through a process which was understood by every body to signify abdication, giving up his sword of State and robes which were made over to the accused. Thereupon the accused undertook the management of the State. He assumed the title and authority of Maharaja, and with the title and authority he undertook the responsibilities of the head of the State. All that can be said in his favour is that in practice he subordinated himself to a younger brother possessing greater force of character than himself. He acquiesced in the decision to resist, and, though he left it to others to carry that decision into effect, he allowed them to act under the authority of his name. Further, he accepted the consequences of their acts, and tried to screen them by making false statements to the Government of India.

He was therefore rightly convicted; but nevertheless, in view of the fact that he was a man of weak character and notoriously under the influence of his brother Tikendrajit Singh, His Excellency has determined to commute the sentence into one of transportation, accompanied by forfeiture of private property.

11. The Senapati, Tikendrajit Singh, was the real leader of the revolt, and undoubtedly the most powerful personage in the State. It is not denied that he led the Manipuri troops against those of Her Majesty the Queen-Empress, and used artillery at close quarters against an unfortified building, the official residence of the Representative of the Indian Government, having amongst its inmates an English lady as well as several wounded men. He also appears to admit the truth of the following facts, which have been established by the evidence, with regard to the murder. The Chief Commissioner and those with him were received into the fort for a parley. The Senapati met them and peremptorily insisted that the British troops should surrender their arms. This demand not being acceded to, the Senapati left without taking any precautions for the safe return of the Chief Commissioner and those with him, although they were surrounded by a dangerous and excited crowd. He did, however, on being appealed to by the witness Angao Minto, give him permission to escort them to the Residency if he were able to do so; and when they were attacked, and Mr. Grimwood had been speared, he returned, drove back the mob, and had them placed in the Darbar Hall. He then betook himself to the parapet of the fort, and was found there half an hour later by the witnesses Usurba and Jatra Singh, who told him that the Tongal General had ordered that the officers should be put to death. He replied that he would come and speak to the General, and, after making a circuit of the parapet, he returned to the top-guard, where he had a conversation with the Tongal General on the question whether the officers should or should not be put to death. Within half an hour a distinct order for the officers' execution was given by the Tongal General, standing in the same room where the Senapati was lying down; and thereupon the subordinates who had refused to act on the Tongal General's own order sent for the State executioners and had the officers beheaded.

The Senapati's defence is that he opposed the Tongal General's proposal, and that, being ill and exhausted, and believing the Tongal General was convinced by his arguments, he fell asleep and was only awakened after the murder by the sudden resumption of firing. A careful examination of the evidence, however, shows that the alleged illness did not prevent the Senapati from doing anything which he had a mind to do; while, as regards the resumption of firing, it is proved beyond all reasonable doubt that the Senapati had himself resumed it, and brought a cannon to bear upon the Residency before he held his consultation with the Tongal General. At this time he knew the officers were in his power in the Darbar Hall. It is in evidence that one of them had written a note showing that they regarded themselves as treacherously entrapped, and it is also established that before fire was re-opened under the Senapati's directions, some one had called out from the parapet where he was engaged that the Chief Commissioner would not return.

The Government of India are unable to believe that the Tongal General would have ventured to order the execution of high British officials against the wishes of the Senapati, and they are satisfied upon the whole evidence that the order was really and in truth what the subordinates considered it to be, viz., the joint order of the Tongal General and the Senapati himself.

The Government of India were, therefore, convinced that he was rightly convicted on both counts of the charge. The sentence in this case has therefore been confirmed and carried into execution.

12. The third case is that of Angao Singh, who seems to have assumed the title of Senapati. On his admission he was in command at Thobal; it appears also that he took charge of the west gate at Manipur on the night of the 24th March. Though there is no evidence that he gave any specific order, he was acting throughout as a leader, if not as the Commander-in-Chief, of the forces resisting the representative of the Supreme Government, and there can be no doubt that he waged war against the Queen. It is not to be supposed that the whole truth has been told as to what happened on that eventful night, but there is no evidence from which it can be safely concluded that he abetted the murder of the officers. The Government of India have therefore determined that his conviction on this count cannot be upheld, and the capital penalty will not be inflicted. He has been sentenced to transportation, with forfeiture of property.

13. The cases of the other accused persons presented no difficulties.

The evidence against Tongal Singh was such as to leave no doubt whatever that he ordered the execution of the officers, and has been rightly convicted. The sentence in his case was therefore carried into execution.

Kajao Manipuri admitted that he murdered Mr. Grimwood; and Niranjana, Subadar, a British subject, and formerly a soldier in the British army, was clearly shown to have participated in armed opposition to Her Majesty's troops. In both these cases the sentences of death were carried into execution.

In the cases of Samu Singh and Nilmoni Singh, who were leading men in Manipur, the Government of India did not uphold the conviction on the charge of abetment of murder, but the charge of waging war against the Queen was clearly established. Nevertheless, having regard to the fact that they were acting under orders, the Governor-General in Council commuted the sentences of death to sentences of transportation and forfeiture of property.

The accused Miya Singh and Lokendra Birjit, also leading men in Manipur, admitted that they had taken an active part in the armed resistance offered to Her Majesty's troops. In their cases also, as they had acted under orders, sentences of transportation with forfeiture of property were considered sufficient.

In the cases of Uru Singh Usurba, Abungjao Yonkorba, Chowbi Hider Machahal, Ghun Singh Kangdra, Kumba Singh Laisraba, Dhojo Singh Myenba, Noni Singh Nepa Machahal, Trilok Singh Nongtholba Sutwal, and Dhon Singh Sugol Senba, it was clear that the accused, though on their own statements guilty of murder, were persons in subordinate positions, and acted under the orders of others. They were, therefore, sentenced to transportation.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—These world-renowned remedies are confidently recommended to miners, navvies, and all who have to work underground, or where noxious atmospheres exist. The minute particles of coal or metal which premeate the air in such places tend to block up the lungs and air-tubes, giving rise to bronchitis, asthma and palpitation of the heart. In Holloway's remedies will be found a safe and easily used medicament, for the penetrating properties of the Ointment relieve the local congestions and the mildly laxative effects of the Pills cause the liver to act freely, and the breath to become unembarrassed. By early resort to these remedies many a serious illness may be averted, and soundness of health maintained.

THE CAPTIVE LADIE.

By the late MICHAEL MADHUSUDAN DUTT.

REPRINTED FROM THE MADRAS EDITION OF 1849.

"I look'd around,—it was no sleep,
But some mysterious trance and deep,
When tho' sight-sense suspended be,
The spirit wakes to feel and see !—
I look'd around,—and now there stole,
The sweetest perfumes o'er my soul,
And softest sounds, such as the bee,
Breathes when on wing of melody,
He woos the sweets of fairest flow'rs,
And revels in the noon-tide bow'rs ;
And then a soft and cloudless ray,
Shone bright as smile of sunniest day,
I look'd—there stood beside my bed,
A child of Light—a heavenly maid* !—
Upon her brow a diadem,
Glisten'd with many a starry gem ;
But the calm lustre of her eye,
Methought aye pal'd their radiance,—
And dewy wreaths of flowers that be,
From realms of Immortality,
Encircling bloom'd—all beauteously !
A moon-lit halo around her shone,
Like dreams of Joy link'd 'round Love's throne,
And sweet the acry symphony,
From viewless harps came sweeping by !—
She spoke,—oh ! like a nameless spell,
Her voice upon my spirit fell !
'Daughter,' she said, 'man's pride and pow'r,
'Are things but of a day—an hour,
'A sun-bright bubble of the sea,
'Which rises but to burst and flee—
'A glance of Light—a fleet-wing'd ray,
'Which shines, but shines to fade away !—
'Then grieve not for a bitter doom,
'Now hangs o'er thee and thine in gloom ;
'And I must go,—'tis to fulfil,
'Eternal Brim's mysterious will ;
'Farewell !—but soon the realms above,
'Will welcome thee to joy and love !'
She vanish'd with her viewless train,—
And then, methought, I dreamt again.

"I dreamt,—I stood in saddest mood,
Within a chamber's solitude,

'Twas in a castle high and lone,
And pale the moon-light o'er it shone,
And sound of sleepless waters there,
Came hoarsely on the dewy air ;—
I look'd me thro' the lattice high,
On desert earth, and boundless sky,
Like prison'd bird which yearns to fly :
But suddenly the voice of song,
In echo'd strains now roll'd along :—
It was a lay of warrior-deed,
Of foemen fierce who met to bleed,—
I listen'd with a throbbing heart,
And hueless cheek and lips apart,
For Memory whisper'd words that came,
Like breath of all-consuming flame !
I look'd and shriek'd—a faded flow'r,
Pluckt from our last, sad trysting bow'r,
I dropp'd ere sight and sense all fled,
And left me there—unheeded—dead.
But when I woke, a mingl'd sound,
Of dashing waters rung around,
I look'd and saw thee by my side
Upon the dark and heaving tide,
On lightest skiff which seem'd to sweep
Along the bosom of the deep
Like falcon cleaving thro' the air,—
Like lion bounding from his lair !
I heard thy words—'Love ! fear no more,
'Dost see a steed on yonder shore ?
'Twill waft thee far from donjon gloom,
'To festal halls—and bow'rs of bloom !'—

"Again I dreamt :—I saw a pyre
Blaze high with fiercely gleaming fire ;
And one there-came,—a warrior he,—
Tho' faint yet bold,—undauntedly,
And plung'd—oh ! God ! into the flame
Which like a hungry monster rose,
And circl'd round his quivering frame,
A hideous curtain—waving close !
I shriek'd—but, tell me why that start,
And paler brow—and heaving heart ?
Oh ! tell me, hath my royal sire
Forgot his deep and ruthless ire,
And come and crush'd our foemen dire ?"

"Baiza ! thy father's ruthless ire
Hath lit for me a funeral pyre !—
Nay—start not, Love !—a warrior's bride
Must have his heart of fearless pride !—
Of bitterest taunts and stinging jest,
Would madden e'en a coward breast,
Is his reply,—Oh ! why didst thou
With tearful eye and pallid brow,

* Sri—or Lutchmee—the goddess of Fortune, Plenty and Beauty. The three worthies—Cali, Sheva and Sri—are supposed to be the guardian deities of royal families.—I have, in introducing them here, availed myself of the popular belief, common amongst all heathens, that when misfortune is about to befall a family, its Penates desert it.

* Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

Urge me to sue and sue in vain,
 And court disgrace—vile insult,—pain?
 But hear. He said—'why seeks relief
 'From me a proud and valiant chief,
 'Whose minstrel-skill can win and steal
 'Hearts, ere they learn what 'tis to feel!
 'Why charms he not,—if that his blade
 'Doth love its sheath—as if afraid
 'Lest blood like touch of blighting dew
 'Should rob it of its sheen and hue,—
 'Why charms he not his foemen strong
 'By roundelay and lovesome song?'—
 And then in words of withering hate,
 Which burst like doom to desolate,
 He curst me,—'yes,—let Moslem tread
 'Crush,—trample on the dastard-head
 'Of him who pluckt my sweetest flow'r,
 'The joy,—the glory of my bow'r!'
 And like the monarch of the wood,
 When in his home of solitude,
 There rings the wild, exulting cry
 Of hound and hunter fearlessly,
 He raged and fiercely called me knave,
 And, oh! my God!—a coward slave!
 Ah!—he forgot the day when blood,
 Flow'd in his hall like winter flood,
 Where thousands throng'd and met to die,—
 His fearful feast of Victory!
 But let that pass;—'tis all in vain
 To call the past to live again!—
 Baiza! arise, there is a steed
 Awaits below of whirlwind speed,
 Oh! rise and to thy father's hall,
 Flee,—all is lost—yes—dearest! all!
 For when the sun of yesterday
 Hied to his ocean-home away
 His golden smile fell on the grave
 Of those, alas!—alone could save!
 Oh! flee, ere yet disgrace and shame
 Stain,—foully stain—my honour, name!
 Yes—all is lost,—they, too, are gone,
 The heavenly guardians of my throne:—
 I knew 'twas so,—for when tonight
 I wander'd by the moonshine bright,
 Aue trod each lone, deserted fane,
 I ne'er must see and tread again,
 I saw each image prostrate thrown,
 And heard, methought, a voice of moan,
 As if sad, aery mourners' wail
 Came there upon the viewless gale!

THE greatest American is dead. He died of a tumour in the liver which appeared eighteen months ago. The English Queen, through Lord Salisbury, expressed to the American President Harrison her sorrow and regret at the death. Lord Tennyson sent the following message to the American press:—"England and America will mourn Lowell's death. They loved him and he loved them. Pray express for myself and mine sincerest sympathy with family." Mr. Walter Besant telegraphed from Dartmoor English Authors' Society's "deepest regrets and sympathy with Americans on death of that great writer, their friend Lowell." Mr. Bret Harte writes:—"To my pride as an American in the frank admiration and loving appreciation shewn to Mr. Lowell's intellect, character and personality here, I have to add my own sorrow for the loss of one of the most fastidious and cultivated professors of my calling, and one of its gentlest yet manliest critics."

WE read that the burn produced by nitric acid may be successfully treated by a dilute solution of sulphurous acid. Another exemplification of the principle of ancient Hindu Therapeutics, that poison is the medicine for poison.

IN Victoria, Australia, they have found eucalyptus a good disinfectant in sick rooms. After a trial of twelve months, Dr. Curgenven states that in cases of scarlet fever, green branches of the plant placed under the bed, thoroughly disinfect the bedding, the volatile vapour penetrating and saturating the mattress and every other article in the room. The vapour also acts beneficially upon phthisical patients, acting as an antiseptic, a sedative and an hypnotic.

DURING the last month, 37,126 persons visited the Indian Museum, that is, 442 male and 116 female Europeans, and 28,705 male and 7,863 female Natives of India, or a daily average, during the 23 days on which the Institution was open to the general public, of 1,614.

THE Dindigul District Munsiff has found Second-grade Pleader P. N. Subramany Iyer guilty of unprofessional conduct for

"(1) not having supplied the necessary stamped papers called for preparing the copies of depositions applied for by the accused Pleader in a certain suit in which he had been engaged; (2) having put in an affidavit in the District Court stating that he had applied for copies of the judgment and decree in the said suit when he had not done so; and (3) in casting blame on the Court for not having granted copies of the judgment and decree in the suit when, as a matter of fact, he had not applied for such copies."

The pleader has been suspended pending the orders of the High Court.

HERE is criminal litigation in its most respectable, not to say welcome, guise:—

"At Brighton Quarter Sessions, Frederick James Muspratt, 24, graduate of Cambridge University, and said to be studying for the Church, was indicted for sending to Ethel Guest, 12, Walpoleterrace, Brighton, a letter threatening to kill her. Prisoner had been in custody nearly two months. At the previous hearing it was stated that the prisoner had been engaged to Miss Guest for some time, and then letters were sent by him to her of such a character that her mother compelled her to break off the engagement. Miss Guest was sent away, but the prisoner persistently followed her and her friends from place to place, eventually sending the letter complained of. The prisoner also brought a Shakespeare, and sent a bullet through a page of Othello, and also smeared the page with blood, and sent the book to Miss Guest. Mr. Marshall Hall now stated that, looking at the peculiar relationship that had existed between the parties, and that the prisoner was prepared to give an undertaking to go to Australia, and not to return for three years, he would offer no evidence. Mr. Gill, for the defence, concurred, and a formal verdict of Not Guilty was returned."

We confess we do not understand how a bullet was sent through a page of Othello. Nor is the difficulty lessened by the smearing of the page with gore and the whole book being sent to the poor lady. It is clear, at any rate, that literature is more and more being put to much ignoble use. Only a fortnight back, we had to announce the dastardly attempt at massacre of a minister of state and his whole family through the Post. In that too, a book was used, but a portion of the letter-press was cut out to make room for the destroyer in the shape of fulminate of mercury which was inserted. However, all's well that ends well. Bloody Love is a fool, and he has been sent to the right about at the antipodes to take the mischief out of him.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

MADRAS has protested against the extension of jurisdiction of the local Small Cause Court. We are not in the secret as to why some of the local merchants joined in the movement. From the telegraphic report of the proceedings it appears, that a resolution was moved to the effect that in the opinion of the meeting no reason had been shown for putting the Court of Madras on an exceptional footing, as compared with the Courts of Calcutta and Bombay. The advocates of extended jurisdiction fully agree with the mover of this resolution. Surely, there is no reason why the Courts of Madras should be placed on an exceptional footing. Evidently, the better course would be to make the proposed legislation applicable to Calcutta and Bombay also. Such innovation might interfere with some vested interests but would be a great boon to the public. The Government doubtless see this as well as outsiders. But Government know their own business better than anybody else can teach them. They do not want to stir all the Presidencies against them. Abuses are best attacked in detail. When one metropolis is reformed and the change is successfully worked out and accepted, it will be time enough to take in hand another. Meanwhile, advantage is taken of the experience and talents of Sir P. P. Hutchins to begin with Madras. The meeting (held on Friday the 28th August) was divided in opinion. Many amendments were proposed and the final deliberations postponed to yesterday.

THE Tribune of Lahore has started a new grievance. In its issue of the 29th August, our contemporary thus laments, in the interest of the suitor, the introduction of printing in the Punjab Chief Court:—

"The Chief Court of the Punjab was started in 1866. For nearly twenty years the system of printing judgments and records was not in vogue. Yet the work of the Court went on very satisfactorily. But with the passing of the Punjab Reorganisation Act of 1884, the old system was found to be insufficient and the rule regarding the printing of judgments and records was introduced. This rule is undoubtedly very convenient to the Judges as well as to the members of the Bar, but as for the litigants it would be no exaggeration to say that it is ruinous to most of them. The tax on justice is heavy enough in all conscience and has called forth some very loud protests. Add to it the printing charges, and the result is something astounding. It is not an uncommon thing for an appellant in the Chief Court, who has had the good fortune or misfortune as one may call it to file a first appeal, to be asked to pay a much higher sum for printing charges than he has had to pay to Government in the shape of Court fee stamps. Cases indeed have been mentioned to us in which the printing charges have trebled or quadrupled the law stamp charges. It thus happens that while the stamps on an appeal do not exceed Rs. 200 in value, the appellant is required to pay down Rs. 600 or Rs. 800 for printing the records of the case, in other words, a sum of about a thousand rupees is demanded from him before he can obtain a proper hearing of his case, though the value of his suit may not much exceed Rs. 5,000. We are not sure that it is right to compel people to purchase justice at such a dear rate. The practice may be very convenient from the Judge's and the Counsel's point of view, but is it equally so from the point of view of the litigant? Of all the three, he is certainly the most interested party and his hardship therefore may reasonably demand some consideration."

To say the least, that comes with ill grace from one whose business is printing. When the reader learns that it is a lawyer that writes, his astonishment will be all the greater at the heroism of the complaint. Is it possible that the printing drains too much of the substance of the suitor to leave sufficient margin for the pleaders? Be that what it may, our contemporary shows extraordinary courage and no little originality in its objective of hostility. It has selected for attack the greatest invention of the human race. Such a war is lost before it is begun. It is too late in the day, even in the Punjab with its "Oriental University," to revert to the rule of katebs and mohurors and an army of copying amlah. The benefits of the press, even in the sphere of litigation, are many and obvious. A printed brief is to the advantage equally of the suitor, the Judge, and the advocate. It is cruelty in these advancing times to ask a man to wade through pages of manuscript, in various hands and fashions. Printing nowadays is as cheap as anything. We are not sure that in the long run a printed record of a case is more costly than all the expenses for fair copies, authenticated copies and all of records taken together. It, moreover, reduces the risk of omission and misleading. Certainly, it may be hard on one party to pay down in a lump sum the cost of printing an entire record when complete. Why not distribute it on both parties at the various stages of a suit? Rules might be framed towards that end.

In strict equity, no doubt, the bench and the bar are liable to pay the enhanced cost of preparation, though they are not unprovided with arguments for repelling the invasion on their purses. It is well worth the consideration of Government, whether they could relieve the suitor, by making the judiciary and the counsel pay for their convenience.

MAHOMED SADEQ, a constable attached to the Balim Bazar outpost, Monghyr, deputed by his superior to make certain enquiries about a budmash, one Kasi Dosadh, a servant of one Mr. Macnaghten, among other houses, called at Mr. G. S. Sykes', and walking, (as Mr. Sykes complained,) through the outer and inner verandahs, entered the outer drawing-room with his shoes on and an umbrella under his arm. The owner objecting to the constable entering his rooms with shoes on, the constable left the room and re-entered it without them but still with the umbrella under his arm. He then asked certain questions and took notes. The owner of the house, while denying all knowledge of the budmash, told the constable that he had no right to ask him such questions nor any right to be in the room. The owner then got the constable to give up his name and told him he would report him. Sadeq, in an insolent tone, said that the owner had power to do so, and then left the premises. Mr. Sykes complained of the conduct of the constable to the District Superintendent of Police who fined Sadeq departmentally one rupee. Mr. Sykes also prosecuted the constable for house-trespass. The Deputy Magistrate of Monghyr, Mr. W. F. C. Montion, fined the accused additional five rupees for the offence charged, with the following remarks:—

"Well, it appears to me that accused's conduct was very annoying; his entering the house with shoes on cannot be attributed to ignorance as argued by his pleader; for he would not have entered the house of any official in that manner; true he took off his shoes when directed to do so, yet his subsequent conduct shows that he considered both complainant and Mr. Macdonald anything but persons deserving of respect and deference. Mr. Sykes complains of his tone and disrespectful manner, and that I think rightly, the wonder is Mr. Sykes did not eject him forcibly instead of treating him with such leniency as it appears he did, especially when he was so put out. Mr. Sykes also complains of the discourteous manner in which he was treated by the District Superintendent of Police, to whom he reported the conduct of the accused; but that matter this Court has nothing to do with, except to remark that a fine of one rupee was a very light punishment. Taking the above circumstances into consideration, I am of opinion that although accused when he entered Mr. Sykes' house had no intention of insulting him, he did after making such entry behave in an insulting manner, and has thereby made himself amenable to punishment under section 448, I. P. C."

The Police generally—the generality—are insolent and overbearing everywhere to natives as a rule. It is, however, but rarely that a white man is subjected to such annoyance. Mahomed Sadeq was a bold fellow who made no exception. But surely the Police are entitled to justice—even this bear of a Sadeq not excepted. In Madras, the entering a court with shoes on is an offence punishable for contempt of court. In Monghyr, entering a Christian drawing-room is house trespass under the Indian Penal Code. According to the Magistrate, the entry was not illegal, but the constable laid himself open to the charge by his insolent behaviour while in the house. It could not, however, be an offence unless he "unlawfully remained there with intent thereby to insult." Who will say that the requirements of the law were fulfilled in this case? The magistrate himself admits that Sadeq did not go to Mr. Sykes's house for an unlawful purpose. If given to quizzing, poor Sadeq may find consolation in his fall by gravely telling the Nazarenes that he went to Sykes Sahab's house for a necessary purpose. Nor, having entered lawfully, did he tarry for an unlawful or unnecessary purpose. His "cheek" was conscious, but not having tarried a moment beyond he was required, we doubt whether he offended under the law, however he might have sinned against the manners of good society or shown unbecoming temper. The judgment is more remarkable for sympathy towards Mr. Sykes than fairness towards Sadeq.

CHARLES STUART, alias Professor Stuart, alias Professor Huxley, age 21, was charged, on remand, at the Bowstreet Police-Court with unlawfully pretending and professing to tell fortunes by hand-writing and other means, with intent to defraud, on the following advertisement—" Marriage. Success. What to avoid, &c. Send hand-writing, age, six stamps, and envelope for reply to Professor Stuart, 54, Fout-hill-road Finsbury-park." During the remand 212 letters had been seized with stamps amounting to 6*l.* 3*s.* 2*d.*, from persons asking for their fortunes to be told. Two hundred and five letters were from women and seven from men, including letters from Constantinople. Mr. Crawshaw, who defended the prisoner, while admitting that his client was technically guilty under the law, contended that the prisoner was a young man and only aped what so many are doing every day, and that there was no evidence of fraud, but only of complaints made. Sir John Bridge said all punishments were for the prevention of crime. There were silly and foolish people in the world who could not protect themselves. The business that the defendant had carried on, could not have been but for the credulity of weak, foolish and silly people. He concluded by saying, "I can only protect them by punishment of such persons as the prisoner. I must sentence him to three months' hard labor." What an amiable young man is sacrificed to the injustice of the world! This folly of the world tempts his enterprising spirit. He falls. Then the world's man—the magistrate—arrives on the scene, seizes and binds him and unmercifully lays the rod on the poor fellow. Was ever injustice more grievous? But then the conditions of the thing were all well-understood beforehand. There is no surprise and no breach of faith. The only score on which Stuart can complain is that so many, worse than he, escape. In fact, the majority of those who are tempted by the credulity of the people to turn a penny or a pound (as the case may be) go scotfree, are not even subjected to the disagreeables of an inquiry. The vengeance of the law is all right, but it does not overtake all alike. Therein, lies the injustice, if any.

THE old world martinet—and there are many such still in our modern world on the eve of the Twentieth Century—regards the invention, patented by the Times, of the War Correspondent a mistake. And many excellent people besides look upon the machinery as worked a veritable nuisance. But men of manly hearts and liberal views have from the first welcomed the innovation as a reform, and the instinct of the masses has recognised it as a blessing. Students see at once the value of it in forming a body of authentic contemporary history. Were it not for the War Special, we should be at the mercy of lying despatches and interested officials for accounts of the great wars which have taken place since the temple of Janus was closed after the Forty years' Peace. The institution is valuable not only for what is disclosed as the events occur, but also for what is withheld and may be afterwards given out. That an independent witness should accompany great international operations to be able to tell the world what is what and how was which, cannot but be good. It is not, of course, expedient to tell everything at the time, but the truth is recorded in private diary or deposited in the memory, for future publication. Hence the supplementary revelations of Specials, which form the most valuable materials for the historian. Such are Dr. W. H. Russell's Recollections of the Battle of the Alma which have recently been appearing in the Army and Navy Gazette. And now the Heir Apparent to the throne of the Specials, Mr. Archibald Forbes, is following the example of the King, with "A War Correspondent's Reminiscences" in the August number of the Nineteenth Century. The writer relates his experiences of the Franco-Prussian war of 1870-71, which he reported in such a masterly way under enormous difficulties for the Daily News. He reverts to the old scenes with all his youthful enthusiasm. Indeed, what surprises us most is the abounding vitality of these records. Some two or three years after his war service, we made Mr. Forbes's acquaintance in India, at the house of the then Foreign Secretary (Sir Charles Aitchison), and he was none the worse for his wear and tear in the field. But then sixteen years have gone by, and he is not only as hale and hearty as ever but actually bouncing like a boy. In fact, he combines the reflection of age with the "go" of youth. We will extract one passage not more remarkable as a literary effort than important for the characters and the historic situation introduced therein :—

"Perhaps the most thrilling episode of all that colossal struggle was the singularly dramatic climax of the battle of Gravelotte. All day long, from noon until the going down of the sun, the roar of the cannon and the roll of the musketry had been incessant. The deep ravine between Gravelotte and St. Hubert was a horrible pandemonium wherein seethed struggling masses of German soldiers, torn by the shell-fire of the French batteries, writhing under the stings of the mitrailleuse, bewildered between inevitable death in front and no less inevitable disgrace behind. Again and again frantic efforts were being made to force up out of the hell in the ravine and gain foothold in the edge of the plateau beyond ; and ever the cruel sleet of lead beat them back and crushed them down. The long summer day was waning into dusk, and the fortunes of the battle still trembled in the balance, when the last reserve of the Germans—the second army corps—came hurrying up toward the brink of the abyss. In the lurid glare of the blazing village the German King stood by the wayside and greeted his stalwart Pomeranians as they passed him. High over the roll of the drums, the blare of the bugles, and the crash of the cannon, rose the eager burst of cheering as the soldiers answered their Sovereign's greeting, and then followed their chiefs down into the fell depths of the terrible chasm. The strain of the crisis was sickening as we waited for the issue, in a sort of spasm of sombre silence. The old King sat, with his back against a wall, on a ladder, one end of which rested on a broken gun-carriage, the other on a dead horse. Bismarck, with an elaborate assumption of coolness which his restlessness belied, made pretence to be reading letters. The roar of the close battle swelled and deepened till the very ground trembled beneath us. The night fell like a pall, but the blaze of the adjacent conflagration lit up the anxious group here by the churchyard wall. From out the medley of broken troops littering the slope in front rose suddenly a great shout, that grew in volume as it rolled nearer. The hoofs of a galloping horse rattled on the causeway. A moment later, Moltke, his face for once quivering with emotion, sprang from the saddle, and, running towards the King, cried out, 'it is good for us ; we have carried the position, and the victory is with your Majesty !' The King started to his feet with a fervent 'God be thanked !' and then burst into tears. Bismarck, with a great sigh of relief, crushed his letters in the hollow of his hand, and a simultaneous hurrah welcomed the good tidings."

That is powerful writing. It is not faultless. There is, for one thing, too much "hell" for our taste. But how vivid is the picture ! The artist seems to pierce his canvas with his brush.

WE talk lightly of misprints. Much of his anxiety disappears if a literary man discover that the errors in his publication are errors of the press. Indeed, the printer has become the standing scape-goat of incompetent authorship. This is too hard upon the subordinate department. The press is fertile and rich in blundering and is capable of making nonsense of any book, pamphlet or newspaper without literary assistance. We frequently meet with lapses, more or less ludicrous. Sometimes, they are provocative of different, even opposite, sensations. Occasionally, they are so serious as to compromise the credit and fortune of the concern. Nor is any concern, however high or habitually careful, above such compromising phenomena. Certainly, no journal in India, or out of it for that matter, is so uniformly carefully printed and edited as the Times of India. How humiliating it was on one occasion may be seen in the following :—

“ Printers sometimes make strange bulls. An Anglo-Indian journal got into serious trouble once owing to a strange misprint writing of Sir Salar Jung the Great. The printer's devil changed 'princely minister' into 'princely monster.' The editor on discovering the error at once wrote to the Minister explaining how it occurred and made a most abject apology, but the distinguished Hydrabadian was mad and it was only by the intervention of high Government officials that the Times of India was not sued for Rs. 70,000 damages, and the Editor seized and thrown into gaol for libel.”

A few years back, the great Times itself was made the victim of an awful misprint. It was the result of a diabolical conspiracy or mad impulse of mischievousness of some of the imps in Pandemonium. The leading journal was just saved from dire disgrace, or perhaps simple ruin, by timely discovery, so that the circulation of the issue was arrested and the copies already delivered to the public were recalled. It was said that the Times office paid exorbitant prices for a small number of copies which had fallen into ungenerous hands. Such was the Times' anxiety to destroy every vestige of its shame.

HERE is an unexpected testimony to the truth of the much abused Bengali :—

"On Board the steamer, we came home with a distinguished Calcutta merchant, a former member of the Legislative Council, returning to England for good, after forty years spent in business in India; and on enquiring what his opinion of the honesty of the natives of India was he said emphatically, that he had almost always had hundreds of thousands of rupees in the hands of native cultivators of Indian produce, indigo, jute, etc, and had never had a written contract with them, and had never suffered loss amounting to a four-anna piece! Strong testimony from a practical man, well able to judge, and quite as reliable as that of some English Barrister at Bombay or Calcutta who feels the competition of the keen wit of the Bengali Baboos, who has probably never moved out of a very narrow circle, and who has scarcely ever visited a town other than the one in which he practises."

This gentleman's lines were evidently cast in pleasant and pure places. Since the appearance of the Abbe Raynal's "Philosophical and Political History of the European Commerce in both Indies," no such testimony to the truth and simplicity, the virtue and happiness of the Indian people has been given to the world. We wonder who is the gentleman who has retired from the East with so much satisfaction. It would be more to the purpose to discover him than to identify Dr. Penterost's friend "Mr. T."

• THE LEITNER MAHA SABHA IN LONDON.

DR. Leitner the irrepressible has, by hook or by crook, managed to get up a tolerable imitation of an Oriental Congress. Considering the enormous difficulties he had to contend with, in the absence of personal prestige in Europe, either as a scholar or a magnate, himself being nothing more than a retired schoolmaster from the East, it cannot be said that the Doctor's old good luck has deserted him in his age, any more than his energy. It is not easy, in a great capital like London, to make even a make-believe demonstration of the kind that will pass muster. We unfeignedly admire his pluck and perseverance as well as tact. He seems to have induced the European Indians to make common cause with him. His friends seem to have come to his help in right earnest. To gather together a true meeting of Oriental learning of all the nations, was not in his power, and he has not brought about such a conference. His prospectus is formidable in its array of names. They are all respectable names, many of them names of distinction or eminence, but they are scarcely germane to the object in view. They would do very well for giving éclat to a board of directors of a new bank. The names of men famous for Oriental scholarship or research, are conspicuous by their paucity. Even as regards the names on the list, we have reason to doubt whether the men will all be forthcoming. We know how, in the stress of need, these things are done. On a late occasion, in our city, names were included without any warrant. Protests are provoked in such cases, but they rarely get into print, and the generality too lazy or weak to complain, thinking it enough to keep themselves out of the business. In Europe, people are more active and apt to catch fire at anything which has an underhand appearance. Many, doubtless, have been the refusals and scowls to which the London Sabha has been treated. In fact, the Oriental lore of both Hemispheres turned its back on the project. The very men whom it is the object of these international palavers to attract and bring together, in the interest of learning and science, would have none of it. In place of them, we have Lords and Baronets and any amount of Knights, particularly of the Indian kind. Still the Congress is Oriental, inasmuch as there is a strong element of ex-Indian collectors and magistrates and secretaries—men who presumably appeared, at some period of their lives, before a board of seniors in their service, assisted by a Moonshee and a Pandit, to pass in the works of Meer Aman and Laloo Lal. Dr. Leitner's manifesto, in the names of the former rulers of India or Indian Provinces or Divisions, fell flat upon the learned circles on the Continent and in the United States. It certainly failed to secure the co-operation of bonâ fide Orientalists. With the exception of two Frenchmen and a Dutchman, not one of the great savants of France, Holland, Germany, Russia, Austria, or Italy, or America had joined the movement. To complete the failure, all the six Asiatic Societies in Europe and the sole trans-Atlantic body of the kind, the Oriental Society of America, have declined connection with it.

So much for the International Oriental Congress!

For all that, there is neither wane of courage nor diminution of assurance in the author. He goes on, if not proudly and gaily, as before, yet unabashed and firm. With the punctuality of a British business, the Congress was true to time—the day and hour. We better give the news of the meeting, which, up to this moment, the Indian public is in possession of. A Reuter telegram under date London, September 2, says :—

"The International Oriental Congress was opened yesterday by Mr. Charles Taylor, headmaster of St. John's College, Cambridge University, in the absence of Lord Dufferin, through indisposition. Thirty-seven different nationalities were represented at the Congress. In the opening address the Chairman dwelt on the services rendered by the Arabs to science, and said that the West still continued to learn from the East. Doctor Leitner said that the present Congress promised to be a great success, and he hoped it would be possible to found an annual Congress, each country to be visited by the International Congress."

It is no fault of the prime mover, any more of the President elect, that, at the nick of time, Lord Dufferin fell ill. That is another omen of the Panjabi Doctor's bad luck throughout this matter. This sudden failure of the sober and punctual Marquis of Dufferin and Ava, without timely warning, on such an occasion, is so extraordinary that we cannot help suspecting that thereby hangs a tale. In stress of weather, the promoters were glad to find any show of a harbour to put to. Their distress must have been great and their connections not very enviable, when they were grateful to a schoolmaster, utterly unknown, to lead them and deliver the opening address. The tall talking necessary to puff the concern, poor simple Mr. Taylor was, of course, unequal to, and it was supplied by the everlasting, if not the Angelic, Doctor himself.

THE FUTURE OF SANSKRIT LEARNING.

It is generally complained that, under the overshadowing influence of English education, the study of the Sanskrit language and literature is fast decaying, and it is even apprehended that the time is coming when it would cease altogether. If the smattering imparted in the English schools and colleges, through Upakramanikâs, and Rijupâts, be, as it ought to be, left out of account, then this gloomy view is not entirely without grounds. When Professor Wilson visited Nuddea in the year 1829, there were in that town alone more than twenty-five toles or indigenous Sanskrit colleges, with from 500 to 600 pupils. In 1863, Mr. Cowell found a dozen toles with about 150 pupils. The number of these has been steadily diminishing, and at present there are about half-a-dozen toles with a corresponding diminution in the number of students. Even at the time of Mr. Cowell's visit, there was a flourishing grammar school in Nuddea with more than 200 pupils. It taught the Sanskrit grammar and vocabulary, and also initiated the students in the study of Sanskrit literature, so as to prepare them for the special training in Logic or Law which was imparted in toles. The decadence of Sanskrit is presumably going on at the same rate in all parts of the country where it used to be cultivated formerly.

Nor is the fact surprising. While several lacs of rupees are spent by Government annually for the support of English and Vernacular schools of sorts, not a single rupee is paid towards the support of the indigenous toles which, from time immemorial, have been the chief means of preserving and contributing towards the growth of Sanskrit literature in Bengal. Then, again, while a knowledge of English opens the road to power and preferment, the native Sanskritists have little or no prospect whatever in the world beyond that of living on the voluntary charity of the orthodox among their well-to-do countrymen. So completely are their claims ignored that, even in their special branches of learning, they are treated as no bodies; and English lawyers not only administer Hindu law, but write books on it and teach it as professors of law in our English colleges. The absurdity reached its climax when the authorities of the Calcutta University invited a German Sanskritist to lecture on Hindu Law. Owing to the exclusive importance attached to English education, the Bhattacharjees, or the great Professors of Sanskrit, have become the butts of ridicule, instead of being objects of veneration as they were in bygone times. The veriest Railway Baboo, with hardly any knowledge of English beyond "all right" and "ring the bell," thinks that he is a bigger and more intelligent man than the expounders of the learning of his ancestors. Under these circumstances, the only wonder is that the Sanskrit language and literature are still studied in the country, and have not become altogether things of the past.

It is understood that our Government has under its consideration a scheme for subsidising our indigenous Sanskrit colleges. Not being acquainted with its details, we are not in a position to pass any opinion as to its merits. Whatever its nature may be, the preliminary steps now being taken by Government fill us with misgivings, and make us apprehend that the scheme might prove a failure, like the Government Sanskrit College and the Title Examination.

Sir Alfred Croft, the Director of Public Instruction in Bengal, in a letter written by him to the Government of Bengal in the year 1886, expressed his surprise that "the Nuddea Pandits have, ever since its institution, held strangely aloof from the Sanskrit title examination." The explanation of what he regards as a mystery, is, however, so obvious that, without going into it, we need only ask him whether he would expect an Oxonian or a Cambridge man to send his son to one of the hill schools of this country.

The great problem now is to bring Western and Eastern learning en rapport. This can be done only by a gradual but a steady change in the curriculum of the toles. The revolution that has been accomplished in the European Universities, has yet to be initiated in our ancient seats of learning. To introduce Geography or Arithmetic in the toles, would amount to an absurdity. But we think that the introduction of European logic, philosophy, astronomy and philology is within the range of practical politics. The matter, however, is of great nicety demanding much caution. At any rate, we cannot answer for success of the reform, unless, for one thing, the plan of operations be entrusted to better hands than the political Mahamahopadhaya who is the confidential adviser of Government in these matters.

The branches of learning which are now cultivated in the toles do not, in our opinion, deserve much encouragement. The dissertations and discussions on the funeral pindas, yoga, maya, atmagnyana, inter-calary months and Kusha grass, may have an immense importance still in the estimation of thousands. The Pandits themselves, specially the professors of philosophy, know what value to attach to what knowledge or what controversy. To ourselves, it seems that, in the remote future, the value of Sanskrit will rest chiefly on its importance in connection with philology and antiquarian research. Some progress has been made in these studies by European scholars. But the errors into which they are betrayed at every step can not be avoided, except by the kind of deep learning which only the Native Pandits possess. As an instance in support of the view that we take, we may refer to the erroneous conjecture hazarded by Mr. Talboys Wheeler as to the identity of Paundravardhana with Burdwan and Panduah. But the mantra for the worship of the river Karatoya shews that Paundravardhana is the country watered by that river, and does not embrace any portion of Burdwan or Hoogly. This is but one of many errors, more or less ludicrous, in the field of Indian archæology, and we can not expect to get rid of them so long as Indian learning is not brought into closer contact with European capacity for original research.

We have, in what is stated above, enunciated the problem. To suggest a solution is not so easy. All that we can say at present, is that Government ought to give greater encouragement to the publication and translation of the Sanskrit books that we possess. It seems to us also worth while to encourage the translation of European science, philology, logic and astronomy into Sanskrit. The bringing about of such translations and publications would be a source of income to the Pandits qualified for the task, and at the same time would further the cause of science by inducing them to put their shoulders to its wheels.

The greatest desideratum at present is the fact that very few books are available to the Pandits. The first step towards encouraging indigenous Sanskrit learning would be to set up good libraries in the important centres of Sanskrit culture. There is a Sanskrit saying according to which the man possessing the largest number of books is the most learned man. There is a great deal of truth in this definition of learning, and surely our Government can, at a very little cost, increase the stock of learning of our Pandits, and prepare the way towards the removal of their prejudices and superstition.

* THE POWER OF FINE WORDS.

FINE words are not always fine. The expression is equivocal, and is getting more and more ironical in our sarcastic times. But there is no other word to express the original meaning in a bland serious way. So we must stick to our much-abused fine.

Fine words, like other artistic productions, are a potent weapon for good as well as evil. The poet, the orator, and the humourist are the authors of well chosen expressions, and they know how to wield them without running any danger. The men of learning and culture are connoisseurs who can enjoy them without allowing them to blind their sober judgment. It is only the illiterate classes that generally fall victim to the enchantment of words and phrases. In the attempt to imbibe the sweets, the man of undisciplined mind goes beyond his depth, and is sometimes drowned altogether. The tickling and the hilarity caused by the language of a syren tongue, are too much for the unlettered, and they break down completely unless sustained by a strong common sense.

The misrepresentations of the vernacular press are seldom couched in what may, with even a shadow of justification, be called fine words. The rabid writings of the penny papers need not be taken into consideration in connection with the subject-matter of our present analysis. We do not mean to say that the sort of stuff which forms the staple of such journalism, is perfectly innocuous and harmless. But the men whom it inebriates with its coarse rum and pachui, are of the poorest class intellectually.

The only remedy against its mischievous influence on them, is a sound system of popular education—by which we mean not the kind of moral training which is at present one of the fads of our educationists; but a system of training by which correct ideas as to political, historical and economical questions may be imparted to the rising generations of our countrymen. They want the day-light of clear knowledge, instead of the twilight of hazy and erroneous ideas which is now imparted to them. As for what is called moral training, that must be to the students—as it is to grown up men—absolutely nauseating.

The influence of really fine words on uncultured minds, is sometimes quite as injurious as, or even more so than, the coarse stuff of vernacular penny-a-liners. The art of forensic advocacy is a standing illustration of the power of language as a weapon of offence and defence. The lawyer's skill in dealing with it can whitewash a devil, and pick holes in the garments of an angel. The guilt or innocence of a man on trial in a British court of law, depends far less upon the intrinsic merits of the case than upon the comparative ability of the advocates engaged to fight for and against him. Even O'Haras and Shama Charans may escape punishment, while the most innocent men are sacrificed every day to the Moloch of British Judiciary and Police.

The art of the advertiser is hardly less important as an illustration of the power of fine vocables. The secret of the success with which vendors of quack medicines, lame horses, and rotten stocks are sometimes able to ply their respective trades, is well known. The puffers' art invests their wares with a value far above their intrinsic worth. It is not genuine gold that always passes as such in the world. It is the word painting of the historians, poets, panegyrists and advertisers that makes all the difference between the value of one thing and another. There is, in fact, so little of common sense and power of appreciation in the world, that even the names of the greatest benefactors of mankind have not been handed down to us by history or by tradition. While we know a great deal too much about cutthroats and imposters, whose adventures and teachings have been productive of mischief only, we know nothing about the really great men to whose inventive capacity we owe the arts of boat-making, navigation, spinning, weaving, &c., which have made human life far happier than it could be in the primitive state.

In the sphere of religion, the importance of words goes without saying, seeing that religion can scarcely be independent of language. It is in that sphere that the divinity of words and their mysterious relation to the human mind, are best discernible. The Gospel of St. John begins with the following tribute to the glory of words:—

"In the beginning was the Word and the Word was with God and the Word was God."

That which is so forbidding at first sight discloses meaning to the patient inquirer. Our words, not only in the scriptural sense of the term, but even as understood vulgarly, have more than earthly power. But how has the power been abused! The master of words and sentences is sometimes worshipped as a prophet, or even as an incarnation of the Divinity. It is said that Faith can move mountains. Whether faith can do so or not, surely the fine wording of this saying has worked even greater miracles. The very fact that even men of thought and culture oftentimes unhesitatingly surrender their judgment to what is called "faith,"—but which is nothing more nor less than the despotism of a master-mind—shows what power even this small word has exercised in the history of the world. Call the same thing "superstition" or "credulity," and it loses all its power at once.

The history of polytheism and idolatry is calculated to fill all earnest minds among us with the saddest reflections. Consider the slender means with which the now prevailing systems of Krishna worship and Kali worship have, in recent times, been floated, and their operations are being daily extended. Looked at a priori, it seems as if there is not one element of success in these presentations. It passes the understanding how any one can be made to believe that mere words can sanctify abominations, or give a character of holiness to the gréatest outrages against social morality and decency! But the few words Lila, Prem, Bhakti, Purush and Shakti garnish the nuisance in such a manner as to make Krishna's battalions of sweetheart-shiva's and Shakti's obscenities, and, above all, that hideous representation of immodesty which is adumbrated so to say and symbolised in the image of Kali, acceptable as objects of worship.

Burke, in one of his memorable speeches, spoke of modesty as a peculiarity of human beings, which, more than reason, distinguished them from beasts. It was fortunate for the great orator and for the character of our nation also, that there was no one among his foemen who could traverse the statement by pointing his finger of scorn at our most popular forms of religion.

Western education has surely fallen flat upon those who can join with their uneducated countrymen in phallic worship. Popularity is no doubt desirable, but certainly not at the cost of degrading ones self and postponing the improvement of our countrymen.

In the sphere of politics, fine words are the most potent factors in regulating the destinies of men. The mischief that has been done by "scientific frontier," "British interests," and "Balance of Power," is well known. The words "liberty," "rights" and "privileges" have been productive of both good and evil. The expressions "Free Trade," "Fair Trade" and "Blessings of British Rule," have had their day too, as "Protection" and others had had theirs before them. As for the word "duty," hackneyed and commonplace as it is, it has done yeoman's service, for good as well as for bad. The greatest of England's naval commanders, at the beginning of one of the most important battles that he fought for his country, found it worth while to din it into the ears of his people, to stir them on. There is not much, perhaps, in the sentiment with which Nelson conjured, but, by dint of emphasis, he made it a power.

Such is the power of words, that a mere change of nomenclature sometimes apparently changes the character of the thing itself. What may be stigmatised as roguery, loses the greater part of its bad odour when called sharp practice, and becomes actually a subject of admiration when spoken of as tact. Similarly, a defeat in battle changes its whole complexion, if only described as a "successful retreat," and becomes actually a source of glory, as a "strategical movement to the rear." The distinction between "disloyalty" and "independence," is very often one of name only. Yet, the two terms can not be used as synonyms.

The cure for the injurious effect of fine words is easy and simple. The malady brought about by a small dose can be removed only by the administration of a larger quantity of the same stuff. The poet says:—

"Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring:—" and we have nothing more to add by way of advice gratis.

TOLSTOI.

COUNT Léon Tolstoy may now be regarded as the head of the living literature of Russia. He is not only a great writer but also a deep thinker. Already almost an old man, he is active and vigorous still. Of a tall stature and towering forehead, with bright though sunken eyes, and a flowing beard nearly grey, he looks like a veritable sage. "We must bow down," says a French writer, "with a profound and an almost religious respect before him."

He was born in 1828 in the old mansion of Yasmara, Polonia. His external life has been that of a Russian gentleman, neither more nor less interesting. Brought up at first in his paternal house in the country, he completed his studies in the University of Kazan, "where he received that education from foreign masters which give to the elevated classes their cosmopolitan tone." He entered the army, remained for some time in a regiment of artillery in the Caucasus, and went over to Sebastopol at his own request. When the war of 1854 broke out, he was at once the actor and spectator of the memorable siege of that impregnable fortress. He embodied his impressions of the Crimean War in the famous tales entitled "Sebastopol in May, in August, in December." On the conclusion of the peace, he quitted the army, travelled all over Europe and finally settled in St. Petersburg, though occasionally he lived in Moscow. He visited the Court and mixed in society, observing everything with the same keen and deep attention as that with which he had before observed the havoc of the War. In 1860, he married and retired to his paternal home near Tula, to live henceforth in studious seclusion.

In this retreat, he began his pursuit after truth. Starting from doubt and negation, he marched and advanced, painfully at first, in a difficult and long route; then stopping for a time on the border of the way, he bounded with a new and youthful spring and hastened to attain the Unknown, so ardently desired, so patiently pursued. At last, dawned the light of Faith and Hope—before an effort, now a possession. The joy of having found it effaced the painful memory of the toils of the research. Hardly had he come to the end of so much toil and labour, when the pilgrim was assigned with a new mission. He now turned towards that humanity, which he found plunged in misery and desolation, tormented by vice and evil, a prey to diseases and a booty of negation. Faith gave him the words of truth. He preached the new Gospel. An ardent apostle, he threw broadcast numberless sheets replete with moral instruction. A sage fulfils his mission if a single soul is saved by his teaching.

From the first, Tolstoi was a pessimist. He saw man and painted him feeble and weak, divided between evil and good, always subject to evil passions, menaced by perils which he does not suspect, running blindly towards the abyss of nothingness. He saw him beset with despair—the Russian fatalism. The Nihilism and Pessimism of 1837 inspired his works—"War and Peace" and "Anna Karénine." "Tolstoi has reflected in them the double aspect of his soul and the soul of the Russian people—all the thoughts and contradictions that tormented him." A haughty noble and a bitter thinker, he looked upon mankind and their ideas with supreme indifference. Cold and sceptic, dry and bitter, he was without belief—without faith. One day, a ball threw him on the ground. He raised his eyes towards heaven as if he seemed, in that visitation of agony, in the tearing of the masks,—to perceive something in that "heaven distant, elevated and eternal." Heat, what he said—"If I could say now, Lord, have pity upon me! But to whom shall I say this? To a force indefinite, inaccessible, to whom I cannot address myself, whom I cannot express in words—the Grand All or the Grand Nothing, or rather that God who is conceived in that amulet which Mary has given to me. Nothing—nothing is certain, except the negation of all that which I conceive and the majesty of that august Something which I cannot conceive."

While he was in this state of mind, he met a poor soldier—a peasant, ignorant, miserable and resigned. He heard his artless but sensible language. He saw him die with the same tranquil carelessness. A proud noble and a subtle thinker, he placed himself in the school of this simple and innocent man. With his ideal of life, he found that appeasement and happiness so long fugitive. The poor peasant taught him to live for others. In his "Search for Happiness," "Three Deaths," and "Power of Darkness," he recommended the humility of soul and the purity of heart, frugality and poverty with ardour—the conviction no longer of an artist, but of a preacher.

The writer is now lost in the apostle. Like a second Rousseau, from his silent retreat, he works for the regeneration of the world, for the mitigation of our sufferings and for the cure of our miseries. He no longer writes for mere fame or fortune. All his works published since what may be called his conversion, are intended for spreading the moral and religious doctrines he has identified himself with. He now despises luxury, disregards riches, partakes of the work of his tenants, lives their simple and laborious life, considering the manual labour, following the word of Jesus of Nazareth, as the only thing that suits the condition of man. Of his three works—"My Confession," "My Religion," and "Commentary on the Gospel," all replete with his new faith, the second is the most important; and though interdicted by the ecclesiastical censor, it has spread itself very widely in Russia. He believes that the happiness and repose of the soul is possible only in a community of men, who put their faith in the simple doctrines of Jesus of Nazareth, not those of the Church, which has betrayed the Gospel; in the return to natural life and in a life poor and pure, without ambition, interest and pleasure, consecrated to work and to the patriarchal affections of the family. This is the credo of the new Faith.

The Count has given an example of it. For this he has been cried down and called a mad man. He is not a malade. A sublime moralist and a high thinker, he opens up future ways—the good and flowery ways of peace and goodness; he pursues his work with firmness, perseverance and enthusiasm. He is no longer a mystic. "Faith," says he, "is not only the conviction in the existence of invisible things * * *, it is the knowledge of humanity, a knowledge which makes man not to destroy himself but to live. Faith is the force of life." And this faith is now his own and has made him a second St. Paul. In his later works, he judges, he speaks as an apostle, with the logic of a mind absolutely right.

He now holds his sway over Russia and his own times by the beauty of his writings and the grandeur of his thought, by the fervour of his faith and the purity of his life.—From the French of M. Louis Rebière.

LAW OF LIBEL IN INDIA AND IN CEYLON.

THE law of libel appears to be the same in British India as in the neighbouring colony of Ceylon. Yet, how different the administration of the law in the two countries! Recently we shewed to what small compass the Indian law has been reduced to the prejudice of the journalist. He is hardly left the defence of the exceptions or allowed the benefit of the Explanations in the Code, but must submit to be punished as soon as a Magistrate thinks fit to issue a process at the instance of a complainant. Now hear how better they order it in the island colony.

The Criminal Sessions of the Supreme Court commenced at Jaffna, on Monday, the 20th July, under the presidency of the Chief Justice, the Hon'ble Sir Bruce Burnside. The 5th case in the calendar is thus reported in a Ceylon paper:—

"Vaitilinger Suppremaniar, printer and publisher of the Hindu Organ, was charged with defamation of one Samuel Abraham by printing and publishing in his journal certain articles containing defamatory matter to the effect that as result of Mr. Abraham's committing a fraud in conjunction with a schoolmaster at Karadivu, he was transferred from that station to Chavagachery. The accused was defended by Mr. Adv. Nagalingam. Mr. Allegakoen assisted the prosecution. This case may be said to be the cause celebre of the sessions and was very warmly conducted by both parties. Dr. Howland, Mr. Cook, Mr. Sinnatamby, Editor Pailer Nasen and the Proprietor of the Hindoo Organ were among the witnesses examined for the prosecution. The Jury returned a verdict of not guilty."

A correspondent of the same paper supplies the details thus:—

"After the Révd Mr. Howland, Mr. Cook, the complainant and another had been heard for the prosecution, the Crown counsel was about to close the case, when his Lordship told him that he had not proved an essential allegation on the part of the Crown, viz., that the imputation complained of has, in the estimation of others, directly or indirectly lowered the moral or intellectual character of the complainant and that if no evidence was forthcoming on this point, he should hold that the offence was not made out. The Crown counsel could not agree with His Lordship and the question was argued with learning and ability on both sides, and I must say that the Jaffna District Court has seldom been the scene of such learned arguments maintained on both sides with the utmost good humour. Mr. Cooke (Crown Counsel) contended that the language complained of was of a nature to lower the man in the estimation of others, that whether as a matter of fact the words lowered him was immaterial, it was sufficient to make out the offence, if the prisoner when he published the words, might be held to know or to have had reason to believe that such imputation would harm the reputation of the person aggrieved. It was not necessary that he should have suffered in the estimation of others. Mr. Cooke cited Starling on Indian Criminal Law in support of his contention. His Lordship opposing Mr. Cooke's contention, observed that the words of the Code were clear on the point and that to make the offence punishable the imputation must as a matter of fact have lowered the complainant in the estimation of others. It was only when a man had sustained real injury that he could invoke the Criminal Law and this was the difference between Criminal Law and Civil Libel.

Mr. Cooke however rejoined that if the words, in their ordinary acceptance, were likely to harm a person's reputation, the prisoner must have known that they would harm, and it was for him to show that they did not actually harm. The Judge said warmly "How can a man know that they will harm when as a matter of fact they have not harmed," and added that if the Crown Counsel could not cite witnesses to prove this he would take the responsibility of directing the Jury for an acquittal, reserving the point for the Collective Court, if Mr. Cooke so desired. The Crown Counsel then called another witness, William Sinnatamby, who deposed inter alia to the fact that the words in question did lower the character of the man in his estimation.

The Chief Justice in summing up the case said that defamation was made a special offence by a legislative enactment forming part of the Ceylon Penal Code. Before directing them on the law bearing on the subject he read to them the 479th section of the said Code. The essence of the offence was that the complainant should have been injured by the publication. Until there was evidence to prove that as a matter of fact he was injured, there was no case for the jury, but as soon as one witness deposed to the fact that in his estimation the paragraph in question lowered the character of the complainant, the offence was made out. As to whether or not the words referred to the complainant, it was their special business to see that from the evidence laid before them. As to whether the words were defamatory or not he would observe that as a matter of criminal law, if a man's character was not injured, there was no offence. It would be highly improper, he thought, to invoke the criminal law and put the prisoner at the bar, for doing a thing which has not injured any one. His Lordship entered into a careful review of the evidence laying down the law bearing on the point very clearly. In closing an exceptionally able and fair charge to the Jury, he said:—"Little matters like this often arise but seldom assume the present formidable shape. There is nothing like religious troubles to turn a community upside down. But the Jury are discharging one of the highest functions and I can say there is no superior duty on the part of any of Her Majesty's subjects, whether it be in the remote corner of Jaffna or at the foot of Her Majesty's throne. The great common sense of the British constitution has established and properly so, that a man should be tried by his own peers and it is in that capacity that you are here to-day. The constitution has entrusted to you this sacred duty and it appeals to you by the oath you have taken that you should return your verdict according to the evidence laid before you. It will be a shame on you if you allow one tittle of feeling to interfere in the proper discharge of this duty. The moment you allow the integrity of the Jury-box to be influenced by any feeling of creed, you sully it as well as your own character. I hope I can safely leave the matter in your hands."

In India, no proof is needed, although the Code says "No imputation is said to harm a person's reputation, unless that imputation directly or indirectly, in the estimation of others, lowers the moral or intellectual character of that person, or lowers the character of that person in respect of his caste or of his calling, or lowers the credit of that person, or causes it to be believed that the body of that person is in a loathsome state, or in a state generally considered as disgraceful." (Explanation 4, Sec. 499).

It will be seen that in the Jaffna trial, only the printer and publisher was committed—not the editor, nor the proprietor, nor anybody else connected with the paper. Under section 499 of the Indian Penal Code, "whoever publishes any imputation concerning any person, intending to harm, or knowing or having reason to believe that such imputation will harm, the reputation of such person, is said, except in the cases excepted, to defame that person." Under section 500, whoever defames another is punishable. The next section makes the printer liable, and section 502, the seller.

The publisher or the printer to be liable must know or have good reason to believe, and the seller must know that the matter complained against was, defamatory. Thus to prosecute successfully, it must be shewn that the defendant either published, printed or sold a paper containing an imputation with the knowledge or reasonable belief that the imputation would harm the complainant. There are other safeguards, such, among others, as explanation 4 of section 499. But all these are disregarded and a person is convicted of defamation on the simple proof that he is either the editor, or the printer or the publisher or proprietor. Oh! for a Bruce Burnside to set the administration of the defamation law right in British India.

The unconcluded prosecution of the Bangabasi for exciting sedition, so far as the dictum of a Chief Justice is a precedent, saves the press from prosecution for defamation by Government. That prosecution, however, makes the proprietor, the editor, the manager and the printer and publisher all liable. At least, no attempt was made by the defence to except any of the four, except that none of them was proved to be the actual writer of the articles complained against and that section 124A. (exciting sedition) aimed at only the writer, although the prosecution differentiated the liability of the first two from that of the two last.

THE STATE PROSECUTION OF THE BANGABASI.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE'S CHARGE TO THE JURY.

His Lordship the Chief Justice said that, before he dealt with the facts of the case, he would like to say a word as to what Mr. Jackson (the counsel for the defence) had said on Saturday (August 22) and to-day (August 24) with reference to the composition of the Jury in this case. He had also been struck by the small number of native names which had been called out when the Jury was being empanelled, and he had enquired of the Clerk of the Crown what was the reason of it. Mr. Apar had written to say that there were certain qualifications to entitle a gentleman to become a special juror; and that, although he had made special efforts to secure the names of Native gentlemen possessing those qualifications, he had not been able to induce them to come forward to serve. Mr. Apar had also tried through several prominent Native gentlemen, and particularly Dr. Mahendralal Sircar, Raja Durga Churn Law, Babu Gonesh Chunder Chunder, the attorney, and the Secretary of the British Indian Association to secure a list of names of qualified Native gentlemen with a view to enlarge the list of Native gentlemen already enrolled as special jurors, but here, too, his efforts have been unsuccessful. It was because there was a difficulty in getting more names for selection that the Native special jury list was so limited. He entirely agreed with Mr. Jackson that it was very much to be regretted that there were not the names of more Native gentlemen on the special jury list. This difficulty would be removed if qualified Native gentlemen would send their names to the Clerk of the Crown for registration.

As regards the case itself, he said that the four accused were charged with an offence under section 124A of the Indian Penal Code, and inasmuch as the offence in question was created and defined by that section, he had thought it desirable that they should have the section itself in their hands whilst he explained the law to them, and also whilst it was being discussed by Mr. Jackson. There were really two questions for them to consider. First, they must clearly understand what it was that had been made into an offence by the section, and when they understood that, to consider whether the evidence before them proved that such an offence had been committed by the prisoners. The section was divided into two parts, and was as follows:—"Whoever by words either spoken or intended to be read, or by signs or by visible representation or otherwise excites or attempts to excite feelings of disaffection to the Government established by law in British India, shall be punished with transportation for life or for any term to which a fine may be added, or with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three years, to which fine may be added or with fine."

"Explanation.—Such a disapprobation of the measures of the Government as is compatible with a disposition to render obedience to the lawful authority of the Government, and to support the lawful authority of the Government against unlawful attempts to subvert or resist that authority, is not disaffection. Therefore, the making of comments on the measures of the Government, with the intention of exciting only this species of disapprobation, is not an offence within this clause."

Mr. Jackson contended that the words disaffection and disapprobation were synonymous words, and had one and the same meaning. If that reasoning were sound it would be impossible for any person to be convicted under the section, as every class of writing would be within the explanation. But the gentlemen of the Jury were thoroughly acquainted with the English language, and must know that there was a very wide difference between the meaning of the two words disaffection and disapprobation. Whenever the prefix "dis" was added to a word, the word formed conveyed an idea the opposite of that conveyed by the word without the prefix. Disaffection meant a feeling contrary to affection, in other words, dislike or hatred. Disapprobation meant simply disapproval. It was quite possible to disapprove of a man's sentiments or action and yet to like him. The meaning of the two words was so distinct that he felt it hardly necessary to tell the Jury that the contention of Mr. Jackson could not be sustained. If a person used either spoken or written words calculated to create in the minds of the persons to whom they were addressed a disposition not to obey the lawful authority of the Government, or to subvert or resist that authority, if and when occasion should arise, and if he did so with the intention of creating such a disposition in his hearers or readers, he would be guilty of the offence of attempting to excite disaffection within the meaning of the section, though no disturbance was brought about by his words or any feeling of disaffection, in fact produced by them. It was sufficient for the purposes of the section that the words used were calculated to excite feelings of ill-will against the Government and to hold it up to the hatred and contempt of the people, and that they were used by him with the intention to create such feeling. The second question for the Jury then would be whether upon the evidence before them they thought that the articles circulated by the prisoners were calculated to create such feelings in the minds of their readers, and if so, whether they intended to create such feeling by their circulation.

Having taken that explanation of the Section from him, it now rested with the Jury to decide whether the accused by the words of the articles which were intended to be read had been guilty of an attempt to excite disaffection against the Government. The Jury would have to bear in mind the class of paper which was being prosecuted and the class of people among whom it circulated, taking into consideration the articles which had been made the subject of the indictment and the others which had been put in during the course of the trial. Those articles were not addressed to the lowest or most ignorant mass of the people. They would see from the article referring to jute that they were not addressed to the cultivating classes. They were addressed to people of the respectable middle class who could read and understand their meaning, more or less the same class as the writers. The Jury had to consider not only the intent of the person who wrote and disseminated the articles among the class named, but the probable effect of the language indulged in. Then the Jury would have to consider the relations between the Government and the people, and having considered the peculiar position of the Government and the consequence to it of any well organized disaffection, the Jury would have to decide whether there was an attempt or not to disseminate matter with the intention of exciting the feelings of the people till they became disaffected. British India was part of the British Empire and was governed like other parts of the Empire by persons to whom power is delegated for that purpose. There was a great difference between dealing with Government in that sense and dealing with any particular administration. Were these articles intended to excite feelings of enmity against the Government, or, on the other hand, were they merely expressing, though in strong language, disapprobation of certain Government measures? The Jury would bear in mind that the question they had to decide had reference to the intention and, in fact, the crime consisted of the intention, for a man might lawfully do the act without the intention. The evidence of the intent could only be gathered from the articles. The ultimate object of the writer may be one thing, but if, in attaining that object, he used as the means the exciting of disaffection against the Government, then he would be guilty under Section 124A. If the Jury thought that these people with the object of procuring the repeal of the Act or of increasing the sale of their paper disseminated these articles intending to excite feelings of enmity, they would be bound to find a verdict of guilty. As to the evidence of intent, the articles are the only evidence. The charges are based on the five articles which were the subject of the indictment. Other articles had been quite properly put in during the progress of the trial, but no charges were laid in connection with the latter. They were put in, some by the prosecution and some by the defence, to prove that their view of the intent of the articles charged was indicated in the others. These articles had been read and re-read to the Jury so frequently that his Lordship did not consider it necessary to discuss them in detail again. He would simply touch on their bearing on the case, and whether they disclose an intent to cause disaffection or disapprobation only.

The first article, taking them in the order of date, was that of the 31st January, 1891. This has been put in by the defence to show that the paper took a strong view against the Age of Consent Bill, and that, after expressing disapprobation of the measure, it is urged upon the Government to abandon the Bill in deference to the feelings of a very large portion of its loyal subjects. And it was contended that the protest against the Bill and the representations to Government were couched in the most loyal terms. There is no doubt that the article does show something of the kind. The Bill became law on the 19th of March. There was nothing before the Jury to show how the paper had treated the question during the period between those dates. The next articles are two from the Bangobasi of the 28th of March. Perhaps that was the very first issue of the paper after the passing of the Bill in which the matter could possibly be treated. The first article laments the slavery into which the people have fallen. It urged the people to weep over their despised lot, and the insult that has been offered to what they look upon as religious customs, and refer to the Consent Bill as a direct interference with their religion. His Lordship wished to make a remark in reference to the Consent Bill. He did not intend to enter upon the merits of the Bill or discuss its provisions one way or the other. But having regard to the action which the Legislature took in collecting information from various sources, both private and official, it is only fair to conclude that the Bill would not have been passed unless the members of the Council had been fully satisfied that there was urgent necessity for it, that the need for protection of the girl-wives of India was both evident and pressing. It was quite true that the Hindu men never asked for protection for themselves or their womenkind. The question to be considered was whether the children required it. With the materials which it had collected the Government concluded that they were entitled to take prompt action, and that, that action was not substantially interfering with the religion of the people, and it was unfair to stigmatize the action of Government in this matter as an arbitrary and wanton proceeding. The two articles of the 28th of March bemoan the mournful condition into which the country had fallen. The religion of the country according to them had been destroyed, and the people had been trampled on by the feet of their conquerors. It would be for the Jury to come to a decision on the tone of these articles. They must not look to single sentences or isolated expressions, but take the articles as a whole and give them full, free, and generous considerations as Lord Fitzgerald had said, and even allowing the accused the benefit of a doubt, they will have to say whether the articles were fair comments, and merely expressions of disapprobation, or whether they disclosed an attempt to excite enmity against the Government.

The next articles to which he would draw their attention were two of the 18th April, one put in by the prosecution and the other by the defence to prove intent. Till June the articles go on steadily on the line which seem to have been adopted. These articles described the grievances of the people, and stated that famines were prevalent, epidemics were of common occurrence, that riots were taking place in several parts of the country, and described the condition of the people as one of extreme poverty, which was an undoubted fact. Mr. Jackson had urged that all that had been said in these articles was incontrovertible, and that, inasmuch as only facts had been stated, nobody had a right to complain. But then the question arose whether by a partial statement of facts the true state of affairs had not been so misrepresented as to cause disaffection. They would have to consider whether the articles were intended to give the people an untrue account of the state of things that existed, or whether there was simply an expression of disapprobation of the measure which Government had introduced, or again whether there was not, by understating some facts and distorting others, a deliberate attempt made to hold the Government up to hatred and contempt, and thus attempt to incite the people to feelings of disaffection; whether the disaffection did develop and show itself did not matter. The feelings of the people were worked up on the ground that their religion was being interfered with, nay even destroyed, and the Jury would have to consider the tendency of such writings at a time, as the writer puts it, of great public excitement.

To his Lordship it seemed that the Jury should especially consider the articles of the 6th of June and the 1st of August, entitled respectively, "What Will the End Be" and "Universal Death Is Certain." In these the writer seemed to sum up the meaning of all the other articles, and from his own words they could gather what the writer meant by the line he had adopted. Did he criticise existing measures or endeavour to excite a frame of mind and a disposition not consistent with regard for and obedience to the Government? If the translation, especially of the passage referred to by Mr. Jackson, was correct, the writer not only intimated, but pleaded, that rebellion against an alien ruler is not a crime; rather it is to be commended if there is a possibility of its being undertaken with success. There were two articles which dealt more or less with the subject of rebellion. Whether an incitement to rebellion was really intended it was not for him to indicate an opinion.

In dealing with these articles his Lordship felt that he would not be doing his duty unless he referred to the article on Manipur, which had been put in during the trial by the prosecution. The Jury would have to consider that article, and decide whether it was intended to represent the conduct of the persons by whom Mr. Quinton and his officers were killed as worthy of praise or blame. The writing and circulating of the articles and the articles themselves are the only evidence in the case.

In leaving the matter to the consideration of the gentlemen of the Jury, his Lordship asked them, and asked them earnestly, to dismiss from their minds all questions of prejudice, and look at this matter in as impartial a spirit as possible. The only question was that of the intent; the Jury had nothing to do with the policy of Government in instituting this prosecution, or the policy of Government in passing the Consent Act, or what had been called the Gaggling Act; they had nothing to do beyond dealing with the evidence in this case, and if they allowed anything else to influence them in their decision upon the question before them they would be failing in their duty.

Their opinion should not be influenced by the opinions of any person, however eminent. The opinions of many great men had been quoted to them, and the Jury had been requested to accept those opinions as their own in arriving at a correct decision in this case. He would repeat that the Jury were not to accept the opinion of any one, be he ever so eminent; if they did, they would not be doing their duty; they were to judge of this case, and give their verdict only on the evidence in the case. The only question for them to decide was, were the articles intended, and were they likely, to cause disaffection. The defence urged that the articles only expressed disapprobation of Government measures; the prosecution said they were deliberate attempts to incite the people to disaffection. He had now dealt with the whole matter, and having told them what was the law to guide them, he now asked them to consider their verdict on the evidence before them.

Holloway's Pills.—When inclement weather checks to a considerable extent the action of the skin, an alternative is required to compensate the body by means of other channels. Holloway's Pills can be confidently recommended as the easiest, surest, and safest means of attaining this desirable end without weakening the most delicate or incommoding the most feeble. When from frequently recurring chills or the inhalation of impure air the blood becomes foul and the secretions vitiated, these Pills present a ready and efficient means of cleansing the former and correcting the latter. By this salutary proceeding disease is arrested at its outset, its pains and inconveniences averted, and the nervous structures saved from the depressing effects entailed upon them by an illness.

No. 491

THE CAPTIVE LADIE.

By the late MICHAEL MADHUSUDAN DUTT.

REPRINTED FROM THE MADRAS EDITION OF 1849.

"Oh! fly—and when far, far away,
Thy life is as a sunny day,
And when the Past to thee shall seem,
A dim,—a half forgotten dream,
Oh! then let tales of bygone years
Claim but a passing sigh,—some tears!"
He paus'd, she spoke not,—but her eye
Look'd into his all vacantly,
As if the bosom, overwrought,
Lost in its wilderness all thought,
Till tears, like rose-empairing dew,
Stream'd in their soft and diamond hue!
"Oh never—never will I fly,
But with thee, Love! I live or die!
When from my father's hall I fled,
And wander'd far—a lonely maid,—
When coldly 'round the donjon's gloom
Rose like a deep and lightless tomb,—
I wept not—for I thought of thee,—
And the sweet dreams of Memory
Lent smiles to cheer the solitude
Or the lone bosom's widowhood!
And now, when dangers 'round thee lower
Like flames all blazing to devour—
Like furious waves round some fair isle,
To sweep away its vernal smile,—
Oh! never,—never will this heart
Be sever'd, Love! to beat apart!
I fear not Death, tho' fierce he be,
When thus I cling, mine own! to thee!—
For in the forest's green retreat,
Where leafy branches twine and meet,
Tho' wildly round dread Agni* roars,
Like angry surge by rock-girt shores,—
The soft gazelle of liquid eye
Leaves not her mate alone to die!
But tell me, must thou bow thee low,
And yield thee to thy godless foe,
And humbly kneel before the throne
Which once, alas! was all thine own?
Nay—frown not thus?"—like lightning-ray
Pride fiercely flash'd,—then past away!
"Baiza!—look thro' you lattice there,
By yonder fane, dost see the glare
Which kindles round the dewy air?
The steeds below,—oh! rise and flee,—
Baiza!—that fiery grave's for me!"

She shriek'd and fell,—as cypress high
When blasted by the storm-god's eye!
But he was gone,—'twas lonely all—
None heard her shriek,—none saw her fall!—

High flames the fiercely kindling pyre
Like Rudra's† all consuming ire;
And many a spark ascends on high
Like light-wing'd birds which wildly fly
Or gaily sweep along the sky;—
The Rishi with his gods is there
But weeps as swells his solemn pray'r,
And all around the brightening glow
Lights hueless cheek and pallid brow!
And there be murmur'd voice of wail,
Like mournful sigh of midnight gale,—
'And must he die so young—so brave,
'Is there no god above to save!'

There is a hush:—a warrior stands
Fast by that pyre of blazing brands;
With all a warrior's fearless pride
He shrinks not from the fiery tide,
Which rolls, a golden, lava stream,
And darts full many a lightning beam;—
A glittering crown is on his brow
Of beauty,—tho' all pallid now,
And in his hand a broken blade
Bath'd in red gore but lately shed!
He looks him round with dauntless eye,
As one who never fears to die!
'Farewell!—Death's but a short-liv'd pain,
'I live not for a captive's chain;
'And now, ye gods! who love the brave,
'Smile o'er a warrior's fiery grave!'
He paus'd—they look'd—'oh! he is gone,
'His last,—his boldest deed is done,—
'Husteena! see thy hope expire
'Upon yon pile of blazing fire!'
But, Hark! there is a shriek,—a cry,
Of wild,—controlless agony!
How fearfully around it rung,
As one burst thro' that weeping throng,
And plung'd into that flaming pyre,
And clove awhile the column'd fire!
They look'd—they knew—yes, it was she,—
The bride of him whose spirit there
Had burst its prison,—joyously
To fly far to the realms of air!

† Sheva, in his character as Destroyer.

‡ "It was in those days a custom of the Hindus, that whatever Raja was twice worsted by the Mussulmans, should be, by that disgrace, rendered unfit for further command. Jeipal in compliance to this custom, having raised his son to the government, ordered a funeral pile to be prepared, upon which he sacrificed himself to his gods."—Dow's Fe-rishta, Vol. I. 45. "WE read in a Mandalay paper that "fifty thousand rupees are said to have been subscribed for the defence of the accused in the Bangabasi sedition case." At one time, in Calcutta itself, the subscription went up to rupees seventy thousand. If the fact were so, the Bengali weekly would have no cause to lament the prosecution.

AS an effect of the Bangabasi trial on the native press, the Phoenix of Karachi thus quotes the conclusion of an "unusually mild article on the Government's orders on the case of the Manipur prisoners," "We beg to differ from the decision of Lord Lansdowne. We must, however, beg pardon of His Excellency for doing so."

COLONEL Olcott, Founder-President of the Theosophical Society, lately went to Australia for the purpose of receiving £5,000 bequeathed to the society. It was represented to him that his acceptance of the legacy would be a hardship to the members of the testator's family. Thereupon he divided it with them, leaving them £4,000 and retaining for himself only £1,000. This is religion, this is magnanimity, this is humanity. Colonel Olcott has made a rare sacrifice.

A BRITISH soldier at Manipur has shot down a Manipuri in a passion. The Morning Post, which gives the above news, publishes a telegram from Nowgong as follows:—

"A private of the Suffolk Regiment yesterday accidentally struck a native Company cook, and the blow injured the spleen and caused death. It was a pure accident, but a Court of Enquiry is investigating the matter."

A EUROPEAN fitter on the Madras Railway, Job Martin, has been fined Rs. 50 (£6) for killing a woman, his servant, in a passion. The Advocate contrasts that with the sentences in the Benares Rine case. The Judge, Mr. Nicholls, sentenced as many as 81 persons, who presumably acted under religious phrensy, to various punishments as follows:—

7	persons to transportation for life.
3	do do for 14 years.
3	do do for 12 years.
12	to rigorous imprisonment for 10 years (with three months' solitary confinement.)
13	do do for 7 years.
18	do do 3 and 4 years with heavy fines.
6	do do for one year.
19	do to receive 30 stripes.

On the other hand, a punka-boy at Buxar, for stealing a two anna bit from a confectioner's shop, was sentenced by the magistrate to five years' confinement in the reformatory.

THE Special Second Class Magistrate of Trivellore committed two lads, of the ages of thirteen and fourteen respectively and both of the Vanniya caste, for putting stones upon a railway with intent to endanger the safety of persons travelling or being on the railway, under section 126, clause (a) of the Railway Act (X of) 1890. They had placed two stones on the rail near Trivellore when a train was expected, one of them being sufficiently large to cause derailment. For this attempt to wreck a train, the Sessions Judge of Chingleput, Mr. J. W. Best, sentenced each of the lads to rigorous imprisonment for two years or to be detained in the Reformatory school till they attained the age of eighteen years.

IN Madras, they do not tolerate street preaching. In the Egmore Police Court, Mr. C. G. Kuppusawmy Iyer fined eight members of the Salvation Army three rupees each, for causing obstruction to a public thoroughfare by holding a religious service at one end of Velala street, Pursewalkam. The defendants denied that they were in the centre of the road and refused to move when required to do so by the Police. They admitted that they were on the side of the road leaving enough space for two or three carriages to pass without any difficulty.

SUB-INSPECTOR Fariduddin and Rajaram, a Mohorror of the Manda Police station, Allahabad District, have been committed for framing an incorrect record, with intent to save a person from legal punishment, and with giving false information with respect to an offence.

HERE is a curious litigation in what may be called ecclesiastical libel nipped in the bud. The Ceylon Times writes:—

"Early this month (July) D. S. Kumarasingha filed a plaint in the District Court of Kandy before Mr. Judge Lawrie against M. H. Perera of 129, Grandpass, Colombo, the editor of the Lakrivikrama, and three others connected with the same paper for publishing two letters, dated respectively 5th November 1890, and 9th January, 1891, containing matters defamatory of the plaintiff and intending to injure his fair name and credit. The plaintiff alleged that the letters (in Sinhalese) insinuated that the plaintiff, not being a Buddhist priest, had performed certain sacred and sacerdotal offices relative to burial, which offices performed by any other than by a person duly admitted and consecrated would be acts impious and sacrilegious, and that the plaintiff misappropriated to himself certain gifts only offered to priests. Judge Lawrie declined to entertain the plaint on the ground that it disclosed no cause of action. On the appeal of the plaintiff the Full Court of appeal considered the case, affirming the order of the lower court, Mr. Justice Clarence dissentiente."

AT the Madras Presidency Magistrate's Court, B. A. Rajendrum Pillay, proprietor and publisher of the Tamil journal Maha Vicla Thoothun or "Comic Herald," was fined Rs. 25, for defaming Pitti Theagaroya Chetty, a wealthy skin merchant, by imputing dishonest acts to him in bribing Government officials. Three witnesses deposed to having given the editor the articles—the subject of the charge—and Rs. 11 for publishing them.

IT seems that there are superstitions in civilized Europe which are unknown even among the most backward of our countrymen. We have it on the authority of the Daily Chronicle's St. Petersburg correspondent that, quite recently, a young child, belonging to one of the peasants in a small village, in the Government of Soratoff, was found missing. An hour after, the body of the child was discovered terribly mangled with its throat cut. The police found that the crime had been perpetrated by an old soldier who had murdered the child and eaten its heart, under the impression that the heart of an infant would cure him of a malady he had been suffering from for many years.

THE Magistrate of Bijwar, Bombay Presidency, reports a lamentable failure of justice from the zeal for improvement of one of his subordinate magistracy. One morning, a vaccinator paid two annas to a poor woman to take her child, whom he had just vaccinated, to another village in the afternoon, to enable him to take the fresh lymph for inoculating another child there. Her husband hearing of the journey, however, forbade it and told the messengers who came to fetch the woman and child to the same effect. Vaccination being a state business, the little man's lesser men would not go without executing their principal's commands. They stayed on the premises and probably meditated force. That they shewed their "cheek," goes without saying. But poor Satawa—so poor that she had bargained for two annas, equal to two pence, to carry her vaccinated baby to another village—was rich in the protection of a husband more brave and self-respecting than many so-called Baboos. He resisted the myrmidons of authority, as he doubtless regarded them, and, in defence of his rights and the integrity of his castle, went so far as to drive the fellows out. The great vaccinator flew into a rage and reported the contempt of authority to the local Magistrate. This officer now proceeded to move the vengeance of the law not on the audacious man direct but through his tenderest point, his wife, in regard to which he was so particular. His Lordship the Magistrate ransacked the whole Penal Code in sanguine expectation of pitting her with one or other of its sections. But though the Code is exhaustive enough, it is after all a sane business and there is no provision for the vengeance of stupidity. Long and weary must have been the repeated search to discover the hidden clause which provides for satisfaction of the injured honour of vaccinators and their establishment. It was being given up in despair, when apparently some village law-man or clerk threw a brilliant suggestion. Accordingly, the woman was charged under section 406, for criminal breach of trust. The case did not occupy the court long. The woman, who for two pence had gladly undertaken to go on a journey of some miles carrying her child on her arms, had no advocate, brilliant or dim, to prolong the litigation in her favour on the chance of coaxing or badgering the court into declaring for acquittal. The coast being clear, the Magistrate sailed gaily, ending in convicting Satawa and sentencing the poor honest woman of two pence to a fine of some 20 shillings (Rs. 15) or fifteen days' imprisonment in default.

ON the evening of the 6th instant, a Hindu widow marriage—that is a marriage between Hindus of the same caste and according to Hindu rites and customs—took place at the Widow-Marriage Hall of Sett Madhavdas Raghunathdas at Girgaum. The parties who reside at the village of Marwar in the Kheder district, belong to the Baj Khedaval Brahman tribe. The bridegroom, Dave Lalobhai Bapoojee, is 31, and the bride, Manchabai, is 18, being the ideal ages of union in the Hindu Sastras. The latter is a virgin widow. Considering that poor Mancha lost her first husband when she was only 10, her first marriage was a nominal one—a mere sound.

THE eminent surgeon and leading throat specialist, Sir Morell Mackenzie, had lately performed a brilliant operation, in his special line of surgery, on Mr. George Lewis. The success of that case emboldened Mr. Irving, the prince of actors, to submit himself to the same operation. Mr. Irving had been, of late years, complaining of throat affections and, after a careful examination of the part, Sir Morell advised the removal of a portion of the uvula. The patient was, however, for letting ill alone for fear of getting worse. But Mr. Lewis's experience satisfied him, and he willingly placed himself at the mercy of the surgeon's skill. Up to this he has not had to regret his step. The diseased portion of his uvula was removed with the greatest ease. He has been enjoined a week's rest, but he will take a longer holiday. We hope he will retain the integrity of his voice.

THE devils! they spare nobody, howsoever high. They played one of their usual practical pranks on our Royal Duke of Edinburgh himself. He is a great musician and composed a waltz called after his vessel "Galatea." He was pressed to give it to the world. Before doing so, he wished to have it revised by a competent professional. Accordingly, it was given to Sir Arthur Sullivan, who went carefully through the pages, initialing each at bottom in sign of approval. In this state it came to the publishers who sent it as it was to the engravers and printers, and so it appeared finally. The Galatea waltz had inscribed under every page the letters A S S—intended for the initials of Sir Arthur Samuel Sullivan. The full point after each letter was omitted.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE Chillian civil war is over. The success of the Congress is complete. President Balmaceda, whose claim to nominate his successor led to the war, has been compelled to seek refuge in the Argentine Republic. The hostilities lasted for nine months, and the struggle throughout was of the most desperate character. The Congressists have gained their object. But the loss in men and money has been enormous. The war has cost the Chilians over fourteen millions of money or very nearly the amount that India had to pay for Lord Lytton's expeditions to Afghanistan for securing a "scientific frontier."

THE recent development of strikes, in number as well as tenacity, could scarcely pass without its effect on the minds of employers and mercantile men in general. We are not, therefore, surprised to hear that it has exercised them deeply and that efforts are now being made to resolve upon some measure for the protection of capital. A great national British association of employers in all the various lines throughout Great Britain is in contemplation.

A TELEGRAM of the 6th instant announces the appointment of the Duke of Rutland temporarily as Post Master General. Young England, the founder among the scions of the British aristocracy of the Disraeli cult at a time when the brilliant Israelite was still regarded as only an adventurer, Young England in his maturity became Post Master General and was rewarded with a seat in the cabinet in the Government of his idol or hero. And now Old England, waxed to a peer and swollen to a Duke, falls back upon the same post. So much for the reverence of Conservative Government for peerage and age—peerage sublimated by age!

What a compensating Providence protects us all! His Grace ought to have been himself—a Duke. In any other position he would have been done for. For it was his misfortune, in early life, to publish himself down. The sentimental enthusiasm of Young Englandism was silly enough, but it was a passing joke. Lord John Manners, however, contrived to make himself immortal by his literary genius. He wrote a poem which is forgotten, but which contains a verse which can never be forgotten, which, indeed, is remembered and will ever be remembered whenever his name is mentioned. Whether for matter or for manner, it is univalued. It is as follows:—

Let Arts and Commerce, Laws and Learning die,
But leave us still our old nobility.

The force of bathos could no farther go. Indeed, published in or before the Augustan Age of England, it would have been seized by old Martin Scribbler for a clinching example of the art of sinking in verse. It is difficult in these days to believe that any man could seriously write that, nay, and print it too. The author has doubtless long since been ashamed of his production. He would fain forget it and make everybody else forget it, but it is not to be. The distich sticks to him like tar. It is the skeleton in the house of his reputation which turns up when least wanted.

What a warning this against rushing into print!

THE British Association this year opened at Cardiff on the 19th August. The President of the year, Dr. Huggins, delivered the opening address. He took up the subject of spectroscopic astronomy. Not the least interesting part of the address was that in which the President dwelt upon the great power which the progress of photography had put into the hands of the astronomer. He spoke in raptures of the modern silver-bromide gelatine plate. Whatever the improvements in telescoping, the eye after all is the instrument of vision, and the powers of the eye are limited—limited even in its capacity for utilising such aid as the telescope offers. In observation of delicate, transparent, evanescent phenomena, the evidence of this sense is apt to be confused, vague, and indistinct. Herein photography, with the vast advance made in recent years by it, may be of great help to the astronomer, catching the fleeting appearances as they fly and almost making the invisible visible. As Dr. Huggins explained :—

"We could not by the force of continued looking bring into view an object too feebly luminous to be seen at the first and keenest moment of vision. But the feeblest light which fell upon the plate was not lost, but taken in and stored up continuously. Each hour the plate gathered up 3,600 times the light-energy which it received during the first second."

Dr. Huggins then went into particulars. According to him, the astronomer was now able, with the sensitive plate, by a single short exposure, to obtain permanently the relative positions of thousands of stars, or the minute features of nebulae or other objects, or the phenomena of an eclipse, such as could not well be done by the eye. Certainly, in accomplishing even a minimum of these results, the poor inquirer would have to spend a large proportion of his time and strain his eye too much. This economy of force is not to be despised in any sphere. It is specially of the utmost importance in a field of the most minute observation and the most patient and unremitting labour—one, again, in which the integrity of the sight is the supreme factor. Above all, photography, by representing light waves which were both too small and too large to excite vision in the eye, opened up to the astronomer a new vista of knowledge.

The remarkable successes of astronomical photography or photographic astronomy is, of course, due to the accumulative property of the sensitive plate of seizing a very feeble light, acting continuously through exposure for several hours. These successes were, in Dr. Huggins' opinion, of the importance of a revelation. This revelation is comprised within the space of a single decade. The first surprise came in 1880, when Dr. Henry Draper succeeded in taking the nebula of great Orion sloping slowly to the West.

This was the stepping-stone. Others followed it up, and in 1883, Dr. Common took photographs which filled in the details and extensions of the nebula.

"A further disclosure took place in 1885, when the brothers Henry showed for the first time in great detail the spiral nebula issuing from the bright star Maia of the Pleiades, and shortly afterwards nebulous streams about the other stars of this group. In 1886 Mr. Roberts by means of a photograph to which three hours' exposure had been given, showed the whole background of this group to be nebulous. In the following year Mr. Roberts more than doubled for us the great extension of the nebular region which surrounds the trapezium in the constellation of Orion. By his photographs of the great nebula in Andromeda, he had shown the true significance of the dark canals which had been seen by the eye. They were in reality spaces between successive rings of bright matter, which appeared nearly straight owing to the inclination in which they lay relatively to us. These bright rings surrounded an undefined central luminous mass. Recent photographs by Mr. Russell showed that the great rift in the Milky Way in Argus, which to the eye was void of stars, was in reality uniformly covered with them."

WITH its closing for the long vacation, the High Court, reversing the order of the District Judge of Gya, upheld the Tikari will. This is another good Samaritan's work, the memory of which will be an enjoyment to the Chief Justice through the holidays. His judgment saves the character of a respectable man, and gives the estate to Raja Ran Bahadar's granddaughter. The latter result specially will be hailed throughout the land.

ON the motion of Mr. Hill on behalf of the accused in the Dacca bribery case, the Vacation Judges of the Calcutta High Court have ordered the transfer of the trial to the Calcutta Sessions. There was no opposition on behalf of the Crown, except that the case might be made over to the Alipore Judge. But the Court thought—and justly—that it was a case pre-eminently for the jury and ordered accordingly. The whole country ought to be grateful to Messrs. Beverley and Amir Ali for such a necessary and humane order.

SPECULATION is rife in town regarding the future of the Bangabasi case. Many are of opinion that practically there is an end of the matter, that the prosecution will not be pursued. Some believe that the Government will move the court again and see to the end of it. And no doubt this view accords better with the object with which the machinery of law was set agoing, which was to ascertain the adequacy or not of the existing law for the repression of seditious journalism.

In this connection the policy and intentions of the defendants are an important factor. Great curiosity has been manifested in regard to these, as well by those who sympathise with them as by those who do not. As usual, there is a great dearth of accurate information. As an example of the better-informed circles, we read in the last Grambasi—a Bengali weekly printed in Calcutta but published on Monday in Howrah—that the proprietor, the editor, the manager and the printer of the Bangabasi are about to send a representation to the Lieutenant-Governor and that they have requested the Press Association—the one recently started in the Rooms of the British Indian Association—to forward their petition. In that representation the four under trial freely admit that the language of their articles is truly violent, disrespectful, and improper, and that in spite of their wishes, they had excited in the people disaffection towards Government, for which they are now truly sorry.

The fact of the matter is, that the Bangabasi people are now penitent—as they may well be after the strain and the drain of these weeks—and, in view of the proceedings against them being dropped, have expressed their regret to the Bengal Government for their intemperate and improper language. The British Indian Association, both in its general Committee and in its new Press branch, support the prayer of the four accused. This is, of course, by arrangement. The Bengal Government is expected to recommend the petition, the final order being that of the Government of India.

Already, the tone of the Bangabasi and other papers is changed.

THE second part of the Warburton criminal prosecution of the Tribune, stands re-adjourned to the 4th November. The names of 11 witnesses were filed by the defence on the 5th, when the case was taken up, with a promise of 30 more, besides 10 in propria persona to be produced at the trial. All these witnesses are of the Panjab, excepting two of Calcutta who will be examined by commission. We hope the firm stand taken by the defence will ultimately prove beneficial to the press, which is at the present moment under a very great disadvantage.

IN his recent tour, the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal found that the work in the two contiguous sub-divisions of Chooandanga and Meherpore, was not enough to justify the retention of both. Sir Charles Elliott, accordingly, decided to abolish one of them. He is as good as his opinion. Pending final settlement of the question, he has just passed orders for temporary suspension of the Meherpore sub-division. That sub-divisional officer will hold his court at Chooandanga as headquarters of the two sub-divisions. The Sub-Deputy Magistrate of Ranaghat is deputed to take charge of the Meherpore sub-Treasury. Excepting the head clerk and accountant of the criminal court in Meherpore, all the other officers have orders to remove themselves to Krisnaghur.

WITH the permanence of the Income tax, the Government has begun to see its iniquity. The doubts about the repeal of the tax were clearly set at rest last year. In Bengal, the offices of Excise Inspector or Sub-Inspector and Assessor of Income-tax were separated. Districts were divided into five classes according to their average revenue from income-tax, and five grades of assessors were appointed on somewhat lower rates of pay than had previously been allowed. Service in the Income-tax branch, hitherto treated as temporary, was declared to be permanent and pensionable. Every district has now an officer entirely devoted to the Income-tax business. With this complete subordination of the country to the odious tax, the Bengal Resolution on the Report on its administration for the year 1890-91 thus concludes :—

"In referring to popular feeling on the subject of the income-tax, the Board say 'the tax is and always must be unpopular.' The enquiries, it necessitates 'are resented as inquisitorial and oppressive,' and are often met by 'the fabrication of false accounts' or 'a garbled balance sheet.' Of the truth of this description the Lieutenant-Governor has no doubt. Nothing but financial necessity can justify the retention of a tax which can only be based on a series of more or less accurate guesses. At the same time the principal hardship is felt by those whose incomes are the smallest, and if the assessable minimum could be fixed at Rs. 1,000 instead of Rs. 500, the greater part of the complaints against the tax would be stilled. The change would exempt 70,807 persons out of the 104,886 who paid income-tax during the year, but would only lower the produce of the tax by Rs. 7,87,603 (Class I, Rs. 500 to Rs. 750, Rs. 5,74,754 and Class II, Rs. 750 to Rs. 1,000, Rs. 2,12,849) out of Rs. 39,55,807, or 199 of the whole receipts. It will be a profound relief both to the administration and the people when the day comes when the Government of India can afford to permit itself the luxury of granting this relaxation."

The recommendation of the Bengal Government, if given effect to, will not only be a relief to the lowest class of assessors, but will exempt many who are not really affected by the law, but who are brought under it by the zeal of the administering officers. That zeal is, in no small measure, the origin of the unpopularity of the tax and the cause of garbled balance sheets. If the tax is to be retained, this small relief is the most needed.

THE Government expenditure, during 1890-91, incurred on subscriptions to newspapers, was Rs. 78,148, against Rs. 70,110 in 1889-90. These figures are supplied by the Superintendent of Stationery charged with the list of newspapers for Government. As the fourth estate, in a constitution not boasting the second and the third, the newspaper press can legitimately claim a greater regard than is represented in the figures quoted. The respectable class of native journals needs encouragement. Native newspapers are hardly paying concerns.

The income tax returns of the last year in Bengal give eleven as the number of newspapers paying the tax. This of course includes both European and Native proprietary. Taking the lowest figures as given in the Resolution, the taxable income of the newspaper press is represented by only Rs. 59,000 and the tax paid Rs. 1,367-3. The Resolution admits, "The average earnings of the eleven, as returned for income-tax purposes, amount to Rs. 6,000, but this figure includes papers under European as well as under native management, and it covers too wide variations of profit to be of any practical value, except as showing what a very small proportion of the large number of newspapers in Bengal make enough to render them liable to income-tax."

THE Indians are a bad lot—the Bengalis in particular being the worst batch,—such is the British report. It has been so often repeated and reiterated as to become a fixed article of faith. We have ourselves been taught to acquiesce in it. Of course, the Europeans are all good and noble, the British heavenly. Lying, we are told, is a native perversity and litigiousness an Asiatic custom, from both which European races are free. Yet, what a tale do the law courts of Great Britain—the Paradise of the West—tell! There has been no great litigation in that country in our time which has not been disgraced by enormous perjury of the most barefaced kind on one side or on both sides. In fact, the evil is clearly on the increase. Here is a responsible opinion deliberately expressed:—

"Speaking of witnesses in England, Mr. Justice Day, on a recent occasion, observed that 'referring both to the period, when he was a member of the Bar, and to the time during which he had sat on the Bench, he might say that the longer his experience in the administration of the law, the more distressed had he been by the amount of perjury committed before him—and committed with practical immunity.' 'He was afraid,' he added, 'that the influence of religion had little weight in deterring from perjury, &c.'"

There is no gainsaying that. Cases are continually cropping up until the subject has, we see, attracted the public attention. Politicians and public writers are discussing it. One extract will show.

The Times thus delivers itself:—

"That usually clever paper, the Pall Mall Gazette, is wonderfully obtuse upon some points. On Monday it suggested a 'Bill to legalise lying,' because no prosecution has been instituted in the case of Evelyn v. Hurlbert. Lying on a grand scale attracts attention. Perjury on the subject of baccharat or weak women excites remark; but compared to the vast amount of lying and perjury which goes on in all Courts of justice it is insignificant. It would be idle to prosecute big and fashionable liars, and to leave untouched the multitude of small and insignificant liars. As much mischief is done by the latter as by the former. Moreover, the remedy of a criminal prosecution is a difficult one to apply. For instance, which should be prosecuted, Miss Evelyn or Mr. Hurlbert? Perhaps our contemporary would suggest that the prosecution of Miss Evelyn should be conducted by the Attorney-General and of Mr. Hurlbert by the Solicitor-General. If this were done an acquittal in both cases is quite possible, for there are depths of guile beyond the ken of juries. Perjury must necessarily enjoy a certain degree of immunity, for every case tried records it more or less. No prosecution would check it, and to have any appearance of fairness prosecutions should follow in at least half the cases where there is a conflict of evidence."

The Times is not given to speaking at random.

HERE is a protest against Sir Philip Hutchin's Bill for extended jurisdiction of the Madras Small Cause Court:—

"During the hearing of an appeal at the Madras High Court, on the 4th instant, his Lordship the Chief Justice observed, that in a suit for Rs. 500 instituted in the Small Cause Court, (and which was referred to as one of the Exhibits on the appeal,) an institution fee of Rs. 46-14-0 had been levied, whereas in the High Court, in a suit for Rs.

2,000 and upwards, the institution fee was only Rs. 30. His Lordship, in commenting on this, said, 'This is what is called cheap justice!'

That may be a reason for reduction of institution fees. But these fees are not all in a suit in the High Court. What is the total cost of a suit of Rs. 2,000 in the High Court, as compared to the whole cost of such a suit in the Small Cause Court?

THE most backward district of Bengal is about to set an example in industrial enterprise which the Babudom of our metropolis would do well to follow. The company which is going to set up a Cotton Mill at Chatra, near Serampore, originated not with our Calcutta Babus or merchants, but with a few Zemindars and pleaders hailing from benighted Rungpore. We heartily wish their enterprise every success, not only for their sake, but for the sake of the best interests of the country. Our impression is that, in our present state, we want nothing so urgently as a sufficiently large number of cotton mills to supply our local wants by local manufacture. We may leave to our Government and to English capitalists the construction of our railways. We may even bear up with the pet grievances of our go-ahead politicians. But in our view of the situation the Manchester goods are the main cause of India's growing poverty and ought to be ousted anyhow from our markets. This consummation, which is devoutly to be wished, can be brought about only by utilising all our resources for setting up cotton mills instead of frittering away the same in begging for political privileges.

The clothing of India's teeming millions cannot possibly be supplied by local manufacture, unless we have at least three hundred large mills in addition to those that we already have. Impoverished as we are by the drain of Home charges and by the growth of an abnormal foreign commerce, it is no easy thing for us to find the necessary capital for such enterprise. Something may be done by economising such resources as we possess. The efforts of merchants and capitalists in this behalf may perhaps be assisted by the co-operation of the philanthropist. But the kind of knowledge which alone can rouse true patriotism, seems to be altogether wanting.

It must in candour be confessed that the Pioneer is now offering an example of impartiality which it were well for the Indian Press if our contemporaries would generally follow. For one thing, it has of late shown an independence of Government, which clearly enough indicates a breach in the official camp. We are, therefore, not surprised to hear whispers that Lord Lansdowne has adopted an attitude of perfect neutrality towards the whole press without favour to any journal, and that, since the retirement of General Chesney, the Allahabad paper has not been supplied with early official information. Still the Pioneer is the Pioneer and must be so—that is, a publication written principally by officials—officers, civil and military—for officials. It cannot change its bottom or its crew. Its connections and its traditions remain. Thus it is doomed to awkwardness and inconsistency. In its present situation, it is an anomaly in journalism. And it must frequently present a queer spectacle. While giving the Government hard blows, with ungloved fists, its character as advocate of Government measures and interpreter of official views remains. It could not be otherwise.

No wonder, therefore, that the Pioneer descends to write up even the Explanatory Memorandum accompanying the Indian Budget laid before Parliament. This Memorandum is, we are told,

"sufficiently elaborate and sufficiently lucid to render impossible the gross misconceptions and egregious fallacies which, a few years ago, were the leading characteristics of an Indian debate."

One would suppose that at length Indian accounts are available to the British nation in a proper and understandable shape. The Indian Spectator, however, dispels the illusion. That little weekly does not shrink from joining issue with the great official journal. In proof of its contention, it quotes the following insufficiently elaborate and insufficiently lucid introductory paragraph at page 4 of the Memorandum:—

"Apart from other considerations, the revenue and expenditure of the country are continually increasing through the opening of the additional railways and canals."

REIS & RAYYET.

THE NATIONS' PARLIAMENT OF HEALTH.

THE first Congress was held at Brussels in 1876. The permanency of the institution—its sitting every other year—we owe to the French. This was a suggestion of Dr. Lionville who represented the French Government. But the success of all these congresses is due to the indefatigable zeal and industry of Drs. A. J. Martin and Henri Napias who made the two French congresses of 1878 and 1889 memorable. After the opening at Brussels, there were sessions successively held at Paris, at Turin, at Geneva, at the Hague and at Vienna. The next Congress was due in 1889. But that was the year of the International Exhibition of Paris when the world would be bound for that capital, and as the French purposed to have a Hygienic Congress on the occasion, a separate gathering on much the same lines was dispensed with. Hence the International was due this year, and it has just closed its sitting in London.

The seventh International Congress of Hygiene and Demography was opened by the Prince of Wales on Monday, the 10th August, at 3 P.M. It had many interesting and brilliant features to be long remembered by all who feel for suffering humanity, not only in Europe but in every country of the world. To make it remarkable, there were many things, besides the presence of distinguished savants. The direct patronage of the Queen, her desire to confer honor on the foreign members disclosed by her commanding their attendance at Osborne, and according them the privilege of a personal reception; the personal presence of the Prince of Wales and the sacrifice made by him in coming to the metropolis in holiday time when it is deserted by most of its well-to-do citizens; his appeal to the corporations, municipalities, public bodies and chief citizens of Great Britain, all combined to ensure and crown the success of a cause which appeals to the sympathy of every respectable man. The reputation of the country for munificence was thoroughly maintained. Hospitality, public and private, was, with warmth and dignity, dispensed to the members of the Congress.

The Corporation of London greeted the members in its Guildhall, and Sir Andrew Clark gave them a banquet in the rooms of the Royal College of Physicians. The last function was especially conspicuous for enthusiasm and cordiality.

There is a dark background in the picture, however. The general management was anything but successful. There was no formal, or, for that matter, informal, reception of the visitors on their arrival. Not even a reading-room worthy of the name was provided for them. The clerks told off for their assistance were perfectly innocent of the languages of the visitors, and not only unable to afford any information to the foreign members but also to their own countrymen. Everywhere, there was a confession of executive incapacity.

The absence of Mr. Ritchie, the Minister of Public Health, with his colleagues, was especially marked. His absolute neglect and studious disregard of such an important Congress, which ought to have been his own, speak much against him and his department.

The Hall of St. James was crowded with about 2,300 persons including many ladies. Besides the representative members of Great Britain, the following foreign members of repute were present. Professors Cornil, Chauveau, Finkelnburg, Buchner, Emmerich, Babes, Laveran, Fodor, Celli, Ralliet, Drs. Rochard, Roux and Metschnikoff.

Sir Douglas Galton, in presenting his report, made the following observation about India: "Delegates were present from nearly all the great colonies, and he desired particularly to mention the support received from India; the Government and the Native States were represented by over seventy delegates; probably so large a number of our Indian fellow subjects had never before attended a European congress."

The inaugural address of the Prince of Wales evidently discloses a sentiment of personal sympathy for the poor. His address reminds one of Tennyson's lines—

"Is it well that while we range with science, glorying in the Time,
City children soak and blacken soul and sense in city slime?"

In response, the following gentlemen spoke on behalf of the delegates of their respective nationalities:

Dr. Brouardel for the French; Dr. Von Coler for the Prussians; Dr. Corradi for the Italians; Dr. Roth for the Germans; Dr. Korosi for the Austro-Hungarians.

The vote of thanks to the Prince of Wales for acting as their President, moved by Sir James Paget and seconded by Dr. George Buchanon, was carried by acclamation. The meeting closed with a suitable reply from His Royal Highness. Dr. Brouardel made a happy quotation from the speech of Lord Beaconsfield when he spoke in favour of a bill for the protection of the public health: "The public health is the foundation on which repose the happiness of a people and the power of a country. The care of the public health is the first duty of a statesman." These noble words, said Dr. Brouardel, ought to be repeated in all countries and in all parliaments.

Sir Joseph Fayrer, in his presidential address on Preventive Medicine, referred to sanitation in India. He is of opinion "that disease is generally diminishing and that life is of longer duration." We wonder what sort of statistics Sir Joseph relies upon in asserting so queer a paradox. In the face of the progressive spread of malaria and deterioration of health in the country, with men carried off by thousands by epidemics, and whole populations dragging on a sickly existence, it is a cruel mockery to talk in this strain. And the improvement is attributed by him to the Sanitary Department of India for giving effect to sanitary laws! We regret to differ from so high an authority, but really it is difficult to avoid laughing when one hears such things of a department which has done almost nothing except writing long administrative reports and resolutions for which the Government of India is so well known as the Government of Paragraphs. Sir J. Fayrer is on terra firma when he says that "cholera is to be prevented or diminished by sanitary proceedings alone, and that all coercive measures of quarantine or forcible isolation are futile and hurtful." So also Dr. J. M. Cunningham (late of India). The land quarantine is impracticable, and the sea quarantine has done us no good. The only efficient method for preventing the spread of epidemic diseases, according to him, is the enforcement of sanitary improvements.

Dr. Rochard (Paris) formulated three laws against the prevention of epidemic diseases: (1) Isolation, (2) Disinfection, (3) Sanitation.

Dr. Felkin said "that a method of inoculation for syphilis was in use among Central African tribes and had resulted in the virtual stamping out of syphilis among the tribes." Here is a fresh field for the Pasteurians to investigate and eradicate this shameful disease.

Dr. Simpson (Calcutta) said that "India had three populations—the Hindus, the Mahomedans, and the Europeans. The Europeans who travelled were not very subject to cholera; the Hindus, who were immensely subject to cholera, did not travel at all, because they would lose their caste. The Mahomedans were the real danger, and Mecca or Medina might be looked upon as a permanent threat to European security." That is neatly put, but sententiousness is too simple a vehicle for the complexity of truth. Dr. Simpson too spoke like a Calcutta Baboo. He does not know the Bheels, the Todas or even the Garos, aboriginal races worthy of observation from the Congress' point of view. But has he not heard of the Parsees and the Jews? As for his concluding remark, does Dr. Simpson intend to preach a crusade against the Holy Cities of Islam?

There was also a special Indian palaver, presided over by Sir M. E. Grant Duff. At that meeting, Sir W. Moore generally dwelt on the sanitation of India and said that at fairs and festivals the mortality from cholera has considerably decreased. Dr. Hendley of Rajputana drew a picture of a typical Rajputana capital and expressed his opinion that little progress had been made in the sanitation of Indian villages. Dr. Pringle declared that irrigation was a leap backward in sanitation. Just so. But then, irrigation could not be suppressed. Water is required for cultivation, and food is as prime a necessity as health. The problem of science, therefore, is, How to reconcile irrigation with sanitation? The Congress did not recognise it, however. Mr. Ollivant expressed a hope that Bombay may be supplied with water at 30 gallons a head per day. But the drainage works are behindhand in comparison with the water works. Calcutta must look sharp in this keen competition of sanitary progress with Bombay. The Administration Report of the Municipal Commissioners of Calcutta of 1889-90, says that "the supply has reached an average of 35'41 gallons of filtered water, 8'99 gallons of unfiltered water or a total of 44'4 gallons per head for the town wards." So it is plain, that Calcutta is better than Bombay at least in its water supply. Sir W. Wedderburn read three papers: (1) Our sanitary wants, by Dr. Kirtikar; (2) A Note on the Hygienic and Demographic condition of India, by Vishram Ramji Ghole; (3) The sanitary condition of the towns and villages of the Bombay Presidency, by K. V. Dhurandhar, Baroda. The following resolution was submitted by Sir M. E. Grant Duff and carried unanimously:—

"That looking to the interest shown by India in this Congress, and considering the probability that other tropical countries and colonies would take a similar interest in future Congresses, if a more prominent position were given to the consideration of subjects in which they are specially interested, this meeting recommends to the permanent committee that in future Congresses a tropical section be formed, with a view to a more full discussion of questions affecting sanitation, and the origin of disease in tropical climates."

In the Section on Demography, Mr. Holt Hallett read an elaborate paper on Indian Factory Legislation which deserves a separate treatment. Suffice it to note here that Mr. Hallett pronounced an unqualified condemnation of the Government of India's action. According to him, Indian factories are in a disgraceful condition. Dr. Bhadenji and others entered into a discussion on this subject.

The Congress was formally closed on Monday the 24th August, after a speech from Sir Douglas Galton.

He congratulated the Native Princes of India for evincing such deep sympathy with the Congress, and he trusted that this would lead to beneficial results. Then he answered the question raised by the Prince of Wales—"Why, if diseases are preventible, are they not prevented?"—by pleading ignorance on the part of the majority of the people and its consequent effect of carelessness and indifference. He at last moved the resolution for holding the next Congress at Budapest in 1894, which was carried. In return, Dr. Korosi thanked the Congress for accepting his country's invitation. There were just over 2,700 members who attended the Congress.

It is to be hoped that these congresses will create a spirit of fraternity amongst the rival nations. This view was well put forth by the late Professor Gubler when presiding over the Paris Congress of 1878. That distinguished savant addressed his colleagues in these terms:—"I call you colleagues, but I should say brothers, for where can that rare plant, the flower of fraternity, bloom and blossom better if not in our midst, and at a congress of health! Here we have no jealous rivalries, only a generous emulation for the attainment of that which is good. We wage war against all abuses, against all causes that bring about results injurious to our fellows, and with such principles the sentiment of fraternity will naturally dwell in our midst." That is language worthy of a Pandit to Pandits, and it specially becomes the President of the Nations' Parliament of Health welcoming the world's delegates.

THE IMPERIAL DIAMOND CASE.

TOWARDS the close of last week, Mr. Handley, the Chief Magistrate of Calcutta, on the application of Mr. Woodroffe on behalf of the Nizam of Hyderabad, issued a warrant of arrest and a search warrant against the person and (house) property of the Simla jeweller Jacob, charged with criminal misappropriation and criminal breach of trust. Mr Jacob had contracted with His Highness to sell, after a model left with the Nizam, a diamond called the Imperial, weighing 180 carats, for rupees 46 lacs, contingent on the Nizam's approval of the original. Jacob had long since sounded the depths of Hyderabad credulity, having first been in that city in the time of Afzalad Dowla Bahadoor. Since he set up as a jeweller, his eye had been on that rich and lavish court, which probably was his best customer. In a professional visit, he mentioned to the Ruler an unprecedented gem, a bigger diamond than the Kohinoor, if not of equal water. The original value of the diamond was 120 lacs, but he was able to procure it for 50 lacs, afterwards reducing the price to 46 lacs, after an absolute sale to the Nizam of other jewellery for 5 lacs. It was also arranged that half the fixed value, or 23 lacs, would be deposited in a Calcutta Bank to the credit of Jacob, to enable him to bring out the Imperial from London. The money was paid down, the stone arrived, but was not approved by the Nizam. Jacob did not receive the other 23 lacs nor did he return any portion of the 23 paid to his account.

Such is the evidence, recorded in the Police Court, of Albert Abid, Chamberlain of the Nizam.

What became of the 23 lacs, appears from the evidence of Mr. William Henry Cheetham, of Messrs Kilburn & Co. From that it appears that that Calcutta firm has transactions with the London firm of Pittar, Leverson & Co., who sent out the diamond, valuing it at £1,50,000. Mr. Shirley Tre-mearne had first negotiated for the diamond with Mr. Cheetham. He was followed by Mr. Jacob, who deposited Rs. 50,000 as security. He had the option of returning the jewel by the 31st July with the forfeit of £2,200. On the arrival of the stone by the end of June, Jacob paid down, on the 10th July, Rs. 22½ lacs and received the diamond. When the sale to the Nizam fell through, Jacob instructed Messrs. Kilburn to remit home the purchase money, and received back his deposit and the balance of Rs. 22½ lacs, or Rs. 1,70,000 and became the owner of the diamond—at the cost of the Nizam to the tune of Rs. 23 lacs. If he could effect the sale to the Nizam, he would have cleared nearly a quarter crore. He has now to account, in a criminal Court, for the 23 lacs.

The Magistrate's order was immediately telegraphed to Simla. Mr. Jacob at once prepared to start for Calcutta with the diamond, instructing his legal adviser, Mr. Cullen, to send the original documents regarding the diamond transaction after him. The Police, in its turn, took possession of Jacob's house and its belongings and sealed them, pending arrival of the warrant to search. Jacob arrived in Calcutta on Tuesday, the 8th, and, by arrangement between his solicitors Messrs. Morgan & Co. and the prosecution solicitors Messrs. Sanderson & Co., the diamond was deposited for safe custody in the Bank of Bengal as a sealed packet. After thus settling the preliminaries and intending to surrender himself the next day, in time to apply to the High Court for bail, he went to the Great Eastern Hotel, but the Police could not allow him to remain there, he therefore removed himself to the Police compound, and appeared before the Magistrate the next day.

In thus surrendering Jacob, his Counsel, Mr. T. A. Apcar, instructed by Mr. Geddes, applied for bail for him and release of his house. Mr. Handley was sorry that he could not oblige Mr. Apcar. He had only made the order for search and if anything wrong was done, he had his remedy afterwards. Mr. Dunne, for the prosecution, opposed the granting of bail, which Mr. Handley refused. He, however, granted the application, which was opposed by Mr. Apcar, of Mr. Dunne for an order for Mr. Davis of the jewellers Messrs. Hamilton to inspect the sealed packet and to examine whether it contained the identical stone the subject of the enquiry, in the company of the solicitors on both sides and Mr. Jacob.

Immediately after, Mr. Apcar applied to the Vacation Judges of the High Court to admit, under section 498, Criminal Procedure Code, the accused to bail. Mr. Woodroffe opposed the application, his initial objection being that there was no affidavit in support of the application. The court admitted the validity of the objection, but granted half an hour's time to rectify the omission. After lunch, the omission rectified, the application was discussed. Mr. Woodroffe contended that the court had no power to interfere at the present stage and before commitment by the Magistrate who is given the discretion to order bail. The Court held that section 498 gave it jurisdiction, if sufficient grounds were made out for such a course, but such a procedure would, of course, be very exceptional, and on very strong grounds indeed, and that sufficient case was not made out for its interference with the Magistrate's order at this stage. It was open to the Magistrate to grant bail.

The same evening (Wednesday) Mr. Handley held his court at quarter past six. Jacob was placed on his trial on charges of criminal misappropriation of 23 lacs and of 20 lacs and Rs. 71,492-7-1 and 1,77,131-1-2, these two amounts forming part of the 20 lacs. After recording sufficient evidence for remand, he remanded the prisoner to jail.

The regular investigation commenced the next day—Thursday. Messrs. Woodroffe and Dunne, instructed by Mr. Earnest Cowie, appeared for the prosecution, while Mr. M. Ghose, T. A. Apcar and Pearson, instructed by Mr. Geddes, represented the defence. Mr. Jacob was allowed a chair in the dock. Some witnesses were examined and the case postponed to Friday.

Before the rising of the court, Mr. Apcar renewed his application for release of the accused's house at Simla, where even his dogs were not allowed admittance. The Magistrate said he had sent a telegram two days ago to execute the search warrant and all that he could do now was to send another telegram to complete the search and release the house if still sealed up.

Friday's enquiry was limited to the examination of the Bank of Bengal people, the Bank having advanced the 23 lacs on the securities deposited at its branch at Hyderabad. The cross-examination of the witnesses was reserved. At the close of the day's proceedings, the Magistrate informed Mr. Ghose that he had received a telegram saying that Jacob's house had been searched, and, nothing being found, it has been released. On the application of Mr. Ghose, Mr. Handley made an order on the jail authorities to allow the accused's servant to attend on him there. They allowed him his meals from the Great Eastern Hotel but no private servants. Mr. Woodroffe, in answer to the Magistrate, had no objection but what he did not want was that Jack, Tom and Harry should visit Jacob whenever they thought fit. Mr. Handley granted the permission and postponed the case to Monday.

Macready once said that "a theatre was a place of recreation for the sober-minded and intelligent." THE DOORGA POOJAH HOLIDAYS.

SIR,—You were very kind to take up the matter of the Dooorga Poojah holidays last year, and the Viceroy replied to your memorial saying that the matter might be taken up again. This probably implied that anything to be done was for the future, as when the reply came it was too late for the last year, arrangements having already been made without there being an opportunity of making any alterations in them.

I, on behalf of the clerks and writers, beg to request you would be good enough to give the matter your early attention as the Poojahs are nearing.

Personally I derive no benefit from a change in the existing arrangements, as being employed in a merchant's office, I have to depend entirely on the pleasure of my employers. Still, it would be a matter of satisfaction if others, more fortunate than we, get the advantage. Besides, the merchants allude to the Government orders and notifications, so, were things better on that side, I and other unfortunates like me may have grounds for asking our employers for the indulgence.

Requesting you most earnestly therefore to take the matter up, I am &c.,

A MERCHANT'S CLERK.

COMPETITIVE EXAMINATION.

SIR,—Recently an appeal has been made to the Lieutenant-Governor for largely appointing Mahomedans in the public service, and therein the competitive system has been disapproved of altogether, and it has also been asserted that as long as the system remains in vogue there is no chance for the Mahomedans getting their legitimate share of the public appointments. In a suggestive manner the writer of the appeal says that the Lieutenant-Governor should either abolish the system itself, as it is the case in other parts of India, or exempt the Mahomedans from the competition, and bestow appointments on them in consideration of their being Mahomedans and members of old respectable families.

Commenting on this appeal, one of your morning contemporaries expressed his sorrow on the present miserable condition of the Mahomedans, and remarked that had the Mahomedans taken time by the forelock they would not have to regret now. However, your contemporary, without making any practical suggestion, recommended the appeal to the favorable consideration of the present Ruler of these Provinces.

Now the question is, Is it possible for the Lieutenant-Governor to undo all that have been done by his predecessors and the High Court relating to the recruitment for the public service and to grant the prayer contained in the said appeal? In the outset, it is beyond the scope of prudence to expect such things at the hands of the kind-hearted and impartial Sir Charles Elliott. We can reasonably expect only that much which the Lieutenant-Governor can advisedly do for the benefit of the deserving Mahomedan candidates. A plan is to be chalked out in this respect, so that the Mahomedans may get their legitimate share of the State patronage, and not merely cry over the hardship caused by the competition and howl for its abolition.

Competition is very good in itself and is the safest mode of testing the candidates. The competitive examination for the public service is highly desirable for the Hindu community of Bengal, for in that progressive community graduates are as plentiful as the mangoes of Malda, and otherwise educated Babus are as numerous as fishes in water. The Local Government could not have adopted a better plan to confer public appointments on the Hindu candidates to the satisfaction of that community than through competition. Consequently, to advocate for doing away with competition for the sake of any community is highly improper and unpatriotic.

Now let us see why do the other communities, and especially the Mahomedan community, complain of this judicious and wise system? As far as the Mahomedans are concerned, it can safely be stated that they do not complain of the principles of this system, but they justly cry against the working of it. As a matter of fact, it is a Hindu competition, for the Hindus compete with the Hindus, who are equally educated, whereas the practically qualified Mahomedan candidates are forced to compete with the Hindu candidates who are far superior to them in academical attainments and who have more facilities for preparing themselves for any examination. This difference is the real ground of complaint. The Mahomedans will never complain nor will they have any pretext for doing so, if they are allowed to compete, like the Hindus, with equally educated members of their own community—graduates for higher grade appointments and undergraduates for the lower. Our humble prayer is that the Government of Sir Charles Elliott will be pleased to do us the bare justice by allowing the Mahomedan candidates to compete with each other for a certain portion of the vacancies that are annually filled up by the competition-wallas. If such a boon be conferred upon them then there is every likelihood that the Mahomedans will soon regain their lost ground in the public service, which has been so to say monopolised by the Hindus. If this boon be granted and a certain portion of the annual vacancies be reserved for the Mahomedan competition-wallas, then it is distinctly to be understood that in the competitive examination same questions should be put to all the candidates—Hindu as well as Mahomedans, with the passable marks in each. In case Mahomedan candidates having failed to secure the passable marks any number of reserved vacancies remain uncompleted for, then these vacancies may be filled up by the deserving Mahomedan servants of Government from educational and other departments, and if there be any paucity in that direction they may be filled up by the Hindu competition-wallas, who, though obtaining the passable marks, could not be accepted.

If the competition examination be carried on in the above manner, it will satisfy the Mahomedans in general and especially those of their leaders who have spent the best portion of their lives in spreading higher English education among their co-religionists. And it is further expected that the Hindu patriots would not have any objection to such a change in the working of the competitive system. If there be any, let the Hindus and the Mahomedans discuss it publicly through the medium of the impartial Press and settle the same among themselves. The Government is always ready to make any alteration in this direction if the communities concerned desire the same. Until the Hindu patriots sacrifice some of their interests for the amelioration of the condition of the Mahomedans, there is no hope for the two communities coming to satisfactory terms.

In conclusion, I beg to state that it will be highly impolitic to bestow all public appointments upon the Mahomedans on the plan referred to in the abovementioned appeal. For when the higher education has been thrown open to all without any distinction of social position or family connection, it would be a gross injustice now to confer appointments upon the Mahomedan candidates on mere recommendation.

MANIPUR.

Telegram, dated the 28th May, 1891.

From—The Viceroy, Simla,

To—The Secretary of State, London.

Manipur punishments. It is essential to the security of our position in India that the subjects of Native States should understand that the murder of British officers renders the murderers and their abettors liable to punishment of death whatever orders they may have received from the authorities of the State concerned. It has been clearly laid down that no Native State has capital jurisdiction over European British subjects. I regard maintenance of this principle as of the utmost importance, but, where a murder has been committed under compulsion, sufficient weight should be given to this fact.

Telegram, dated the 3rd June, 1891.

From—The Secretary of State, London,

To—The Viceroy, Simla.

Your Lordship's telegram of 28th May, Manipur punishment. I agree.

Telegram No. 27 N.-E., dated the 5th June, 1891.

From—The Viceroy, Simla,

To—The Secretary of State, London.

Manipur.—We wish to draw special attention to the following points:

First.—It is the right and duty of the British Government to settle successions in subordinate Native States. Every succession must be recognised by the British Government, and no succession is valid until recognition has been given. This principle is fully understood and invariably observed.

Second.—Manipur is a subordinate Native State. We rendered it independent of Burma. We have recognised successions in Manipur, and have asserted suzerainty in many ways; and Manipur ruling family have repeatedly acknowledged their position of dependence. For example, in 1874 Maharaja presented nazar to Viceroy and received khilat. Again ex-Maharaja now in Calcutta was recognised as future successor by us during his father's lifetime at his father's request; and similarly, at ex-Maharaja's request, we recognised as his successor present Jubraj. Ex-Maharaja and even Regent and Senapati since revolt have all admitted dependent position of State (see ex-Maharaja's letter, 14th November, paragraph 7; Regent's letter, 25th March, last paragraph but one; Rassick Lall Kundu's letter 4th April, end of paragraph 6). He now states that portion of letter referring to Senapati was dictated by Senapati himself.

Third.—It is our right and duty to uphold Native Chiefs recognised by us, except in case of gross misrule, and to punish unlawful revolt against their authority. We have accordingly more than once upheld Manipur Chiefs by force, and punished rebels against their authority (see Aitchison's Treaties, Vol. I, page 248, and recent cases of Bara Chauba and Jogendra Singh referred to in Maharaja's letter of 14th November).

Fourth.—The rising against Maharaja in September 1890 was unlawful revolt, and we should have been justified in putting it down by force and punishing rebels. But for Maharaja's abdication, which was somewhat hastily accepted by Grimwood without reference to us, we should probably have done so. Chief Commissioner offered Grimwood armed assistance from Kohima (see Quinton's telegrams to Cunningham, 22nd and 24th September 1890, and Grimwood's letter 25th September, paragraph 10 to 14, and Cunningham's letter to Quinton of 24th January, paragraph 6).

Fifth.—When Maharaja wished to recall abdication, we were disposed to restore him and re-assert his authority. We gave way on this point to objections earnestly pressed by Quinton both in letters and in personal communication with the Viceroy and Council. Grimwood also was opposed to Maharaja's restoration (see Quinton's letters to Cunningham, 9th and 19th February 1891, and Grimwood's letter, 4th December, paragraph 26).

Sixth.—Nevertheless we could not permit a revolt against a Chief recognised by us to remain wholly successful and unpunished and virtual authority in Manipur to pass into hands of Senapati, who, as lately described by Johnstone in a letter, is "a man of infamous character," and who was notoriously turbulent and the real leader of the revolution of September 1890. See paragraphs 4, 11, and 19 of Grimwood's letter of 25th September, and paragraphs 5, 14, 17, 19 and 27 of his letter of 4th December; also correspondence of 1881 and 1888 as to Senapati's antecedents and occasions on which he incurred the displeasure of Government.

Under the circumstances we decided that Senapati should be removed from the State, and Quinton, while in Calcutta, did not question propriety of this decision.

Seventh.—We did not indicate to Quinton method in which deportation was to be effected. We asked him what steps he considered necessary for carrying out removal without affording Senapati the chance of making forcible resistance. No instructions other than those contained in letter No. 360 of 21st February were given to Quinton on this point either by letter or by word of mouth.

Eighth.—Quinton did not immediately consult Grimwood on subject doubtless for reasons given in demi-official letter to Cunningham of 22nd February. Following is extract from this letter:—Begins: "It is of importance that the decision of the Government of India which I am going to Manipur to announce and enforce should not be divulged prematurely, and it is scarcely possible to guard against its leaking out if I use the telegraph at Manipur or even write: so many persons are interested in knowing what is about to happen. The Political Agent has no cypher code."—Ends. No doubt Darbar would have tried hard to get message or letter from Telegraph or Post Office, and might have succeeded. Some of the Agency establishment are suspected of having been in the habit of supplying information to Darbar, and Quinton must have known this. These facts explain alleged studious concealment from Grimwood of Quinton's intentions.

Ninth.—Quinton's desire to consult Grimwood as far as circumstances permitted is shown by Gurdon's special mission to Manipur a week in advance of Quinton. On that occasion Gurdon gave Grimwood clear information of intended removal of Senapati, and consulted him as to the method of arrest. Grimwood could suggest no way for effecting arrest without affording Senapati opportunity of making forcible resistance. Gurdon's Italian telegram to Quinton reporting on situation was seen and approved by Grimwood (see Gurdon's telegram, 7th May, and his report forwarded with our despatch No. 81 of 26th May).

Tenth.—On Gurdon's return from Manipur, Quinton sent his telegram of 18th March to Cunningham. This telegram was the only reply received to enquiry mentioned in section 7 above, except demi-official letter of 22nd February mentioned in section eight. In that letter Quinton expressed intention of consulting with General Collett before submitting his recommendations officially.

Eleventh.—We did not know, and we had no reason to infer from Quinton's telegram of 18th March, that Quinton contemplated summoning a formal Darbar or public assembly for the purpose of arresting Senapati. The words "Regent and the Darbar" in that telegram mean Regent and Court or entourage. The word Darbar is habitually used in this sense.

Twelfth.—The decision to arrest in Darbar or public assembly was apparently arrived at on 21st March in conference at Sengmai between Quinton, Skene, Cossins, and Grimwood. Gurdon, who was in Quinton's confidence, informs us, in report cited in section 9 above, that after this conference Quinton told him the Senapati would be arrested at Darbar next day. Gurdon adds:—Begins: "This was the first mention I had heard of the plan."—Ends. Until Gurdon's telegram of 7th May reached us, we did not know precisely what Quinton had intended.

Thirteenth.—Grimwood was opposed to removal of Senapati, and doubtless also to his arrest.

Fourteenth.—As to merits of Quinton's proposed action, there was certainly nothing unusual in announcing our orders in formal Darbar, including the order for removal of Senapati. Under ordinary circumstances this would have been the natural and proper course. No question as to exact time and method of arrest would have arisen, because ordinarily there would have been no thought of resistance, and any person to be deported would have considered himself at Quinton's disposal from the time that orders of Government were announced.

Fifteenth.—The anticipation of possible resistance to such orders is so rare that comparatively few instances of formal arrest in Darbar are on record; but the following cases may be cited: Sandeman lately arrested in open Darbar the Naib of Kej, who had attended at his summons. In 1879 General Roberts made formal entry into Bala Hissar, and read out proclamation to assembled notables. After doing so, he informed principal Ministers, whom he suspected of using their influence against us, that it was necessary to detain them. In these cases idea of treachery never occurred to anyone concerned.

Sixteenth.—It cannot be too clearly understood that the proposed Darbar at Manipur was not a conference between equals, or anything of the nature of a hospitable reception. It was an assemblage summoned by the Representative of the Paramount Power to declare the orders of the British Government in a case of disputed succession, upon which both ex-Maharaja and Regent had addressed us, and upon which, in accordance with custom, we were entitled to decide, and they were bound to accept our decision. Quinton in telegram of 18th March says:—"I propose requiring Regent and the Darbar to meet me," and Regent's letter 25th March, first paragraph, shows Regent understood that he was required to attend with his brother to hear what our decision was. There was nothing of the nature of allurements. The Senapati, like the Regent, was bound to attend and accept our orders. The Regent was to be recognised as Maharaja and the Senapati was to be banished. In the meantime Quinton was right in treating both with ordinary politeness. Though Senapati was to be banished, the immediate cause of his banishment was political rather than criminal misconduct.

Seventeenth.—To say that Quinton was bound to give Senapati previous warning of the orders of Government, and of the fact that he would be forcibly arrested unless he submitted to them, is in effect to say that because Senapati was known to be a man of violent character and likely to give trouble, it was therefore Quinton's duty to show him special consideration, and give him special opportunity of preparing for mischief. The necessity for forcible arrest could not arise unless Senapati refused to accept our orders. It could only, therefore, be the result of his own misconduct and revolt against our paramount authority, which authority he himself subsequently acknowledged in letter referred to above, section 2.

Eighteenth.—We do not know Quinton's motive for arrest in Darbar. He probably desired to announce and carry out our orders in most formal and open manner. Statement that Darbar was delayed in order to give time for translation of Quinton's speech supports this view. Arrest of Senapati could apparently have been effected with less difficulty by summoning him to private interview; but Quinton probably thought this would not have been as suitable to the occasion. In any case there was nothing of the nature of treachery involved.

Nineteenth.—If Quinton had been willing to stoop to treachery, there would have been no difficulty in the matter. He could certainly and easily have allayed Senapati's suspicions by friendly assurances, and have seized him on occasion of friendly visit.

Twentieth.—Suspicion of treachery, which arises primarily from misapprehension of nature of proposed Darbar, may perhaps be secondarily due to special circumstances for which Quinton was not responsible; for example, Grimwood and Simpson's shooting expedition with Senapati after orders of Government had been communicated to Grimwood.

Twenty-first.—As to military questions involved, we would rather not offer any opinion until the receipt of the proceedings of the Court of Enquiry held at Manipur, which were posted there on the 31st May and are due here on the 14th instant. We can only say that both by letter and in personal communication with Quinton we instructed him to take care that he had a sufficient force. From the papers that have come before us, it is evident that Quinton and the responsible military authorities in Assam considered the escort ample to overcome any resistance that could reasonably be expected.

Twenty-second.—To sum up. It was our duty to settle disputed succession in Manipur. We accepted opinion of local authorities, and decided in favour of acknowledging Jubraj instead of restoring Maharaja; but we stipulated that Senapati, who had led revolt against Maharaja, and was a man of turbulent and infamous character, must leave the State. We did not prescribe method of his deportation, and we did not know Quinton intended to arrest him in Darbar; but we consider that Darbar was suitable place for announcement of our orders, including order for banishment of Senapati, and we see no treachery whatever in Quinton's intention to arrest Senapati there and then if he declined to submit to those orders which as subject of a subordinate Native State he was bound to obey. As to question of escort, we desired Quinton to take sufficient force, and he took the full force which was considered necessary by him and the local military authorities.

No. 492

THE CAPTIVE LADIE.

By the late MICHAEL MADHUSUDAN DUTT.

REPRINTED FROM THE MADRAS EDITION OF 1849.

[Concluded from page 433.]

Go,—ope the portals far and wide,
And let the overwhelming tide,
Of foemen like an ocean glide !
What boots it now, since they must sheathe
Their blades in hearts have ceas'd to breathe,
And Conquest in proud triumph tread
A lone, wide city of the dead !
'Tis morn : the sun is on the sky,
With beaming brow and laughing eye !
Fair light ! lit at Creation's birth
Bright tenant of eternity,
He melts not like the things of Earth,
In fadeless glory shrin'd on high !
What empire's 'neath his changeless beams,
Have sprung, then sunk—like baseless dreams !
He fades not like thy works, proud man,
Thou creature of a measur'd span !
Thy pride, thy glory, and thy power,
Are things to him but of an hour,—
He on Creation's birth did smile,
And he shall light its funeral pile,
When Time shall flow into the sea,
Of boundless, wide Eternity !
'Tis morn :—along the Moslem line,
Ten thousand spears all brightly shine,
And many a flashing blade is bare,
• And voice of triumph on the air,
As column'd warriors onward press,
With all the haste of eagerness,
When Vengeance sternly wings the feet,
To rush where falchion'd foemen meet ;
On—on they press,—'tis idlesse all,
There stirs no foe on yonder wall,
And wide the portals gape and far,—
Deserted—lone—as if no War,
Rag'd round to crush—destroy and mar !—
'Tis noon :—and from his car on high,
The sun looks down, his burning eye,
Now sees the Crescent's blood-red wave,
Gild fall'n Husteena's lowly grave,
Where Love and Valour with her sleep
In dreamless slumber long and deep !—
What tho' fierce foemen's shouts come on the gale,
Far louder than lone Grief ! thy bitter wail,—
What tho' their dirge be the exulting cry
Of foemen crown'd by bloody Victory,—
It breaks not,—nay 'twill never break the rest
Which lull'd them yesternight upon its breast !—
END OF CANTO II.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

A FREE fight is reported between several policemen and a section of the Rawal Pindi City population called Dhabras, over some disagreement.

THERE was lately a serious emeute in the Agra Central Jail. It is said that, pursuant to a well-matured plan, the life convicts rose on a dark night and, but for the vigilance of the convict burkundazes and the pluck of the warders, would have made their 'escape. Three of the prisoners lost their lives, besides the wounded, on both sides.

HEAVY rains have fallen in Rohilkhund. Whole tracts have been flooded. The bazar at Shaharanpur is under water. Houses have fallen at Moradabad, killing many persons under them.

CHILD of Faith and Charity, the Aligarh Mahomedan College has fitted out an Expedition to send round the hat—not only broad in the brim but also deep and roomy. The excellent and indefatigable learned Syed, Sir Ahmad Khan, who founded the College, is at the head of it. The deputation has left Aligarh.

THE Khojak Tunnel was formally opened last week, connecting India with the plains of Chaman on the very fringe of Afghan territory.

It has been discovered that the hairy part of a tiger's foot is full of minute invisible parasites which are in themselves so many miniature tigers—with head, ears, jaw, legs, claws, body, tail and all.

THE death of Captain R. D. C. Davies, of the Berar Commission, raises Assistant Commissioner Kumar Shri Harbanji Rawaji from the 3rd to the 2nd class in which he had been officiating.—In the N. W. Provinces, Mr. Rustonji has been succeeded by Kunwar Bharat Singh as officiating District Magistrate and Collector of Balia.

THEY have found a "sensation" in Lucknow. The local Advocate writes :—

"A house has been found under-ground near the northern portico of the Canning College. It is said that the late King's Begams used to keep their jewellery at the spot, hence a pahrawalla has been appointed to watch the place."

And who is to watch the pahrawalla ?

BRIGADE-SURGEON R. C. Chandra, Professor of Materia Medica and Clinical Medicine, Medical College, and ex-officio Second Physician in the Medical College Hospital, shortly retires from the service—next month, we believe. The date of retirement is not Gazetted, but his successor is—Surgeon-Major J. F. P. McConnell, M.D., of the Bengal Establishment, Civil Surgeon of the 24-Pergannas. How to account for this haste ? A native is, however, allowed to officiate as Civil Surgeon of the 24-Pergannas.

HERE is a description of a monsoon in India by a writer in the Hawk:—

"The quick-darting adder tongues of flame flash everywhere, search the bellowing heavens throughout from top to bottom, throughout the whole cloud-packed dome. Now for a second, only for a second, the quick flash lightning ceases, and an inky blackness, of Erebus, succeeds, and the thunder bellows as an Englishman in his sea-girt little isle never heard it bellow. It is no distant rumble gradually rolling nearer and culminating in a resounding crack overhead; no, around, about, and just overhead, the infernal din never ceases. The belled clouds are pregnant with thunder, and the flame forks flash hither and thither piercing their wombs and loose the thunder from its prison. It reminds one of Michael and his celestial host warring with Lucifer and his legions. It is terrible. Inside your bungalow the first advancing wind that heralded the monsoon carried with it clouds of blinding dust which is now piled up an inch high on table and chair and shelf. And still the war of the elements goes on. You cannot hear your neighbour's voice, though he shout his utmost; the birds affrighted shriek in the thickets, and the native servants huddle themselves together in dark corners for safety. The sky opens its floodgates and rain in torrents pours down without intermission for 80 or 90 hours on the parched earth. Splash! splash! on the roof, not in showers, but in sheets. That is the monsoon."

EXCEPTING the Shan States, the Municipal Taxation Act, XI of 1881, has been extended to Upper Burma.

HER Majesty's Secretary of State for India in Council, at a meeting of the Council of India, held on the 28th July 1891, has resolved—that the provisions of section 1 of the Statute 33 Victoria, Chapter 3, being an Act to make better provision for making Laws and Regulations for certain parts of India, and for certain other purposes relating thereto, be, and the same are hereby, made applicable to the tracts known as Angul and the Khondmals in Orissa, Bengal.

MR. J. D. Rees, Private Secretary to the Madras Governor, was privately married to Miss Mary Dormer, daughter of the Madras Commander-in-Chief, on the 9th September, in the Roman Catholic Cathedral, Ootacamund, Lord and Lady Wenlock, the Hon'ble Sir James and Lady Dormer, with their respected staffs, being present.

THE Cutchee Veesa Oswals have, at a meeting at Mandive Bunder, tabooed the nose-ring for their women, but not the boring of the nose, nor the ornamenting of it either. The ring is to be substituted by flower. The disregard of the Resolution is punishable with a fine of Rs. 10-4 annas. The boring—whether of the nose or of the ear—is a barbarity and disfigurement, not unattended with evil consequences on the health. Although the practice is maintained, it is something that it is being circumscribed. The Cutchee Oswals have started a reform which should be taken up in other parts of the empire.

CHARACTERISING it as a heinous crime, committed in a most cowardly way, Mr. Justice Hawkins, at Lewes Assizes, sentenced John Smith, formerly of the Black Watch, to five years' penal servitude, for sending threatening letters to Mrs. Williams, a married woman, residing with her husband at Buxted, saying that unless she paid him a considerable sum of money he would disclose improper relations between them.

THE Sessions Judge of Agra has transported for life a Mahomedan cook for attempting to poison his mistress Mrs. Nisbett for her jewellery, said to be valuable.

IN a pastoral letter, it is said, the Vicar General of Thana charged Mr. Da Monte and Mr. C. D. Nunes with being the prime movers in an agitation setting at naught the rules of the Church, with circulating a pamphlet despising the laws of the Church, and attempting openly and audaciously to attach the coffers, to obtain possession of funds, &c. On these grounds, the Bishop of Damaun pronounced sentence of excommunication against them. The Bombay Chief Presidency Magistrate has by a summons called upon the two dignitaries to shew cause why process should not issue against them for defamation.

WE read in the Lucknow Advocate:—

"A case that promises to be big with sensation was filed in the City Magistrate's Court on Tuesday last, the 8th instant, by Mr. L. B. Bose, B. A., B. L., on behalf of Babu Parbati Charan Banerji. Mr. Bose applied for summonses under sections 499 and 500, I. P. C., against the Printer, Publisher, the Editor and Proprietor and an Occasional Lucknow Correspondent of the Indian Mirror newspaper of Calcutta, to show cause why they should not be punished for having published libellous matter, in the issue of 4th August of that paper and other dates, concerning the said Babu Parbati Charan. The application was granted and summonses issued."

THE Armenian defamation case, in which the Northern Division Magistrate was engaged for sometime, at last came to a close last week, when Syed Ameer Hossein Khan Bahadar convicted the accused. Mr. Martin, a warden of the Armenian Church, prosecuted Mrs. Mackertich, a recipient of the Armenian Church casual charities, for a statement of hers that he came into her room, outraged her, &c., &c., and that she had become enceinte by him. Mr. Martin admitted that he had an interview with her in one of his rounds of duty but that "he did not lay his hands on her in order to outrage her modesty or say or suggest anything indecent to her." The Rev. Mr. Elisha, a priest of the Church and a witness for the prosecution, however, deposed that "Mr. Martin told me that whatever he had done was with the consent of the woman and he had used no force towards her," and that "Mr. Martin admitted to me that he had committed adultery with the defendant." This evidence of the priest was a stumbling block to the Magistrate, but he avoided it saying "It appears to me that the heart of this gentleman was melted into pity towards the defendant, and he has evidently made an attempt to save her from the consequences of the law, regardless of the means he had adopted for doing so, which, I regret to say, reflects little credit on his own conduct." In consideration of the desitute position of the defendant and the object of the prosecution being to vindicate the character of Mr. Martin, the court sentenced Mrs. Mackertich to pay a fine of Rs. 10 only, or to undergo one month's simple imprisonment. The case is very unfortunate for the venerable Armenian Church. If the warden is restored to his old position, the priest comes out of the trial with a scratch.

MR. C. W. Christian, a minister of the Gospel, holding his ordination parchments from Bishop Thoburn, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, prosecuted Mr. J. W. Hayes, junior, of Bangalore, at Bangalore, for defamation. The complaint was that the accused had said to Mr. Cribb, junior, in the accused's office in the Brigade-road, that complainant "was not the son of Captain Christian," and that "he is the son of a Marvady." The complaint was heard by Colonel Magrath. Mr. Lawrence appeared for the accused, the complainant pleading for himself. Mr. Lawrence tried a compromise offering an apology. The complainant was willing to accept it, provided it was a written one. The Court suggested the advisability of his accepting a verbal apology from the accused who stated that he "did not mean to injure Mr. Christian's reputation by making use of the statement which Mr. Christian construed into defamation and which he had made under instructions from his client." The complainant would not accept anything but a full and written apology, and asked the court to go on with the enquiry. He would have accepted an apology "if it were any other than Mr. J. W. Hayes, junior." The last statement put Mr. Hayes on his mettle and he jumped up saying, "You cheated people in Hyderabad, and had to leave the ministry." Mr. Christian, keeping his temper, asked the Court to record "this irrelevant and highly defamatory statement." During the complainant's opening of his case, the accused's counsel intimated his client's willingness to render a written apology, and Mr. Christian insisting on the omission of the clause about Hayes' intention of not hurting him or injuring his reputation which he did not consider a true statement, the following written apology was tendered and accepted, and on the Court accepting and placing on record copies of Captain Christian's marriage certificate and Mr. Christian's baptismal certificate, the case was compounded with sanction of the Court:—

"I am very sorry I made the statement that Mr. Christian was not Captain Christian's son, and was the son of a Marvady, or words to that effect, and I withdraw the statement to which he has taken exception."

With this simple withdrawal and expression of regret, both complainant and court were satisfied and the ends of justice obtained.

MISS Marsden, an English nurse, has brought to prominent notice that in Siberia they successfully use a plant for prevention and cure of leprosy. Following it up, Mr. F. J. King, of Croydon, attributes the disappearance of the disease in England and Ireland, so common in the Middle Ages and even in Queen Elizabeth's days, to introduction of the potato. He says leprosy is limited to countries where potatoes are not grown or not used as a common article of diet, and then suggests the free use of the vegetable as a cure for leprosy.

ANOTHER lawyer in trouble. The Munsiff of Aligarh has sent a pleader practising before him to be prosecuted in the criminal court for having tampered with certain papers in a suit.

EUROPEAN outrages on unprotected women are becoming quite as common in India as European murders of natives. Lately, two young ruffians one a European and the other an East Indian—entered at night a second class compartment of a Loop mail train in which a young Eurasian girl of fourteen was travelling on the East Indian Railway between Mokameh and Jamalpore. They disguised themselves by tying their handkerchiefs on their heads. One of them immediately covered up the lamp with the green shade. Then they proceeded to their fell purpose. She resisted and struggled. At the same time, she screamed as loud as ever she could until she lost her voice and then commenced to vomit. At this the wretches decamped. One of them by name C. Ryland was arrested and, after magisterial enquiry, committed to the sessions under sec. 376, I. P. C. Another night, the privacy of a lady was invaded for the same purpose and she was forcibly seized, but her cries brought assistance and she was saved. The Railway town of Jamalpore is acquiring an unenviable notoriety, and the line to the other side of it seems to be the prowling ground of bad characters of sorts. There was an attempt also on the wife of an officer in an upcountry station.

If the people are satisfied with the Consent Act, and the more candid oppositionists are already ashamed of their part, the malcontents of British blood in England will not let bygones be bygones. It is in this style they are inciting the Indian people:—

"Indians will make a grave political mistake if they allow that Act to remain in force. Quite irrespective of the inmarriage question itself, the introduction and passing of that Act will crush the political aspirations of Indians if it is allowed to remain. The intention of the Act was to hold up Indians to scorn as utterly unworthy of political power; and many Indians have been fools enough to fall into the trap. It was also hoped that it would split the Congress Party, and it has paralysed it. Officials are now laughing at the successful dissension they have started among Indians."

It is these mischievous writers who are the guides of the Bangabasi and their independent satellites, the Dainiks and such like.

IN an address to the Governor of Madras, the inhabitants of the village of Periapolliam deplore "the total absence of lakes and tanks for agricultural purposes, which are, to use a strong word, the mantra of this village," and complain that, "though this village is on the River Nggari, the inhabitants of this village and its environs can afford to make, comparatively speaking, but very little use of its water, for this reason, that its water is allowed to run waste into the sea after a short course through the villages."

ON the application of Mr. V. A. Modak, the Principal of the Bombay Elphinstone High School, Justice of the Peace, Fellow of the Bombay University, and supporter of the Age of Consent Bill, the acting Chief Presidency Magistrate of Bombay issued summonses against one B. S. Sitaram for writing and against V. N. Bhatt, editor and proprietor, and Amaram Kanoba, printer, of the Marathi monthly magazine Khurd-Prakar or "the Truth Sayer," for publishing and printing an article "An Extremely Reproachful Story" said to insinuate "a gross and malicious scandal in connection with two of his children." A search warrant was also granted "to recover the original of the alleged publication or any copies thereof."

DR. Burggraave, of the Ghent University, has put forth a panacea for all ills. His recipe is simple—it is nothing else but salt. He says that good health is not a matter of chance or constitution, the laws regulating human life are calm and regular phenomena, and to attain to longevity you have only to take care that they develop themselves without objection. That regulating agent, he says, is salt. If the blood be too rich, salt will clarify it; if the blood be too poor, salt will strengthen it and supply the necessary elements. The Doctor cites several instances to prove his theory of long life. Formerly, in Holland, the highest punishment for an offending soldier was unsalted bread. This treatment in a few months proved his grave. The terrible epidemic in Saxony, at the end of the last century, was due to want of salt. According to this physician, salt is an infallible cure for consumption and cholera. In Russia, a plague was once averted by salted milk. Ordinarily, the daily dose of an adult is two-thirds of an ounce. Here is a call in the name of science on the Government of India to reduce the salt duty, specially in times of distress and disease. The subject is well worth consideration.

THE quiet little French town of Chandernagore has lately been stirred by a most unhappy squabble between two of its leading citizens. Mons. Charles Dumaine is the Mayor of the town and Mons. D. C. Roquette is one of the principal natives of the place. M. Dumaine is also the accomplished editor of Le Petit Bengali, Chandernagore's only French paper—indeed, the only journal of any kind now published in the Settlement. Baboo Dourga Charon Roquette took offence at certain criticisms which appeared in Le Petit Bengali of the 15th June, and charged the proprietor and editor with having libelled him. As M. Dumaine was the leading advocate in the Settlement, M. Roquette engaged a lawyer from Pondicherry, M. Gaston Pierre, an advocate of the superior courts of French India. The case was heard on the 10th September by M. Sirot, Judge of Chandernagore. The defendant has been fined 200 francs besides mulcted in Rs. 1,000 to be paid as damages to the plaintiff. If Baboo Dourga Charon Roquette was defamed, he has got only his due. No man can blame him for seeking to right his reputation, or the court either for doing its duty. In that case, we regret that common friends did not come between, to effect an amicable settlement. There is still room for the offices of friendship. Friendship being absent or lukewarm, philanthropy may well step in to do the needful. Is there no good Samaritan in Chandernagore? Baboo Dourga Charon is a wealthy and prosperous man known for his obligingness, and he does not care to make money by this litigation. His character established, he may be easily induced to forego the damages awarded him. The fine and damages, coupled with the other unavoidable expenses of litigation, and the loss of professional or business earnings during the period, and their reduction afterwards, perhaps ever after, must, we are afraid, prove ruinous to the defendant. As the French patriot of Chandernagore, M. Dumaine could not have been doing famously—that is, financially speaking. That is a surmise we should be exceedingly happy to be disabused of, but we cannot in reason hold any other view. The present Mayor has devoted himself to the Settlement and he is identified with its worth. Now that the policy of the ministry in the mother country has brought down the status of the colony in Bengal and reduced its establishment, withdrawing the higher judiciary, the hopes of the depressed citizens more than ever centre in M. Dumaine. His Le Petit Bengali, little as it is, is the sole remaining glory of the place. The difficulties of maintaining a French journal in a remote speck of a colony without a French-speaking population, may be imagined. Great, however, is the importance of such a journal in keeping Chandernagore and its interests alive in the minds of the authorities and the public in Pondicherry and in France as well as in other French colonies, and M. Dumaine has sacrificed his substance and himself in the public cause in keeping up his paper, formerly on a large scale, now in a reduced shape. In Pondicherry or Cochin China or almost any another French colony, he might have done himself good. Even in British India, he could scarcely have failed to thrive, had he devoted himself with an entire heart to business. But men are dominated by their ideas, and Frenchmen above other men. So M. Dumaine elected to suffer as the Patriot of Chandernagore, an inland colony without a commerce and without a future. Yes, Chandernagore like Greece, has a past, but she has not, like Greece, a future.

For what is left the patriot here?

For French a blush—for France a tear.

Holloway's Pills.—Liver, Lungs, and Kidneys.—Most diseases of these purifying organs arise from obstructions, over the removal of which these celebrated Pills exercise the most perfect control. A course of them is strongly recommended as a remedy for such chronic affections as liver enlargements, congestion of the lungs, torpidity of the kidneys, and other functional disorders which cause much present suffering, and if neglected lay the foundation of organic diseases. Holloway's Pills are especially adapted for the young and delicate; their gentle and purifying action ranks them above all other medicines. In indigestion, nervous affections, gout, and rheumatism these Pills have achieved for themselves universal fame. They expel all impurities from the blood, and thus restore cheerfulness and vigour.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THERE is a change in the Turkish ministry. Suspected of plotting against the Sultan, Kiamil Pasha has been turned out and Djevad Pasha taken in as Grand Vizier. This step is regarded in Europe as a Franco-Russian triumph, inimical to British interests in Egypt while favoring Russian designs on Bulgaria. It has been, however, announced at Constantinople that the new ministry will make no change in the European policy of the Porte.

AN earthquake in Salvador has destroyed many towns, and, with them, millions' worth of property, and many lives.

DISTRESS in Russia is making terrible strides. In the country districts, the peasants are infecting their children with diphtheria to save them from death by starvation. At Elizabethpol, starving beggars have taken to brigandage, outraging women and murdering whole families. Brutes are brutes, be they sturdy beggars or starving. The ruling passion strong in decay, these savage Russ utilized the raids they were compelled by hunger to undertake, for the gratification of their lust.

A CONGRESS of Trades Unions was opened at Newcastle on the 7th. It declared itself in favor of an Eight Hours' Bill and the enforcement of the principle in all trades, and for an International Conference to secure the same concession in every country.

DISASTROUS floods have visited the province of Toledo, in Spain, drowning, in the town of Consuegra alone, fifteen hundred persons. Hundreds of bodies were floating in the swollen rivers in the south of Spain. Distress is great. A subscription has been opened in Madrid for relief of the sufferers, the Queen Regent heading the fund with a donation of six thousand pounds sterling. A collection is also being made in London. The latest report is that the floods have destroyed the raisin, rice, grain and orange crops in Southern Spain.

THE European Powers have recognized the new Chilean Government. Ex-President Balmaceda is reported to have escaped as a drunken sailor in an American flagship to Callao. The Junta is in a rage.

THE landing at Sigri, in the island of Mitylene, of a British force from an ironclad, early in the week, disturbed the political atmosphere of Europe. The continental bourses were depressed. It is, however, explained that such landing for practice is an ordinary occurrence in the Levant.

LORD and Lady Harris had been to Simla. On account of indisposition, the Viceroy could not attend all the "functions" given in honor of his guests. Something too much of this. For the good of the functionaries, to say nothing of the interest of the people, there ought to be a retrenchment of these agreeable social functions. Much of their ill health is due to these. The endemic diseases of the official hill stations are all "functional disorders."

LORD Lansdowne has gone on a trip of health and sport to Chor, where his camp has been pitched at a height of upwards of eleven thousand feet. He left in thunder, lightning, and in rain—in a tremendous thunder-storm. The weather at Chor is reported to be cold and rainy. Altogether, a fine prospect for health and sport. Oh incomprehensible Bull of Woden's sturdy Race!—to speak after the now famous Bangabasi style.

THE Viceroy returns to Calcutta on the 28th November. He leaves Simla on the 24th October and goes to Cashmere travelling by train via Kalka, Umballa, Rawal Pindi, to Murree. By tonga from Murree via Domel Chakonti to Baramula, where he takes boat to Srinagar. His stay there is expected to last from October 21 to November 10. Lord Ripon had been to Cashmere. But he reached it in tears and departed in mourning, so to say. His melancholy monkish soul seemed to precede him, dominating the meteorology of the season. He scaled the heights against incessant rain and torrents and was compelled to beat a hasty retreat. For him Lalla Rookh proved a delusion and a snare. Lord Dufferin had to forego the pleasures of a visit to the Happy Valley on account of cholera there and Parliament sitting at Home. Lord Lansdowne is luckier.

MANIPUR is not to be annexed. That is a relief. It will be British for all purposes all the same, as it has been since the military occupation of the country after the massacre. That is a necessity of circumstances. There is no help for it, and there need be no regret. Its status is reduced. It will be allowed a Raja in the person of Chura Chand, the great grandson of Raja Nar Sing—a boy of five years of age. The State will be saddled with a tribute and otherwise brought under complete control. Primogeniture, as a rule, will be observed in the succession to the gudde, but always subject to the approval of the Viceroy, and no brother allowed to succeed unless there is a failure of other heirs. During the minority of the Raja Chura Chand, a British officer will rule in his name. According to the Pioneer, the Raja has encountered a windfall, like the present Gaekwad of Baroda, and is another Furzund Khas Dowlatia Englishia. He has no sort of claim to the gadi, says our contemporary. That is true in the sense of the state being forfeit, but, in no other. If it is suggested that he is not of the ruling family, he is wronged. He belongs to it, and his great grandfather Nar Singh was, on the death of Gunbheer Singh, the Regent for many years and afterwards Raja for another long period till his death, when his brother Debendro Singh succeeded him in the throne. We make this statement because there are malcontents about who want to make out that the Government have chosen an utter stranger—a mere scion of a former minister's family—to the entire exclusion of the whole teeming lot of the Manipur Rajbanses. Lucky Chura Chand is a chip of the same block to which Sura Chandra the ex-Maharaja and Kula Chandra the ex-Regent belong.

THE trial of the first batch of the Shani Bazar rioters is over. The assessors found four of them not guilty and the remaining eight guilty under sections 143, 147, 148 and 152 of the Indian Penal Code. The Judge acquitted four and sentenced one to eight, two to seven and five to seven years' rigorous imprisonment. The trial of the second batch has commenced.

THE bubble gold mining companies which were started into existence last year, are collapsing one by one. The Marwari mania for gambling speculations which gave vitality to them for a time, has subsided. The result is the washing—not of gold which is non est—but of a great deal of dirty linen which exposes the true character of the promoters and their dealings. The High Court of Bengal has this week initiated the last solemn rites on the Jutput Company by ordering its compulsory liquidation. We should not be at all surprised if the other concerns of the same kind be made to follow suit, though the regular funeral of a Joint Stock Company which, like a corporation, has neither a body nor a soul, is a kind of luxury for which its quondam patrons cannot always be expected to throw away their good money after bad.

THE Jut-Put, true to its name, has come to its end jhutput. It was ihoot throughout.

On Thursday, Mr. Justice Baverley ordered the compulsory winding up of the Jut-Put Gold Mining Company, Ltd. Mr. Hyde is confirmed as official liquidator without security. He will draw the usual commission of 5 per cent. upon the assets.

THE company was incorporated on the 7th November 1890, with a capital of Rs. 3 lacs, divided into 3,00,000 shares of the nominal value of Re. 1 each, with the principal object of prospecting and mining for gold. Mr. Julius Posner was the company. He was the promoter of the company, the vendor to the company of the prospecting and mining rights, and the agent of the company in the purchase of those rights. He is charged with selling those rights for a sum far in excess of their value and thereby making a secret profit without the intervention of any independent trustees or board of directors to protect the interests of the shareholders. A month after the company's incorporation, it was reported by the engineer deputed to prospect, that he failed to detect the presence of gold. The shareholders met for the first time on the 29th January 1891, when, under the Chairmanship of Mr. Posner, who commanded about 2,400 out a possible vote of 3,000, they confirmed all that their Managing Agent and all—Mr. Posner—had done up to that date. With this confirmation of his own acts, Mr. Posner left India on the 5th March, appointing one Henry Reinhold as managing agent of the company. The new agent called an extraordinary meeting of the company on the 24th August on a requisition signed by 21 contributories representing more than one-fifth of the capital. At that meeting, 66 contributories holding 95,800 shares attended and the contributories representing 92,100 shares passed a resolution for a voluntary winding up of the concern. This proceeding did not satisfy all the contributories, and three of them applied for the protection of court against the acts of Posner. The assets of the company comprise the sum in cash of about Rs. 83,000, while its liabilities do not exceed Rs. 1,000.

The law governing such companies usually allows, says the Judge, the fullest latitude to the shareholders, granting them a domestic forum for their internal management, including voluntary winding up. But there are cases in which courts must interfere for protection against fraud. The proceedings of the present company did not meet with the approval of Mr. Justice Beverley.

He questioned the validity of the resolution of the 24th ultimo. Posner & Co. had no authority, under the articles of the Association, to delegate their powers as managing agents. After alluding to other omissions and commissions, the Judge thus concludes his order:—

"Having regard, therefore, to all these circumstances, to the facts disclosed in the petition, and not contradicted, as to the formation of the Company; to the fact that by the memorandum of Association two-thirds of the total number of shares in the Company were to be allotted to Posner, and that it is not shown that he does not still hold all, or the greater portion of them, to the fact that by the articles of the association Posner & Co. (Posner being apparently the only member of the firm) were appointed managing agents of the firm without any board of directors and to the fact that Posner is now in Europe and the Company is virtually without any management, it seems to me that the only order that the Court can make is to direct the liquidation of the Company by the Court. I was at one time inclined to accede to the prayer of the objectors expressed through Mr. Graham, to call a meeting of the shareholders in order to ascertain their wishes in the matter but on further consideration I have come to the conclusion that, in the circumstances of the case and under the system of share-warrants, it is absolutely impossible to distinguish between bond fide and independent shareholders and persons who may be merely holding for the time being Posner's shares. I accordingly order that the Put Gold Mining Company be wound up by the Court, and I confirm Mr. Hyde's appointment as official liquidator without security. Mr. Hyde will draw the usual commission of 5 per cent. upon the assets, and under Section 146, he is authorised to appoint an attorney to assist him in the performance of his duties. The petitioners are entitled to the costs of this application out of the assets of the company."

BABOO Shew Bux Bogla has spurred the consideration, by the Bengal Government, of a proposal for the establishment of a veterinary school and hospital in the vicinity of Calcutta, for the treatment of cattle. He has come forward with a donation of Rs. 30,000 in aid of the project. There is the further offer from the same quarter to provide a site for the necessary buildings.

FROM a manifesto issued by our congressists, it appears that a meeting of what is called the Provincial Conference is to take place about the end of the Doorga Ponja vacation, when either for shopping or for lion-hunting, the élite of our countrymen in the mofussil generally come down to this metropolis and may conveniently be treated as delegates. There is very little in the programme of the Conference which is either new or original or, for the matter of that, to the point. The old bill of fare is repeated without any variation whatever. Not a word is said in it about the Factory legislation of last year or the agitation for the still more stringent legislation which is being got up by the Manchester cotton spinners and which, on the eve of a Parliamentary election, has every element of success in it, notwithstanding the iniquity of the demand.

TO us, the entire programme of the Congress is a mistake. The representative principle is a good ideal to fight for. But election is a veritable ignis fatuus to tempt the unwary to destruction. Nor can we say anything agreeable with regard to the other aims and aspirations of our "political leaders." In fact, the programme appears to us to border on bathos, in some respects. At any rate, notwithstanding the number of wise heads in which it has originated, it betrays a want of appreciation of the real needs of the country which is simply unaccountable.

THE topics at which Congress speeches and Resolutions are usually fixed are:—

Local Self-Government. 2. The Police and Panchayet. 3. Embankments. 4. Sanitation. 5. Technical Education. 6. Civil and Criminal Justice. 7. Coolie Emigration.

The programme which, in our opinion, ought to form the basis of our Congress, is of a very different character. The subjects which most urgently demand the attention of our patriots are the following:—

1. Organising Jointstock Companies for setting up Cotton Mills and Iron foundries. 2. Salt Manufacture in the seaboard of Bengal. 3. Measures for preventing the import of Liverpool salt. 4. Putting a stop to the manufacture and import of spirituous liquors. 5. Reimposition of a tax on Manchester piecegoods. 6. State Banks for financing cotton mills, iron foundries, &c. 7. Reduction of Home charges and Military expenditure. 8. Public Works including drainage, irrigation and embankments. 9. The utilizing of manures for agricultural purposes. 10. Abolition of Cooper's Hill College. 11. Giving to Vakeels the privileges of barristers. 12. Civil Service Examination in India. 13. Village sanitation. 14. Proper direction of public charity. 15. Text-books for vernacular schools.

Had the lakhs so lavishly wasted on an annual address on things in general, and a quantity of vapoury eloquence besides been expended on a practical programme, the country would by this have been a visible gainer, and its face assumed a new aspect. But this was not to be. The leaders of the movement were either men who, from different professions, suddenly plunged into politics, or town politicians and publicists who knew not the country.

FROM announcements made in the public press, it appears that a society has been organised, the declared object of which is the higher training of young men. We know nothing about the origin or parentage of this new phase of the fad for moral training. Who is to be our next saint, we wonder? We do not believe in moral change by public meetings, otherwise we should be much pleased to find that the members of the new organization have bound themselves, by a Resolution, to abstain from smoking tobacco, especially in the shape of cigarettes. This is a step in the right direction—the abstention that is, not the Resolution. We only hope that our juvenile reformers will have the firmness to stick to their determination. The Resolution is a bad sign, though.

LET the faddists beware! It is useless for them to preach vegetarianism or teetotalism. All Nature is greedy and even carnivorous. Even plants do not spare animal life. Nature is a trippler too. The very beasts of the field that perish are addicted to strong drinks. A few years back, the traveller on the great avenue of Lord Mornington from the capital to the Governor-General's Park at Barrackpore, might any day see near the Paikpara stables scores of bulls, not British but true Brahmini bulls, primed with the leavings of the neighbouring rum distillery, browsing on the roadside grass or walking with the gravity of peripatetic gymnosophists. The other day we noticed how, in England cockroaches had developed the highest taste in that direction, they having shown an appreciation of champagne. Cockroaches, although they fly, are scarcely fowls of the air. But now we find true birds have been caught—shall we say tripping?—tripping. We read:—

"A pigeon flying experiment at Tours has ended in a most remarkable manner, proving the shocking fact that the useful birds, in addition to being excessively greedy, are also given to an over-indulgence in strong drinks. Four hundred and twenty-nine pigeons were conveyed by train from Tours to La Bolelle, and there let loose. To the astonishment of the various societies interested in the experiment, only forty returned home, and these were in a dazed condition and quite incapable of finding their respective quarters. An inquiry resulted in the discovery that at a roadside station a large consignment of black currants had been put into the same van as the bird. The intoxicating qualities of the currant-juice proved too much for the little travellers, and they were quickly in such a condition, that only a small proportion were sober enough to find their way back to Tours."

But why shocking? Is drinking proper for a bishop and improper for a pigeon?

THE District Magistrate of Shwegyin sentenced one Arthur Cole to six months' rigorous imprisonment for kissing a young Burmese lady. An appeal has been filed. The advocate Mr. Moylan in applying for bail pending the appeal contended that the sentence was excessively severe, for, in England, he said, it costs only £5 or fourteen days' imprisonment for a similar offence, and obtained an order for bail. Taking the English precedent as a basis, a contemporary calculates that to undergo the sentence passed on him, Cole is entitled to kiss as many as 1285 young ladies.

THE Madras Law Times reports that "a Sowcar went to the Mahomedan Interpreter of the Small Cause Court to swear to the contents of two affidavits he wished to have filed. After being sworn in for one affidavit, he was being sworn in for the second, when the Translator observed that it was for another individual. On being interrogated the Sowcar said the other man was his son, and that he had come to swear for him. The matter was reported to Mr. Lavery, the Registrar, who after severely reprimanding the Sowcar and the Vakil concerned informed them that he had a good mind to hand the matter over to the police."

The act of the Sowcar was quite in keeping with the patriarchal rule in the East, which is fast disappearing under the more strict Rule of the day.

Police! And why? This threat of Hand over to the Police and soldiery is the robber or the tyrant's argument. Not all the Police and lawyers in the universe would have made a criminal of a man of such transparency and simplicity as this Sowcar. He thinks no evil. He knows no wrong. So he confided his heart to the Interpreter. This fussy person seized the opportunity to make capital of it and at once ran to the Registrar. And this unsympathetic gentleman could think of nothing better in the connection than the vulgarity of calling in the Police. What was the Sowcar's offence? So many things are done vicariously, the good man thought swearing might be done too. He did not know the nature of swearing—did not understand its solemn import. But the way in which swearing and solemn affirming are done is not calculated to teach the public a proper respect for the ceremonies. The truth is, all solemnity has been long since abolished by legislators who scarcely believed in a future state and poohpoohed the idea of divine vengeance for perjury as mere superstition. The operation is regarded with the greatest contempt in our courts and perfunctorily gone through. One might suppose that, whatever the fate of other forms, under a Christian Government and with Christian officers, at least Christian swearing would be a respectable reality. But the fact is different. There is no proper custodian of the Bible. The Holy Book is left somewhere neglected among strange bed fellows. Sometimes it is so dirty that there is risk in kissing it. Sometimes the Bible is a nominal affair. We know courts in which mutilated copies do duty. This is a matter worthy of the Bishop's notice. If the Government cannot afford the expense of a fresh supply, there are doubtless many charitable societies ready to come to its help.

A NATIVE judicial officer in the Jhelum district, Panjab, ascribes the considerable increase in the number of contested cases in his court to "the plaintiffs who generally belong to the money-lending classes inducing the process-servers, by offering illegal gratifications, to make a false report to the effect that the summons had been duly served while no service had really taken place, and thus to have ex parte decrees passed against their victims." What are the steps taken to remedy the evil? There are other ways of putting honest people to inconvenience, loss, degradation and insult, for supposed or no debts of theirs, specially through the minor courts. The practice gains ground where Judges, in ex parte cases, instead of being very particular, give decrees for the mere asking, without enquiring whether the summons has been properly served, whether the defendant is the right party to be sued or is aware of the suit against him or whether the claim is proved by full and satisfactory evidence. They seem to think that the absence of the defendant, however occasioned, is admission of the debt.

A REMEDY is indicated in the Bengal Government Resolution on the annual general administration report of that Division for the year 1890-91. It remarks on the disinclination of Civil Courts to lighten their own work by making due use of the criminal courts, and approvingly quotes the following opinion of the Magistrate of Maimensingh:—

"The Civil Courts increase their work by their unwillingness to commit to the Criminal Courts persons guilty of flagrant perjury and forgery and other offences against civil justice. If litigants know that the chances are 100 to 1 against their being prosecuted for such offences, they will certainly commit them. Again, it is considered a point of honour, I believe, among persons of wealth or influence, not to obey a Civil Court process—at any rate not the first two or three processes. It is only when they are called upon to show cause why they should not be sent to the fozzdari that they think it compatible with their dignity to come in. And yet, since I have been here, only four persons have been committed by the Civil Courts under section 174, Penal Code, and of those three were committed by the Judge. This delay in coming in causes the utmost inconvenience and harassment to the parties.

"Again, though failure to give a proper rent receipt is a criminal offence, Munsifs never send such cases to the Criminal Courts. They receive receipts written on scraps of dirty country paper, and thereby needlessly increase their labours tenfold. If they would impound the receipts and send them to the Collector now and again, they would find their labours considerably lightened."

That is not the whole truth, we are afraid. It is notorious, how lightly the processes are ordered, without any enquiry as to their necessity. Sometimes, they are issued, apparently by the amlah without the knowledge of the presiding officer, for the mere asking, for purposes other than those of the suit—for causing harassment or indignity. If honorable men avoid the courts, why fix the blame on them alone?

A CASE of great medical interest is recorded in the Memphis Medical Monthly for August, relating to the abnormal rise of temperature in a girl aged 14. She was an athlete, contortionist, excelling in running, jumping, &c. She had an attack of tonsillitis, from which she almost entirely recovered, when this occasional rise of temperature to 103° or 105° was observed. Her physician not believing, he was not called till it was 108°. He however arrived to find it 109°. The next two or three days it continued at 114°, then for two weeks after the thermometer burst with the expansion of the mercury. Then a thermometer registering 150° was procured, but it burst too. The temperature then rose up to 158°. Spirit and mercurial thermometers were used. These periods of high temperature were evanescent, coming and going rapidly. Once at least it went down to 95½°. During the fall of the temperature her hands and feet were cold and surface covered with clammy sweat. She had severe nausea and some oppression of the chest. The pulse never went beyond 120. She possessed the power of dilating and contracting the pupils at will but they were generally normal. No other abnormality was noticed. The pathology of fever, which is so ill understood even now, will afford an opportunity to many to theorize, though a good explanation is out of the question.

A FRENCH scientific man has measured the average strength of the two sexes, by means of the usual clock work device, the ring of which when pulled downwards by the hand will record the hand pressure. Fifty robust men and as many healthy women, from the middle class of the society, with ages varying from 25 to 45 years, were selected for the experiment. The strongest man of the company could produce with his right hand a pressure equivalent to 85 kilograms (a kilogram is more than 2 pounds) and the weakest to 40 kilograms, the average being 56 kilograms. The short men were nearly as strong as the tall ones. The strongest woman could only record a pressure of 44 kilograms, the weakest 16 kilograms, while the average was 33 kilograms.

A fine experiment indeed! After this, we hope the go-ahead Yankees will not venture to set afoot a corps of women soldiers.

At last, some clue seems to have been found to the murder of General Azimoodden, Vice-President of the Council of Rampore. At least, some persons have been on trial. They are rather important persons, being sons of a nobleman in the state by name Abdulla Khan, one of them being a Tehsildar in British employ. This Mahomed Mustafa Khan and his brother Saidulla Khan are now under trial in the court of the District Magistrate, Barielly, under sec. 14 of the Extradition Act. The hearing commenced on the 4th September. Mr. Vansittart, counsel for the accused, took a preliminary objection on the ground of Rampore not being an independent state within the meaning of the Extradition Act, in fact no requisition having been made within the meaning of section 14 of that Act, the court had no jurisdiction. The Magistrate overruled him, confessing that he acted under order of Government and holding that he was precluded from going behind the command. He is much to be pitied. It is true he contrived in the same breath to expose himself and the Government. But what could the poor man do? Mr. Vansittart next claimed the defendants' right to be treated as Indian subjects. Whatever that may mean, it seems to have delighted the soul of the Public Prosecutor, Mr. Dillon, who wished the claim to be recorded. Mr. Dillon then examined Mustafa Ali, peshkar of the President's Court, Ibrahim Khan, jailor of Rampur, Ram Charan Dass, the Civil Surgeon who attended the deceased, Nubbun, barber, Kullun, a contractor for lighting and partner of Nubbun, Kamruddin, shopkeeper, Inayatula, grocer, Ali Husain. The defence reserved cross-examination. This concluded the first day's proceedings. The second day, the 5th, was taken up with the examination-in-chief of 5 more witnesses. On the third day, Monday, the 7th, Mr. Dillon examined another nine persons, and closed the case against Mustafa Khan, and the proceedings of the day. Before the Court rose, Mr. Vansittart said there was absolutely no proof against Mustafa Khan and asked the Court to admit him to bail. But the Court had no orders from Government and therefore refused the application. The enquiry of the fourth day, the 8th, commenced and ended with the cross-examination of Mustafa Ahmed. His cross-examination concluded the next day, the 9th, when two more were taken up. The seventh day, Sep. 11, was reserved for Mr. Berril, Deputy Inspector-General of Police, who was deputed to enquire into the murder of the General.

REIS & RAYYET.

THE POONA INDUSTRIAL CONFERENCE.

THE Industrial Conference held lately in the Capital of the Peshwas, deserves more than a passing notice. Our impression is that the depression of our manufacturing industries—coupled with the fearful increase of population under a régime of unexampled internal peace and order—is the main cause of India's growing poverty, and that the concentration of our resources and energy is absolutely necessary for regaining our lost ground. In this view, we cannot but feel deeply interested in the work of an association the direct object of which is the amelioration of our national industries. The report of the Conference held at Poona, does not, unfortunately, inspire us with any high hopes. The first Resolution which was carried unanimously was in the following terms :

"The President of this Conference be authorised to submit a respectful memorial to the Government of Bombay, praying that, as suggested by the Government of India in their Home Department Resolution No. 199 dated the 18th June 1888, they will be pleased to order an industrial survey of this Province as a preliminary step to the introduction of an organised system of technical education in this Presidency."

In a country in which the manufacturing industries have already attained a high development, a statistical survey, such as that recommended by the Conference, may have a value. If we possessed a full account of our indigenous arts and manufactures in the last century, an industrial census now compiled would have placed us in a position to weigh exactly our profit and loss under British rule. But, however valuable a store account may be, we can certainly afford to do without it. At any rate, it must be admitted, that mere counting and recounting cannot increase our national wealth. Even without the exact figures, we perceive distinctly the heavy depletion that has taken place in our stock, and the most important question now is, to recoup the loss, without being too anxious to ascertain clearly its extent. It is cotton mills which we want most urgently. But on this subject the Conference seems to have been silent altogether. In the present state of India, the importance of iron foundries is only next to that of cotton mills. On this subject, an interesting paper was read by Dr. Dhanakoti Raju of Madras and Mysore, in which the learned gentleman expressed his opinion that, from the peculiarly favorable conditions and facilities that exist in India for manufacturing iron and steel of the finest quality in the world, it was not too much to say that, if only some intelligent and enterprising men of moderate capital would earnestly and energetically work in this highly producing but greatly neglected field, it should soon lead to most important and lasting results. The Conference does not appear to have recorded any Resolution with regard to Dr. Raju's paper. But we hope he will be good enough to publish its full text with practical suggestions for setting up iron foundries.

Technical education is one of the fads of the hour, and we are not surprised that the Conference attached considerable importance to it. But we have as little faith in technical schools as in Exhibitions and Industrial Surveys. We have in our country engine drivers, telegraph signallers, mill operatives, printers, compositors, &c., without technical schools. As a general rule, the only training possible for artisans is that which is obtainable in industrial establishments. The owners of workshops and manufacturing factories can train their apprentices far more efficiently and at much less expense, than any Industrial School. The utmost that Government may do in such matters, is to give increased facilities to persons desiring to serve as apprentices in the Government docks, gun factories, railway workshops, &c.

The second Resolution adopted by the Conference is somewhat more to the point than the first. It asks the Government to purchase its stores locally and to abolish the expensive establishment maintained at the India Office for supplying stores from England. But in a matter like this we cannot hope to achieve success merely by recording a Resolution. The vested interest of British manufacturers and of the clerks employed in the Duff of the Grand Vizier-i-Hind cannot be divested except by a very hard struggle.

At the end of the Conference, the Honourable Rao Bahadoor M. G. Ranade read a paper dwelling upon the necessity of State Banks for financing our artisans and agriculturists. The idea is a good one except that, so far as artisans are concerned, we cannot expect our Manchester-ridden Government to stretch out its helping hand to them. For the amelioration of our national industries, the most important question is that of ways and means. We initial difficulty can be got over only by the proper conservation of our resources. The problem can be solved only by our abstaining from luxuries and extravagance, and by the proper direction of national charity. Hospitals, roads, schools are no doubt beneficial. But our countrymen ought to be made to understand that its most crying necessity is cotton mills and iron foundries. We are not for tabooing nautches, Barwaris and other tamashas, though certainly for regulating and improving them. Still less are we for abolishing charity or religion. But surely a good proportion of the capital irretrievably sunk in these indispensable objects may, under discreet and economical management, be diverted without being felt. The first thing is for the people to understand the situation. And then we would see the sums now lavished on random, perhaps baleful, charity and unmeaning superstitions and pleasures that do not please, imperceptibly turned to different uses. We would see what is now spent, without any hope of material return, better invested in giving an impetus to the national industries and thereby putting food into the mouths of our starving millions.

We have in Bengal very few capitalists who, by means of their individual resources, can possibly set up a manufactory of piecegoods like one of those that have made Manchester so rich and famous. A business of the kind requires a capital of at least twenty lacs of rupees to start with. But from what we know of our Rothschilds and Vanderbilts, our belief is that there are scarcely half a dozen among them whose investable capital is sufficient to set up even a single cotton mill. Thus it is that we cannot hope to effect any improvement in our national industries except by organising joint stock companies for the manufacture of our dhoties and chudders and for working our mines. If we want Congresses and Conferences, it is only to organise such companies and to watch their operations, so that they may not go wrong.

In a small scale, an Industrial Conference may render great good by offering rewards for improvements in hand-loom weaving, and for publications embodying practical suggestions for setting up mills and for working our mines. An Industrial Conference may also do good by having a standing committee of experts to examine and encourage new inventions, as well as such old industries as are unknown, except in particular localities. At the present time, there is no independent agency to have the value of new inventions tested or made known to the public. Only the other day, it came to our notice that a Bengali gentleman of Konnagur has been from some time manufacturing lucifer matches which are in no way inferior to those imported from England and Norway. But we fear that this new and important industry has not yet come to the notice of any Conference or Association in any part of India. The locks patented by Krishna Lal Das, of Chitpore, are admitted by experts to be superior to those of Chubbs. But the latter is in full possession of the field still, and as yet the very name of the former is hardly well known even in this metropolis. Even without cotton mills on a large scale, our weavers may, we think, with a little improvement of their looms, oust Manchester piecegoods from our markets to an appreciable extent. But, with all our English education, we retain our Brahmanical instincts unimpaired, and we consider our Tantis and their affairs as altogether below our notice, except for the purpose of an occasional joke at their proverbial stupidity. Through want of work and food, the caste of weavers in Bengal is fast becoming extinct. We have known many highly skilled weavers who worked at their looms with their whole family from morning to night and yet could not earn sufficient to keep their body and soul together. From a sense of the dignity of their avocation, they could not at first stoop to menial service. Many died from starvation, while a few have latterly taken to agriculture or domestic service.

A census properly taken of the weaver caste would reveal a harrowing tale which might excite pity in the breasts of even the philanthropic Manchester cotton-spinners who have brought about their ruin. But how little have our patriots and publicists done to enlighten the public here or in England on the subject!

THE IMPERIAL DIAMOND CASE.

THE Imperial Diamond case was resumed in the Chief Magistrate's Court on Monday, and continued the whole week. The noticeable feature in the defence is that Mr. M. Ghose has been replaced by Mr. Inverarity from Bombay. He first appeared with Mr. Ghose on Monday when the Calcutta barrister applied to the Magistrate to grant bail for the accused. Mr. Handley refused it, as he considered there were reasonable grounds for believing that the accused was guilty of the offence with which he is charged, and was of opinion that under section 497, C. P. C., he had no discretion to exercise under the circumstance. The rest of Monday was occupied with the examination-in-chief of Albert Abid, the Nizam's Chamberlain.

If the Police Magistrate was consistent in his refusal for bail, the High Court was ready for it for the second asking. The same Monday, the Vacation Court made the following order, through Mr. Justice Beverley:—

"We think it better in this case that we should not state at length any of the reasons which have influenced us in coming to our decision; but having regard to what has been stated before us, we think that this is a case in which the accused ought to be released on bail, and such bail to be of a substantial character. We accordingly direct that Mr. Jacob be released upon furnishing bail in his own recognizance of two lakhs and giving two or more sureties aggregating another lakh of rupees. Of course, it will be understood that the diamond remains with the Bank of Bengal pending the proceedings in this case."

At the conclusion of the proceedings at the Police Court on Tuesday, the Magistrate admitted Jacob to bail on his personal recognizance of two lacs and two sureties, Messrs. Attorneys Geddes and Burder—the last from Bombay who came with Mr. Inverarity—for Rs. 50,000 each.

On Wednesday, Mrs. Abid was examined and re-examined at the Great Eastern Hotel.

She is known to Jacob who had seen her at Hyderabad and informed her of the refusal of the Nizam to purchase from him the Imperial or other jewellery, and regretted to her that he had been fool enough to tell the Nizam last year that if His Highness would buy the Imperial, he, Jacob, would never do another day's work. Jacob had upbraided her for her husband introducing other jewellers while the negotiations for the sale of the Imperial were not complete. It appears from her evidence that Abid draws a pay of Rs. 550 and is in the Nizam's service for about 9 years, being the personal attendant on His Highness. He receives a commission of 10 per cent. on all purchases by the Nizam—whether with His Highness' knowledge is highly problematical. She herself had received commissions and presents from Jacob. Her husband was formerly in the service of Captain Euan Smith as assistant and she—a Welsh woman—as travelling governess to a boy of eight of Lady Meade. She met Abid at Hyderabad and was engaged to him there and married him in London. She has a shop of her own at Hyderabad—for drapery, outfitting, pharmacy and store with millinery attached, under the management of a Robert Skinner.

On Thursday, after the examination of some Bank people, Mr. Woodroffe applied to the Magistrate for an order on Jacob to produce fifteen Government currency notes for Rs. 10,000 each which he still held as part of the Rs. 1,70,000 which he is charged with misappropriating. Mr. Inverarity pointed out that the law only empowered the court to grant a summons. Mr. Handley refused the order as that would cripple the accused. It might be that he would require the money to pay Counsel. It was besides not necessary or desirable for the purpose of investigation and nothing was to be gained by the proceeding. Mr. Woodroffe had a mind to secure the sum for the Nizam in case the prosecution succeeded.

Friday, the 18th September, 1891, will be a memorable day in the life of the Magistrate and the annals of the magistracy. On that day, Mr. Handley immortalised himself by a stroke of his pen. He ordered the examination of His Highness the Nizam—by commission. In answer to the Magistrate, Jacob said he would go up to Simla and thence to Hyderabad to attend on the commission, but he would not leave Simla on any day except Tuesday, as he was superstitious, and the only occasion on which he had not observed the rule has involved him in the present prosecution.

Notwithstanding the magistrate's considerate abstinence, Mr. Burder, when he presented this day five of the fifteen ten thousand Rupee currency notes at the Currency for cashing, was, at the instance of the solicitors for the prosecution, who had stopped payment of the notes as stolen property, seized by the Police. He resisted, as well he might after the distinct order and opinion of the Court. But the constable would drag him by force. There was no help for it, so Mr. Burder went. Luckily, he found Mr. Lambert who allowed him to go, after taking down his statement.

Later in the day, Mr. Burder represented to the magistrate that the five notes he had cashed were his own property, they being made over to him by Jacob for expenses of the defence, before Mr. Woodroffe's application for their deposit. On the application of Mr. Dunne, the magistrate ordered Jacob to produce the other notes on Monday next.

MONGHYR.

Jamalpur, Sept. 10, 1891.

A few days ago a sensational case of a disgraceful nature is alleged to have taken place in a train while in motion. Whilst a young Eurasian school girl aged between 13 and 14 years was travelling in a 2nd class compartment between 'Mokameh and Jamalpur in the Loop mail, two young lads, one a European the other an East Indian, who were travelling in the same train but in a 3rd class compartment about 7 or 8 carriages apart from the young lady's, got out of their carriages, walked along the foot-boards of the other carriages and entered the 2nd class carriage in which the young lady was travelling alone by herself, and most indecently and brutally assaulted her. Of the two culprits, the ringleader by name C. Ryland was arrested by the Police and placed under trial under Section 376 of the Indian Penal Code. The case was enquired into by the District Magistrate of Monghyr on the 8th instant, who committed the accused to the Sessions.

The E. I. Railway Company's Agent, Major Gardiner, R. E., accompanied by the Traffic Manager Mr. Rutherford, paid a visit the other day to the other side of the River (Monghyr) i. e. Khagariah with a commercial view. Rumour has it that the object of their visit was to consult the local Rajahs and Zeminders and if feasible to open a feeder gauge line on that section to foster traffic on the main line.

One Kissory Chand Modock, son of the late Gunga Moyrah of Nyhaty, Bengal, is now here. It is alleged that he has effected some wonderful cures, by means of witchcraft, of hysteric fits and similar diseases as also possession by evil spirits.

SANITARY PROGRESS IN INDIA.

THE CONGRESS OF HYGIENE.

The adjourned special Indian meeting in connection with the Congress of Hygiene, convened to discuss the question of sanitary progress in India, was held on Aug. 14 in the theatre of the University of London, Burlington Gardens, when the chair was again occupied by Sir M. E. Grant Duff, the late Governor of Madras.

The meeting was well attended, and among those present were Sir Douglas Galton, Sir Thomas Crauford, Sir W. Moore, Sir W. Wedderburn, Sir Owen Burne, Surgeon-General Cornish, Professor Corfield, Brigade-Surgeon Harvey, Mr. T. H. Thornton, C. S. I., Surgeon-General Biddle, Sir Charles Lawson, Surgeon-Major Hendley, Mr. E. C. K. Ollivant, and Deputy Surgeon-General W. Farquhar.

Sir William Wedderburn proposed the following resolution:—"That, looking to the interest shown by India in the Hygiene and Demography Congress, and considering the probability that other tropical countries and colonies would take a similar interest in future congresses if a more prominent position were given to the consideration of subjects in which they are specially interested, this meeting recommends to the Permanent Committee that in future congresses a tropical section be formed with a view to a more full discussion of questions affecting sanitation and the origin of disease in tropical climates."

The resolution was seconded by Professor Corfield, and supported by Sir Douglas Galton, and was carried unanimously.

The discussion on the papers read on Aug. 13 by Sir W. Moore, delegate for the province of Bombay, and Surgeon-Major T. Holbein Hendley, Residency Surgeon, Jeypore, delegate for Rajpootana, was resumed by Mr. T. H. Thornton, C. S. I. (delegate for the Punjab and formerly Secretary to the Government of that province). Adverting to the interest taken in the present Congress by the chiefs and people of India, he mentioned that in two cases he could call to mind feudatories who had shown in matters of sanitation an example to those parts of India under the direct administration of the Crown. The first town in India—other than the Presidency towns of Calcutta and Bombay—into which a scientific system of pure water supply was introduced was Jeypore, capital of the feudatory State of that name, whose ruler, a Hindu of very high caste, did much by his enlightened action on this occasion to remove the prejudices of his fellow religionists in all parts of the Empire. Again, the first place—indeed, he believed the only place in India in which the cellular system of imprisonment—the only system under which the terrible outburst of disease in Indian jails can be effectually averted—was a feudatory State, the State of Bhawalpore. Referring to a message sent by Miss Nightingale in favour of measures being taken for the sanitation of rural villages in India, Mr. Thornton while sympathising with the benevolent object of the message, urged that as a measure of prudence it would be much better, in the first instance, to concentrate sanitary efforts upon towns, which were the foci and radiating centres of disease, instead of frittering away resources and irritating the people by attempting the introduction of elaborate systems of sanitation for which the peasantry were, at present quite unprepared. He concluded by referring to the malarious effects of canal irrigation in Northern India, and urging upon the authorities greater vigour in dealing with the matter. He suggested that until the proper drainage of affected areas had been completed, stringent measures should be taken to prevent the abuse of irrigation; and, in particular, he urged that in malarious tracts, especially those in the vicinity of towns, no high-level irrigation should be permitted.

Brigade-Surgeon Hamer assured the meeting that the Government of India were fully alive to the necessity for securing better sanitation for the country; but they had to contend against the ignorance, apathy, and prejudices of the natives of India as well as being hampered by the want of money. The natives of India, however widely they might be separated by distance and language, were unanimous upon two points—namely, objection to innovation and to taxation. It must be remembered that an alien Government could not afford to run counter to the prejudices of the natives, and until the natives had been educated up to the necessary point in respect of sanitation the Government were almost powerless to take the necessary steps to improve the sanitation of the country. The financial needs of India were enormous, money being continually required for the construction of roads, railways, canals, irrigation works, schools, and colleges in addition to the enormous sums required to meet the military expenditure. The consequence was that whenever any extensive and costly sanitary scheme was brought forward it had to be rejected simply from want of money. Not long ago it was discovered that the injection of permanganate of potash was a specific cure for cobra poison, and it was proposed to furnish the natives with hypodermic syringes and a quantity of permanganate of potash, but the scheme had to be rejected, because it was found that it would entail an expense of £120,000,000 (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Russel Aitken entirely concurred in the opinion that had been expressed as to the difficulties in the way of sanitation that were caused by the prejudices of the natives. Mr. Baldwin Latham, civil engineer, bore testimony to the admirable manner in which the Bombay Water-works were constructed. The health of the larger Indian cities was better than that of the most of the European capitals. Dr. Bahadurjee thought that the Indian municipalities should be compelled to look after the purity of their air as much as after that of their water.

The chairman said that they had listened to a number of interesting speeches in reference to the two very important papers which had been read yesterday. He suggested that where a headman of a village was found to keep his district in an excellent state of sanitation he should receive some mark of distinction from the Government. (Hear hear.) He called upon Sir W. Wedderburn to read the next paper.

Sir W. Wedderburn said he had had three papers sent to him to read by native gentlemen—one entitled "Our Sanitary Wants," by Surgeon Major K. R. Kirtikar, of the Bombay Army, and civil surgeon, Thana; a second entitled "A Note on the Hygienic and Demographic Condition of India," by R. B. Vishram Ramji Ghole, honorary assistant surgeon to the Viceroy; and a third, "On the Sanitary Condition of the Towns and Villages of the Bombay Presidency," by K. V. Dhurandhar, medical officer and superintendent of vaccination, Baroda. In the first paper Surgeon-Major Kirtikar, in referring to the villages of India, which contained nine-tenths of the total population of the country, said:—

"What is the normal sanitary state of an Indian village? Imagine a collection of low huts, mostly strawroofed or thatch covered, the cattle tethered in the hut side by side with human inmates. The cattle generally consist of cows, bullocks, and buffaloes; occasionally there are pigs, donkeys, goats, and fowls. These inmates of the hut are in open air during the day, but at night lie upon the ground beside their master and master's wife and children. There is hardly a window or an opening for ventilation. The excreta of the cattle lie on the floor, or are channelled out and swept into a receptacle at the adjacent corner of the huts, or allowed to accumulate between huts. Much of the fluid excreta sink into the ground floor of the hut. The dung-pit, which is not far removed from the huts, exists, as a matter of course, in every village as a final repository for any cattle excreta that may happen to be removed from the vicinity of the huts. These dung-pits are annually emptied as manure for the fields which the villagers cultivate, and are as necessary for agricultural purposes as the very grain they sow. This dung pit is not far off from the water-supply of the village. A solitary well—perhaps two or more—supplies the whole body of villagers. The fluid contents from the dung-pits, following the natural law of percolation, contaminate the water of the well. Close to the well, washing of clothes, often filthy rags, without soap, without disinfectant, washing of animals and of men, is carried on from day to day. This ablution-water sinks into the soil, eventually to escape into the well. If there be a tank or a quarry-hole in the rainy season, or a well with a flight of steps, whereby men can get at the surface of the water itself, the washing is done in the water itself. The process of ablution is very characteristic indeed. The man dips his feet into the water, then his hands; he next takes a mouthful of water, which he promptly throws back into the water with a sharp scouring of his throat, and the discharge of the mucous contents thereof. Then he washes his body, changes the cloth round his waist, and finishes with washing the same. If the bather is a woman who has come with a ghurra (earthen jar or pot) for her day's supply of water for cooking, drinking, and other domestic purposes, she takes this very water home in as contented and unconcerned a manner as if it had passed through hundreds of filter beds, pure and undefiled. Conservancy is equally of the most primitive kind. The human excreta are also not found very far from the water supply. There are no private privies, no public latrines, in small villages. The back yards of huts, near fields and even gulleys or spaces between and adjoining houses, are used for natural purposes. In a country like India, for eight months of the year, the sun is very powerful, and acts as a prompt desiccator, thus minimising the evils of the want of conservancy arrangements, especially where the village population is very limited, but in large villages, when such excreta of healthy men and sick men promiscuously lie within the contaminating area of the prime water-supply of the village, the danger to health must necessarily be great. It is this that in times of cholera epidemics renders all efforts to give medical relief futile. It is this that tends to keep up the virulence of the disease. It is this that renders an epidemic a source of danger to all, demolishing families without check or without choice as between the rich or poor, the young or old, the sickly or robust. Such is an Indian village ordinarily. If mortality is not greater it is solely due to the supervision of the minor revenue officers, goaded on by the moral influence and periodical visits of the higher district officers. There is no special sanitary officer for a village with any special knowledge of, or training in, sanitary science. It will at once be apparent, from what I have stated here, where our difficulties in sanitation lie. Sanitary rules may exist, and they do exist. It is the executive we want to carry out these sanitary rules. He must be a man from among the villagers; but he must be one who not only himself understands what sanitation means and how sanitary measures should be brought to the notice of the villagers, and how he should help them and persuade them to carry out those measures, but he should also have an official status which will command respect and be tolerably well paid. The minor sanitary officers must work direct under the deputy sanitary commissioner of the district, or under the civil surgeon of the collectorate. There appears to be no necessity, in my opinion, for a sanitary board or a punchayet. There could hardly be one single hut in the present state of society in a village to furnish a man who understands what sanitation really means. Sanitary measures requiring money from the villages would touch the pockets of the individual members of the board or punchayet, and the utility of important but costly measures will be therefore underrated and often not seen. The deputy sanitary commissioner or the civil surgeon is the most enlightened and properly educated sanitarian in the district. All sanitary proposals, projects, and undertakings should emanate from him. He is the most qualified to order them, execute them, and control them. As in matters connected with the civil station in which the civil surgeon resides he is independent of the revenue officers, but works with the collector as his sole medical referee, so in the matter of village sanitation he should be the sole sanitary adviser of the collector. It seems to me that in modern days the consideration of giving towns and villages an abundant supply of water should be a sanitary reform that should not be left to the whims or caprices of village committees, or even of town municipalities. It should be insisted on and even carried out by Government, inasmuch as people are not sufficiently educated to ask for such important sanitary measures of their own accord. If they are called upon to do it through municipalities, the majority of members are so far incapable of recognising their own best interests, and so far from wishing to have a good supply of potable water, that they may not pass the measure at all. Every large town should have its water works. Where there is want of money it should be borrowed, and the posterity which will, in the end, be the greater gainer from such works should be made to contribute—the town handing down the debt from father to son. From the foregoing remarks it will be seen that the chief sanitary difficulties in India are want of money, and want of special sanitary officers in each village. For the masses of the lower classes to appreciate sanitary laws or to understand them popular education of the lower classes must advance, and when in popular schools the elementary principles of hygiene are taught, and the newer generations grow old, carrying with them the lessons of their younger days, in time they will practically carry out the dictates of sanitary science in their own lives, and, as is but natural, their sons will follow. But the State, to start with, will have to take the lead, will have to begin the noble work of sanitary instruction in our elementary schools. It is after the sanitary truths shall have been dinned into their ears till they come to believe in them as self-evident truths, that permissive legislation can be of any avail. Just now sanitary instruction will have to be more thorough and systematic before a man can himself appreciate the real importance of the subject. The Indian student, to be a practical scientific sanitarian, will have to be practically educated to appreciate the practical difficulties of carrying out sanitary measures. Then, and then alone, can there be any hope of sanitary principles trickling through him to men of ordinary education, and from these again, by practical example and personal adherence to rigid sanitary laws in daily practice, to the vast masses of the lower classes, to whom the conduct in life of the higher classes serves as a silent, but yet not unobserved or un-influential, example."

Mr. Ghole in his paper said:—"In India, many large towns, cities, and villages are mostly situated along the banks of rivers and rivulets. The sewage and other impurities from the habitations, ashes of cremated dead bodies, animal refuse, and trade refuse are allowed to flow into these rivers, and the people use the same water for their domestic and other purposes. In some places, the towns and villages are situated on the banks of tanks and ponded streams. This is especially the case in Central India and Malwa. In these places, all manner of impurities from the inhabited areas are allowed to flow into these tanks. The animals are watered therein, persons bathe in them, clothing is washed there, and this water, so polluted, is freely drunk by the people. Persons obey the calls of nature in the immediate vicinity of these rivers and tanks. In some holy places, such as Benares, Pandharpore, Alandi, and others, the river water is rendered most filthy by a large concourse of people visiting these places at stated periods during the year, and large numbers of pilgrims fall an easy prey to cholera. All the fairs, called Jatras, which are periodically held in several holy places during each year, give rise to epidemics from the fouling and scarcity of the water-supply. The water from the tanks, protected with parapet walls and without steps to descend, is generally pure. These remarks, it is hoped, will suffice to give the Congress some general idea of the impurities of the Indian water-supply. Light and air are purposely excluded from the houses in the majority of cases. The cultivators and other working people enjoy the full benefit of fresh air during the day, but in their houses they have to breathe and re-breathe this foul air all through the night. This fouled air gives rise to coughs and consumption. When women are confined they are shut up in rooms almost hermetically sealed; they breathe and re-breathe the limited and confined air for months together; the air is further vitiated by a lamp being kept in the room, burning day and night. Owing to these habits, many a woman falls a prey to pulmonary consumption without any hereditary taint. When a person is sick, he is generally confined in a room well closed up, so as not to admit any air. Many cases of fever thus become aggravated and end fatally. So the free ventilation of houses and huts is very defective in India. Nor is the street ventilation any better. The streets and alleys are generally narrow and crooked. The rows of houses are built without any aim to secure thorough ventilation. In large towns, the houses are mostly built close to one another, without any interspace for ventilation and light between them. The street ventilation is thus almost as bad as the inside house ventilation. The people of this country in their ignorance deprive themselves of the "lung food" so necessary to health, and thus shorten their lives and lose many working days by illness. In the matter of food, also, the people of India are very badly off, owing to general poverty brought on by various causes; they have generally to pass their days on scanty fare. The frequent recurrence of famine, due mostly to scanty or irregular rain or no rain, has brought about a great deterioration in the physique of the people besides causing immense mortality in the years when famine prevails. The people live chiefly on grains and vegetables. Animal food is used by some people, but sparingly, as they cannot afford to have it daily."

Mr. Dhurandhar gave a most disgusting, though truthful, account of the habits of the natives inhabiting villages, and advocated the municipalities of India being allowed to borrow money on the guarantee of the Government so as to enable them to effect necessary sanitary reforms.

Sir Douglas Galton said that the three papers, written by native gentlemen who were intimately acquainted with the habits of the Indian villagers, gave most interesting information to the meeting.

The chairman said that he was only expressing the feelings of those present when he thanked the gentlemen who had read the very interesting and important papers which they had listened to, especially those that had emanated from native sources, which had been read by Sir W. Wedderburn. One of the speakers seemed to think that that meeting was a section of the Congress; but that was an entire mistake, as the meeting had no connection whatever with the Congress, although they desired to work side by side with it. He asked the meeting to return thanks to a number of native gentlemen of high position who had assisted the Congress to a very great extent, and who were always foremost in all good works connected with their country. Their names were—the Nizam of Hyderabad, the Gackwar of Baroda, the Maharaja of Jeypore, the Maharaja of Bhownugger, the Maharaja of Vizianagram, and the Maharaja of Kuch Behar. (Hear, hear.)

Sir Owen Burne moved, and Sir C. Lawson seconded, a vote of thanks to the chairman, which was carried amid loud applause.

The Chairman, having briefly responded, the proceedings terminated.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE FIRST KISS.

BY MISS M. J. E. KNOX.

"NAV, ask me not—how could I bring
My lips to rest on manhood's brow?
A maiden may not lightly fling
Her timid nature off—and thou,
Caressed as thou art wont to be,
What were a kiss of mine to thee?"

"And thou wouldst think that I had pressed
Another cheek as soon as thine,
Should I allow my lips to rest
(Even lightly as on hallowed shrine
The trembling lips of devotee)
On thine, as pledge of love to thee."

But then some words of gentle sound
Were whispered to the maiden's heart;
She could not bear his love to wound—
The hour had come when they must part;
And she was young and fond and true;
What could the gentle maiden do?

The spell is broken—she has laid
Her trembling lips against his cheek;
On hers there is a deeper shade
Of crimson, but she does not speak;
Her voice is hushed—her voice is still—
'T is given, half without her will!

NOT ALONE ON THE WIDE SEA.*

BY JAMES T. FIELDS.

WE were crowded in the cabin,
Not a soul would dare to sleep,
It was midnight on the waters,
And a storm was on the deep.

'T is a fearful thing in winter
To be shattered in the blast,
And to hear the rattling trumpet
Thunder, "Cut away the mast!"

So, we shuddered there in silence,
For the captain held his breath,
While the hungry sea was roaring,
And the breakers talked with Death.

As thus we sat in darkness,
Each one busy in his prayers,
"We are lost!" the captain shouted,
As he staggered down the stairs.

* A ballad from Poems. By James T. Fields.

But his little daughter whispered,
As she took his icy hand,
"Is n't God upon the ocean,
Just the same as on the land?"

Then we kissed the little maiden,
And we spoke in better cheer,
And we anchored safe in harbour
When the morn was shining clear.

IN TIME TO COME.

THE flowers are dead that made a summer splendour
By wayside nooks and on the sunny hill,
And with regret these hearts of ours grow tender
As sometime all hearts will.

We loved the blossoms, for they helped to brighten
The lives so dark with wearying toil and care,
As hopes and dreams for ever help to lighten
The heavy loads we bear.

How like the flowers, whose transient life is ended,
The hopes and dreams are that for one brief hour,
Make the glad heart a garden bright and splendid
About love's latticed bower.

One little hour of almost perfect pleasure,
A foretaste of the happiness to come,
Then sudden frost—the garden yields its treasure,
And stands in sorrow, dumb.

Oh, listen, heart! The flower may lose its glory
Beneath the touch of frost, but does not die,
In spring it will repeat the old, sweet story
Of God's dear by and by.

In heaven, if never here, the hopes we cherish—
The flowers of human lives we count as lost,
Will live again. Such beauty cannot perish;
And heaven has no frost.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—The most effectual Cure for Gout and Rheumatism.—A frequent cause of these complaints is the inflammatory state of the blood, attended with bad digestion, lassitude, and great debility, showing the want of a proper circulation of the fluid, and that impurity of the blood greatly aggravates these disorders. Holloway's Pills are of so purifying a nature that a few doses taken in time are an effectual preventive against gout and rheumatism, but any one that has an attack of either should use Holloway's Ointment also, the powerful properties of which, combined with the effects of the Pills, ensure a certain cure. The Ointment should be thoroughly rubbed in to the parts affected at least twice a day, after they have been sufficiently fomented with warm water to open the pores to facilitate the introduction of the Ointment to the glands.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

TODAY the Doorga Pooja begins at all the great houses. On the 3rd October at lesser ones. On the 8th and 9th universally.

THE state-recognised Doorga and Luckhi Pooja holidays commence this year on and from Thursday the 8th October and end on Monday the 19th October, the four grand days of the grand Pooja beginning with Saturday the 10th. The Custom House will not observe any close holiday. It will be absolutely closed only on Sundays, the 11th and 18th October. On the 8th, 9th, 14th, 15th, 16th and 19th, it will be open, with its Treasury, during the usual hours for transaction of all business. On the remaining days, the 10th, 12th, 13th and 17th October, the public holidays under the Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881, only the Treasury will be closed, the Custom House being opened on notice given, free of charge, from 11 A. M. to 12 noon, for entering or clearing any vessel that it may be required so to enter or clear, and for the issue of bills-of-entry or shipping bills covering free goods from or to the same.

The Comptroller-General too has notified that the Public Debt Office, the Government Savings Bank and the Government Account Department at the Bank of Bengal, will be open for the transaction of business, and for the receipt and payment of money on Government account, as also the Paper Currency Office at Calcutta and the Comptroller-General's Office, on the 8th, 9th, 14th, 15th, 16th and 19th October.

The Bengal notification dated 2nd December 1890, allows the closing of the offices of the Collector of Customs, the Shipping-Master, the Registrar of Assurances, the Collector of Stamp Revenue, the Stamping Department of the Office of the Superintendent of Stamps, all of Calcutta, and the Salt Rowannah and Opium Sale Departments of the Board of Revenue, on only the four public holidays—the 10th, 12th, 13th and 17th October.

DR. JOHNSON was of opinion that no one could get intoxicated on claret, though several people brought on dropsy in trying to get drunk on it. It is now reported that in Paris a woman has disproved the doctor. She not only proved that she could be drunk but also killed herself with claret. She had swallowed no less than 112 litres (about 24½ gallons) in less than a week.

IN consideration of his excellent service when he was British Agent at Kabul, Sirdar Bahadur Mirza Atawalla Khan has been created a Raja. And why not Nawab?

A CORRESPONDENT of the Englishman says that a native, innocent of the deposit of snow in the Himalayas, told him early in the season that the rains would be scanty. His ground was the locusts. He had observed that they were the precursor of the scarcity of 1872-73. He adds:—

"The Orissa famine which occurred about the year 1864, and in which much scarcity was felt here, was marked in sporting annals as a wonderful quail year. One put quail out of every copse of grass, and the bags made of them were most unusual. No doubt the unusual season in their own country had driven them to Bengal."

He concludes with the information that Mr. Riley, the head of the Bureau of Agriculture in the United States, says that flights of locusts recur at periods of 13 and 17 years.

GOVINDADASA Durgakund, Benares, writes, in Tuesday's Indian Daily News, a sensible and most interesting letter. He exposes the un-wisdom and ignorance of a Bengali correspondent of the same journal, who had asserted that the custom of stone throwing on a certain day in the year is a beastly amusement and that it was confined to the Deccan and known in no other part of the country. He speaks from personal knowledge when he says that "In Benares the practice flourishes in its pristine vigour and in defiance of all law. This last Gonesh Chaturthi, the Magistrate proclaimed by beat of drum that anyone found indulging in this reprehensible practice would be prosecuted, but apparently nothing came of it, the stone-throwing continuing as vigorously as ever, and the Police were nowhere to be seen, according to their wont. The superstition connected with this rather dangerous development of an old practice is a very queer one. The superstition is that if any one happens to look on the moon on that particular night he will be accused of theft, Shree Krishna having been accused of the theft of a jewel belonging to Shatrjit, which is reported to have been given him by the Sun himself, after having looked on the Moon of the 4th. To obviate the risk of having such a serious criminal charge brought against one it is prescribed that one purifies oneself of the sin of looking on the Moon on that particular night by throwing sweetmeats on the passers-by and that practice has degenerated into stone-throwing in these rather hard times."

The other point is matter of opinion. We suppose most men will be found to be of his own way of looking at the old custom, to wit:—

"I don't think the old practice was after all so very reprehensible; as far as I have been able to make out it must have been a rather feeble imitation of the Roman Carnival—I don't mean to suggest by this that the practice was actually copied from the Italians—in which flowers and boubons are freely pelted by the people at each other."

THE deposed Maharaja of Keonjur has, we see, petitioned the Lieutenant-Governor. We have not seen his petition, but the Maharaja has all along borne so exceptionally high a character, that the responsibility lies with Government to convince the public that a great wrong has not been committed on the native ruler and people of Keonjur. We strongly suspect—not without excellent reasons—that such has been the case. We are glad that the Indian Daily News has taken up the subject. There is little danger of its being spoiled by nonsense or exaggeration of interested imperspicacity, or burked by official wrong doers.

OUR contemporary has begun well. By way of fitting introduction, the editor relates his personal experience of officialism in such matters. His illustration indeed comes pat in, drawn as it is from the administration of the same group of principalities towards the South-west Frontier of the Province:—

"Some years ago we had occasion to look into a case in connection with the mahals; and we brought the subject to the notice of the Government of Bengal. Sir Rivers Thompson went to Oussa intending no doubt to make personal inquiries. But he was very ill and really not in a position to do so. He accepted and approved whatever was placed before him. We felt convinced that Sir Rivers was wrong, and gave reasons for it to Sir Donald Mackenzie Wallace, Private Secretary to the Viceroy, and asked for a real investigation. In the letter we said that we never saw a man more like clay in the hands of the potter than was Sir Rivers Thompson in the hands of his subordinates. Sir Donald asked if we had any objection to our letter being sent to Sir Rivers, and we replied that we had not the slightest. Sir Rivers asked us to Belvedere, and we so far satisfied him of the position that we took, and that he had failed to recognise, that he said 'you had better see the Chief Secretary.' We saw Mr. Peacock and at first he treated us most cavalierly, demanding to know by what authority we appeared in the matter, and practically, and almost as bluntly, intimated that we had better 'mind our own business.' We happened to be in a position to convince him that we could if need be, go beyond the Lieutenant-Governor, to say nothing of his Secretary; and he changed his tone at once. At the same time he expressed his absolute conviction, nay even his knowledge, that we were wrong in our contentions. 'Metcalf had done this, and So-and-so the other; and we had only been imposed upon by some people down there, &c.' We asked him one question, gave him one item of information, and what was the result? Some further inquiry took place on the lines we had indicated, and Sir Rivers at length confessed that we had been right all through!"

But to no purpose, however. The wrong remained all the same, and has not, we believe, been rectified to this day. Officialism is as shameless as it is irresistible. The Editor of the Indian Daily News as an Englishman may well speak tenderly of British functionaries, but what do the people think of Christian gentlemen who stick to their posts for the pelf leaving the duties to their irresponsible subordinates? We shall never forget the indignation of one of the family of the Chief referred to in the above passage, who was for some years here to sue for the integrity of the Raj, who was kicked from pillar to post and from post to pillar, tantalised with false hopes—amused with idle promises!

THE Government of India, in the Home Department, have modified the Rules for regulating appointments in the Home Department—No. 39, dated 3rd July and No. 39/2970-84, dated 13th November 1888, thus:—

"In modification of the rules for the regulation of appointments in the Secretariat Clerical Service of the Government of India and attached offices published with the Notification of the 3rd July 1888, and in continuation of the Resolution of the 13th November 1888, the Governor General in Council is pleased to direct that those rules shall not apply to classes VII (Rs. 50-75), VIII (Rs. 35-50) and IX (Rs. 25-35) of appointments in the Statistical Branch, and to classes IX (Rs. 25-35) and X (Rs. 20-25) in the General Branch, of the Department of Finance and Commerce. That Department will also have authority to recruit without reference to the rules in the case of appointments in class VIII (Rs. 35-50) in its General Branch at any time when it considers it necessary to do so, but ordinarily recruitment to that class will be from passed candidates. No clerk other than a passed candidate who enters the classes now exempted from the operation of the rules after the date of this Resolution shall be eligible for promotion to the classes above class VII in the Statistical and class VIII in the General Branch, except in accordance with rule 12 of the Rules of the 3rd July 1888."

THE Lieutenant Governor of Bengal again goes into camp on Monday, the 26th October. This time Sir Charles Elliott tours in Behar. He visits Durbhunga, Bettiah and Hutwa, and returns to Calcutta on Sunday, the 6th December. We miss Dumraon in the programme.

IN an appeal before the Madras Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Shephard, wherein a revenue classifier, guilty of an offence, was prosecuted under the Indian Penal Code, Sir Arthur Collins remarked that, instead of seeing them punished departmentally, people in this country were in a great hurry to bring officers under the Penal Code.

Sir Arthur might have added with equal truth that, if the heads of offices in India ever dispose of cases departmentally, they dismiss the poor fellows outright, howsoever long or meritorious their service.

IN a case of grievous hurt, Mr. Hamilton, one of the Bombay town magistrates, sentenced a Mahomedan to two years' rigorous imprisonment. The punitive jurisdiction of the court extends no farther. Still the Government were not satisfied. The case was a bad one. That is, it is not an ordinary grievous hurt. The accused was charged with cutting off his wife's nose. A fresh Englishman like Lord Harris must have been shocked at the barbarity and thought that, if a fellow is guilty of such unmanly wantonness, he deserves all the punishment that the law provides for the offence. If the magistrate had no power to award the full measure, he need not have tried the case but should have sent it up to the High Court. As Mr. Hamilton had not exercised his discretion in this behalf, the Government sought to remedy the effects of his action, as far as they were allowed to do under the law. Application was made to the High Court. Luckily the Court showed a disposition to take the matter up. The question of jurisdiction was argued before Justices Jardine and Parsons. For the prisoner it was contended that the Presidency Magistrate having been within his right in all that he had done, the High Court could not quash the conviction and order a committal to the sessions. The Judges have decided otherwise. They have quashed the conviction and sentence and directed the magistrate to commit the prisoner to the sessions.

The interpretation by this Bench of the extraordinary powers of the High Court is most liberal. According to it, an inadequate punishment is a grave impropriety which the revisional jurisdiction is intended to remedy. It was no justification for a magistrate that he was competent to try a particular case, unless he was in a position to award adequate punishment.

THE Municipal Council of Colombo assessed the house of the Revd. C. Mourier, Procurator of the Arch-diocese of Colombo, at Rs. 1,450, while the owner let it to one Allis Appoo at Rs. 720 and the tenant sub-let it in parts at an average of Rs. 888 per annum. The District Judge being called on to decide, the question turned whether the gross annual value is the amount of rent which is obtained by the proprietor from his immediate tenant for the premises rented out to him as a whole, or the amount which the tenant gets by sub-letting the premises—divided into small holdings to his tenants. Judge Owen Morgan decided that the gross annual value is what the proprietor and not the immediate lessee derives, being a fair and reasonable rent for the premises, unless it can be shown that the proprietor and his lessee connived collusively to put a small rental on the premises in order to defraud the Municipal Council, and share the profits which the tenant might make by sub-letting the premises.

In Calcutta, under the last Act, the municipality assesses a tenanted house at its rental, less an allowance of 10 per cent for repairs, &c. The law, however, is unusually harsh on residential houses, the assessment on such being 5 per cent. on the sum obtained by adding the estimated present cost of building the house, less a reasonable amount to be deducted on account of depreciation, if any, to the estimated value of the land with the house as part of the same premises, the value of the land not including the value of any machinery thereon. There is no allowance for repairs or other expenses necessary to maintain the house.

THE Alligah begging deputation, under the leadership of Sir Ahmed Khan, has bagged a respectable sum at Hyderabad. The Nizam has doubled his monthly grant to the Anglo-Oriental College of the Syed, raising it to British Rupees two thousand.

FOR defiling an idol by putting round its neck a pair of old slippers, the second class Magistrate of Haur convicted and sentenced a native to two months' rigorous imprisonment. On appeal, the Head Assistant Magistrate of Salem, following certain rulings, of 1885, of the Madras High Court, quashed the conviction and released the prisoner. Those rulings, he argued, precluded the assumption of criminality in the act of the prisoner, adding his own reason that in the present case there was not even a difference of caste or sect. The case went up higher still and has been remanded by the Madras High Court to the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Shephard to the Lower Appellate Court to be re-heard. Mr. Justice Muthusawmy Iyer had defined defilement as rendering materially or virtually impure or rendering impure to the accused's knowledge, according to the recognized usage of the institution, as an object of worship. Mr. Justice Parker had interpreted the law differently. His opinion was that the law has used the word in its primary signification of making unclean, rendering foul or dirty, and it has nothing to do with ceremonial or ritual. It was, besides, not intended to make criminally punishable under the general law breaches of ritualistic observance committed by persons of any one creed against the canons of their own faith.

IN the Bohemian Exposition at Bubentsch, near Prague, on June 16, a balloon, after having ascended very high, was seen to come down rapidly. The vast crowd of spectators soon learnt to their great horror that the balloon had split from top to bottom and the occupants of the basket were clinging to the shreds of the bladder, trying to form a sort of parachute to retard the fall. In its descent, it passed over the chimney of an iron foundry, and took fire. But Lieutenant Wondrusch sprang quickly on the roof of the building and helped his comrades out. So they avoided the double danger by their pluck and good luck. The workmen of the factory extinguished the fire and threw the remains of the balloon on the ground, to be divided amongst thousands of people who kept them as souvenirs of the wonderful deliverance of these brave men.

Such ruptures in balloons occasionally happen, but they are not necessarily fatal to the riders. When, in 1883, G. Tissandier with M. Duruof ascended in the Neptune from Paris, it burst and acted like a parachute, and all were saved.

SAM CHUNDER ACHAPPE is a young man scarcely twenty-five old. He is an astrologer by craft, who makes his poor living by casting horoscopes and otherwise making bold guesses into fortune. Tired of eking out a meagre following planets to find out their influence on the lives and fortunes of his clientele, he came to look with kindly eye on a young widow of twenty-two, a Kayastha widow in his quarter, left destitute by the death of her husband, with three children to support. One day he surprised her by knocking at her door, professing to have followed possibly with the help of his friends of the neighbourhood on high the traces of a visitor to her room. To disguise so formidable a neighbour of a suspicion so degrading to her, and to clear her reputation, she opened the door. The volunteer Inspector of the Purity Society discovered a mouse's nest. There was not a mouse stirring. Certainly, no visitor was found. But no matter. There was one in his soul. He had doubtless long meditated on the lonely poor widow and decided that it was high time the terra of her misery should be determined. She wanted an occasional visitor, he was convinced, and he proceeded to embody and produce that visitor out of his moral consciousness. Who could be a more desirable visitor than the astrologer himself? Circumstances favouring, he might make the good use for the nonce. So having found himself in, on pretence of executing the search-warrant from his own authority, he was in no hurry to leave. He sat himself down and, like a learned man, fell to reading some paper he found there. What paper it was does not appear, but it seems to have acted on the good fellow as an aphrodisiac, for he soon sprang a mine and kissed her. The unsympathetic woman misunderstood her humane visitor. She resented his touch as an affront, raised an outcry and, in due course, charged him with criminal assault.

The case came before the Deputy Magistrate of Alipore, Moulvi Abdul Jubbar. That officer enquired into the matter, and, notwithstanding that the complainant was subsequently willing to drop the case, convicted Acharjee and sentenced him to three months' rigorous imprisonment. On appeal, the District Judge reduced the sentence to one month. There was a further appeal to the High Court. Mr. M. Ghose argued that, from the peculiar circumstances of the case, the offence of criminal trespass could not lie. The Vacation Judges refused to interfere, holding that it was in evidence that an indecent assault had been made on the woman, and that the offence had been clearly established.

IN another case, in which a native vakeel appeared in an appeal against sentences of various small terms of imprisonment on four Mahomedans by a Bench of Honorary Magistrates of Calcutta, Mr. Justice Beverley remarked that "it was altogether absurd for a pleader to appeal in such cases where the offence had been so clearly made out. It had apparently been very carefully dealt with by the Magistrates, and it was not to be inferred that because they were Honorary Magistrates they could not sift evidence in such trivial cases."

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE loss caused by the floods in Southern Spain is estimated at one million sterling. Up to the 20th September, no less than 1,780 bodies, victims of the floods, were buried in the town of Consuegra.

GERMANY and France are beginning to be friends. A German Opera—Wagner's "Lohengrin"—is being enacted at the Paris Opera House. The first night was on the 17th September. It was successfully played before an immense audience. An uproarious crowd had assembled outside the building who shouted down the name of the composer and cheered frantically for Alsace-Lorraine. There were scuffles between the police and the mob. There were over a thousand arrests, and of these only fifty were detained. At the second performance of the opera, there was some slight hooting among a portion of the audience, and noisy crowds outside gave some work to the police, who arrested about a hundred and dispersed the mob without anything more serious. A Berlin decree has slackened the restrictions on the entry of foreigners to Alsace and Lorraine. Only foreign military men are required to produce passports.

SO far so good. The hate that would taboo the wisdom and knowledge, the science and ideas, the literature and arts, of other nations, is utterly irrational. It starves itself in malice aforethought. And then, in these days, for any people to boycott the genius of the Fatherland, is simply a policy of national intellectual suicide. Not France herself can afford to indulge in such a puerile pastime for any length, without serious consequences to her morale. We are glad, therefore, to see her returning to her better consciousness and evincing a disposition to appreciate the creations of German Art. Great as Germany is in many departments, in none—not even in metaphysics or philology—is she greater than in Music.

We wish we could see in the incidents above related any prospect, however remote, of a tolerable rapprochement between the two nations. There is none. They must remain dogs and cats to the end of the chapter. The one can not forgive and the other can not trust. They must fight. The sooner the better, perhaps—for all.

As a sign of the Francophile tendencies of the Porte, the Sultan has conferred the Grand Cordon of the Osmanlie on M. Ribot, the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, and presented the Order of Chekfat to Madame Carnot.

THE Pope held at St. Peter's a reception of an enormous host of pilgrims, all French workmen. His Holiness addressed them long and eloquently on the Labour Question, saying that it could not be solved without the aid of the Church, and enjoining on them the necessity of practising diligence, docility, and thrift, of attending to the religious education of children, and of the avoidance of all forms of socialism, urging, at the same time, the formation of labour unions under the direction of Bishops.

EX-PRESIDENT Balmaceda who brought on the Chilian revolt had been hiding himself at the Argentine Legation in Santiago, where he blew out his brains on the 19th September.

SIR James Fergusson, Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, has been appointed Postmaster General. Messrs J. M. Maclean and G. Curzon are said to be in the running for the Under-Secretaryship. A keen contest is expected over the re-election of Sir James Fergusson.

THE Novosti explains that Russia is already too extensive to covet India, but holds out the threat that Russia would undertake the enterprise in retaliation for British hostility in Europe. The journal therefore advises Great Britain to enter into a definite agreement with Russia.

THE India Office has sanctioned a grant of £5,000 to the Imperial Institute, to be paid by five annual instalments of £1,000 each.

THE eyes of Europe and America are now centred on China. Great Britain, France, Germany and the United States have combined to take joint measures for the protection of their subjects from riots in that country, and to pursue there, besides, a policy of watchful naval manœuvres—whatever that may mean. Later telegrams speak of a general rebellion along the valley of the Yangtse, concentration of war vessels at Shanghai, which is in danger, the despatch of three war ships to Wuchang, and the discovery of a plot among the Chinese employés to seize the Arsenal. China has assured France of everything needful being done to protect the lives and property of foreign residents.

THE Foreign Department of the Government of India thus notifies in the Gazette of India of the 19th September, 1891, the permanent occupation of Manipur:—

"The 18th September, 1891.

No. 1862-E.—With reference to the Notification in the Gazette of India, No. 1700-E., dated the 21st August 1891, regarding the regnant of the Manipur State, it is hereby notified that the Governor-General in Council has selected Chura Chand, son of Chowbi Yamma, and great-grandson of Raja Nai Singh of Manipur, to be Raja of Manipur.

The Sanad given to Chura Chand is published for general information.

Sanad

The Governor-General in Council has been pleased to select you, Chura Chand, son of Chowbi Yamma, to be Chief of the Manipur State, and you are hereby granted the title of Raja of Manipur, and a salute of eleven guns.

The Chiefship of the Manipur State and the title and salute will be hereditary in your family; and will descend in the direct line by primogeniture, provided that in each case the succession is approved by the Government of India.

An annual tribute, the amount of which will be determined hereafter, will be paid by you and your successors to the British Government.

Further you are informed that the permanence of the grant conveyed by this Sanad will depend upon the ready fulfilment by you and your successors of all orders given by the British Government with regard to the administration of your territories, the control of the hill tribes dependent upon Manipur, the composition of the armed forces of the State, and any other matters in which the British Government may be pleased to intervene. Be assured that so long as your house is loyal to the Crown and faithful to the conditions of this Sanad you and your successors will enjoy the favour and protection of the British Government.

H. M. DURAND,
Secretary to the Government of India."

The present sanad cancels all previous treaties. It creates a new State altogether. And it places that State on a new basis more favorable to security and order in the distant future. We say distant future, for, just now and for years to come, the guarantee of those essentials of prosperity is the British occupation. In New Manipur, the sanad removes the chief source of revolution and anarchy, by laying down a simple rule of succession—a rule which has been the cherished object of not only all States and Chiefships but also of all landlords ambitious of founding houses, even in this land wedded to minute division. One important omission we remark. We are not sure that the regnant secures to Manipur the right of adoption, which—thanks to our lamented friend Robert Knight—was assured by Lord Canning to the Native Princes after the mutinies, and which was enjoyed by Old Manipur. It seems that the English rule of primogeniture is to prevail in the succession of the Manipur State, subject to the approval of the Government of India.

THE State prosecution of the Bangabasi is virtually ended. The accused—Jogendra Chandra Bose, proprietor, Krishna Chandra Banerjee, editor, Brojoraj Banerjee, manager, and Arunodoy Roy, printer and publisher, apologised to the Bengal Government, disclaiming the remotest intention of exciting disaffection by the articles objected to, but admitting that their language is intemperate, disrespectful and unjustifiable. Pledging themselves not to be bad boys again, they threw themselves unreservedly on the mercy of the Crown. The Lieutenant-Governor recommended to the Government of India the withdrawal of the prosecution. Sir Charles Elliott believed that the object of the prosecution—the ascertainment of the sufficiency of the law for punishment of seditious writings—was attained, the law was vindicated and that the trial was a sufficient warning to editors against lapsing into sedition. The Government of India have accepted the recommendation and are not desirous of pressing the matter further against these defendants. This early announcement of the decision of Government adds to the gracefulness of the course adopted. The Bangabasi people will be free to join in the merriment of the Poojas, and we wish them the joy of the season. Doorga be blessed!

THE Lieutenant-Governor says that "there can be no reasonable doubt that a majority of the jury, in the proportion of 7 to 2, were in favor of conviction." In that case, the Chief Justice is to be thanked for allowing the accused the present opportunity of seeking for mercy which has been granted.

FOR all that, the trial is still pending, and until a nolle prosequi is entered, the public has no right, as the practice still stands, to comment on the case.

IT is a fact worthy of note that, in Europe, the best men generally remain unmarried to the end of their lives. Newton, Locke, Pope, Hume, Gibbon, Cowper, Gray, Macaulay and De Quincey, and scores of others, were never married. And yet they were not, on that account, above the general—if you will, the vulgar—need. The fret of temper itself disclosed the flutter of the heart within. The late John Stuart Mill passed the best years of his life in "single blessedness" and made old Mrs. Taylor his mate when he was almost on the verge of his grave. His Gooroo, Comte's tenderness for the lady whom he canonised and set up as the Mother of the Faithful, is confessed. The case of the female genius, George Eliot, is a still more touching testimony to the supremacy of Nature. Notwithstanding all, the disinclination to the marriage bond is as strong as ever, perhaps stronger. Various explanations may be suggested to account for the phenomenon. To us, it seems that it is due, in some measure at least, to the fact that the really great men in the domain of science and literature cannot possibly stoop to the frivolities by which alone female hearts can be won. In this view, we cannot but be thankful to our ancient legislators who left the regulation of matrimonial affairs amongst Hindus entirely in the hands of their parents.

GOETHE is not only a poet but a man of science as well. He was indeed an encyclopædist—a student who cultivated every kind of knowledge. His optical researches and speculations are wellknown. So was his partiality to the biological sciences. But he was a discoverer in anatomy. Such is the announcement of Professor Karl Bardeleben of Jena, who will report in detail in the next volume of "Goethe Annual" (Goethe-Jahrbuch). Of the three discovered manuscripts, the first is the famous essay on the intermaxillary bone, of 1784, announcing Goethe's discovery of the said bone in man, the absence of which had hitherto been regarded as one of the main marks which distinguish man from lower animals. There are two other unfinished anatomical essays. The one has reference to osteology in general, believed by Bardeleben to have been written in the summer of 1794, and the other treating of the lower forms of animals was written at Breslau four years before. This last essay throws more light on Goethe's conception of the nature of comparative anatomy than the first. After all, Bardeleben combats the frequent assumption of Goethe being a pre-Darwinian Darwinite. He is of opinion "that the idea of man's descent from lower animals, of a real blood relationship among the latter and between them and man was far from him."

SIR Charles Elliott takes the opportunity of reviewing the last administration report of the Presidency Division, to pay a handsome compliment to the retiring Commissioner. The Resolution almost opens with "His thorough knowledge of the Division and of its wants, and his extensive experience, are apparent in his report, which deals fully with every subject", and similarly concludes with "Mr. A. Smith's merits as a painstaking and experienced officer, possessed of great knowledge of Bengal administration and of ripe judgment." Only four European and one native officers are singled out for praise in the Resolution, namely, Mr. Forbes, Mr. Bolton, Mr. Ritchie, Mr. Baker and Baboo Durgagati Banerjee. As the appointment of the last named officer was so hotly assailed by the organs of the Anglo-Indian community and the European Service, we are, on public grounds, glad to find his name in this connection. Baboo Banerjee has justified his selection by Sir Stuart Bayley as Collector of Calcutta. It is matter for satisfaction to the whole native community that Sir Charles Elliott is able to say, through his Secretary Mr. Buckland, that "The total increase in the excise revenue of the Division (Presidency) was Rs. 1,33,078, obtained from every excisable article except rum. The increase in Calcutta was over Rs. 1,40,000, attributed to the better settlement of shops, larger consumption of licit liquors and licit ganja and opium, but there was a decrease in three out of the five districts. The licenses issued were 240 less than in the previous year."

OF the rupees 23 lacs deposited, at the instance of the jeweller Jacob, by the Nizam for the Imperial diamond, Jacob had taken back rupees 1,77,000 after paying for the stone. Out of this sum, he is charged with misappropriating Rs. 1,50,000, which amount was traced to his possession in the shape of 15 currency notes of Rs. 10,000 each and subsequently advertised. The Chief Magistrate, on the application of the prosecution, ordered the accused to deposit in court five of these notes, which has been done. But he refused an order for the other ten notes, five of which Mr. Burder had cashed at the Currency office. On Tuesday, the Advocate General obtained from the High Court a rule on the Chief Magistrate to shew cause why his orders regarding the notes advertised and not deposited should not be set aside. Sir Charles Paul, while asking for the rule, explained that these notes came under the category of stolen property. It was no argument that five of the notes had been changed. Their equivalent still continued to be stolen property. Here the Indian criminal law assimilated itself with the English. He, however, distinguished that if a person should come to know that something had been stolen, he could not deal with that property unless he came by it in a bona fide manner. Mr. Burder, in the lower Court, had claimed a lien on some of the notes. This the Advocate General said was no answer to a summons for their production under the Criminal Procedure Code. On Friday, Mr. M. Ghose showed cause against the rule on behalf of Jacob. At the outset he remarked that but for the fact that the Advocate General had made the application, he would have characterized it as one of the most extraordinary and unprecedented applications which any counsel had ever made to that Court. It was in effect to compel the Presidency Magistrate to issue a writ of attachment before judgment, a proceeding wholly unknown to the criminal law of the country.

Mr. Handley's explanation is that he was not sure that section 94, C. P. C., gave him power to compel the production of the property, especially when Mr. Burder, a solicitor of long standing, had claimed a lien on it, and he would not, under the circumstance, send him to jail when he refused to produce it. The chief consideration that guided him was that, in case the prosecution succeeded, the Nizam was amply protected with the diamond and the Rs. 50,000 in Court.

The Judges have taken time to consider the judgment

TENRI is an obscure little place up in the hills of the North. Nor is its political importance anywise superior to its statistical insignificance. Of late years, however, it has made more noise than its capacity for yielding wool would entitle it to make. This is due to the proceedings of, or in connection with, a single nondescript family. On the death, under most suspicious circumstances, of Pertab Sah, the last Raja, his brother became Regent during the minority of Pertab's son. The Regent was accused by the Dawager Rani of receiving a large sum of money to save the scapegrace of the family referred to above, who stood charged with murder—nay, many murders—from the gallows. The Commissioner of Kumaon came to enquire and found the Regent guilty. He dismissed him and rewarded the informer by putting her at the head of the Raj. There has scarcely been any decent government in Tehri since the death of Pertab Sah. And now the cup of the people's misery is full. But for fear of the British they might have broken out in revolt. There is no depending upon this influence, however, when men are exasperated.

Such is the account as it comes to us from all the distance. The matter at least is worth proper inquiry.

BABOO BIBBLEBABBLE.

YOU last year or so, Jandb "Reis" Sahab, you did not spare the literary shortcomings and vices of the Eurasian organ of Southern India. Is it just that you should keep your own counsel when the time for praise has come? How is it you have not noticed the sentence pronounced by the Eastern Guardian or Mr. Caine? The Times of India is more appreciative. I see it in that paper as follows:—

"Incurable in devising clap-trap, ingenious in discovering mare's nests, incorrigible in vilifying Government, Mr. Caine, the inveterate notoriety hunter and father of fuddists, has, says the Eastern Guardian, had a lasting making set on him as a murderer—of truth. His Excellency Lord Wenlock has given the lie direct to each and all of the scurrilous though sensational statements of Truth's 'genial ruffian,' and his Excellency's answer is, as the Madras Mail remarks, a pulverising one."

You see it deserves encouragement. It is evidently the work of a student of sentences, if not a master. It is quite artistically constructed, and there is rhythm and movement and music of the right sort. Surely, there ought to be no jealousy in acknowledging this. Let there be no colourable pretext even for complaint that, after holding the lion's share of Government favor to the exclusion of the poor Poor Whites and Eurasians, the Baboos would have the monopoly of genius and letters.

After the exhibitions of inaccuracy, inanity and absurdity of the past, this sort of writing introduces us into a new atmosphere. The hand evidently has not yet had much practice, nor is the head quite mature, but it is the right pen and no mistake. The construction is perfect. And the period itself would have been perfect if the writer had been well-supplied by his treasury. But he has no adequate felicity of epithet. "Incurable in devising clap trap" is not at all luminous. Luckily, the next phrase—"ingenious in discovering mare's nests"—is good and makes up to some extent, but then the third combination—"incorrigible in vilifying Government"—is again contemptible and throws back the effort rather upon the region of bathos.

That is all the exception that criticism can take to the passage, and it is very little, after all. On the whole, that criticism only establishes the general excellence of that bit of eloquence. Let us, therefore, Reis Sahab Bahadoor, heartily congratulate our new brother of the pen and wish him all success and health and happiness.

THE Times of India, in noticing a (speaking mildly) noted limb of vernacular journalism in this Province, has been swearing at it—unconsciously:

"The Damik of Calcutta, which is but the daily edition of the Bangabasi, which is a weekly paper, contradicts the assertion of the Pioneer and another Anglo-Indian journal, that the opinion of the majority of the special jury in the Bangabasi case was for conviction. It says that the matter will ever remain a mystery."

There is a misprint somewhere, I am afraid. "What matter whers if" the print, such as it is, has still a just and useful sense? Some misses are truehits. The public has lately been reminded of the Friend of India of Serampore at the beginning of the Mutinies of 1857, when it published the famous article "The Centenary of Plassey." Who would have complained if in writing of that journal in those days any one had dropped a letter of its long trailing name without making nonsense of it? Would not all have recognised the occurrence as a rare felicity of accident sent by Heaven? So in the present case. If there is a misprint, the "mis" may just as well be in the final syllable as in the initial. It stands to reason that if the name is Dam something, not to say Dam', then the ik is it, and no mis-take.

If lowsie is Lucy, as some volke miscalle it,
Then Lucy is lowsie, whatever befall it.

TRAINING FOR ZEMINDARI AND MERCANTILE BUSINESS.

IN this country it is of great importance that, in the vernacular schools, special arrangements should exist for training in Zemindary and mercantile business. In Bengal alone, there are no less than one hundred thousand landholders, and necessarily a much larger number of men in the country acquire their livelihood by service under Zemindars and traders. However valuable general education may be to the sons of the big landholders and merchants, they can not do without some theoretical knowledge of the special departments in which they have to work in after life. The son of the Zemindar has very often to manage his own estate immediately upon attaining his majority, and, without some knowledge previously acquired, he finds himself in the embarrassing position of a master who has to learn business from his own servant. He is either duped, robbed and ruined, or has to surrender the management of his affairs unconditionally to more skilled hands, reducing himself to the position of a pensioner, and bringing discredit on his vaunted "high education."

As to our merchants and tradesmen, their ignorance of the world's commercial affairs is simply ludicrous. There are many among them who are under the impression that the large export of indigo and linseed from this country, is due to the peculiar constitution of Englishmen, which makes these things highly palatable to them as articles of food. In the absence of any information as to the circumstances which affect the price of exportable commodities, the mercantile speculations of our countrymen generally partake of the character of gambling transactions. Their movements are usually effected in the darkness of total ignorance, the result being that the fortunes of some are wrecked for ever or crippled seriously, though the ruin or loss could have been easily averted by a careful calculation from knowable facts.

Whatever may be the case with our aristocracy, there can be no doubt that the majority of those who attend the primary schools desire nothing so much as to acquire some knowledge of the business of land stewards and mercantile agents. The village headman or shop-keeper, who sends his son to a vernacular school, has no higher ambition than to qualify him for service under a Zemindar or a Mohajun. If his education qualified him for such service, then alone such education would be considered desirable by the bulk of the people.

When Sir George Campbell was the ruler of Bengal about twenty years ago, he made a special training for Zemindari and trading business a part of the course of instruction imparted in the vernacular schools. But his scheme failed on account of the want of good text books on the subjects at the time. The department patronised the work of a writer whose knowledge of Zemindari and Mohajuni was absolutely nil, and whose style of writing in his mother-tongue is such that not a line is intelligible or free from lapses in grammar and idiom. Through the kindness, however, of the subordinate Hakims of the Education Department, the fortunate author went on clearing several thousands of rupees every year, and it was only about the end of last year that Sir Alfred Croft saved the poor students of our vernacular schools from the iniquitous taxation, by striking off the work from the lower primary curriculum.

Apart from the merits of that work, it is to be observed that mere specimens of account and forms of Zemindari documents can not suffice to make a really good text book on zemindari or mohajani. A book of conveyancing, however valuable to the practical lawyer, never forms a part of the curriculum laid down for a law-student. Some of the officers connected with the education department complain, that the teachers of our vernacular schools are generally ignorant of Zemindari and mercantile office work, and that it is therefore very difficult for them to teach these subjects. The fact, however, is that if really good books were placed in their hands, they would not experience any difficulty in imparting useful instructions to their pupils in these branches of study. The work of a confused brain confuses teachers as well as students.

It is generally supposed that a knowledge of the mnemonic rules of Suvankar, the famous Indian arithmetician, is an essential part of zemindari and mohajani book-keeping. And, in fact, the students of our vernacular schools are still subjected to the infliction of getting by heart these enigmatic formulæ. True it is that there are some shop-keepers and Zemindari amlas who are very expert in figure work. But it does not therefore follow that the Suvankari system is a better one than the arithmetical science which is taught in the higher schools. The fact is, that the proficiency of native accountants is due not to any merit in Suvankar, but to their constant practice. Though the Suvankari system is favored by our educational authorities, there is, in our opinion, no ground whatever for the supposition that it can be easily mastered, or that it enables the person who has mastered it to be a better accountant than one whose knowledge of book-keeping is based on arithmetic properly so called. It takes years and years for the most industrious and intelligent lad to master all the unscientific and enigmatic rules in Nava Sisu Bodh. But when the occasion for their application arises, the chances are that he forgets them altogether, or some words in them do not occur to him at the right time and he is quite at sea. In some simple cases, the rules of Suvankar prove to be of some use. But in all complicated cases, and, especially where Suvankari rules do not apply, a knowledge of the system is of no use at all. The fact is, that it is no system at all, and nothing can be more clumsy than its bhanga chalan and do bhanga chalan. Can anything be more absurd than that the simple fraction $\frac{1}{3}$ is represented by a series of figures which are equivalent to a complex fraction like the following :

$$\frac{5}{16} + \left(\frac{6}{20} \times \frac{1}{10} \right) + \left(\frac{2}{4} \times \frac{1}{20} \times \frac{1}{10} \right) + \left(\frac{2}{3} \times \frac{1}{4} \times \frac{1}{20} \times \frac{1}{10} \right) ?$$

The clumsiness of Suvankari figures for denoting such fractions, has been recently emphasized by the working of the Land Registration Act of 1876. According to the time-honored practice of our Collectorates, the extent of interest of the several co-sharers in estates owned by more than one proprietor is recorded not in simple fractions but by the marks denoting the fixed fractions called annas, gandas, cowries, krants, &c. The result in some cases is that, when all the shares are added together, they either exceed or fall short of 16 annas.

The absurdity of teaching Suvankari in our schools is so obvious, that it is hardly necessary to dilate upon it further. If there is a sentimental bias among the people in favor of it, it is the duty of our educational officers to remove such prejudice. The scientific arithmetic which is taught in our higher schools, is not a branch of foreign learning. It is well known that it had its origin in India, and the true Hindoo patriot has much more reason to be proud of it than of Suvankar.

The training of Zemindars should, as a matter of course, include a knowledge of law and zemindaree book-keeping. But, above all, their eyes ought to be opened to the kind of tricks by which the ruin of Zemindars is usually brought about by their amlas, priests, relatives and panderers. A history of the leading families of landholders would be the most interesting subject of study for the youth of our wealthy classes. There is no such history at present, and even if there were such books it may not be considered proper to impart to any class of students a knowledge of Zemindari Machiavellism in all its horrid details. But no exception can be taken to a book like the Kshitish Bangsabali of the late Babu Kartik Chandra Roy, and, if required by the authorities, similar books may be brought out with respect to the other great families of Bengal landholders, excepting perhaps that of Burdwan, the affairs of which cannot be expected to be brought to light in the present state of the law relating to defamation.

The especial training essential to the efficient carrying on of trading business, requires not only a knowledge of book-keeping but of commercial statistics, and of the elementary principles of the economical science. These are the branches of technical education for which, in our opinion, immediate provision ought to be made.

THE RAMPUR STATE MURDER.

THE enquiry into the Rampur murder, under the Foreign Jurisdiction and Extradition Act, was concluded on the twelfth day, the 7th September. The enquiring Magistrate, subject to the orders of the Local Government, admitted the two accused to bail, each on his personal recognizance of Rs. 5,000 and two sureties for Rs. 3,000 each. As required by the law, the magistrate will make his report "to the Government by which he was directed to hold the said enquiry." "If, upon receipt of such report, such Government is of opinion that the accused person ought to be given up to the persons making the requisition, it may issue a warrant for the custody and removal of such person and for his delivery at a place and to a person to be named in the warrant."

Mr. Dillon, for the prosecution, examined fresh witnesses on the 7th and 8th days. On the 9th and the 10th, Mr. Vansittart, for the defence, cross-examined the witnesses for the prosecution. The statements of the two prisoners were taken down by the Magistrate. They denied their complicity in the murder, contradicting the statements recorded against them, and giving their own explanation of the implicating evidence. One witness for the defence was examined and cross-examined on the 10th day. The next day, four, and the day following, two more, witnesses deposed on behalf of the accused. Mr. Vansittart then addressed the Magistrate. He was followed in reply by Mr. Dillon. Thus the proceedings terminated.

Mr. Vansittart made a good point, namely, that since the Manipur trial, the Extradition Act has become a dead letter in Hindustan, as far as extradition to Foreign States therein is concerned. For, where the British are paramount there can be no foreign sovereign. Whether it be so or not, he claimed that his clients be tried—if trial be ordered—as Native Indian subjects, in British territory, according to the law of the land, with the usual right of appeal. He relied for this contention on section 8 of the same Act, which extends, subject as to procedure to such modifications as the Governor-General in Council may from time to time direct, the law relating to offences and to Criminal Procedure for the time being in force in British India to all British subjects, European and Native, in Native States. If the evidence recorded justified any suspicion of the General Azimuddin having been the victim of his own overhearing dictatorship, at the hands of members of the Regency Council, it would be an infamy to hand over British subjects to the same Council of Regency. He hoped that political reasons had not moved the Local Government. It looks as if it had been decided to hang some big man at Rampur, to appease the shade of the murdered General, and that, for want of a better, the choice had fallen on a family out of Rampur, though of it. He regretted that he was not allowed to prove a counter-charge and to expose the real murderers. The counsel then noticed the oppression of the Police in working out the case. The Rampur Superintendent of Police—a courageous man who would not funk in time of danger but might refuse to help in earning an enormous reward of Rs. 15,000 by screening the real offenders and prosecuting an innocent family—was sent out on leave—to save his life, and a British officer and his subordinates put in his place to enquire into the crime. If Rampur is a foreign jurisdiction, Mr. Berrill and his myrmidons had no business there. The British Police started with a strong suspicion, then went in for proof, proof failing, they manufactured evidence to prove their theory. The reward offered was an incentive to perjury. With such a fund it was no difficult task to procure such witnesses as Kullan and Wali Mahomed, to whom 15,000 was the same as ninety lacs to the magistrate, but who had not the moral training nor the early associations nor the traditions that safeguard an English gentleman. He pointed out that every Pathan soldier whom the murdered General had replaced by a Gurkha was his enemy. All the members of Council over whom he dominated as their master might have had motive to get rid of him.

THE WATER WE DRINK.

[A LECTURE BY DR. BENJAMIN EVERS, CIVIL SURGEON, RAIPUR, C.P.]

Water, as you are aware, covers about five-sevenths of the whole area of the earth's surface; and we find there the salt water of seas and oceans and the fresh water of rivers and lakes. From this vast expanse evaporation is constantly taking place and the atmosphere becomes, in consequence, gradually charged with moisture—the warmer the air, the greater the quantity of moisture it is capable of absorbing—and when this warm air saturated with moisture meets a current of cold wind coming across the sea, the hitherto invisible vapour becomes chilled and condensed and falls in the form of rain or hail. Where the land is high, as for example along the west coast, and where the mountains rear their dark cold heads, there the rainfall is heaviest. Thus these mountain ranges and their ravines become the watersheds of the various streams that fertilise the plains below. Coming straight then as it were from heaven, water falls in all its purity on this earth to brighten and vivify all nature, and this, as you know, is especially manifest in the vegetable world. From the very beginning, when, as the Mosaic account says, "the earth was without form and void" until "the spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters," water has ever been considered an emblem of purity; and, as you know very well, all religious teachers among the ancients rigidly enforced baths of purification on certain ceremonial occasions, and even in years subsequent to Moses and Menu, a teacher greater than either made purification with water a distinct sign and bond of union between himself and his followers. "If I wash thee not," says he, "thou hast no part with me," and the Christian rite of baptism is simply typical of an inward spiritual change, by the outward and visible sign of purification by water, and cleanliness in the Christian religion comes next to godliness. In no country in the world, perhaps, is the desire to seek religious purification by water more common than in India. From the snow-capped Himalayas to where the waves kiss the feet of Cape Comorin, hundreds of pilgrims are to be found painfully toiling along the roads to some river of reputed sanctity, there to wash and be cleansed from their sins. The confluences of certain large rivers, such as the Jumna and the Ganges at Allahabad and the Mahanadi and Pairri Rajim, are, as you well know, considered to be of special sanctity; and similarly the sources of rivers, as at Moondara in the Seoni District, where the Menigunga is first seen to trickle, and at Oomurkuntak where the mighty Nerbudda rises, an annual gathering of pilgrims takes place—pilgrims who muster from all parts of the country with the one object of washing and becoming clean in a religious sense. I cannot refrain here from quoting a very poetical description of a river by an old writer. "Behold the babe! springing from the bowels of mother earth. See, it is asleep in its moss-girt cradle-bed pure as ever was infant. Soon it crawls over the side of its cradle, its moorland nest, a tiny strengthless thing. The age of progress once begun, there is no turning back, and soon it has grown into the mountain brooklet—the jolly, noisy, splashing, dashing, leaping, tumbling, boisterous 'burn.' Anon, as if wearied out sleeping quietly self-intoxicated in its own sweet gurgling eddies. Then growing and flowing till the brooklet of yesterday is the river of to-day. Westward looms a growing haze, and towards that the river slowly but surely is going, like as the waves make to the pebbled shore. Swiftly now, as if confronting a foe, it rolls along, facing the future dark though it be proudly and defiantly. It has entered the city. Where now the bright sun, the verdant pastures, the song of birds? Overhead all is gloom, around, an atmosphere of impurity. Oh! how it chafes, how it chokes! Nobly battling for the mastery it goes on. A sharp struggle perhaps, and then out beyond the city. Purity once more, the glorious country and the golden sunshine! Alas! step by step it grows foul and turbid and the odours are those of death and decay, not life and health. The river is no longer beautiful and pure but foul and loathsome. It has emerged from the city bearing its stain. How sadly, how painfully it flows now, aye, and flows on till it is lost in the loving arms of the ocean's resistless tide. How like indeed to man's life—from the cradle to the grave!"

Yet such an emblem of purity as water is, it is in this very land that water is more abused than any other element. The rippling brook and the placid tank that supply our villages with drinking water, are fouled as if with the object of rendering them foul, thus converting what ought to be sources of life and energy into sources of pestilence and decay. Visit any of the villages in this district, and what do you find? Nullah-beds and tank "bunds" polluted to such an extent, that with the first fall of rain, these sources of water-supply to the people, must simply become charged with liquid sewage. At all times of the year, the nullah serves as a receptacle for the most disgusting impurities, and the village tank, in the hot months especially when the water is low, holds a concentrated solution of organic matters which give rise to most serious derangement of the digestive organs. With a water-supply of such a character, it is not surprising that, when epidemics appear the people die off in hundreds. Pollution of a stream is not only a nuisance, but a danger, to every one dwelling on its banks, and unless we conserve our smaller affluents, our large rivers must necessarily become foul also. Nature, it is true, does to a certain extent, by means of light and air and movement, endeavour to mitigate the evil, but a nullah perpetually fouled must, in the end, become saturated with filth, so much so that its very silt may be looked upon as manure. A water-supply from wells, especially if they be covered over and protected from pollution against surface impurities, would be much safer for our villagers, than a tank or nullah supply such as I have already described. But unfortunately the Chattisgarhi, accustomed as he and his ancestors have been to the use of tanks, finds it very difficult to understand that pollution of water can take place in a tank, where the whole village, both man and beast, makes use of it as a bathing cistern. Of late years, however, I am glad to say that some of the members of our Local Boards have been brought to consider this matter, and in a few of the larger villages there has been an attempt made to conserve certain tanks and reserve them as sources of supply for drinking water only. This is a small beginning, but now that the schoolmaster is abroad, I sincerely hope that the people generally may learn to appreciate the advantages of a pure water supply.

Water forms one of the principal constituents of the human body, and enters into the composition of all its various tissues. Indeed, it has been calculated to amount to two-thirds of the whole body weight. All the processes of secretion, nutrition and growth depend upon its presence; it is absolute therefore to the maintenance of life in all its forms. In the animal system, the appetite for water is the sensation termed thirst, and this sensation is invariably referred to the tongue and back of the throat, but like hunger which is, as you know, referred to the stomach, it is simply an indication of the general want felt in the whole body. Simply moistening the mouth from time to time, will relieve thirst no doubt, but only for a short time; the water must be swallowed to make good the deficiency in the body, and it is only then, as you know, there is an immediate feeling of relief. Certain articles of food, especially those containing an excess of salt, create a feeling of thirst, but this is simply the result of irritation caused by this excess, and more water is instinctively swallowed to dissolve these saline matters. Again, in certain diseases, there is an increased craving for water, in consequence of the constant drain of fluid from the body. Total deprivation of water is followed by consequences similar to those of starvation—bodily strength fails, the mental faculties become weak, and after a time exertion of any kind becomes almost impossible—but let water be again supplied, and it is astonishing how soon strength will return. Most of you have heard or read no doubt of painful instances of death from thirst, and in Coleridge's well-known poem of the Ancient Mariner you find a most thrilling description of the pangs that attend thirst when unappeased:

Water, water, every where
And all the boards did shrink,
Water, water, every where,
Nor any drop to drink.

I closed my lids, and kept them close,
And the balls like pulses beat :
For the sky and the sea, and the sea and the sky
Lay, like a cloud, on my weary eye,
And the dead mere at my feet.

The silly buckets on the deck,
That had so long remained,
I dreamt that they were filled with dew ;
And when I woke it rained.

My lips were wet, my throat was cold,
My garments all were dank ;
Sure I had drunken in my dreams,
And still my body drank.

The average quantity of water required by a healthy adult amounts to $3\frac{1}{2}$ or 4 pints per diem, but of course this quantity is to a certain extent modified by personal habits, the temperature of the country in which one lives, and the nature of the occupation one has to follow. Thus, for example, when fruit and vegetables are largely partaken of as food, a smaller quantity of water is drunk. Some persons from mere habit drink more than others at all times. In a climate again where the skin is constantly bathed with perspiration, the need for a larger quantity of water to drink is apparent. The field labourer similarly, from the nature of his occupation, has generally a greater thirst than one who leads a sedentary life. Water is a general stimulant to the digestive system, and it enables the various organs and structures of the body to carry on the nutritive process. It is the type of all drinks, and in its purest form consists of two gases, named oxygen and hydrogen. It is not necessary or desirable, however, that, for drinking purposes, water should be of absolute purity, for it would then be unpalatable like distilled water. Water considered sufficiently pure and wholesome, should be transparent and without any disagreeable smell or taste. It should be free from floating impurities, and the total solids consisting of various salts should not exceed 8 grains per gallon. The presence of organic matter in water, is detected by the blackening of the residue left after evaporation, and in good water there should be scarcely any blackening. Water then being so very necessary to build up and maintain the body, it should be our best endeavour to procure it as pure as nature will permit. The injurious effects of an impure supply are not easily detected, for they are not always sudden or striking, and it is this fact no doubt that makes many persons indifferent and apathetic as regards the nature of their water supply. But ignore it as they may, the mischief is there and working insidiously the whole time, the individual's general health is being gradually lowered, and a tendency to disease is being induced. Of all impurities, organic matters are probably the worst, for they give rise to such diseases as dyspepsia in its many forms, diarrhoea, dysentery, specific fevers, and also predispose the body more or less to cholera by vitiating the blood. Foul drinking water does not of itself originate cholera, but it offers a suitable nidus for the development of the specific poison, when once the specific contagion of cholera alights on it. It then by the use of foul drinking water you predispose yourself as it were to cholera, you run a very great risk of taking the disease, when it breaks out in a village or community. In addition to this acquired predisposition, there is what seems to be constitutional susceptibility, and it is fortunate for us, that we are not all equally susceptible, for then we should all be equally liable. What actually constitutes personal susceptibility it is not easy to define, but this much we know, that people living under favorable sanitary conditions, of which a good water supply is one, are less likely to suffer than those who live under opposite conditions. I have made these passing remarks regarding cholera, as it was a disease which unfortunately caused us a good deal of anxiety last year.

The composition of water in a well varies, of course, according to the soil in which the well is sunk, and the condition of the surrounding neighbourhood. A well of 40 feet in depth will drain an area of about 25 or 30 feet radius, and it would never do therefore to sink a well near a cesspool. This state of things, however, is more frequently seen in large towns than in our outlying villages. Even in Raipur, I can point to wells in private backyards, placed in dangerous proximity to sources of pollution. The propagation of diseases by water may not be quite so common as that by air, but when specific poisons find entrance into the system by means of it, their effects are much more rapid, for not only is a large quantity of the poison absorbed at one time, but it is brought into immediate contact with the stomach and intestines, the highways, if we might call them so, for the transit of food and drink. The purest form of drinking water is rain-water, and in many places where ground water is either bad or unobtainable, rain water is collected and stored. In this country it is collected and stored in our tanks, but, unfortunately, as I have already said, the people themselves pollute this source of supply. We find rain water again in nullahs and rivers, and so long as these are in flood all impurities become largely diluted, and further exposure to the action of the air decomposes them to a certain extent. It would be safest, however, if water be taken from a river, particularly when the river is in flood, to have it filtered before use, or if a filter is not available to boil it before use. In considering the fitness of any water for drinking purposes, you should not only attend to the sources, viz., whether they are wells, tanks, nullahs or rivers, from which it is obtained, but also the season of the year, for in the hot months, remember, the water is low, and the proportion of impurities would be greater. Under the influence of solar heat, again, organic matters in water putrify more rapidly, and it would be prudent of you, therefore, to practise either filtration or boiling, or both combined, as precautions. As habitual water-drinkers you should be very careful to ascertain the source of your drinking water supply. The members of our Municipal Committees and Local Boards should endeavour in the future to prevent the digging of wells in foul localities, and the fouling of localities in which wells already exist. You should make it your duty, you who are considered men of light and leading in your community, to teach the people that the fouling of tanks and streams, will, in the end, bring its own punishment—that conservation of water in tanks and rivers is incumbent on all, so that the supply may be a life-giving, not a death-bearing one. You, each and all, can bring a certain amount of influence to bear upon the people, especially by your example. I have seen signs of an awakening, if I might call it so, in some of our villages, but the generality of people are still indifferent as to what water they drink. It will be an uphill work no doubt for you to overcome the ignorance of ages, but for all that do not relinquish the task. Your progress will be slow, but work nevertheless and do not be discouraged ; and in time you will, I have no doubt, reap the reward of your labours.

Honour and shame from no condition rise.
Act well your part and there the honour lies.

ABANDONMENT OF THE BANGABASI PROSECUTION.

No. 143 J---D, dated Darjeeling, the 9th September 1891.
From Sir John Edgar, K. C. I. E., C. S. I., Chief Secretary to the Govt. of Bengal,--- To the Secretary to the Government of India, Home Dept.

In continuation of my letter No. 3375 J, dated the 28th of August last, I am directed to forward a copy of a petition to the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, from Jogendra Chunder Bose, Kristo Chunder Banerjea, Brojoraj Banerjea, and Aronodoy Roy, respectively, proprietor, editor, manager and printer of the Bengali newspaper Bangabasi, in which they express their deep and heartfelt sorrow for having allowed the articles which were the subject of the recent prosecution, to appear in the columns of the Bangabasi, and throw themselves unreservedly on the mercy of the Lieutenant-Governor. In a separate communication they undertake to publish this petition in the Bangabasi newspaper when required by the Government. I am also to forward a copy of a letter from the President of a newly-formed Native Press Association, in which the members, who are the proprietors and editors of nearly all important native newspapers published in Bengal, express their regret at the use of the language of the articles, but support the prayer of the petitioners, which is also supported by the British Indian Association in a letter, copy of which is also submitted, in which they express their strong condemnation of the language and tone of the incriminated articles.

2. In considering the above petition and letters, the Lieutenant-Governor has thought that great weight should be attached to the result of the recent trial. In the first place, the interpretation placed by the Chief Justice in his charge upon section 124A of the Indian Penal Code is substantially that contended for on behalf of the Crown. In the second place, there can be no reasonable doubt that a majority of the jury in the proportion of 7 to 2 were in favour of conviction, and that it was solely owing to what might be described as an accident that this verdict was not accepted by the Court under section 305 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and the accused convicted. In future every editor who admits a seditious article inciting his readers to feelings of disaffection against the Government will know that he is committing a breach of the law as laid down by the highest authority in Bengal, and will hardly hope to escape punishment through the chance that the jury may disagree, and that the Judge may again decline to be governed by the verdict of the majority. The main object of the Government in instituting the prosecution, viz., to ascertain and make known the exact state of the law, has been thus attained, and the accused persons have now expressed their contrition unreservedly, and have pledged themselves never again to give any just cause for the belief that they are intent on exciting disaffection.

3. In these circumstances the Lieutenant-Governor considers that no adequate object would be gained by renewing the prosecution next November, but rather that Government should gladly take the opportunity of showing that it is not influenced by vindictive feelings, and he therefore proposes to instruct the law officers of Government not to proceed further in the matter. Before, however, taking this step he thinks it advisable to ascertain the views of the Government of India on the subject, and has therefore directed me to submit the petition and memorials for the consideration of His Excellency the Governor-General in Council, and to solicit early orders, as it is desirable that the matter should be disposed of with as little delay as possible.

No. 1165, dated Simla, the 17th September 1891.
From C. J. Lyall, Esq., C. I. E., Secretary to the Government of India, Home Department,---To the Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter No. 148 J. D., dated the 9th instant, with which you forward a copy of a petition to the Lieutenant-Governor from the proprietor, editor, manager and printer of the Bengali newspaper Bangabasi, in which they express contrition for having allowed the articles which formed the subject of the recent prosecution to appear in that paper, promise henceforth to conduct it in a spirit of loyalty to Her Majesty the Queen-Empress and the Government of India, and throw themselves unreservedly on the mercy of the Lieutenant-Governor. You also enclose a representation from the President of the Native Press Association which is described as having been recently formed, after the institution of the proceedings against the Bangabasi, with the object (among others) of improving the tone of the Native Press and preserving moderation in the discussion of all public questions, interceding on behalf of the Bangabasi, the directors of which have now joined the Association; and another from the British Indian Association, supporting the prayer of the petition and entreating the Lieutenant-Governor to direct, in consideration of the humble submission of those responsible for the paper, that further criminal proceedings shall be stayed. Sir Charles Elliott proposes to instruct the law officers of Government not to proceed further in the matter, but before doing so desires to ascertain the views of the Government of India.

2. In reply I am to say that the Governor-General in Council has perused these papers with much satisfaction, and fully approves of the course which the Lieutenant-Governor proposes to take in directing the prosecution of the accused in the Bangabasi case to be withdrawn. The proceedings which were instituted under His Honour's orders (with the approval of the Government of India) had it for their object to bring home to the conductors of the Native Press of Bengal that the dis-loyal and seditious utterances in which so many of their number permit themselves to indulge cannot be tolerated. The paper which was selected for prosecution by the Lieutenant-Governor, acting upon the opinion of his legal advisers, by whom the articles upon which the prosecution was based were chosen, was one of those which, since the passing into law of the Age of Consent Act in March last, had shown themselves conspicuously virulent in their attacks upon the Government. No prosecution under section 124A of the Indian Penal Code had, however, been instituted since that section was added to the Code in 1870, and doubts had been expressed in various quarters as to the manner in which it might be construed by the Court. The Government of India did not share these doubts, and were not prepared to admit that the law as it stands is insufficient.

The law has now been clearly explained by the highest judicial authority in Bengal, and the interpretation put upon it coincides with that which the Government of India themselves attached to it. It has been shown beyond doubt that deliberate attempts to excite feelings of enmity and ill-will against the Government, and to hold it up to the hatred and contempt of the people, and misrepresentation of the true state of affairs by partial statements of facts so as to cause disaffection, are offences within the purview of the section, and that writings of this nature in the public press render those who publish them liable to punishment under the existing law.

This having been fully demonstrated, and the persons responsible for the appearance of the incriminated articles in the Bangabasi having themselves acknowledged the articles to be "intemperate, disrespectful and unjustifiable," having expressed their contrition, and having promised never to repeat their offence, the Government of India are not desirous of pressing the matter further against these defendants.

I am to say, in conclusion, that neither now nor in the future has honest and independent criticism, however mistaken or even hostile, of Government measures or the action of public officers, anything to fear from the law, so long as it is put forward in good faith and does not attempt to stir up hatred of the Government or attack its inherent characteristics. So far as it is well informed, such criticism is welcomed by the Government of India as a valuable auxiliary in the good administration of the country.

Dated Calcutta, the 4th September 1891.
To the Hon'ble Sir Charles A. Elliott, K.C.S.I., Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal.

The humble petition of Jogendra Chandra Bose, Krishna Chandra Banerjee, Brojaraj Banerjee, and Arunodoy Roy,

Respectfully Sheweth: That your petitioners, Jogendra Chandra Bose, Krishna Chandra Banerjee, Brajaraj Banerjee, and Arunodoy

Roy were respectively, as proprietor, editor, manager, and printer and publisher of the Bengali newspaper Bangabasi, printed and published at Calcutta in the Bengali language and circulated among, and read mostly by, Bengalis throughout Hindoostan, prosecuted at the instance of the Government in the High Court of Judicature at Fort William in Bengal, in its Original Criminal Jurisdiction, under section 124A of the Indian Penal Code, for having printed and published certain articles in the issues of the said Bangabasi newspaper, dated the 28th March 1891, 16th May 1891, and 6th June 1891.

That your petitioners were tried by a special jury composed of seven European gentlemen, one Armenian gentleman, and one Bengali gentleman, but by reason of their disagreement in the verdict the said Jury was discharged by the Hon'ble the Chief Justice of Bengal, who presided in the said trial; and upon an inquiry made by the said Chief Justice of the Standing Counsel to the Government as to what course would be adopted by the Government against your petitioners, his Lordship was informed that the matter should be placed before the Advocate-General and such action taken as the Advocate-General might advise the Government: thereupon the case against your petitioners was postponed as a remand case to the next sessions of the said High Court, which will be held in November next, and your petitioners were enlarged on the same bail as before.

That your petitioners do by this their humble petition solemnly and sincerely declare that in publishing the said articles in the Bangabasi newspaper there was not on the part of any one of your petitioners the remotest intention of exciting, or attempting to excite, feelings of disaffection towards the Government, nor did they for one moment suppose that the articles complained of could or would excite such feelings in the minds of any of their readers.

That your petitioners fully appreciate the benefits of British rule in India, and they should not be true to themselves and to the Hindoo race to which they belong if by any act of theirs they, either directly or indirectly, excited or attempted to excite feelings of disaffection towards a Government to which their country owes so much.

That your petitioners do hereby honestly declare that they are ready and willing to state publicly that there was not on their, or any of their, part any intention to excite any feelings of disaffection among the readers of the said Bangabasi newspaper towards the Government, and to express their sincere regret that the language and tone of the articles complained of was such as to lay them open to the construction placed by the legal advisers of Government.

That after carefully considering all the matters and things which, on the one side or the other, have been treated of in the discussions which have taken place in connection with their prosecution, they feel bound to acknowledge that the articles to which exception has been taken were intemperate, disrespectful, and unjustifiable. Your petitioners therefore express their deep and heartfelt sorrow for having, however unintentionally, allowed those articles to appear in the columns of the Bangabasi.

That it has always been the chief aim and object of the conductors of the said Bangabasi newspapers to support and render obedience to the lawful authority of British Government.

That your petitioners do hereby undertake and promise, and they are quite ready and willing to publicly undertake and promise, that the Bangabasi newspaper, so long as any one of your petitioners may have any authority over the conduct thereof, shall continue to be conducted in a spirit of loyalty towards Her Imperial Majesty the Empress of India and the Government of India conducted on her behalf, and never again give any just cause for the belief that your petitioners are capable of exciting disaffection against the rule of Her Imperial Majesty the Empress of India, or of showing disrespect to the said Government of India.

That your petitioners believe that it has been brought to your Honour's notice that steps are being taken to organize a Press Association, the object of which is to keep the Native Press of Bengal under the control and supervision of the leading members of that Press, and the editor of the Bangabasi newspaper has joined the said Association as one of its members, and this, your petitioners venture to submit, is a sufficient guarantee that in future the said Bangabasi newspaper will be conducted in a loyal spirit.

That your petitioners have already been impoverished by their aforesaid trial, and further criminal proceedings will be utterly ruinous to them.

That your petitioners now unreservedly throw themselves on the mercy of your Honour, and sincerely hope and trust that, after all their sufferings, the generous protection of your Honour's Government will not be denied to them.

Your petitioners therefore humbly pray that your Honour may be pleased to take the circumstances of their case into your kind consideration and pass such order thereon as to your Honour may seem just and proper.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, shall ever pray.

JOGENDR CHANDRA BOSE,
KRISHNA CHANDRA BANERJEE,
BRAJARAJ BANERJEE,
ARUNODOY ROY.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

I CHARGE THEE TO REMEMBER.

BY MRS. PONSONBY.

By the rushing of the waters
Of our native mountain streams,
Whose music long shall mingle
With thy haunted midnight dreams—
By the purple of those mountains—
By the azure of that sky—
By the everlasting shadows,
Round the forest-trees that lie—
By the paths we trod together,
By the glade where first we met,
Do I charge thee to remember
All thou wouldst most forget.

By the softness of the morning,
The glory of the noon—
By the shining of the silver stars,
The radiance of the moon—
By the calm and tender twilight,
The dropping summer showers—
By the songs that glad the greenwood
In the merry time of flowers—
By the freshness of the greensward,
With evening dew-drops wet,
Do I charge thee to remember
All thou wouldst most forget.

By the wild and wintry tempest,
The fierce autumnal breeze—
By the howling of the storm-blast
O'er those frozen northern seas—
By wind, and frost, and darkness—
By fragrance, light and bloom—
By summer's wreath of beauty—
By winter's brow of gloom—
By earth, where flowers are springing—
By heaven, where stars are set,
Do I bind thee to remember
All thou wouldst most forget.

By all those happy moments
Whose memories thrill thee now—
Memories which dim thy downcast eyes,
And flush thy drooping brow;
Which quiver on thy false, false lip,
And heave thy faithless breast,
And long in that frail heart of thine
Shall live in deep unrest—
Memories beneath whose silent might
Thy cheeks with tears are wet;
Do I bind thee to remember
All thou wouldst most forget.

By love with all its rapture,
By love with all its tears,
Its bliss so mixed with sorrow,
Its hope so full of fears,
Its passion and its anguish,
Its wildness and its woe—
By all that thou so well hast known,
And never more mayst know—
By the joys for ever past away,
The dreams that linger yet,
Do I charge thee to remember
All thou wouldst most forget.

Oh! false as thou hast been to me,
False to thine own weak heart,
Too deep a sadness thrills me now
While thus, while thus we part.
Oh! by the love which outraged,
Doth its own vengeance bring,
By thine own guilt and my deep wrong,
And all our suffering,
By weary life and welcome death,
'By shame, despair, regret,'
Do I bind thee to remember
All thou wouldst most forget.

SONNET

ON MRS. FRANCES KEMBLE BUTLER'S READINGS OF SHAKESPEARE.

By Milton praised, what higher praise is found?
For he, unrivalled poet and undefiled,
Commended few, yet none in pride reviled;
His harp sublime one name doth chiefly sound,
A name, like his, known through the world around:
He spoke of "sweetest Shakespeare, fancy's child,"
Warbling in joy "his native wood-notes wild,"
And in his song hath made his name rebound.
If other honor Shakespeare could desire,
It might be in a distant age and clime,
Beyond the western deep, in new empire,—
That some unequalled Warbler, in her prime,
All his wild notes most heartily should sing,
In myriad ears enthralled and wondering!

ARION.

Holloway's Pills.—Indigestion, Stomach and Liver Complaints.—Persons suffering from any derangements of the liver, stomach, or the organs of digestion should have recourse to Holloway's Pills, as there is no medicine known that acts on these particular complaints with such certain success. Its peculiar properties strengthen the stomach, increase the appetite and rouse the sluggish liver. For bowel complaints it is invaluable, as it removes every primary derangement, thereby restoring the patient to the soundest health and strength. These preparations may be used at all times and in all climates by persons affected by biliousness, nausea, or disordered liver: for flatulency and heartburn they are specifics. Indeed no ailment of the digestive organs can long resist their purifying and corrective powers.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

OF all the public schools of England, Harrow can boast of having given five Prime Ministers during this century.

THE New Holkar College, Indore, has been affiliated to the Calcutta University in Arts up to the B. A. Standard.

IN our issue of the 15th August last in the leader headed "A Blunder Rectified," we noticed the return of good sense in the Government of India in the matter of honorary titles. The Resolutions on the subject are published in the last week's Gazette of India.

THE women of Kingston and Sydenham, two neighbouring villages in Ontario, at a meeting, condemned corsets as unChristian. To give effect to their Resolution, they lighted a fire and flung the wicked corsets into the flames, exclaiming that they would die as they were made. The spirit of Puritanism still endures in North America.

A THEATRE, on the lines of the Theatre-Français, is being built at Athens. It will be exclusively devoted to Greek comedy. The subscriptions already amount to one million francs—over five lacs of rupees. The building is expected to be ready in two years.

THE annual value of houses and messuages in England and Wales is not even four times that of London alone. While the annual value for the metropolis during the last year is given at £35,155,593, that of the United Kingdom is stated by the figure £138,589,982.

THE manufacturers of Blue Ruin can scarcely be said to be engaged in an honest occupation. Yet the more successful of them make noble amends for their sinful practice. Before the close of the chapter, they are metamorphosed into public benefactors. What they have acquired with one hand, they spend with the other. The charities of the Western Shahoos and Shoories are proverbial. This is specially the case in Ireland where, in the paucity of various forms of manufacturing industry, brewing and distilling are the principal source of wealth. And perhaps no other class has laid the island under greater obligation by its considerable acts of liberality.

THE brewer of Cork, Crawford, will be remembered, so long as the town is not destroyed, as the endower of her Art School and of the splendid library of her famous College. A distiller named Roe sunk a fabulous sum on Christ Church Cathedral, Dublin. Sir Benjamin Guinness spent no less than fifteen lacs on St. Patrick's. His sons, Lords Ardilaun and Iveagh, have been equally distinguished, the one throwing open St. Stephen's Green, and the other giving new houses to the poor. And now Mr. R. G. Danville, famous for his Irish whisky, has, at a cost of over two lacs (£18,000), given Belfast a public park.

THE Government of Bengal notifies that a class in Geology and Mineralogy, in accordance with the Regulations of the Calcutta University for the Degree of Bachelor of Arts, will be opened for third year students, at the Presidency College, in the month of June 1892, provided that seven students are found willing to join it.

THE law's delay is a proverb. The delay of local boards and sanitary departments deserves the same distinction. The following letter not long ago appeared in the Times :—

"Some time ago I took a house in the Cromwellroad, and subsequently found that the house drain communicated straight and direct with the main sewer, without bend, trap, or obstruction. Consequently the house was a cistern of sewer gas. I applied personally to the sanitary inspector, who airily informed me that 'he would pop in some morning.' As far as I know he never popped in, but I popped off, otherwise I should not have had the opportunity of writing this letter."

When matters are no better than that in famous London town, what hope is there for us "Ditchers"?

SOME supremely leisured gentleman has gone to the pains of finding out, that the year's supply of piano keys requires the tasks of 50,000 elephants.

WHETHER in town or country, the United States are by no means cramped for space. Yet there are more lofty houses of many stories in their cities than in any other part of the globe. Seven-storied and eight-storied and nine-storied houses are quite common. Of late years, the tendency has been to multiply flats upon flats. And now, to take away the breath of Old World humanity, we learn that Chicago is shortly to have a steel building of twenty-four stories.

MISMATCHED Currency notes hitherto became the property of Government, unless within three years of their deposit in the Currency office, the corresponding halves were received in the form of a mismatched note and the Currency Office, by joining together the proper halves and paying the entire notes, were able to meet the claims of depositors as far as possible. By Accounts and Finance, Paper Currency, No. 4024 dated the 23rd September, the Governor-General in Council is now pleased to decide that in future, instead of crediting the value of both the halves of mismatched notes to Government after they have remained unclaimed for three years, the value of one half should be credited to Government and that of the other half to the depositor of the mismatched note.

IN April last, the Lieutenant Governor was "prepared to guarantee that four appointments in the upper subordinate grade of the Public Works Department shall annually be given to qualified students of the (Sibpur) College who have graduated in Engineering at the Calcutta University, and successfully passed the subsequent period of practical training." That order is now modified into—"The Lieutenant Governor is prepared to direct that all appointments in the upper subordinate grade of the Public Works Department, made by the Government of Bengal, shall be made from students of the Sibpur Engineering College who have graduated in Engineering at the Calcutta University, and successfully passed the subsequent period of training." Sir Charles Elliott finds that in April he had gone too far to bind the Government to four appointments annually, against the spirit of modern administration, and now rectifies the commission. He raised hopes for which he received thanks, and selects a propitious season for an unpropitious announcement.

AT Saint Joseph, Missouri, one Louis Bulling was tried for the murder of his wife, condemned and ordered to be hanged. The day fixed for the execution was the 5th September and the hour 10 O'clock in the morning. At the earnest entreaty of the condemned, the Sheriff twice postponed the fatal hour to 2 and to 3 in the afternoon. On the last occasion, as soon as the Sheriff had closed the door of the cell on his prisoner, he heard two shots fired, and on quickly re-entering the cell found his charge weltering in blood. He was not dead. The Sheriff dragged Bulling, bathed with the blood of his wounds and screaming for mercy, to the scaffold and there hanged him by the neck until he was dead, as directed by the sentencing Judge. The Revd. Mr. Lavake was arrested for supplying the revolver. Bulling had agreed to murder himself for the murder of his wife, while he had a horror for the scaffold. Love of life had unnerved him in his attempt on himself and he cried for life until it was taken out of him.

This fellow's behaviour was natural though unmanly. Even for cut-throats, it is easier to cut down another than to kill one self. It was an atrocious execution, however. No consideration was shown to the poor prisoner—not even his wounds were bandaged. The officers of justice behaved almost as truculently as the convict. And yet it was all due to an amiable weakness—a maudlin sympathy. It is an example fraught with a fine moral. Having improperly allowed the prisoner to evade the law's programme as to the disposal of the convict, it was necessary for the safety of the Sheriff to execute instantly the captured fugitive as it were, no matter in what condition or plight so ever. Had Bulling not been caught alive, had the coward succeeded in killing himself with the clerical innocent's pistol, they would have hanged the carcass.

THE Dussehra vacation in the Calcutta Small Cause Court commenced with the Mahālayā from yesterday. The Court will reopen on Wednesday the 3rd November. During the four grand days of the Doorga Pooja—the Saptami, Oshthomi, Navami and the Doshomi—the 10th, 11th, 12th and 13th October—no summons will be served on, nor any warrant executed against, any Hindu.

THE mofussil Civil Courts too closed from Friday, the 2nd.

THERE was a lecture at the Poona Mission House, which was attended by, among others, on invitation, by Pandit Raghunath Narayan. Visitors were provided with tea, coffee and biscuits. The Pandit did not partake of the refreshment but only heard the lecture. The Poona Waikhan published a list as of persons, including the Pandit among them, who had gone to the Mission House for the tea, &c. Separate slips of paper were printed and circulated with the list of names and posted in conspicuous places, with the effect that the Pandit was outcasted, the Brahmans refusing to perform religious ceremonies at his house, his friends and relations declining to join at dinner at his house, and he not being asked to dinner at their houses. Raghunath has charged the newspaper with defamation.

THE Viceroy's Levée at Calcutta is announced for the 5th December. The Drawing Room is fixed for the 10th following.

THE Viceroy is back to Simla from Chor.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE German Emperor William III. has repeatedly declared himself for peace. The German Imperial Chancellor, General Caprivi, improving upon his master, declared, in a speech at Osnabruck, that no sovereign in Europe desires war.

THE German Government are not satisfied with China's friendly assurances that measures will be taken to prevent any further rioting or attacks on foreigners. They want to be satisfied with China's ability to suppress disorders. They insist on deeds not words. To verify the words, as it were, the Chinese Government have dismissed the Governor of Wuhu.

IN a speech at Bapaume, M. Ribot, the French Minister for Foreign Affairs, affirmed the existence of an understanding between France and Russia, and the resolve of France to profit by it in the interest of the peace of Europe.

As a bond of amity between the two nations, they are raising in Paris a Russian loan of twenty millions sterling. The Berliners were to have joined in it, but, owing to a public feeling in Germany, they have retired from the business.

GENERAL Boulanger is dead—by his own hand. The death of his mistress Madame Bonnemant drove him mad. He would daily visit her tomb and strew it with flowers. His friends took alarm, watched him and took precaution that no arms came in his way. He, however, secured a revolver and blew himself out with it on the dear tomb.

France had discarded him for corruption and he discarded himself for a woman. The man of war ends as a monomaniacal suicide.

THE successful termination of the Chilean revolt and the self-destruction of the President Balmaceda, is followed by rumours of a rising against the President Barillas in the capital of that name in New Guatemala. It is said to have broken out on the 15th September, with the result that, in a three days' fighting, five hundred men were killed, the President's forces proving victorious.

THE first two sections of the Manchester Ship Canal, comprising eleven miles, have been opened to regular traffic.

THE Under-Secretaryship for Foreign Affairs has gone neither to Mr. Maclean nor to Mr. Curzon, but to Mr. James William Lowther, member for Penrith.

RUMOUR is revived that the Duke of Connaught succeeds Sir Frederick Roberts as Commander-in-Chief of India.

RAJA Rajendra Narain Roy of Bhowal, in the Dacca District, has been the foremost to come forward with a permanent memorial to the memory of the late Pandit Eswara Chandra Vidyasagar. He has founded a scholarship of Rs. 10 per month, tenable by any boy who passes the Entrance examination from the Dacca Collegiate School, stands high in Sanskrit, and is considered otherwise a deserving youth by the Principal of the College. The scholarship is to be continued to the same boy in his career up to the Master of Arts class of the College, unless he sooner forfeits it by failure in the University examination or by earning any other scholarship under the rules of the institution.

The Raja's intelligent public spirit is exemplary. While others are holding meetings and delivering orations in praise of the lamented Vidyasagar, and organising committees to collect money for perpetuating his memory, he has already done the thing—in some measure at any rate. Nor does he belong to the class of those whose conduct belies their tongues—men who, while lavish of admiration of the reformer, are ready to oppose tooth and nail the most moderate reform on strictly Hindu lines. It will be remembered that the pure Brahman Raja of Bhowal was the only great landholder in Bengal Proper who from the first supported the Consent Bill.

Is the Bengal Provincial Railway Company at last a fait accompli? Advertisements are appearing in the daily papers inviting applications for appointments to be made by the company in November next in its engineering and office establishments. We are not, however, in the secret as to how, when or through what channel the promoters have got the necessary sanction of Government. Supposing that they have got, or are likely before long to get, such sanction, we can not yet appreciate the value of their enterprise. Their ambition is no doubt laudable. But India is not America, and a country in which the capitalists of Europe, with their practical instinct, do not venture to invest a penny in railways without Government guarantee, is certainly not the field for the enterprise of our would-be Vanderbilts and Jay Goulds. The British Sahookar hesitates not in the least in financing our tea-gardens, our sugar mills, jute mills and gold mines. But when an Indian railway is in question, he never opens his purse without binding the Government to assure him reasonable profit. Considering all these circumstances, we fear that the public have not much reason to be over sanguine as to the success of a poor narrow gauge line of 30 miles between points already served by the East Indian Railway.

OUR belief is that we may safely leave the construction of our rail roads in the hands of our rulers. They have given us more than sixteen thousand miles of railway within the last thirty-five years, and the routes traversable by the iron horse are being extended by them every year. By the side of these vast lines, the Tarkeswar-Mugra line will, we fear, be in the position of the French Settlement of Chandernagore in the midst of the British Empire—not a source of glory but an evidence conspicuous of our want of resource and enterprise.

THE foundation stone of the Bengal Spinning and Weaving Company's mill buildings was laid at Mahesh on the 24th September, by Raja Janaki Bullav Sen, of Rungpore. We sincerely congratulate the Raja and his fellow directors on the Board of the Company for its successful floating. We hope that, under the stewardship of its Managing Agents Messrs. Visram Ebrahim and Co., it will prove a paying concern to the shareholders and a boon to the country.

MRS. Alice Hayes contributes to the last Indian Planter's Gazette, by way of commencing a series of "Anglo-Indian Celebrities at Home," a delightful gossiping sketch of dear old "Monty" Turnbull and his far from old helpmeet and worthy mate to match. For, always unmanly as it is to pry into the dearest dead secret of woman, it were simply impertinence to talk of the age of a lady whose slim figure daily cantered extensively on the downs on her favorite "Cuckoo." Colonel, now General, Turnbull is of the grand old type of Britons now almost extinct in this country, and fast disappearing even in the Anglo-Indian settlements at Home. He always remembered what he owed to the people among whom his lot was cast. As for hating natives, he knew not what hating was, beyond a generous indignation at, and contempt for, baseness. He was kind to all. And he had the true Oriental magnanimity of soul which wonderfully affects the natives and which attached them, life and property—to speak like an Oriental—to their loved idol.

General Turnbull was the Prince of Sportsmen in India in the olden days, when gentlemen took to horse-racing for mere sport. He kept a fine stud and owned many of the most famous races, one of his latest favorites having been Hermit.

The worthy couple now live a happy life in the old country at their well-known and hospitable house, the Hermitage, at Southwick, a pretty village, a few miles from Brighton. That can scarcely be called a retreat, where so much good company gathers. It is, nevertheless, a true hermitage—the resort of many pilgrims.

MRS. Hayes' paper is enriched with some capital anecdotes. One of the best shows up the snobbery of a popular writer—the high priest of the English school of Realism of the day.

"While some people at the Hermitage were talking of India, Mr. George Moore, who was present, said: 'A cousin of mine, Lord Ulick Browne, was for many years there.' 'Oh, do you know Lord Ulick? He is coming here to stay in a few days. You must come and dine here when he arrives,' said the hostess. Needless to add that when the illustrious relative arrived, the novelist was non est, nor could Lord Ulick at all remember being related in any way to the 'English Zola.'"

O for a Thackeray to dish A Drama in Muslin, and its author into the bargain, in another "Novel by an Eminent Hand!"

MRS. Hayes relates an interesting reminiscence of the late Lord Mayo which is deeply instructive.

"After 'Hermit' was sold to the Rajah of Puttialla, Lord Mayo, who was then in the Punjab, knowing Mrs. Turnbull's love for horses, thought she would like of all things to see her favourite, so took 'Hermit' down with him to Calcutta. When he arrived and Mrs. Turnbull heard the dear old horse neighing outside the verandah, she fled upstairs and ordered him to be sent back; for having once bidden a sad farewell to him she could not bear to see him again, so Lord Mayo's prepared surprise for her was not such a pleasant one as he had hoped it would be."

That is an affecting record, showing how the frank, but on the whole gross, humanity of the Irish nobleman failed to appreciate the finer sensibility of woman in an apparently horsey lady.

ADVERTISEMENTS by shopkeepers and others, in various shapes and of various qualities, have fearfully increased throughout the civilized world! Not only are exaggerations adopted to raise up certain articles in public estimation above others of the same class and quality, not only is flowery prose used in preference to simple language, but even poetry is resorted to to lend charm to various wares. Types of all descriptions and of all sizes—big, small, middling, Roman, Italic, ornamental, manuscript shaped, slanting, upside down, &c., &c., are employed to attract attention. And these notices in typographic variety not only appear in the newspapers at various prominent places, inside books, on the covers of books, on the street walls, at Railway stations, but also in handbills left at houses, offered to passers in the street or shot into carriages, or they are simply carried about by fantastically dressed lads on their persons or stuck up on their various shaped hats. They may not only be seen in the Tram cars, but they have their own special vehicles, of all sorts of curious makes in which they deliberately take their airing. They are ubiquitous. No expenditure is grudged by tradesmen to have their precious wares brought prominently to the notice of the public. All this is not enough, and so it has for some time become the fashion to publish, with their advertisements, pictures of their articles with those of handsome young female athletes, unquestionable Peries, lovely boys, fashionable Padries, noted actresses and so forth, the chief object invariably being to attract the attention of the public.

All this is very fair, and the very large expenditure ungrudgingly incurred for these advertisements shows that the advertisers have benefited by means of these advertisements in a much greater degree than if they had not spent so much in this direction.

But it has for some time struck us that the advertisers of "Pear's Soap," who are perhaps the largest speculators in this line at the present time, have, day after day and month after month, adopted a curious method of advertisement. Not satisfied with publishing the excellence of their manufacture and its superiority over all others, supported by the written testimonials of some of the most famous ladies and gentlemen of the day, they have been publishing two pictures of a little child, one struggling in a small bathing tub, with a ball of Pear's soap lying outside—with the legend "He won't be Happy till he gets it," and the other sitting in the same bathing tub with the ball of Pear's soap in his hand—with the words "He's got it! he is Happy now." Of course, the advertiser wishes to prove the excellence of his article by these illustrations. But the question is—Does the child's unhappiness in not getting the ball of soap, or his happiness after getting it, really prove the boy's appreciation of the excellence of the soap, or his looking upon the article as a mere toy, which might have been made either of wood or clay or anything else, and been equally attractive to the tiny admirer? We cannot understand how such a palpable fallacy has not been seen by the advertiser. We only hope that the modern art of advertising may not degenerate into an absurdity.

ANGLO-INDIAN writers have concluded that the people of India are devoid of the faculty of wit and humour. Our contemporary of the Bengal Times too, who ought to have known better, joined the Griffs in their inappreciation of Indian vivacity. From a paragraph in the Lahore Tribune of the 19th September, apparently taken from a journal of the Eastern Delta, we see native wit assert itself at the expense of the critic who ignored it. It seems that the Editor of the Bengal Times had related in his columns some encounter that he had with the rascals who still disgrace Dacca city, even after Mr. Rampin's steady efforts to clear it of their baleful presence and influence. We hope it was only by way of an independent "spree," or a game of acquisition, of the rascals that they fell upon the quiet literary man. The morals of the place are low enough. Dacca gentlemen—God save the mark!—are given to employ these ruffians to gratify their private revenge on one another. We trust that no dastardly conspiracy was at the bottom of the attempt to stop an English gentleman who could have given offence only in the fearless discharge of his duties as a journalist. This was the incident to which the native writer gave an imaginative rendering in the following paragraph which we reproduce at second hand from the Panjab paper:—

"An Anglo-Indian Editor.—Mr. Kemp, Editor of the Bengal Times was known as one of the best fighters in Dacca. The gundas of the place, however, were not prepared to give him the palm so easily and resolved to teach him a lesson. So they sought their opportunity, and one night, encountered Mr. Kemp on a public road, when he was alone. They were all armed with lathies, and no sooner they saw him, they fell upon Mr. Kemp. The strongest of the gundas gave the first blow with his lathie on Mr. Kemp's head. But lo, what was the effect! The lathie broke in the middle, but the head escaped unhurt and Mr. Kemp stood like a massive mountain. Frightened with what they saw the gundas fled in all directions. Mr. Kemp then came home unconcerned and no body knew of it till he related the story."

That is too bad. It is "chaff" of course, but the less of that kind of fun the better. We ourselves are no exemplars of peace at any price or dealers in sherbet. But nothing but extreme cases can justify such treatment of a brother writer.

THE European outburst on the last Bengal Resolution on the income tax operation, is but an evidence of the extreme abhorrence with which the tax is regarded. The natural generalizations of Mr. Risley on the incomes of certain professions gave a handle to the Chamber of Commerce and the Trades' Association to make demonstration against the hated impost. The daily press commenced the agitation. The Trades' Association followed up with a strong protest in the shape of a letter from the Secretary Mr. E. Hickie, to the Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal. In that representation the Association remarked that "the Resolution while professing to review the administration of a Department of the State, worked professedly in terms of the strictest privacy, per-ceeds by the enumeration of the details of a confidential nature, to the commission of what may be justly considered a breach of confidence, which has startled the public, and has given cause for considerable irritation and annoyance." The letter moreover asks his Honor "whether there is any warrant for the serious reflections which are contained in paragraph 5 on the honesty of the mercantile classes. Those classes are charged with combating the tax by the preparation of fictitious accounts, while the secrecy observed by them in their business affairs (and not less strictly it is presumed by Governments themselves), is characterized as a 'peculiarity' which is to be regarded with suspicion in dealing with their books."

That letter was capped by a deputation from the Bengal Chamber of Commerce—consisting of the president the Hon'ble J. L. Mackay and a member Mr. H. N. T. Becker—who waited on the Lieutenant Governor at Darjeeling, and elicited from him the following reply. Sir Charles Elliott explained that he has for Secretary a prig who professes ethnology but who, though a promising youth, does not yet know how to write. His Honor then withdrew the remarks objected to as not applying to the objectors and promised not to offend them again:—

"In reply to the deputation, the Lieutenant-Governor admitted that the sentences objected to in paragraph 5 were badly worded, and did not express the real intention of Government. In the first place, it had not occurred to him that the Collector's remarks could be held to apply to the practice of such large firms as are represented by the Chamber of Commerce and the Trades' Association, who keep their books in the regular mercantile form; and he is still satisfied that there was no such intention on the part of the Collector. In the second place, he wished to convey that he did not absolutely accept the apprehension expressed in the paragraph, even as regards small firms or traders who do not come under the above description, but considered the matter of importance, and desired that further enquiries should be made and further report submitted next year. It is clear that, in the press of official work, the language used did not accurately convey these intentions, and that sufficient care was not taken to make clear the limitations which were intended to govern the statement as to the conduct and habits of the mercantile classes. He requested the deputation to accept his assurance, and to convey it to the Chamber of Commerce, that his observations were not meant to apply to the body represented by them or by the Trades' Association, or in fact to any firms which have been in the habit of keeping regular books, and that it was only because they were altogether outside his thoughts at the time of writing that he did not expressly exclude them from the application of those remarks.

With regard to the comments made in the Resolution upon the earnings of certain classes of people, the Lieutenant-Governor pointed out to the deputation that they are based solely upon the figures contained in Statement V appended to the Report, which has all along been supplied to the Press and to Public Associations. Similar statements have been published year by year since the enactment of Act II of 1886. They have been prescribed by the Government of India, and are required for administrative purposes. As it now appears that objections are felt to publishing or commenting on the figures contained in the statement, owing to the fact which the Lieutenant-Governor regretted that he was not aware of, that in a comparatively limited community like that of the mercantile and professional classes in Calcutta, it might be possible to identify conjecturally a considerable number of the persons referred to, the Lieutenant-Governor has proposed to the Government of India that Statement V shall in future be treated as confidential. His Honor expressed a hope that the course which it was proposed to adopt would remove all cause for complaint."

LORD Lansdowne gives the Bombay Government a gentle snub for their presumption to ape royalty. That Government objected to the withdrawal of ex-officio honorary titles for members of District and Taluka Local Boards and Municipal Commissioners. Mr. Chief Secretary T. D. Mackenzie of the Local Government writes:—

"In reply, I am to state that His Excellency the Governor in Council is not in favour of doing away with these titles now that they have been once bestowed; but if this Government is directed to discontinue the grant thereof, the orders of the Government of India will be obeyed; otherwise it would, the Governor in Council considers, be wiser to retain what has now become customary. In any case it would be desirable, if the ex-officio honorary titles are to be abolished, that this Government should retain the power of granting these distinctions for exceptional zeal and merit on the part of Presidents and Members in municipal work. It seems almost indispensable that Government should retain and use some weapon of influence to get the Municipal Commissioners over the obstructions raised by ignorance and selfishness to any measure of improvement which involves municipal taxation in order to avert the danger of the Municipal Corporations degenerating still further."

While not objecting to "Presidents and Vice-Presidents of Municipal and Local Committees continuing to enjoy titles as an official distinction if the Government of Bombay desire so to order,"—for "these offices are not so numerous; they entail on the holder considerable trouble and responsibility and appointment to them, whether by election or nomination, is still a distinction"—the Government of India reply—"His Excellency the Viceroy, while from the nature of the case unable to delegate to the Bombay Government the power to confer titles (a power which rests only in the Governor-General as the representative of Her Majesty the Queen-Empress) for exceptional zeal and merit in municipal work, will always be prepared to give favorable consideration to any recommendation which a Local Government may see fit to make in favor of individuals for the conferment of a honorific title as a personal distinction in recognition of good work done in municipal or local administration."

Lord Lansdowne tries to be as little uncourteous as possible under the indignation offered to his Queen and mistress. He minimizes his indignation within a parenthesis, and assures all possible compliance with the wishes of the Local Government in the matter of honorary titles. Lord Dalhousie as Governor-General of India regretted that he had no power to reward Cautley, the Engineer of the Ganges Canal, with any decoration, for that was the sole prerogative of the Queen as the fountainhead of all honor. For that aspiration, as the late Hurris Chunder Mookerjee pointed out, the great Proconsul would, in earlier British times, have forfeited his neck.

THE Morning Post having announced, that the soldier who killed the native near Mhow has gone mad, owing to the treatment he received at the hands of the brutal population, the Advocate pertinently remarks:—

"This is not the first time nor the second we believe that a European's reason has been extinguished after murdering a native. It has almost become a standing rule, especially in cases where the 'accident' plea can not be sent up. Instances might be multiplied to show that such is the fact."

Our Lucknow contemporary then proceeds to give instances. One is the case of Mr. Maltby of Vizigapatam.

"In 1879, on Christmas day—the day on which the Lord Jesus was born, the day of universal joy of Christians, a Christian Magistrate, Mr. Maltby by name was proceeding to his headquarters at Vizigapatam. To expedite his journey he had asked a Munsiff and a Maistry to keep palki bearers in readiness for him on the way. For some reason or other they had failed to execute the order. Mr. Maltby arrived and—found no bearers. Could there be any more grievous crime? His hot Briton blood was up at an instant; and he shot down the two natives. Of course, this was natural enough. But then the rabid Native Press would not take it that way, they would persist in asking for justice. What could now poor Mr. Maltby do but to get mad? He began to have fancies, fancies of no ordinary nature, mind, he came to fancy that the two notorious dacoits Rampa and Chundria were about to kill him! Poor man he had come across seas and oceans to a distant land where heathens surrounded him, and it was no doubt the duty of the paternal Government to take care of him. He was sent to a Lunatic Asylum where he was fed and clothed and supported in luxury; a European Civil Surgeon visited him daily and often dined with him. Thus he passed days and at last his passage was taken by the Government and he was landed on the coasts of England. The moment he arrived there, the foggy climate produced a good effect. Mr. Maltby recovered but proceeded to sue the Government for damages!"

And now for an example of easy madness from the Bombay Presidency.

"Martin Dawayer, a soldier stationed at Satara, murdered a woman in the year 1883. He was arrested, oh horror! and imprisoned in a cell pending his trial. There like Mr. Maltby, he was troubled with fancies. There was only this difference, while Maltby was threatened by dacoits, Dawayer saw a woman hovering round him. He was placed on his trial before the High Court and there acted to perfection the part of a maniac. He sang and screamed so frightfully as to interrupt the proceedings. Five eminent doctors of Bombay, however, declared on solemn oath that he was feigning madness. The jurors who sat in judgment upon him belonged to the same race and came of the same country. They, however, pronounced a verdict of not guilty. Dawayer was released and sent home like the Vizigapatam Magistrate at the expense of the Indian rayyet who starves half the year through with its family and children. It is said that on his arrival in England Dawayer regained the equilibrium of his mind."

In the Imperial diamond case, the High Court has set aside the judgment of the Chief Magistrate who had declined to order the deposit in Court of the ten ten-thousand rupee notes made over by Jacob to his attorney, Mr. Burder. The Judges are of opinion that the notes are connected with the subject matter of the charge and the Magistrate was entitled and bound to compel their production. As regards Mr. Burder's objection that he had a lien on five of the notes, that is no sufficient reason for their non-production. That is a matter to be subsequently dealt with under section 517 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Mr. Burder must therefore produce the five notes admitted to be in his possession. The proceeds of the other five notes cashed at the Currency Office, must also be treated in the same way, and it is left to the Magistrate to order their deposit in Court, if they can be reasonably connected with the subject matter of the charge.

On Monday, Mr. Handléy issued a Commission on the First Assistant Resident, Hyderabad, to examine the Resident Sir Dennis Fitzpatrick. The Commission to examine the Nazim has reached Hyderabad.

The Manager of the Simla Alliance Bank has already been examined by commission.

SIR MONIER WILLIAMS ON THE HINDU RELIGION.

SIR Monier Williams is a Sanskritist whose name is too well known to require any introduction. He has recently delivered a lecture on our national religion for which we ought to be grateful to him, though we may not be able to accept as well grounded all the compliments that he has paid to it. He observes:—

"Hindooism is founded on a very subtle system of Pantheistic philosophy excogitated long ago by the Brahmins. A system which the human intellect most naturally thinks out for itself, a system which is, in some respects, almost identical with that thought out by Spinoza and the profoundest thinkers of modern Europe. Indeed, if you will pardon the anachronism, the Hindoos were Spinozites more than 2,000 years before the existence of Spinoza; and Darwinians, many centuries before Darwin; and Evolutionists, many centuries before the doctrine of evolution had been accepted by the Huxleys of our time, and before any word like Evolution existed in any language of the world."

This surpasses even the sort of stuff with which stumblers of a well-known type have, of late, found it profitable to flatter the national vanity of their half-educated co-religionists. To give our Rishis the credit which is due to Darwin and Huxley, borders on bathos. Such overcolouring may, to a certain extent, be inevitable in a popular lecture. In all probability, the compliments are meant to be taken cum grano salis, as in interpreting the language of social courtesy. But the risk of the exaggeration being taken as sober truths, is such that we almost feel inclined to repeat the admonition of Cromwell to his painter.

Sir Monier gives a graphic account of what may be called the evolution of the Hindoo pantheon. Upon the whole, we think, his lecture will enable his countrymen to appreciate our religion better than they seem to do. It is the ignorance of Europeans generally, regarding the true character of our national creed, which makes them talk disparagingly of it, and leads to the enormous waste of British energy and resource involved in fantastic forms of Missionary enterprises like the Salvation Army, for leading us to light.

Since more than a century, India has been brought into the closest relationship with England, and yet even the most cultured Englishmen—whether at home or here—can not claim to have more than a superficial knowledge of the details of our private life. The official career of those employed in ruling the country, especially of those employed in the administration of Justice, makes them familiar with the worst characters of our society; and they are apt to conclude that the witnesses who daily perjure themselves in the courts of law and the subordinate police officers who get up false cases, are typical Hindoos and Mahomedans. As a matter of fact, the professional perjurers even in the larger towns may be counted on one's fingers, and they are able to ply their trade with success, simply because our courts are generally presided over by foreigners. Before Judges and Panchaïts well acquainted with the people and untrammelled by hard and fast rules of evidence, the hired witness would be simply laughed out of court. The machinery of the British judiciary renders it an extremely risky business for an honest and truthful man to appear in the witness box in a court of law. The more truthful a witness is, the greater is his chance of being browbeaten and insulted. Thus, under British rule, the practised perjurer has become a necessity to the country. But the class is treated by Hindoo society as outcastes and beyond the reach of divine mercy. In fact, the general belief among the people is, that the perjurer has inevitably to end his days in domestic misery—in sad bereavements, and loathsome diseases. The superstition may not be well grounded, but it may be taken as clear indication of Hindoo feeling of aversion towards perjury.

But how few are there among our rulers who have any idea of our thoughts and feelings on the subject? The ignorance which some of them betray now and then, is simply ludicrous. An Anglo-Indian gentleman of the old type, who plumed himself upon his knowledge of the country, defined a Hindoo as a person who does not eat beef, and a Mahomedan as a person who does not eat pork. The spread of English education amongst us and the possibility of free interchange of ideas between our rulers and ourselves, has not improved matters to any appreciable extent. We believe a member of the Bengal Civil Service is still living who, in speaking of the wife of a well-known native Civil Surgeon, expressed his opinion that she was an orthodox Hindoo because, in dining with him, she refused to eat beef and ate only fowl-curry.

In lecturing on Hindoo religion, Sir Monier does not appear to have made any reference to its most important side, viz., that which purports to regulate our life in every department. For practical purposes, a Hindoo has not much concern with his host of gods and goddesses, except when he wants a blessing from them, as, for instance, a mail child, a Government appointment, or success in trade, lawsuit or University examination. There are few even among the orthodox, who regularly worship all the deities that have a place in the Hindoo pantheon. Of the three principal gods, whose account has been given in Sir Monier William's lecture under notice, the worship of Brahma is more honored in the breach than in the observance. Brahma, according to our cosmogony, is our creator, and human nature can not be expected to belie itself by paying, for the sake of gratitude only, its homage to a god who is functus officio. Vishnu being our preserver, and Siva being the god of destruction, they both have a decent following. It is, however, to be observed that the majority of the incarnations of Vishnu receive not the least attention from his followers.

Whatever measure of honour the Hindoos may pay to their gods, it is not absolutely incumbent on them to worship any or all of them. A Hindoo does not forfeit his claim to the name by not repeating, every morning and evening, the names of his gods accompanying the process with the counting of beads. But the man who eats forbidden food or marries in a different caste, or mixes with a member of a lower caste, is regarded as altogether beyond the pale of Hindooism. A Hindoo may not visit Kalighat or any other shrine during his life, yet he would be regarded as an orthodox member of the community provided he observed all the formalities prescribed by his Shastras. A man who would indulge in forbidden food and drink, or associate with a lower caste, would be regarded as worse than an outcaste, though he might be regular in saying his prayers and in paying his homage to all his gods and goddesses. This characteristic of our national faith, is its chief distinguishing feature, but its importance is hardly appreciated even by those among our countrymen who are now loud in their talk about the glory of the Arya religion.

MR. COTTON AND HIS CRITICS.

THE author of "New India" is not only a sound thinker but has also the courage of his conviction. In an article contributed to the Journal of the East India Association, Mr. Cotton has mercilessly exposed the hollowness of the notion that in the development of agriculture lies the cure of all Indian ills. He boldly confesses the truth that the official attempts hitherto made to improve our agriculture, has not been productive of any good whatever. He avows plainly that he has no faith whatever in model farms and agricultural bureaus. His views are being severely criticised by some of our contemporaries. But what we have yet seen of such criticism, does not in the least degree shake the grounds on which his conclusions rest.

In an article entitled "The Fuss about Scientific Agriculture," which appeared in these columns some years ago, our views on the subject were thus given :

"Scientific agriculture is, no doubt, a good ideal. But at present it is practically unattainable; and the talk about it is either insincere or is based upon an ignorance of even the elementary principles of this economical science. The backwardness of India's agriculture is the result of her political condition. Model farms, machine ploughs, agricultural exhibitions, and Cirencester scholars, have done no good up to this time, and, so far as we can see, they will never do much in the present state of things."

"The productive power of land in India might certainly be increased by draining marshes, by destroying wild animals, by encouraging plantations, by utilization of manures, and by artificial irrigation. But industry is necessarily limited by capital, and money is not quite so cheap in India that the few capitalists of the country can be expected to invest their little savings in manures and scientific farming."

"It may be said that the backwardness of our agriculture is due to the rayyet's ignorance of science, and to the Zemindar's indifference towards his proper duties. But the fact is that the poverty of the rayyet and his unscientific agriculture are due to one and the same cause, namely, the drain of Home charges and the Foreign commerce which is considered as the chief blessing of British rule. Paradoxical though it may seem at first sight, yet nothing can be clearer than that agriculture can never flourish without a town population. With large manufacturing centres in all parts of the country, there would be a demand for those kinds of produce which alone can make agriculture and cattle-breeding profitable."

These views are founded on Mr. Wakefield's theory of colonization, which is at present accepted as one of the axiomatic truths of economical science. The late Mr. J. S. Mill, in his treatise on Political Economy, made the following observations with regard to the value and nature of the doctrine :

"It is one of those great practical discoveries, which, once made, appear so obvious that the merit of making them seems less than it is. Mr. Wakefield was the first to point out that the mode of planting new settlements, then commonly practised—setting down a number of families side by side, each on its piece of land, all employing themselves in exactly the same manner,—though in favourable circumstances it may assure to those families a rude abundance of mere necessities, can never be other than unfavourable to great production or rapid growth; and his system consists of arrangements for securing that every colony shall have from the first a town population, bearing due proportion to its agricultural, and that the cultivators of the soil shall not be so widely scattered as to be deprived by distance, of the benefit of that town population as a market for their produce."

From these principles, Mr. Mill draws the conclusion that the productiveness of agriculture in India is limited by the deficiency of her town population.

Mr. Cotton's views are just the same. He says:—

"The real wealth of countries now depends not so much on the extent of their rural cultivation as on the prosperity of their urban populations. The tendency in India is for the urban populations to diminish and for the agricultural population to increase, and this is contrary to the tendency of prosperous countries."

In conclusion, Mr. Cotton observes that if the rayyets of India, under the stimulus put upon them by English trade, are able to make two blades grow, where one blade grew before, they will certainly reap the benefit; he urges, however, that they will not be able to do so until they are wealthier and more prosperous than they are at present; and of this augmentation in prosperity there is, he insists, no chance so long as local manufacturing industries are in a dying condition.

It seems that there is a little confusion of ideas in the concluding passages of Mr. Cotton's article under notice. The rayyet's want of capital is not the main cause of the backwardness of our agriculture. Had scientific farming been profitable in our country, the capital required might have been forthcoming—to some extent at least. But the fact is, that the cultivation of the staples for export can never be very lucrative except perhaps under a system of large farming in virgin soil like that of America. The tendency of profits is towards minimum, wherever there is room for competition. It is only by the cultivation of those vegetables which, on account of their perishable nature, command a monopoly price in the neighbourhood of towns, that the tillers of the soil can make large profits. But as, with the decay of our ancient industries, the market for fruits, kitchen vegetables, &c., is diminishing in extent, we cannot expect our agriculture to flourish, until, by the expansion of our manufacturing industries, we have a larger town population than we have at present.

THE LATEST HACKNEY-CARRIAGE LEGISLATION.

THE new Hackney-carriage and Palanquin law for Calcutta, passed by the Bengal Legislative Council, received the assent of his Honor on the 9th August, and that of His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor-General on the 11th September, and is first published as Act II (B. C.) of 1891 in the Calcutta Gazette of September 23, 1891, and came into operation from that day, as provided in the Act. The fare for the first class carriage by distance is 8 annas for every one mile or part of a mile, and 6 annas for every other or part of a mile; by time, one rupee for the first hour and 8 annas for every other hour, five rupees for 9 hours and again 8 annas for every subsequent hour or part of an hour. For the second class, 6 annas and 4 annas by distance; and by time, 12 annas, 6 annas, 2 rupees, 3 rupees and 8 annas, and 6 annas. For the third class, 3 annas and 2 annas by distance; by time, 6 annas for the first hour, 4 annas for the second or third hour, and 3 annas for every hour beyond, being 2 rupees for a whole day of nine hours, and 3 annas for every additional hour or part of an hour. There is an immediate rise in the rates of the second and third classes, though we are not aware of any convenience granted for the increase. The day after the law came into force, the Municipal Commissioners, having the charge of its working, passed some byelaws under the Act which must be confirmed by the Local Government before they have any force. The confirmation may not be gazetted for some time. And then the owners of these carriages must have reasonable time to comply with the byelaws. The law enacts that fares are to be paid by time, unless at the commencement the hirer express his intention of paying by distance. In the case of a second class carriage, the hirer cannot avail himself of the half day, or whole day, rate unless he shall have engaged the conveyance for the half day or whole day, as the case may be. This provision in the schedule, not in the body of the Act, means that, unless the carriage be engaged beforehand for the half day or the full day, the hire payable for the five hours is Rs. 2-4 and for 9 hours Rs. 3-12, that is, the owner or driver will be entitled to claim 6 annas for every hour or part of an hour, beyond the first hour. This will be felt as a hardship and an inconvenience by the public. And it is a gratuitous wrong. The new law repeals the old law and changes the registration month from April to October, while preserving the registrations made under the old law. Carriages and palanquins registered under the old law, are entitled to ply for hire under the old license, making the new law a dead letter to the end of the present official year, thus defeating the object of the change—decent turns out for our cold weather visitors. The publication of the law authorizes owners and drivers of carriages to exact the increased fare, while they are not bound to conform to the provisions of the new law so far as their old license can protect them, and so long as the requirements of the new byelaws await confirmation. If it were necessary to initiate the public into the changes in the law, by early Gazetting, the assent of the Viceroy might have been kept back from the public till the proper time, or the exact date of enforcement provided for in the body of the Act itself.

In distance rates, the law allows an additional one-fourth fare for the first hour for every fifteen minutes that the driver shall have been required to stop the carriage. There is, however, no reduction in time rates for mere detention. The fare is the same for rest as for motion. In the present enhanced rates, such an allowance in favor of the fare was reasonable.

The Select Committee on the Bill succeeded in making the law unnecessarily harsh on the hirer. A rather awkward mischief was rectified at the final consideration. We quote from the proceedings in Council. The discussion was wholly ignored in the morning papers:

The Hon'ble the President said:—"In section 42 a new provision has been adopted taken from the Madras Act III of 1879, under which, if a dispute arises between the hirer and the driver, the hirer may require the driver, or the driver may require the hirer, to proceed forthwith to the nearest Magistrate's Court, and the then sitting Magistrate shall hear and determine the suit in a summary way. The addition to the existing law is contained in the words 'and the driver may require the hirer' to go to the Magistrate's Court and settle the question offhand. I think the hon'ble members must admit on consideration that very great inconvenience may result to the hirer from this innovation. My hon'ble friend Dr. Rash Behary Ghosh, for instance, may be proceeding to the High Court, and if in case of a dispute arising between him and the driver he can be forthwith taken before a Magistrate, he may be put to great inconvenience, and his client, perhaps, may lose his case for want of the valuable services of his advocate; or a gentleman may be on his way to a railway station and may miss his train; and, lastly, there is the strongest case of all, the case put by a memorial presented by my friend Nawab Abdool Luteef of a purdah nashin lady whose appearance in court would be impossible. I therefore propose that these words which have been imported from the Madras Act be omitted, and that we should fall back on the terms of the original Act with one slight exception to provide for cases in which the Magistrate being engaged in some important case is not able to hear and determine the dispute, or when no Magistrate may be sitting at the time. The section which I propose to substitute for section 42 of the Bill will run thus:—

'In case of any dispute arising between the hirer and the driver of any registered hackney-carriage, the hirer may, if any Magistrate be then sitting, require the driver to drive to the Court of such Magistrate, or, if no Magistrate be then sitting, to the Registering Officer; and if any driver shall refuse to obey such requisition, it shall be lawful for the hirer to give such driver into the custody of the nearest police officer; such police officer shall thereupon take the driver and the hirer, together with the carriage and horse, to such Court or Registering Officer, and the then sitting Magistrate or Registering Officer shall, in either of the cases aforesaid, hear and determine the dispute in a summary way.'

The Hon'ble Dr. Rash Behary Ghosh said:—"I have much pleasure in seconding this amendment. I pointed out to my colleagues in the Select Committee that this provision was liable to be abused by the drivers of hackney-carriages. In the case put by Nawab Abdool Luteef, the abuse would be very great. But I yielded rather too readily perhaps to the suggestion of my colleagues that the section would practically be a dead letter, and that a corresponding provision was to be found not only in the Madras Act, which had led to no harm, but, if I am not mistaken, in the English Act also. I am glad that this amendment has now been moved."

"The Section was put and agreed to."

So we have narrowly escaped an ugly situation. It is a relief to know that Jehu is not privileged to play pranks with his fare ending with driving him to—the Police.

The byelaws framed (under Sec. 53) by the Byelaws Committee of the Calcutta Corporation, which were considered and passed by the Commissioners at their meeting last week, bear the same evidence of haste and want of consideration as is observable in the Act itself. Infringement of any byelaw under the Hackney Carriage Act, after publication in the Calcutta Gazette with the confirmation of the Local Government, is punishable with a fine not exceeding twenty rupees (Section 54), nor is it a continuing offence, as is the omission to register any hackney-carriage or palanquin or to take out a license, (Section 56). The byelaws provide that only under certain conditions will licenses be granted. They also enjoin on drivers strict observance of the provisions of certain sections of the Municipal Act. Supposing a license of any carriage is found not to comply with any of the provisions under which the license was issuable, who will be visited with the penalty of section 54—the registering officer or the municipality? The owner or driver of the conveyance can not be made answerable afterwards for any thing existing at the granting of the license. The byelaws are open to other objections. In the very act of enforcing them, the Commissioners detract from the weight of the provisions of the Municipal Act. The Commissioners by their byelaws take upon themselves to reduce the penalty provided in the Municipal Act for disobedience of the provisions of secs. 329 and 331 of Act II (B. C.) of 1888, for, while the penalty for breach of those sections is Rs. 50, the punishment for infringement of the byelaw is only a fine of Rs. 20 at most. Take it from another point of view. To make those sections a part of the byelaws, is further objectionable, in that it makes their infringement doubly punishable—punishable as a breach of a byelaw under Act II (B. C.) of 1891, and punishable as a breach of certain sections of Act II (B. C.) of 1888. For the same act or omission, a man is liable to a fine of Rs. 20+Rs. 50. Every driver, we see, of a first and second class carriage is required to wear a uniform and the syce to be decently clad. Here is a good aspiration made law. We are afraid it stands some chance of proving a dead letter. Who is to be punished for breach of this byelaw—the driver and the syce or the registered owner?

The law (section 11) empowers the Registering Officer to suspend or cancel the registration of any carriage and the license granted to the driver, whenever it shall appear to him that such carriage or any horse or harness used with such carriage is unfit for public use; yet a byelaw says that the harness must be of good description and strong, and no chain or rope traces unless they be covered with leather and no stiring fastenings will be allowed. That virtually takes away the power given by the law to the Registering Officer for cancellation of the license, and reduces the penalty to the penalty of breach of the byelaws or only Rs. 20. A table or book signed by the Registering Officer is conclusive evidence of distances for payment of hire. But the byelaws propose to append a table of distances. That table will be of no use, under the law, in any case of dispute, unless it was signed by the Registering Officer and his signature proved. The Committee confound the functions of the Commissioners with those of the Registering Officer. In fine, they have made a mess of it.

DOORGA POOJA IN THE COUNTRY.

TO THE EDITOR, Reis and Rayyet.

SIR,—This time last year, you kindly published my letter giving an account of the celebration of the Pooja in the ancient aristocratic house of Maharaja Krishen Chundra Roy of Krishnaghur. I now ask a similar favor from you for a little space with a view to describe, as briefly as possible, how Mother Doorga is worshipped in my native district of Nuddea, as well as in other contiguous districts of Bengal. The "cloud-clapped" temples, the stately churches, the sombre-looking mosques are as much true indices of a nation's religious fervour and enthusiasm in the cause of its own religion, as the superbly-grand and spacious Pooja Halls of the Sakta worshippers, that are still to be found, some in their dilapidated state, and some in full repair, in the ancient district of Nuddea. During my recent peregrinations through Bengal and Behar where I was the guest, thanks to the sacred memory of the late lamented Kristodas Pal, of almost all the Zemindars of Bengal, I saw nowhere, either in East Bengal or in any other parts of Central Bengal, such magnificent Pooja Halls as are to be found in the Rajbati of Krishnaghur, in the dwelling-houses of the Brahman Zemindars of Santipur, of the house of Kristananda Roy, (I mean the mansions of the late Mutty Babu and his brother the late Babu Bhugwan Chunder Roy), in the barrack-like palatial buildings of the well-known Pal Chowdry family of Ranaghat, and in the secluded rural villa of Sibnibash of the late Babu Brindaban Chundra Sirkar. Comparison is no doubt odious, but I can not help comparing them with those of the metropolis, for the purpose of giving an adequate idea to your readers of the relative importance and value of these architectural buildings. Sir Raja Radhakant's Pooja Hall with its large quadrangle is, I believe, one of the largest of its kind in the much-vaunted city of Sonarbanias and Peer-Alis, but it looks like a pig sty when compared with the Pooja Hall of the Krishnaghur Raj. I saw the Pooja house of the Dighaputy Zemindar, in Rajshaye, as well as of Raja Rajendra Narain Roy Bahadur of Bhowal, in Dacca, but their dark, low and uncouth appearance then produced an uneasy sensation in my mind. The Muktagacha House is no better off than those of Rajshaye or of Bhowal. In short, the Pooja houses of the Dutt Family of Wellington Square, or of the Sen family of Colootolah, not to speak of other bigger buildings in this town, are far superior to those I have just mentioned. But let that pass.

I now come to consider the important question, How the Pooja is celebrated in thousands of aristocratic houses in Bengal. Impossible as it is for me to give a detailed description of the celebration of this great and unique autumnal Hindu festival in Bengal within the narrow compass of a short newspaper letter, I must remain content with specifying the names of the principal worshippers of the great Adya Sakti in the Lower Provinces of Bengal. In the district of Nuddea, the grandest Pooja is performed in the Krishnaghur Rajbati, of which I gave a full description in my letter of last year. In days gone by, when this ancient Raj Family was in the enjoyment of its full resources as well as power and prestige, dozens of high-class Brahmans of great learning used to sit together before Mother Doorga for the purpose of chanting the Chandi, part of the Markandeya Purana, from dawn to twilight during the Pooja days. Huge sacrificial altars or the home kundu used to be kept up continually, consuming maunds of ghee (prepared from cow-milk). A hundred thousand billa patra (leaves of the Bel fruit) steeped in clarified butter would be cast into this sacrificial fire, every day, and Mother Doorga was worshipped with the same number of Jaba and of lotus flowers, by the highest Brahmans specially invited from Nabadwip. With the decadence of the affluence and prestige of this princely Brahmanic house, there has been, no doubt, a corresponding decline in the grandeur of this holy performance, but the house still maintains, even in its deteriorated state, its old reputation for worshipping Mother Doorga with all the scrupulousness and strict religious exactitude which we can expect in a Brahman's house alone. Compared with this Pooja, the Calcutta Babus, Rajas and Maharajas' Poojas are so many huge shams and mimicry only. Next in importance to the Pooja of the Krishnaghur Raj, are the Poojas of the noble ladies of Berhampore in the neighbouring district of Moorshedabad, I mean Her Highness the Maharane Surnomoyee, and Rani Arnakali Debi. From a monetary point of view, these Poojas, which are celebrated, I believe, at an annual cost of Rs. 10,000 each, if not more, must be considered as the highest celebrations in the land. These twin Hindu widows--the paragons and beau ideal of their sex--have another brace of competitors in the sacred field of worship--I mean, Rani Bindyabashini Chowdhurani and Janhavi Chowdhurani of Sontosh in Tangail. These two Barendra Brahman ladies vie with each other in celebrating the Pooja in right royal oriental style. In Rajshaye, the Brahman Rajas of Bolihar and Tahirpur, and the Soodra Rajas of Dighapatya and Dubulhati, perform their annual Poojas in their respective houses, in as befitting a manner as is conformable to their exalted positions in life. In point of hospitality, in urbanity, in the presentation of large money-grant to various classes of Brahmans and Bhats, the Barendra Zemindars of Muktagacha, the Lahuri and Acharjee Zemindars of Kalipur and Ramgopalpur, in the district of Mymensing, stand head and shoulders above all other Zemindars of Bengal in celebrating this great autumnal carnival of the Hindoos in Bengal. If any one were to attempt collecting statistics of the number of Poojas held in the Lower Provinces of Bengal, with full details of expenditure, on this festive occasion, he would render an invaluable service to the country. Taking the average cost of each Pooja at Rs. 1,000, and the number of such Poojas being, roughly calculating, more than a lac in the whole of Bengal, the total expenditure incurred by the Hindoos would come up to ten crores of rupees. And this vast sum is annually spent in feeding the poor, giving new dresses to neighbours and friends alike, and lastly in helping the needy Brahmans, silently carrying on the neglected profession of their noble race.

I now proceed to answer the question, Have the English educated natives ceased to celebrate the Pooja? The English educated natives, particularly of the middle class, who have acquired affluence and position in Hindu society, celebrate the Pooja, if from no other motive, at least to maintain their dignity and position in their respective spheres of life. Among such educated natives, I may mention the names of Babu Amritlal Chatterjee, the first and foremost man in the subordinate judicial service, who celebrates the Pooja in his house at Kona, in Howrah, every year, at an annual cost of Rs. 3,000. The Calcutta Collector Babu Doorgagati Banerjee is no insignificant personage whom I am proud to mention in this connection. In my own district, Babu Ram Chunder Mookerjee, the Government pleader, Babu Jodunath Chatterjee, another senior member of the local bar, may be added to the list of regular worshippers in Bengal. Having transgressed my prescribed space, I must cut short here, thinking it unnecessary to multiply names such as I have mentioned above.

Permit me to conclude this letter with two anecdotes as to the authority of which I entertain not the least doubt.

The first is in regard to the late Maharaja Satish Chundra Roy Bahadur of Krishnaghur (the father of the present Maharaja). One day, during the Pooja time, a servant named Patit Ghose, the chief valet of the Maharaja, went into the Tosha Khana and brought out several costly Benares Saris for the use of the Maharani. The valet had a mistress, and to please her as well as his own eyes, he presented the woman with one of these golden robes, purloining it from the Maharaja's stock. The giddy gowalini girl could not resist the temptation of coming to the Maharaja's house in her gala dress. The brilliancy of her garment at once attracted attention. Out of jealousy, the matter was brought by the other servants to the notice of the Maharaja. The valet was asked to speak the truth in the matter, and no sooner he confessed his guilt, than the royal mandate was given that the gold-worked silk sari should be the valet's for ever. Such magnanimity has now become rare among the aristocracy of the land.

The other anecdote concerns my poor self and the family in which I was born. While I was a young boy of fourteen years of age (and now I am nearly fifty), I went with my mother to my maternal grandfather's house where the Pooja was being celebrated with unusual éclat. My mother being the wife of a high caste Koolin Brahman, was asked by my maternal grandfather to prepare the bhog (cook the dinner for the goddess) for that day. She readily obeyed the command, went into the kitchen, and, with the assistance of other ladies, began to prepare it. It consisted of no less than four maunds of rice with proportionate quantities of vegetable curries, and the whole was to be ready by 3 o'clock in the day, so that four hundred Brahmans could be fed within half an hour's time. When my mother came to the kitchen, another female relation of mine happened to come there and began to assist her and the other ladies engaged in cooking for the goddess, by bringing in water or in handing over the spices required for the vegetable curries. While they were thus engaged, my maternal grandfather came to inspect what was being done, when the simple presence of that female relation in the sacred kitchen was considered to have polluted the entire preparations, because my grandfather suspected her to have been guilty, in early life, of an indiscretion derogatory to her character. She was immediately ordered to leave the room and the whole business of preparing the bhog had to be renewed. Such was the rigidity observed in olden times in these matters of cookery for the goddess.*

RAM GOPAL SANYAL.

Taltolla, Calcutta, September 30, 1891.

THE TRANS-SIBERIAN RAILWAY.

[Translated from the French for Reis and Rayyet.]

THE Nineteenth Century is emphatically the Century of Railways, and the line which its last decade will see, will be the grandest in the world. This is the great Trans-Siberian Railway, which will join Russia in Europe with the Pacific Ocean, across the Asiatic dominions of the Czar. Already, has the Emperor Alexander III. decided that the line should be taken in hand, and his eldest son, on his return from Japan, has inaugurated the works of the eastern section of it. The example of the Trans-Caspian Railway, achieved so promptly in a desert, leaves little doubt as to the promptitude with which the Russians will complete the work.

* The "rigidity" of which our correspondent speaks has by no means been relaxed, as he seems to fancy. It all depends upon family custom. Some families are, as they always have been, more strict than others. The conservators of religious purity and family usages are everywhere and in all ages the ladies, and it is only on the men that the disturbing influence of modern notions has worked. In our own humble home, the rules for preserving the purity of the divine breakfast and dinner are as strict as anywhere else and they are still maintained. These have to be prepared not only by ladies above suspicion but by the lady of the house herself, if possible, if not by ladies of the same sept. They are prepared in camera and so served --E.D. R. & R.

This is a work which is not wanting in interest for us. What renders Russia more powerful, more redoubtable, and more invulnerable, is a gain for France, for the power of the Czar is at present in the same scale as ours, which balances the other scale in which are placed Germany and her allies.

A line all Asiatic has not doubtless the same military advantages, in view of a great European war, as the lines which can transport armies to the Austrian or German frontiers. Siberia, despite its immense extent, is the least rich and the least peopled portion of the Empire. But it is also the least protected, at least on the east, and the gigantic work will have the advantage of sheltering it from an invasion from the side of China. It is a thing by no means indifferent to the Russians to guard themselves against all diversions.

As long as China remained une quantité négligeable, the Russian Establishments on the Amoor and on the coast of the Pacific, had nothing to fear from that inoffensive people. But this is no longer the case. The Chinese have organized and armed themselves. They have so colonized the neighbouring countries on the frontier that the Russian territories can be suddenly invaded and inundated by them, and the resistance will be almost impossible, for it will take some months to expedite a respectable force from Russia in Europe over distances of 2,000 leagues, and across regions thinly peopled and with hardly any resources.

The Trans-Siberian line constructed, an army corps can be brought to the frontiers within a few weeks, and the Chinese will not be tempted to stir, even in case of a European war. In the present state of things, the Anglo-German diplomacy can excite them to take part in the Triple Alliance and to avenge themselves on France for taking away their suzerainty over Tonkin, and on Russia for encroaching on their territories on the north east and north-west. With the aid of some European captains, seconded by a British fleet, they can play a rôle which will not be without importance. The Trans-Siberian line will keep them in check and oblige them to a neutrality.

Nor is this all. When the shores of the Pacific will be only a few week's journey from Moscow, Russia will be able to found on that Ocean a great maritime establishment and to keep up a formidable fleet. The Fort of Vladivostock, now almost isolated, will be the Sebastopol of the extreme east, in becoming the head of the new Trans-continental line. The British commerce will be menaced in the Seas of Asia and the Ocean. The future struggle for India will no longer be the duel between the "Whale and the Elephant;" the elephant will go on the water. This will be a good reason for which the English would take care not to provoke the struggle in taking a part in the Triple Alliance. They will appreciate much better the advantages of the neutrality, when the distant seas, where they are now so tranquil, will be full of dangers for them.

Thus the construction of the Trans-Siberian Railway, with its natural consequences, which are the development of the Russian marine on the Pacific, will no doubt ameliorate our perilous situation in Indo-China. We will henceforth be less isolated--less exposed to the offensive return of the Chinese, or to an attack on the part of the English.

A GRAIN OF WHEAT.

By Tolstôï.

[Translated for Reis and Rayyet.]

Some children were once playing on the border of a ditch. One of them found something, which looked like a grain, but so big that it attained almost to the size of a hen's egg. While it was being passed on from hand to hand and examined with care, a man came there and bought it from the children for a few pence. He came to the town and sold it to the Czar as a curiosity.

The Emperor called together the wise men and ordered them to ascertain whether this object was a grain or an egg. They all armed themselves, some with spectacles and some with microscopes and other instruments, but all their researches proved vain.

One of the wise men put this grain on a window-ledge. Some hens which were feeding there came and pecked at it with their beaks, and made a hole in it. It was then easy to perceive that it was a grain, for it had a mark in its middle. The Emperor was astonished at it. He ordered the wise men to study and discover why this grain was so beautiful and why they no longer found such big grains. They consulted their books and their dictionaries but without any result. "Sire," they said to the Emperor, "the peasants alone could enlighten you on the subject of this grain, they had perhaps heard their elders speak of it." A very old man with a grand white beard, without teeth and supported by two crutches, was brought before the Emperor. He took the grain but could hardly see it; he weighed it in the palm of his hand and tested it. "What dost thou think of this grain, dear father?" said the Emperor to him. "Hast thou seen its like in all thy life? In what can it be useful? Hast thou seen it sown or reaped?"

The old man, who was almost deaf, did not quite understand what the Emperor said. He, however, replied--"I have never bought such grains nor have I seen them sown. The wheat I bought was always very small. My father can perhaps tell you of it--it may be that he had seen the plant which produced such big grains."

The Emperor ordered the father of this old man to be brought before him. He came with a single crutch. His eye-sight was better than his son's and his beard was just turning to be grey. The Emperor gave him the grain which he examined long and with great attention.

"Tell me in what way is this grain useful, dear father," said the Emperor to him, "hast thou seen it planted since thou hast begun to labour in the field, or hast thou seen others reap it in their fields?"

"No," replied the old man, "I have never seen grains of this sort sold, for, in my time they had no use of money. Then we supported ourselves with the food of our own cultivation and we gave a share of it to those who were in want. I never saw this grain before. I, however, remember to have heard my father say that, in his time, wheat grew much better and produced bigger grains. It was necessary to ask my father about it."

They brought this old man. He was straight and vigorous, his eyes were lively, he walked without crutches, his beard was hardly grey and he spoke very clearly.

The Emperor showed him the grain. The old man took it and after looking at it for a long time, exclaimed, "Oh! now-a-days no one sees a grain like this grain." He put it into his mouth and tasted it, and again exclaimed, "Yes it is that, it is of the very sort."

"Thou knowest it then, dear father," said the Emperor, "where did it grow and in what season? Hast thou sown and reaped it thyself?"

"When I was young," said the old man, "we had no other grain but this, we used to make our daily bread with it."

"Hast thou bought it or cultivated it?" asked the Emperor.

"Formerly," replied the old man, smiling at the recollection of his youthful days, "we had not committed the sin of buying and selling food, we had never seen gold and every one had as much food as he wanted."

"Where was thy field, dear father, and where grew such wheat?"

"My field, O Czar! was the earth which God has given us all to till; then the land belonged to no one but was for all; every one worked for what was necessary for his life. My field was the soil which I cultivated. None said this is mine, that is his, this is my property and that is my neighbour's. We gathered the fruits of our labour and we were content with them."

Upon this, the Emperor cried out "Tell me, old man, why the wheat is so small now and why it was so gross before. Tell me also why the grandson walks on a pair of crutches and the son on a single one, while thou art still hale and vigorous despite thy great age. Thou oughtest to be the most worn out of the three but thou art the most active among them. Thy eyes are bright, thy teeth are not gone, thy voice vibrates like that of a young man. Wherefore art thou so, dear father, knowest thou this?"

"Yes, Emperor, I know it; now a-days men wish for more than what they want. They are jealous and envious of one another. I have lived in the fear and respect of God and possessed only what was mine by my labour, without ever having the idea of coveting what belonged to my neighbours."

MONGHYR.

Jamalpur, Sept. 25, 1891.

The case Empress versus Hyland (not Ryland as appeared in your issue of the 19th current) was tried in the sessions held in Monghyr by the Judge of Bhagalpore, on the 23rd. In addition to section 376, Indian Penal Code, sections 511 and 354 were added to the charge. The prisoner pleaded guilty and was sentenced to five years' rigorous imprisonment. The culprit was employed in the Locomotive Department as an apprentice in the workshops at Jamalpur. The Railway Company, on the result of the case being known, has dismissed Hyland from its employ.

This no doubt will set a good example to others and help to ensure safety to the travelling public, especially the female travellers.

It is gratifying to learn that the Railway authorities took immediate steps aided by the Police to surrender the culprit to justice.

I would humbly suggest to the East Indian Railway Company, which has almost at every important changing station an Institution and a Railway-aided school for the intellectual training of youths, to issue strict injunctions on the tutorial staff to look after the moral education of the young boys, so that they may not grow up young Hylands.

The local rate-payers' association which was about to be extinct is indicating signs of revival. It had a sitting the other day when some resolutions were passed.

This station is now full of bustle, owing to the approach of the autumnal festival, Doorga Pooja. The cloth merchants, tailors, shoe-makers, &c., are selling their articles with rapidity at exorbitant prices.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

TO-DAY AND TO-MORROW.

DON'T tell me of to-morrow !
Give me the man who 'll say,
Whene'er a good deed's to be done,
Let 's do the deed to-day.
We may all command the present,
If we act and never wait ;
But repentance is the phantom
Of the past, that comes too late.

Don't tell me of to-morrow !
There is much to do to-day
That can never be accomplished
If we throw the hours away.
Every moment has its duty—
Who the future can foretell ?
Then why put off till to-morrow
What to-day can do as well ?

Don't tell me of to-morrow !
If we look upon the past,
How much that we have left to do
We cannot do at last !
To-day ! it is the only time
For all on this frail earth ;
It takes an age to form a life,
A moment gives it birth.

THE ALARM.

Look there ! the beacon's crimson light
Is blazing wide and far,
And sparkles in its towering height
The rocket's signal star.
Rise ! rise ! the cannon rolls at last
Its deep and stern reply ;
And heavier sleep is coming fast,
Than seals the living eye.

And now the warning trumpet peals !
The battle's on the way ;
The bravest heart that moment feels
The thrilling of dismay :
Around the loved, the shrinking fear,
Love's straining arms are cast ;
The heart is in that single tear,
That parting is the last.

A thousand windows flash with fires
To light them through the gloom,
Before the taper's flame expires,
To glory or the tomb ;
Far down the hollow street rebounds
The charger's rattling heel ;

And ringing o'er the pavement sounds
The cannon's crushing wheel.

Then answers to the echoing drum
The bugle's stormy blast ;
With crowded ranks the warriors come,
And bands are gathering fast ;
Red on their arms the torch-light gleams,
As on their footsteps spring
To perish ere the morning beams—
For death is on the wing.

The courier in his arrowy flight
Gives out the battle cry !
And now march on with stern delight ;
To fall is not to die.
Already many a gallant name
Your country's story bears :
Go ! rival all your father's fame,
Or earn a death like theirs.

SONG.

LET me sing thee, while daylight is fleeing,
Some melody rare and divine ;
Let me speak to thy innermost being
Of all that is thrilling in mine.

Life's clouds round us often have gathered—
No pageant hath time been for us ;
Hand in hand the dark storms we have weathered,
And the sunshine shall smile on us thus.

If the days of my youth are retreating—
If the lines of gray gleam in my hair ;
Remember, when daylight is fleeting,
Comes twilight the tranquil and fair.

Still softly the snowy wings hover,
Still brightly the starry eyes shine,
Round my life, which the angels watch over,
Because it is mingled with thine.

II.

Sing not to me in joyous tone
Sing me some solemn song ;
Some low and plaintive melody,
To which sad thoughts belong

Sing, in thy lowest, sweetest tone,
Some holy, time-worn psalm ;
Distilling through the mists of care
Its drops of healing balm.

Sing ! for the burthen of my life
Is more than I can bear ;
Sing ! let the holy words uplift
The weight of my despair.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

Sing! for my soul will answer thine
In low responsive tone,
And my whole heart give back to thee
The echo of thine own.

• III.

No, thou art not my first love ;
• I had loved before we met—
And the beauty of that early dream
Is pleasant to me yet.
But thou, thou art my last love,
My dearest and my best ;
My heart but shed its outer leaves,
To give thee all the rest !

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THIS has been a melancholy week, with distress and death on all sides.

THE Englishman of Wednesday startled Bengal with unprecedented news. It is contained in the following telegram dated Lucknow, Oct. 6 :—

"Not since the reign of Ali Shah, some half a century ago, has Lucknow been afflicted with such an inundation as that with which it has just been visited, and from the effects of which it is likely long to suffer. On Sunday there was an unusually heavy downpour, and for an hour or more the rain fell in veritable sheets. This passed off, however, and the afternoon and evening were fair. The river was very high, and steadily increased in volume, but it was not until Monday morning that the full extent of the rise was clearly apparent. The citizens awoke to learn that the whole of the low-lying portions of the city and station were submerged, and as the day advanced crowds of people wended their way to various cogns of vantage to witness the strange sight—one which is not seen in a generation in these parts.

Taking Bruce's Bridge as a centre point of observation, the view was grand in the extreme. The Gumpri in huge volumes and with an extremely rapid current was in itself an exceptional sight, while the back water which found its way, in every direction extended far and wide. The roadway in front of the Club was deep under water, and all access to the Chutter Munzil was cut off by way of the Mall. As the day drew on, the river steadily rose, and at noon not only was a large part of the city under water, but Hosanabad and the park, of which latter the clock tower is the prominent object, were several feet deep under the flood, and the area presented all the appearance of a vast lake. Practically the whole of that part of the city is now uninhabitable, and the occupants of the shops and houses of all sorts have had to make a most hurried departure, even at the cost of considerable loss in property of every description. But the inundation is by no means limited to the city. All around the station the flood is steadily encroaching on parts to which, within the memory of the oldest residents, the overflow of the river has never reached before. For example considerably beyond the entrance to the Bank of Bengal, the water is surging up, and it seems not improbable that the Mall thereabouts will be reached, should there not be a subsidence of the flood during the next few hours. To those who know Lucknow, a fair idea of the extent of the flood encroachments will be gathered when it is mentioned that a house on the elevated site, abutting on Bruce's Bridge, is surrounded on the land side by some hundreds of yards of deep water, so that the occupant is altogether cut off from the Courts, unless by boats. The Moti Mahal and its big enclosure are swamped, albeit miniature bunds are being hurriedly built. Yesterday, to obviate, if possible, any worse consequence of this quite abnormal condition of affairs, Mr. Rose, the Deputy Postmaster-General, in his perch in the Dilaram Kothi, is as effectually isolated as if he was in the Island of Perim, and even Mr. Dyer's house, Kaboota Kothi, is surrounded as with a big moat and lake.

Extending right to the police lines the waste of waters reaches the new Falukdas' College which rears its imposing front on the banks of our now very big river, a veritable Mississippi, where the puny Gumpri was wont to flow. As for the N.-W. P. Company's ice factory, the buildings are pretty well neck deep in their interior, and the place is in great danger. The greatest anxiety is felt for the pile bridge. The Magistrate was there for some time on Monday, and the Municipal Secretary spends his time there taking all precautions for saving it from wreckage. It was confidently expected that it would go during Monday night, but it still holds together, notwithstanding that the immense force of the flooded river catches it at weak corners as it rushes along. Yesterday morning the Station Library was giving admission to the flood, and the underground tykanas are filled. The Judicial Commissioner's Court has the river right up to the doors, and Mr. Young's house is in very much the same plight.

It is almost needless to say that numerous villages on the banks of the river have been swamped. Close at our doors the village of Sultan-ganj has gone, and the washed-out people from the various reaches of the stream are pouring into Lucknow for shelter, carrying what remains of property they can. This will add sensibly to the local distress, and increase the cost of food stuffs, as all trans-Gumpri supplies are pretty well cut off for the time being. Indeed, what with the injury done to private and public property added to the immense increase of pauperism which will necessarily be a resultant of the floods, there is a grim look out for the poor during the winter. The villages about the Martiniere College are wholly submerged, and the class rooms on the ground-floor of the institution are under water, so that work will not be resumed by the boys until next week at the earliest. The view from the College is picturesque to a degree. As far as the vision extends is a vast inland sea, and to take the most cheerful view possible, the subsidence can only be so gradual as to interfere materially with agricultural operations. The silver lining to the cloud, however, consists in the fact that these floods will act as the annual overflow of the Nile does in Egypt, and the ground should be greatly fertilized for wheat, gram, barley, and rice. These freshets will help along the cultivator, at any rate we hope so. The Wingfield Park in the lower portions is deep under water, which has been supplied by the old canal, and the flood extends a considerable distance into Messrs Peake Allen's compound. Various theories are afloat as to the cause of the great floods, the favourite one being that a big bund on the Ramganga has burst. There is no doubt of their magnitude, however, and the present generation is not likely to witness such another inundation in Lucknow.

Later.—The wooden pile bridge referred in my earlier telegram has been swept away by the flood, and five men who were on it were drowned. This disaster closes all connection with the cemetery and paper mills, and will be a great public inconvenience. The river is still rising, and the worst does not seem to be yet touched. There are fears felt for the safety of the Chutter Munzil and Dilaram Kothi."

By Ali Shah, our contemporary's telegraphist means either Amjad Ali Shah who ascended the throne of Oudh in 1842, or his father and predecessor Mahammad Ali Shah who came to power in 1837.

There was an inundation in 1871, which submerged the strand road on the bank of the Goomtee and reached the steps of the Chutter Munzil, but it did not spread beyond. It was nothing like the present calamity.

THE latest news from Lucknow is contained in the following telegram of the 7th :—

"The floods are slightly subsiding. The country, however, is all under water this morning. Mr. E. Plomer, of Messrs. Peake Allen and Co., nearly lost his life. He was endeavouring to reach the ice factory, of which he is the principal proprietor, when through a breach in the road just over Bruce's Bridge his trap was capsized into the storm water between the road and the factory, and in a moment his life was in jeopardy. The horse, a valuable one, was at once drowned and had it not been for the promptitude of some boat men thereabouts he would undoubtedly have been carried away by the flood. These men plunged in to his rescue, and brought him with difficulty to the shore. Mr. Plomer is well known in Calcutta, and greatly respected on all sides, so I need only remark that had this plunge ended disastrously it would have been keenly felt far and wide. He reached home on an ekka in a most distraught condition for all the world like a shipwrecked sailor. The weather is now set fair, and the temperature is delightful. It is satisfactorily settled that the floods have been caused by local and district rain, and not by any bund breaking in Rohukhand. The railway bridges and lines are all right, so tourists need have no apprehensions on this score. Yesterday under the direction of the Deputy Commissioner and City Magistrate the skiffs of the Boat Club, which put in such a brave appearance at the recent Regatta, were usefully employed in rescuing flooded out villagers thereabouts. The crews did excellent service, and they saved many lives. Messrs. Murray and Co's boat was particularly active under Mr. Bonner. The station is just now filled with refugees, houseless and homeless. The public buildings are for the present all right."

THE Viceroy leaves Simla and goes into camp, like many of our Doorga Pooja tourists, on the Ekdasi day—Wednesday, the 14th October. Lord Lansdowne does not come direct to Calcutta but visits Kashmir, Gwahar, Bhopal and Indore, reaching Howrah at 8.30 A.M., Calcutta time, on Saturday, the 28th November. The Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, according to his programme of tour, will not be in Calcutta to receive the Viceroy, although the Simla notification of the viceregal arrival requires the presence, at Government House, of the Members of His Excellency's Council. The Lieutenant-Governor, to be sure, is not mentioned by name, but will that excuse his absence? The British in their zeal for imperialising now affect to be particular. Sir Charles Elliott had better act advisedly. One obvious question suggests itself. In the absence of the Lord Lieutenant, who will represent the Bengal Government? Nor is there any provision for the representation of Calcutta. The Chairman of the Corporation is not in the official programme. Mr. Lambert, as head of the metropolitan Police Force, will represent his own department. However, between his heroes and the military, there will be a lively show on the occasion. The Levée comes off at Government House, on Saturday, the 5th December, at 9.30 P.M. Cards must be sent in not later than the very day the Viceroy arrives in the capital,—Saturday, the 28th November, 1891. Gentlemen presenting others must themselves attend the Levée. This is an innovation. It has been a condition in the Drawing Room, not in the Levée. Full and evening dress. Before receiving the homage of the capital of the Empire, the Viceroy dines with the good and loyal Scots in memory of their patron Saint on the 30th November. The day and the hour for the Drawing Room are Saturday, the 5th December at 9-30 P.M.

THE Viceroy is timed for Simlga on the 23rd. He enters it in a State procession of boats. Gwalior comes in next where he arrives on the morning of the 17th November and halts there till the 20th. Two days will be devoted to Bhopal, which the Viceregal party will reach on the 20th. Thence from Khandwa by the Holkar State railway to Indore on the 24th. The stay there is limited to the 26th, when the Viceroy leaves direct for Calcutta.

THE Viceroy takes a trip to Burma early in January.

HER Simla friends, through the Commander-in-Chief Sir Frederick Roberts, has presented to Lady Lyall a handsome bracelet, as a parting tribute to the qualities by which she had endeared herself to her host of friends. At the same time, Sir Frederick recounted the services of the retiring Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab. Sir James Lyall was full of thanks for the present and the praise.

THE Postal Contractor Abdur Rahman Khan, Hazara District, has been allowed by the Viceroy the title of Khan Bahadar as a personal distinction.

THE shareholders of the Baragunda Copper Company have unanimously resolved to put an end to its existence by voluntary liquidation. It may Phoenix-like resuscitate into life again.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE Doorga Pooja is upon us. Today is Saptami, the first of the four grand days. With this issue, we take our fortnight's holiday. There will be no issues on the 17th and 24th October, the next Reis & Rayyet appearing on the 31st October.

A daily contemporary takes exception to this suspension of business in the weekly native press. He, however, forgets that the daily press has its holiday too. If we keep away from our readers two numbers, our morning contemporaries withhold more than two issues in a twelvemonth. As newspapers, the non-appearance of dailies causes greater inconvenience than that of the weekly reviews.

THE famine in Russia is increasing terribly. A village priest writes to a Moscow paper—"Persons have already gone two or three weeks without bread, and are barely managing to keep themselves alive with grass and leaves. Even the rural clergy is suffering from hunger. Multitudes of beggars are tramping about the country."

This news is by the mail. According to a St. Petersburg telegram of the 6th October, on account of the distress, Court balls have been suspended this season, the officers of the Guards have renounced champagne, and general abnegation has been resolved upon by all ranks of society. The money thus saved will go towards relief of the sufferers.

AT Canterbury, assisted by Canon Freemantle, Mr. Henry Irving unveiled the monument to Christopher Marlowe. In his address, he regretted the absence for so long a time of great dramatists. Mr. Gilbert writes to the Times saying that the remark is impolite, as there were present Mr. Pinero and many other playwrights. Stiff and nonsense! Was Mr. Gilbert present, too? What a pity that the best Englishmen cannot rise superior to conventional sentiment!

THE rumour of the Duke of Connaught succeeding Sir Frederick Roberts as Commander-in-Chief in India, is contradicted, no successor being yet named.

THE National Liberal Federation Congress have adopted for their programme—payment of members of Parliament, rural reforms, local option, disestablishment of the Church in Scotland, reform of the House of Lords. They would not take up the eight hours question.

MR. Gladstone's forecast is that a Liberal victory is approaching, that Lord Salisbury would leave the Egyptian question—its evacuation—to his successor without solving it himself. He would extend the labour representation in the House of Commons, and defer amending the constitution of the Upper House. Parliament must charge the electoral expenses to rates. His advice is look before you adopt a compulsory limitation of the hours of labour.

While attending the National Liberal Federation at Newcastle, Mr. Gladstone was presented with the freedom of that town. In returning thanks, he urged the necessity of the country adhering to Free Trade.

THE statue of Garibaldi, erected at Nice, was unveiled by the Mayor on the 4th October. Several Italian and French Deputies were present and most cordial speeches made. M. Rouvier, the Minister of Finance, on behalf of Government, warmly desired to see the closest entente between France and Italy.

ON the 7th October, Reuter announced the deaths of the Right Honorable W. H. Smith, First Lord of the Treasury, of Mr. Parnell, of Sir John Pope Hennessy and of Sir James Robert Longden. There was no previous intimation of the approaching end of any of the four. The only information given in these telegrams is that Mr. Parnell died at Brighton the day before, the event being due to a chill caught on Friday from which he sank gradually. The last we heard of Parnell was on the 5th, when Reuter telegraphed that "Messrs. Dillon and O'Brien, speaking at Carnick yesterday, violently inveighed against the attitude of Mr. Parnell, who, they declared, was fighting solely for his own ends. His policy was described as one of insanity and national perfidy." He is now beyond all praise or blame. Since the O'Shea divorce suit, he had ceased to be the idol of even his own party. But that exposure ought not to affect the judgment on his public career. That has been extraordinary. He was admittedly the greatest Irish man since O'Connell. But if O'Connell was the Great Agitator, Parnell was the greater. Mr. Smith had been for many months in failing health, and his retirement from the House of Commons was even talked of. He was respectability itself. Of Sir John Pope Hennessy we should like to speak at length. Enough here to say that he had earned the reputation of a just and conscientious Colonial Governor. After his retirement from the Government of Mauritius, he had entered Parliament by a bye-election.

WHILE noticing, last week, the Hackney Carriage Act and the byelaws framed under it, it escaped us that the Calcutta Gazette of the 30th September had published the byelaws with the confirmation of the Local Government. The byelaws have been sanctioned as sent up with the exception of the last item No. 13, which professed to add a table of instances.

UNDER the Bengal Local Self-Government Act, III of 1885, a District Board "may provide that a breach of the sague (byelaws) under the Act) shall be punished with fine which may extend to fifty rupees, and in the case of a continuing breach with a further fine which may extend to five rupees for every day during which the breach is continued after the offender has been convicted of such breach." In the byelaws just sanctioned for the Burdwan District Board, published in the Calcutta Gazette of September 30, we find—

"Any person washing in or otherwise fouling a tank or well reserved for drinking purposes by the District Board or Local Board shall be liable to a fine not exceeding Rs. 50, and to a further fine not exceeding Rs. 100 for a repetition of the offence."

Both the Board and the Local Government are carried away by their zeal for sanitation. They do not hesitate to double the highest penalty of the law for the original offence as created by a byelaw, or prescribe a fine twenty times that laid down for repetition of that offence. Some of the byelaws are more stringent than the conservancy regulations of municipal towns. Indeed, the Act does not apply to municipal towns. It is, besides, general in its scope and objects, and its commands are general, including the provision for enactment of byelaws "for carrying out all or any of the purposes of this Act." Those, therefore, charged with the working of the Act, feel themselves free to freely pass and sanction subsidiary orders according to their will and pleasure.

The byelaws prohibit obstruction or trespass upon roads, their slopes or berms or side drains, by buildings, huts, or fences, or otherwise; the stacking of straw, jute or other articles for sale on roads, or the slopes or side drains. The penalty fixed for these offences is Rs. 10 and Rs. 2 each day for continuance (byelaws 2 and 4). Any person destroying or damaging any tree shall be liable to a fine not exceeding Rs. 10. Any person plucking the fruit of a tree shall be liable to a fine not exceeding Rs. 4. The destruction and plucking may be by permission of the Board, and yet they are punishable, for no exception is mentioned. The Board may find it necessary to cut down a tree, but the person laying the axe on it runs the risk of being prosecuted. There is no prohibition to the Board to sell the fruits of trees, yet no body must pluck any of the fruits. Every body is warned against soiling any road or berm or its side drains by committing any nuisance by deposit of any noxious or offensive matter or otherwise, on pain of a fine of Rs. 10, or allowing it to remain unremoved on conviction of the offence and after notice of removal, on pain of further fine of Rs. 2 every day that such noxious or offensive matter is not removed. A man must be his own scavenger besides paying the fine for committing a necessary nuisance. Steeping jute in the side cuttings is allowable when permitted by the Board. Persons breaking these commands are equally liable to the penalties of the byelaws and to the punishment prescribed for such offences in the general law for the whole country.

BOBILI, we see, is coming to the front. Although an old chiefship, acknowledged by the accomplished early historian of the Rise of British Power in India, it was not till the visit of the Prince of Wales to this country that the world became conscious of the existence of the place. With the passing away of the occasion, it would have been forgotten with hundreds of insignificant humbledoms which were forced up to the surface to swell the Acet of the royal visitor's reception, but for a literary accident. Bobili had the supreme luck of attracting the notice of the chief historiographer of the Royal Triip. Dr. W. H. Russell brought down the old annals from dusty upper shelves to the circulating library table and the notice of the modern public. Sufficient advantage was not, however, taken of this favorable turn, and Bobili still remained but a name at best, even if so much. Of late, there seems a change. There are signs of some life and motion. The public ear is assailed by a name. One thinks one has heard it before, though one does not exactly remember in what connection. One day, the news is that the Raja has left his back-woods' hole for the Presidency metropolis. Another day, he went to meet another Raja with whose family his had had a hereditary feud. A few months back, he gave a donation to some useful institution. All this is good, but nothing particular. At last, however, something sensational has cropped up. The announcement is made that Bobili actually is bent on seeing the world and contemplates a trip to Europe next year.

AGRA city seems given up to the worst Bad mashery of the place. An armed band, twenty strong, attacked at midnight the house of the native doctor of the Leper Asylum, who lived next door to the Convent and the Judge Mr. H. G. Pearse. Some fellows surrounded the doctor to prevent his making any noise, while others awoke his poor wife, who was sleeping in another bed, tore the jewellery off her person, and compelled her to give up all the cash in the house which amounted to only, Rs. 50. They next visited a native Christian widow living opposite the Cathedral and tore the gold earrings from her bleeding ears. They then proceeded to the boarding house of the Lady Lyall Hospital. The watchman (chowkidar) of the house was true to his salt and raised an alarm, but they attacked him with such violence that he fled for his life. One of the female students was struck on the head with a club so as to cause a serious wound. The others all took refuge in the room of Mrs. Justice, the matron. There they were by no means out of danger, but now the Police appeared, and one constable of a neighbouring beat had the rare courage to rush into the midst of the gang and seize one of the robbers. His comrades, however, attacked the plucky constable with swords and rescued the prisoner, while the other constables looked on. The robbers all made their escape.

OUR delightful friend Mark Twain stands, we are sorry to report, charged with highway robbery in open day. The story contributed by him to the August number of Harper's Magazine, is said to be cribbed from the Adventures of Sir Frizzis Pumpkin published, along with "Nights at Mess and other Tales" fifty years ago. It is a blow, but not unexpected. All the popular idols and heroes have been caught in the act, prosecuted and punished, until the Botany Bay of the great Republic overflows with talent, and the atmosphere is perfumed with the breath of genius itself. From Dumas to the author of She, all the prolific producers have been detected. Nor have the Lyttons and the Disraelis escaped exposure. "It must be so," to borrow the dictum of Cato's soliloquy. The fault lies with the public whose thirst for light literature is insatiable and who pay lavishly for any attempt to satisfy it made under a popular name. Hence the demoralization of writers who have once gained the public ear.

AT the Central Criminal Court, before the Recorder, Edward Arthur Newton was charged with the abduction of Lucy Edith Pearman, a girl of fifteen, under the statutory age, the daughter of a tobacconist in the Strand. Newton is a married man but separated from his wife. He is in receipt of a weekly allowance of £2-10s from his grandmother of which 10s goes to the wife for her maintenance. Living thus lonely, five years ago he made the acquaintance of the Pearmans. He received from them every kindness and sympathy, and, in return, took an interest in the education and welfare of their children. His interest had specially fixed itself on Lucy. She grew and developed an affection for him. He had chosen her for his partner in life after his divorce from the separated wife. How then could he, as he said to the Recorder, plan an injury upon one whom he loved and upon whom he had built the hopes of his future? When Lucy passed her 15th year, circumstances grew too strong for Newton and he fell. Lucy, in her unhappiness, had asked him to remove her from her parents' roof and he did so. He had resisted the request until she grew violent and threatened her own life. He ultimately pleaded guilty. The Recorder observed it was a painful case. The girl was attached to Newton, and it was at her request that she was taken out of the guardianship of her parents. If the accused had waited a few months more, he would have escaped the present trouble, but as the law stood he must send him to jail for six months.

JONAH Hall Farlam, an engineer by profession but out of employ for the last two years, himself a widower, with three children, married a widow. That marriage did not prove happy, and the husband and wife separated for the last two years. Thus rendered unhappy, he had recourse to drink, which made him more miserable still, losing him his appointments and reducing him to consequent destitution. He, however, still longed for his wife, who would not come to him. He would watch her but could not always trace her. Gradually he conceived an aversion of love for her and, armed with a revolver, forced himself, on the 1st instant, into her house, in Taltolla, 43, Munshree Ahmuddin's Lane, and there shot her dead. There he discovered that his wife was a fellow lodger with one Hippolite. He had suspected that she had begun to love another and wanted to discard him altogether.

AN instructive anecdote is told of Mr. Spurgeon. On one occasion the great Baptist preacher, who commands listening hosts at his London Tabernacle and is, besides, an excellent writer, remarked to a friend that he made a practice of reading through Carlyle's "History of the French Revolution," once a year for the sake of its style. "It is a mass of rocks and boulders," he said. "Its rugged strength corrects the too great smoothness into which one is apt to glide." A true and practical remark. There is no doubt that too much attention to smoothness of language deprives a discourse of all its pith and point—its bone and marrow.

THE Eurasian Association of Madras held its anniversary meeting on the 7th. There was half holiday in the Government offices to enable the Eurasian employés to be present at the celebration. The Hon'ble Mr. Garstin presided, supported by Mr. Hanna, Manager of the Madras Railway. The Chairman advised the Eurasians to take to technical education ignoring office work, and to soldering. As Colonel of the Madras Railway Volunteers, he had found in them qualities for military training. He was sure the Commander-in-Chief would not oppose their entrance into the army.

The Association enter their new career, under a new President, by dropping its slightest connection with the Congress.

WE have no doubt that our readers will be glad to have the list of the famous conclave of Pandits who preside over the literature of France under the name of the Academy. In submitting before them the names, we are glad to be able to add the respective ages of the several men. Here are the names and the ages of the forty French immortals:—Lesseps, 86 years; Legouve, 84; X. Marmier, 82; Duruy, 80; C. Doucet, 79; J. Simon, 77; John Lemoine, 76; Duc d'Audiffret-Pasquier, 76; Rousse, 75; Leconte de Lisle, 71; C. Rousset, 70; Duc de Broglie, 70; Jurien de la Graviere, 70; Pasteur, 69; Mazade, 69; Joseph Berhaud, 69; Boissier, 68; A. Dumas, 67; Renan, 67; Mazieres, 65; Taine, 63; Emile Olliver, 69; Max du Camp, 69; Perraud, 63; Léon Say, 65; Gréard, 63; Saidou, 60; Cherbuhez, 59; Meilhac, 59; Paileron, 57; Halévy, 57; Hervé, 56; Sully Prudhomme, 59; Claretie, 49; F. Coppée, 48; d'Haussonville, 47; Vogué, 43; Loti, 41. As to M. Freycinet, his age is not known. One seat is vacant.

These figures are important for their teaching. They go far to prove that high thinking and the cultivation of letters, even to the constant practice of literary composition, so far from necessarily undermining the health, are distinctively favourable to longevity. They certainly explode the old superstition that the habitual pressure of thought dries up the sources of vitality and curtails a man's days.

Editors of newspapers and magazines hard up for matter, may find their profit in circulating the above among negligent correspondents and lazy friends.

THE author of the Ethnology of Bengal has proved himself too much for the Bengal Government. Mr. Cotton has cancelled the remainder of his leave and is coming out. Mr. Risley is relegated to Darjeeling as Deputy Commissioner.

THE Commission issued by Mr. Handley has examined-in-chief the Nizam, his Private Secretary and Director of Public Instruction in Hyderabad, Nawab Imadool Moolk, acting as interpreter. As a preparation of this examination, it was necessary to publish the letter to be found elsewhere to allay the indignation caused at Hyderabad. The accused Jacob keeps himself away from the Commission. He is unwell and does not feel himself safe in the Nizam's dominions. The cross-examination will commence next week, the First Assistant to the Resident acting the interpreter on the occasion.

MR. G. H. Simmons, who had dominated the Port Commission since its creation in 1871, first as Secretary and then as Traffic Manager and latterly as Vice-Chairman, is dead. He died on Wednesday, in London, of cancer. He had other qualities besides professional ability to recommend him to the Commission.

THE Muhammadan is phenomenally rich in colloquialism, and it is slanging with gusto the Native Press on the conclusion of the Bangabasi case. There are several papers—not of the unspeakable native order but conducted by respectable English gentlemen—who see in the finale a Government defeat or discredit. Not so the Southern Muhammadan. In a leading article headed "The Bangabasi 'Bust-up,'" our contemporary points a moral simply humiliating to the Bangabasi and its like. Remorseless as the writing is, it is full of shrewdness and knowledge. The opening will serve for a good specimen of the manner as well as the matter. It runs:—

"A more farcical but not on that account unsatisfactory dénouement it has never fallen to our lot to witness. The beaver-cocking and thumb biting have culminated in a complete and ignominious collapse. It was bruted abroad that money galore would flow abundantly forth from patronic purses and the Bengal quartet, like Fitz-James in the Lady of the Lake, stand with back to rock, defying the Government to come on. But the four Boo Aves down Bengal way finding their courage oozing fast out of their finger-tips, threw up the sponge and cried peccavi! with the result that the door-money has to be returned to the mob who longed to witness the 'min,' fully expecting to see a good stand-up fight, in which the favourite was certainly not the Government. The Bangabasi has spoiled sport just as expectation was running high. If its valor is an unknown quantity, its discretion certainly is not. The knocking down is complete—a fuller or more abject apology is nowhere on record; but neither fuller nor more abject than the occasion demanded. The deathless four of the Bangabasi have avoided by the course pursued enforced intermural retirement and saved the Government a good deal of useless trouble in pressing the prosecution. Much of what the Bangabasi wrote was poor inflated stuff; and being such, it some think should have been passed by unheeded by the Government against which it was directed. But rubbish as it was, it was nonetheless calculated to produce baneful consequences, as the people it was meant to affect are not given to nicely discriminating between sense and its opposite."

The Muhammadan observes:—

"The delinquent run in is by no means the chief offender; there are other journals which could beat the Bangabasi, giving it points. That these have escaped and the Bangabasi has fallen into the toils is simply due to the circumstance that in the sequence of events the latter came up first, and had to suffer for the encouragement of the rest."

That, of course, only goes upon the information of the Pioneer, unless it be the expression of a progenitive wish—to attempt, from a long distance, something in our contemporary's style. The Times of India said the same thing, and, besides, fathered the whole plan of the campaign against the Native Press on the Law Member. Sir Alexander Miller, however, promptly denied the soft impeachment. Pure as the unborn baby was the Law Member. Whatever may be the plan or whoever may be responsible for it, he knew nothing about it. Now, these Anglo-Indian journalists were quite as likely to err in the remainder of their information as one of them was deceived in respect of a part.

IN another column we publish Dr. Sircar's address at the last Anniversary of the death of Ram Mohan Roy. We are afraid the Hon'ble Doctor is paying, like another gentleman, the penalty of fame and ambition and morbid self-confidence. At any rate, he too easily lends himself out to the aggrandisement of movements for twaddle, without securing the conditions for the preservation of his own reputation. Surely, the world has not begun to produce wizards whose mere presence would develop thought. Sentiments proper to be delivered on public occasions, specially occasions of solemnity, are of the character of high literature, or the Muses' heavenly lays,

With toil of sprite, which are so dearly bought.

There is no evidence of study or meditation in the address. It seems as if, suddenly unpressed for the occasion, the speaker relied upon his ability to pass through the ordeal without a hitch, if not with flying colors. Once on his legs, he was tempted by the friendliness of the audience to attempt a triumph. So he let his tongue loose. Dr. Sircar could not speak without being eloquent, but this time it was the eloquence of conventionality and exaggeration. His native hate of the Brahmans supplied him with an inexhaustible theme. In piling his adjectives on their devoted head, he forgot that the object of his adoration for the nonce—Ram Mohan Roy—was a Brahman and had maintained his Brahmanism to the last, even in Europe. Apart from that striking fact, had the speaker known more of his hero, he would scarcely have made himself so miserable over the coldness of his countrymen towards Ram Mohan Roy. It is all very well for Miss Carpenter or Dr. Max Muller to dwell with rapture on the polished Oriental who, sixty years ago, charmed the highest society of Western Europe, but those nearer home ought to be more sober. This is not the hour for polemics, nor is Dr. Sircar the party with whom we have any desire for controversy. What we say is only in discharge of our duty to the public. At another time, we may go into the matter at length. Just now, we have only to say that Dr. Sircar only echoes Europeans' blunder when he regards the Brahmans as a priestly class. They are not. Even admitting for argument's sake that they are all priests, so far from their meriting the anathema of Dr. Sircar, they will not suffer in comparison with any similar class in any other part of the globe, in the modern or the ancient times. Priests or no priests, they have been the most unselfish governing race in the world.

BABOO BIBBLEBABBLE.

THE Chief of Jamkhandi has had a silver palki made for his god Ganpati at a cost of Rs. 20,000.

Which is the greater—the small Raja worth a few lacs per annum who spends Rs. 20,000 on a vehicle for his elephant-headed idol, or the great Nizam of the Deccan, who had ordered a stone for nearly half a million of money for decorating himself with?

A BARBER'S shop in a town in the Isle of Man has at the entrance to his shop a signboard with the following inscription:—

"Professor Kelly, Tonsorial Artist, Cranium Manipulator, Capillary Abridger, Facial Operator. Hirsute appendages adjusted with embidexterous celerity."

Surely, the Professor has not on his establishment a "first class classical Baboo?"

HERE is a specimen of the true American Spread Eagle eloquence:—

"Ours is a great and growing country. Faneuil Hall was its cradle; but where—where will be found timber enough for its coffin? Scoop all the water out of the Atlantic Ocean, and its bed would not afford a grave sufficient for its corpse. Europe! what is Europe? She is nowhere, nothing—a circumstance, a cipher, a mere obsolete idea. We have faster steamboats, swifter locomotives, larger reeks, bigger plantations, bigger mill privileges, broader lakes, higher mountains, deeper cataracts, louder thunder, forkeder lightning, braver men, handsomer women, and more money than Europe dare have! Who's afraid?"

Our Surrender Not's Eagle is but a poor black ka-kaing fowl.

WHAT is Abdopalam? It occurs in the Calcutta Gazette of September 30, Part IB., p. 216, and is intended as a signature of the Commissioners of the Burdwan Municipality—Syed Abdopalam—in a notification under the signature of Mr. H. H. Risley. Mr. Risley the Secretary's notification suggests the question, let Mr. Risley the ethnologist answer the query.

THERE are several lions on the prowl in Europe, but just now the lioness par excellence is a dowager of plutocracy. She was lately the observed of all observers in London as the richest widow in America. Her husband Mr. Ayer amassed a fabulous fortune by the sale of sarsaparilla. Mrs. Ayer wears a pearl necklace worth £50,000—about 7 lacs of Rupees. What were the "mashers" and "dudes" of her land about? Yankee Doodle is a veritable noodle to have allowed such precious big game to go out of the country. We shall not be surprised to see some nominal Prince or embarrassed baron make the capture.

THE courts of Paris and Copenhagen have exchanged compliments. The Danish monarch has sent M. Carnot the collar of the Danish Order of the Elephant, and the French President has conferred the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour on Prince Christian, eldest son of the Prince Royal of Denmark.

I have no complaint on that score. But I cannot help inquiring how the Danes came to have their strange Order. Where, in fact, did they get their Elephant? It must be cribbed from the East. Elephants have not been known in Northern Europe, within the present or any recent geological period.

TALK of the imaginative Oriental and his tell-tale knock! he is a farthing rushlight to the sun of the Occidental. And the ultraoccidental is simply blinding with his excess of glory. Many in all directions of the compass are ready enough for the exercise of their wits at invention, but nobody succeeds so well as he. He is the Edison.

I suppose we owe to him the remarkable account of the modern Jonah which is making the tour of the whole globe, how a sailor in a storm fell from the mast of a whaler into the sea, how the life-boat was lowered after him, how no trace of him was discovered, how as the rescuing party were about to return in sadness they suspected the presence of a whale, how they waited in suspense on the alert, how the huge beast showed signs of distress from sickness, how the whale groaned and at length vomited out the missing salt, how home they brought their comrade dead or dead-like, how he lay unconscious for some days after which he was himself again. It is a rare treat.

The following has the same hall-mark.

"Two brothers named Smith, fishermen of Hobart, obtained the carcass of a whale at Rochester Bay after it had been tired out by the whaling barque Water-witch. On opening the body they found a lump of ambergris weighing nearly 200 lbs., the value being quoted at £5,000."

Seventy thousand Rupees within a whale! That is a windfall indeed! And such is luck.

By and bye, I think the American whales will take care to stow away in their capacious holds only Imperials and Kohinoors.

THE DOORGA POOJA REFORMATION.

SPEAKING generally, our religious festivities and observances are based on the most refined sentiments, and cannot be taken exception to from an esthetic or humanitarian point of view. But an element of brutality is not always wanting in the actual practice of many of our co-religionists, and, though we may ascribe its origin to an imperfect appreciation of the rituals prescribed by our shasters, it is impossible for any reflecting mind not to feel distressed at the cruelty which is perpetrated in the name of religion by some orthodox Hindus of the Sakta sect. The display of barbarity which takes place in connection with the Doorga Pooja, is thus graphically described by the author of "Hindus as they are":—

"The last day of the pooja is attended with many offerings of goats, sheep, buffaloes and fruits. The area before the shrine becomes a sort of slaughter-house, slippery with gore and mire, and resounding with the cries of the dying victims, and the still more vociferous shouts of "Mā, Mā," uttered by the rabble amidst the discordant sound of gongs and drums. Some of the deluded devotees, losing all sense of shame and decency, smear their bodies from head to foot with this bloody mire, and begin to dance before the goddess and the assembled multitude like wild furies. In this state of bestial fanaticism, utterly ignoring the ordinary rules of public decorum, and literally intoxicated with the glory of the meritorious act, the deluded mob, preceded by musicians, proceed from one house to another in the neighbourhood where the image has been set up, sing obscene songs, and otherwise make indecent gestures which are an outrage alike on public morals and on common decency. When quite exhausted by these abominable orgies, they go and bathe in a river or a tank, and return home, thinking how to make the most of the last night. Should any sober-minded person remonstrate with them on their foolish conduct, the stereotyped reply is—the Māhāmāyer Bāzār and the last day of the poojā, when all sorts of tomfoolery and revelry are justifiable. The sensible portion of the community, it must be mentioned, keep quite aloof from such immoral exhibitions."

The tastes of men differ according to their education and sphere of life. What to men of refined sentiments appears as a display of savagery, may be the only kind of recreation possible to young men possessing an exuberance of animal spirits, and the minimum of brain culture. There is hardly a nation in the world whose religious carnivals are altogether free from exhibitions of drunkenness and coarse sensuality, and this much at least may be said in favor of our religious festivities that they are very seldom marred by the excesses which are inevitable where indulgence in strong drink is allowed without stint. The vulgar merriment of our young men on the occasion of the Doorga Pooja, may, with a little allowance for the weaknesses of human nature, be tolerated. But what pains us most, is the cruelty practised towards the lower animals in the name of religion. A singular instance of such cruelty is mentioned in Mr. Ward's interesting book on our religion. The perpetrator of the act was the wellknown Raja Krishna Chandra of Nuddea. "He began," says Ward, "with one, and, doubling the number each day, continued it for sixteen days. On the last day he killed 32,768, and on the whole he slaughtered 65,535 animals. He loaded boats with the bodies and sent them to the neighbouring Brahmans, but they could not devour them fast enough, and great numbers were thrown away. Let no one, after this, tell us of the scruples of the Brahmans about destroying animal life and eating animal food."

With reference to the concluding remark, it is to be observed that the slaughter of lower animals for propitiating the gods is not a peculiarity of the Hindu religion. The hecatombs of the Grecians and the dedication of the temple of Solomon with the blood of 20,000 oxen and 1,00,000 sheep, certainly surpass any act of similar cruelty ever practised by any Hindu. In his primitive state, man is naturally a lover of flesh meat, and our Aryan ancestors were no exception to the general rule. In the savage condition, flesh meat is the only kind of food available to man, excepting perhaps a few kinds of fruits and roots. Thus, to the anthropomorphist of archaic times, nothing could appear more acceptable to the gods than the flesh and blood of the lower animals.

At a later period, the good and thoughtful members of society enter a strong protest against wanton cruelty of this kind. In some cases, goahead reformers attempt to put down the practice with a high hand. But, among nations that have a well established religion and ancient traditions, such innovations cannot be easily made acceptable to the people. If any reformation appears desirable, the only safe course lies in proceeding by indirect means. The author of "Hindoos as they are" has noted the fact that the practice of slaughtering kids and buffaloes has been, within the memory of living men, discontinued in many families, and, considering the progress that the religion of Chaitanya is making in the country, the time seems to be fast coming when, not merely the Vaishnavas, but Hindus of all classes, will consider the killing of even the humblest of God's creatures a crime, and not a meritorious act.

Sacrificial offerings are recommended by some of our shasters, but are nowhere enjoined as absolutely necessary. Our Rishis could not, by one stroke of their pen, make the eating of flesh meat unlawful and liable to punishment. But they never encouraged ruffianism in any shape. The rituals prescribed by them recognised the killing of certain animals as a tribute of piety to the gods. But they discountenanced the practice in every way possible. To begin with, they laid down that in killing a goat or a buffalo, the head of the victim must be completely severed from the body by a single stroke of the sword. Dire calamity is supposed to ensue where the first cut only partially effects its purpose. The very fear of the misfortune which is believed to be the inevitable result of such an accident, has led many families to avoid its possibility by omitting the validan part of the ceremony altogether.

The mantras prescribed by our divines for consecrating an animal intended for sacrifice, also show that their object was not to encourage cruelty, but to discourage it. The victim of their mistaken piety is actually worshipped as a god and prayers are addressed to it, invoking its blessings. The following is a translation of some of the mantras:—

"May the goddess Chandika be pleased with thy blood. Go thou, hero! to heaven giving me the merit of having made of thee a sacrificial offering to the deity. O thou fortunate buffalo that carriest the god Yama on thy back, give me good fortune, rice, wealth and piety out of thy good nature. As thou art an enemy to the horse, as thou carriest the goddess Chandika on thy back, so mayest thou kill my enemies and bring me good fortune. O thou fair looking and immortal conveyance of Yama, give me long life, wealth and fair fame. With these prayers I make my reverential bow to thee.

Excuse me for the pain caused to thee by the sword. Mayst thou attain the position of a Gandharva.

O buffalo! I have got possession of thee through good fortune. I lay myself prostrate at thy feet, O thou representative of the God Siva! The lower animals were created by Brahma for sacrificial purposes. Therefore, the killing of an animal for making a sacrifice not being culpable, I kill thee. By pleasing the goddess Chandika, thou art able to keep me free from worldly calamities. I make my reverential bow to thee O thou gratifier of Chamunda!

All this is either utterly without meaning, or the object is evidently to inspire the votary with a due regard for the sacredness of the lowest forms of animal life.

However much it may outrage our feelings to admit the fact, there cannot be any manner of doubt that beef was the favorite food of our ancient progenitors. Yajnyavalka says:—

"When a Brahman versed in the Vedas is a guest, the host must kill a large ox or a goat for his entertainment."

Chapter I. v. 109.

The commentary of Vijnyaneshwar on this passage makes its meaning as clear as possible, and shows also that, in his time, that is about the tenth century of the Christian era, beef eating had already come to be regarded with horror. While the sages expressly prohibited beef and fowl, they declared that certain kinds of flesh meat could be lawfully eaten. But the privilege was coupled with the condition that the flesh of an animal that was not killed for sacrificial purposes was not to be eaten, except in emergencies such as involved imminent death. Manu says:—

"Flesh meat may be eaten which has been hallowed for sacrifice with appropriate texts, and one only when desired by many Brahmins, and when through hunger or disease a man may otherwise lose his life."

"Let no twice-born who knows the law and is not in urgent distress, eat flesh without observing this rule, for he, unable to save himself, will be devoured in the next world, by those animals whose flesh he has thus illegally swallowed."

"The sin of him who kills deer for gain, is not so heinous, with respect to the punishment in another life, as that of him who eats fleshmeat in vain, or not previously offered as a sacrifice."

"Should a man have an earnest desire to taste fleshmeat, he may gratify his fancy by forming the image of some beast with clarified butter thickened, or he may form it with dough, but never let him indulge a wish to kill any beast in vain."

"As many hairs as grow on the beast, so many similar deaths shall the slayer of it, for his own satisfaction in this world, endure in the next from birth to birth."

"Let no twice-born whose mind is improved by learning, hurt animals without the sanction of scripture, even though in pressing distress, whether he live in his own house, or in that of his preceptor, or in a forest."

"He who injures animals that are not injurious, from a wish to give himself pleasure, adds nothing to his own happiness, living or dead."

"While he, who gives no creature willingly the pain of confinement or death, but seeks the good of all sentient beings, enjoys bliss without end."

"He who injures no animated creature, shall attain without hardship whatever he thinks of, whatever he strives for, whatever he fixes his mind on."

"Fleshmeat cannot be procured without injury to animals, and the slaughter of animals obstructs the path to beatitude; from fleshmeat, therefore, let man abstain."

"Attentively considering the formation of bodies, and the death or confluence of embodied spirits, let him abstain from eating fleshmeat of any kind."

"The man who forsakes not the law, and eats not fleshmeat, like a blood-thirsty demon, shall attain good will in this world, and shall not be afflicted with maladies."

"He who consents to the death of an animal; he who kills it; he who dissects it; he who buys it; he who sells it; he who dresses it; he who serves it up; and he who makes it his food; these are eight principals in the slaughter."

"Not a mortal exists more sinful than he, who, without an oblation to the manes or the gods, desires to enlarge his own flesh with the flesh of another creature."

"The man who performs annually, for a hundred years, an atva mētha, or sacrifice of a horse, and the man who abstains from flesh meat, enjoy for their virtue an equal reward."

"By subsisting on pure fruit and on roots, and by eating such grains as are eaten by hermits, a man reaps not so high a reward, as by carefully abstaining from animal food."

"Me he (Mānsa) will devour in the next world, whose flesh I eat in this life! Thus should a flesh-eater speak, and thus the learned pronounce the true derivation of the word Mānsa, or flesh."

Manu, Chapter V. vv. 27-55.

These injunctions and rules have made the Hindu practically a vegetarian. His Aryan craving for flesh meat and for the luxury of celebrating his festivities by the destruction of animal life, still manifests itself now and then. Innumerable are the stories current in the country of the avidity felt by some Hindu for the relish of goat's flesh, but which cannot, by legitimate means, be gratified, except on occasions like the Doorga Pooja. Under the influence of English education, the craving for flesh meat is increasing, and it may not be possible to keep it in check. But if the gentlemen who affect to be the leaders of the Hindu community, really possess any influence over it or any claim to the honor, they ought at once to put a stop to the barbarities which are now practised in the name of religion, instead of giving, by their inaction, a handle to hostile critics, and possible occasions for the interference of the S. P. C. A.

NEPAL.

ETHNOLOGY.

THE dominant race in Nepal are the Goorkhas. Their predecessors in the country were the Newars, whom they have displaced from power, position, and profit. As seen at present, both seem to be Mongolians. Yet their mutual difference is unmistakable and considerable. The Goorkhas have all the characteristics of a conquering race, while the Newars exhibit those of a conquered one. The former are proud, brave, warlike, apt to take fire, difficult to control. The latter are mild, submissive, easy to govern, skilful in arts. Not the least important difference between the two is that the one are Hindus and the other are Buddhists.

We talk of Nepalese and we all have seen Nepalese. Be it understood that it is the Goorkhas we see and talk of. For it is the Goorkhas of all the tribes of Nepal that ever leave their country. So little is known of the Newars that I took care to collect all the information I could about this interesting people.

You will hear of endless tribes in Nepal, but you need not be terrified. The number dwindles on enquiry, most of them proving to be sub-varieties. Thus:

The Udás, the Jáápu, the Bánrá, the Srestanewár and the Khusál are all different sections of the Newars of Nepal. The language is, of course, the same, with occasional variations.

The Newars, much more than the Goorkhas, are unmistakably Mongolian in features. Although the Goorkhas, as the ruling class, treat them with disdain, yet their small eyes, prominent cheeks and flat noses are scarcely against the Newars in the estimation of the dominant people, thus betraying a mutual affinity. The Udás are reputed the most handsome people in the hills. My Goorkha friend, whom I will call Captain Ram Bahadur, says that their women are quite as beautiful and as sought for as the Jews and Armenians are at Calcutta, but if they are Newars, as he without hesitation says they are, the Newars can scarcely be Mongolian, or other than Aryan or Semitic. In that case, I would regard them as a pure aboriginal Aryan tribe, like the Siahposhi. But that is neither here nor there. We know little of their language and I have no materials with me now to institute a comparison. Looking to the few words of the several tribes of Newars I have been able to collect, I see no Aryan identity in them; if anything, I should suspect the language to be Mongolian or Non-Aryan. Comparing the Newar numerals with those of the Thibetan and Bodo or Mechi, Indo-Chinese dialects, in Appendix B. of Justice Campbell's Indian Ethnology, I trace a similarity. In the first four Newar tribes named above, the word for one is cham, and in the fifth tribe, namely Khusál, chi. The last word chi seems to be the root of the cham of the others. In Thibetan, we have chik and in the Bodo che. Although the first sound in the latter words is ch, not as in the Newar word chh, yet on enquiry possibly it may be found to be chh, at any rate the difference is nothing. The Newar for two is Nam, which in Khusál is Nam. In Thibetan, it is nyu, and in Bodo me. In Newar, three is um, in Khusál pi. In Thibetan, it is um and in Bodo tham, by a natural and easy change of s into th. The same similarity is found in other numerals, though it is missed in some. In the words for the family relations, except in those for father and mother, which curiously agree in many languages, be they Aryan or Non-Aryan, Semitic or Mongolian, there is no approach to Aryan sounds.

In religion, some of the Newar tribes are Buddhists while others are Hinduish, but that need not suggest for them a Mongol origin, for both Buddhism and Hinduism are of Aryan, indeed, Indian origin, and are notoriously professed to this day, and even within India, by Indians and Aryans.

The Udás, from Ram Bahadur's account, would appear to be Buddhists. Some of them indeed visit, and sometimes even make a show of worship at, the Siva temples, but that is more from a desire to humour the dominant Hindus or from the force of the sympathy of numbers. I suspect they were originally Hindus and became Buddhists from political causes, and are again turning Hindus from a similar cause. The Nepal Government is a very powerful and religiously very strict Hindu Government. The Bánrá are Sáktá Hindus much occupied with Tántic practices.

I may here mention that the Chhetris of Nepal—the true Goorkhas—are, many of them, Sáktas of the Dakhinachari section. They, however, do not take wine after the rites prevalent among the sect. A few abandoned people do, but, on discovery, they are excommunicated from feasts and ceremonies.

The Udás are at once religious and keenly commercial. The chief trade of Nepal with China and Central Asia is in their hands. They seem to be the Oswáls of the hills.

The Jáapu are the Káhárs or "bearers" and inferior menials of Nepal.

There is not much difference between the Udás and the Baura.

The Udás, the Jáapu, and the Bánrá are Buddhists and the Sresta Newar Hindu Saivas.

The Náo or barber caste who, as in India, are also the higher menials and attendants, also speak the Newar tongue.

Ram Bahadur does not countenance the idea that the Newars, any tribe of them, have Mongol or, as I put it to him, Bhotia, i.e., Thibetan features. The Bánrá and the Udás, he said, had very mild, soft countenances and bodies like, as he said, the Agarwáls Baniás of Hindustan. I can hardly reconcile the last similarity with the expectation I had been led to form of the surpassing beauty of the Udás and Banra women.

The Newars formerly, even within Ram Bahadur's memory, young as he is, had a different dress from the Chhetris or Goorkhas. They wore the long dhuti and the jama (large gown) and the Panditi cap undulating down round the ears. Now they have gradually adopted the tight coat (of the cut of our old Bengal Bunian) of the Goorkhas, their pyjama and their cap.

There does not seem to be any sumptuary laws in Nepal, and people of all classes are allowed to dress as they like.

The Udás and other Buddhist tribes have priests from among their own classes without distinction of caste, (as Brahmans, Chhettris, &c.) The Hindu Srestanewars, however, have a class of Brahmans among them, very degraded, who wear the thread, but drink spirits, &c. They are the priests, of course. The Gurus are called Jurus and the Purohits, Devyalukas.

DOMESTIC LIFE.

Goorkha ladies, the same as among us, do not eat with their husbands, or at the same time. They eat of the leavings of their husbands, the same as among us, only our ladies as they are becoming civilized are giving the dirty practice up, and the Nepal ladies while they sit down on their husbands' plates in the same chowka (the chowka prevailing there) are given by the Brahman cook a small plate of untouched or uneaten dishes for the purpose of offering them to the elements and gods before they commence to eat. In Bengal, strict Brahmans make this offering, but women never—it would be considered strange and pedantic, perhaps horrible, if any lady commenced her dinner with this form. Of course, the Nepal small plate contains more than necessary for the small offerings for the elements, to supply the deficiencies of the husbands' left plate.

The Napalese are fond of dress.

The ladies wear a long robe—saree—manufactured in the country or made of colored muslin or lawn, a very long piece which they wind like a heaving gown round and round their girdle. Unlike their sisters of Bengal, they rarely cover up their bodies with one end of this saree, but instead wear full angias like the hill courtesans of Nainital or Almora, only of thicker texture than these loose women. These angias, jackets made of silk generally, European or China silk, are very close fitting and come down to the wrists. Over this angia they often put on equally close-fitting cloaks of velvet or rich silk or broadcloth (the poorer have both for angia and cloak coarse silks and alpacas, &c.) which are bordered with lace all round, the lace of the sleeves being very heavy, the cloak sleeves only reach to the elbows, often the skirts of the sleeves are of the fur or skin of an animal whose name I have forgotten, while the rest of the cloak is fringed with narrow gold lace. They delight in wearing a lot of jewellery—finely made ornaments—churis, bárá, &c., as in Bengal and called by the same names. The saree is kept fixed by a komarband of cloth over which the angia falls and over it the cloak. Thus far they might look in dress like Europeans, but then the whole dress and body are shrouded by a very long shawl—chaddar—made of lawn, (each piece of lawn making two chaddars) falling down from the head. There is no bonnet used. The hair is collected into one braid and let down the head and back like a black snake; at the end of which hangs a silk and gold or silver lace tassel, and at the root of the snake many large gold or pearl or diamond flowers are placed as well as gold holders to stick natural flowers in, of which the Nepal ladies, to their credit, are inordinately fond.

All Nepal ladies ride like Mahratta women and ride in the posture of men, without indelicacy. They are above the grossness of prudery.

Ram Bahadur tells me he will take his wives to Calcutta to show them the wonders of the British Indian metropolis. He is happy there is not much of parda in Bengal, and not, I fancy, so much of it in Nepal either, as among the Moslems.

It is satisfactory to know that pauperism and pinching distress are very rare in Nepal. There are a few beggars seen on Shivaratri and one or two other occasions, but, even then, they are not so beggarly and persistent as Indian beggars. Every body works on land.

THE RAM MOHUN ROY ANNIVERSARY.

The fifty-eighth Anniversary of Raja Ram Mohun Roy's death was held in the City College, on the 27th September 1891. On being voted to the chair, the Hon'ble Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar opened the proceedings as follows :—

Gentlemen,—While I offer you my sincere thanks for the honour you have done me in asking me to take the chair for the third time on these solemn anniversary days, I bend my head and heart in humble adoration to the Author of all good for having spared my life to this day to enjoy that honour. It is not only an honour, but a great privilege, to be permitted to preside on occasions when we meet to keep alive the memory of the greatest man whom our country has produced in these days; a man who was not only an intellectual giant—he had acquired such a proficiency in Persian and Arabic in his twelfth year as to be able to read Aristotle and Euclid, and gained such a mastery in Sanskrit before completing his sixteenth year as to be able to critically read the Veds, the Upanishads, and the Vedanta, and to carry on discussions on them with learned Pandits,—he was not only an intellectual giant, of whose like we have not seen yet, but a man who had a heart which was keenly alive to the dearest and highest interests of his countrymen and of humanity at large. It is now exactly 58 years that this great man died in a foreign land, and yet can we his countrymen say, after this long lapse of time, over half a century, very near six decades, can we say that we are at all worthy of him? Can we say that with all the advantages we have since enjoyed, advantages which were mainly created for us by him, that with all these advantages the country has progressed as he had in the heart of his heart wished? Gentlemen, we cannot say that we have been worthy of him, that the country has benefited by his life and labours, so long as the mass of our countrymen continue in the most revolting idolatries and superstitions to which they have been bound down by a priestly class, the most crafty, the most selfish, and the most demoralized of any in the world, a class who are trading upon the ignorance and credulity of millions of human beings, to their own and their victims' eternal perdition. It is for this reason, Gentlemen, I am humbly of opinion that the best way to celebrate the anniversaries of Ram Mohun Roy's death, should be by weeping and lamentation. Yes, there has not yet been cause for rejoicing that Ram Mohun Roy was born in our midst, lived in our midst, worked in our midst with a deep earnestness, a holy zeal, and an unselfish devotion such as have not yet been seen, and such as could only have been inspired by a genuine love of country and of mankind, and by absolute reliance upon the grace of the All-Merciful Creator. In view of this lamentable fact, one may, in bitterness of soul, almost exclaim Ram Mohun Roy had lived in vain! and why? because he was born in a country which has up to this day failed to appreciate him. Education, you may say, for which Ram Mohun Roy so strenuously and so wisely laboured, has spread fast and wide. But where is the fruit which a sound education should have borne, and which he so anxiously expected? Excuse me, if I tell you, that it is as yet nowhere to be found. The head has only been superficially touched, and the heart scarcely at all. In the anguish of my heart, I ask you, my countrymen, how long is this reproach to continue? I expect an answer from the three eminent gentlemen who have promised to address the meeting, and I am confident, the answer will be a satisfactory one.

After the addresses,* and a few remarks by a gentleman from Assam, the chairman brought the proceedings to a conclusion with the following words :—

Gentlemen,—Though only one gentleman has, at my invitation, favoured us with his remarks, that gentleman hails from Assam and he has made a revelation which we have all received with ecstasy. It was a new fact to us that our illustrious countryman, whose memory we have met to honour this evening, was not only, as we all know, one of the pioneers of the introduction of Western culture into Bengal, but was mainly instrumental in introducing that culture into Assam. In opening the proceedings I asked you a question, and at the same time expressed a hope that a satisfactory answer would be returned before the meeting would be closed. I am happy to observe that I was not mistaken. The three very eloquent and highly interesting addresses, which we had the pleasure of listening to, have furnished the answer that I was anxiously expecting. If we have not hitherto appreciated Ram Mohun Roy, it is because we have not known him, and we have not known him because we have not taken care to acquaint ourselves with the facts of his life, with the work he did, with the services he rendered to his country and to the world at large. Now we shall have no excuse as his writings have been collected and ably edited, from which we can gather what manner of man he was and what he did for us. And if we do so, unless we are absolutely insensible to the stimulus of example, of such example as that of Ram Mohun Roy, we cannot remain idle. It is not a small misfortune that he should hitherto have been claimed only by a very small, I had almost said, an infinitesimal section of our community, by those who profess themselves to be his followers and constitute what has been called his church. It is true that he has been claimed by the Christians as a Christian, by the Mahometans as a Mahometan, by the Hebrews as a follower of the Law and the prophets. But this has been through sheer misunderstanding. And I venture to say that even his having been claimed by those who call themselves his church has been no less a misunderstanding. A study of his writings, in their entirety, and especially his Gift to the Deists, the Tuhfat-ul-Murabbin, will convince us that he belonged to no church and that it was not his intention to found a church, far less a sectarian church, certainly not a church which should split up into divisions, scarcely consistent with the harmony of universal brotherhood. He was, what every right-minded man should be, a child of God, a simple and pure believer in one Supreme Being of infinite intelligence and power and goodness, as the author and preserver of the universe. This is the faith which, modern science teaches, is preached by every part of universe from the atom to the systems of worlds that roll in the fields of immensity, by every living being from the microscopic plants and animals to man with his intellectual and moral endowments which reflect the image of his Maker. You will, therefore, appreciate Ram Mohun Roy better when you find him strenuously opposing the establishment of a Sanskrit school by the Government "as best calculated to keep this country in darkness," and advocating "a more liberal and enlightened system of instruction, embracing mathematics, natural philosophy, chemistry, and anatomy, with other useful sciences, which the natives of Europe have carried to a degree of perfection that has raised them above the inhabitants of other parts of the world." Thus Ram Mohun Roy, with an insight which was a marvel in those days, saw that the true basis of positive knowledge by which alone man could rise to the true conception of the Deity was furnished by these physical sciences, and, Gentlemen, if you study these sciences in the proper spirit the conviction will be forced upon you that standing on that basis as the rock whose foundations are eternal and infinite, man cannot deviate very far from the truth without coming back to it by a natural gravitation. Thus, Gentlemen, you see that though born in India, in an obscure village of Bengal, Ram Mohun Roy belonged to the world. His life, it is true, was devoted solely and exclusively to the amelioration of his country, but his sympathies embraced the whole human race. So that he can be claimed as their own not only by his church, but by every man and every woman of India, nay by every man and every woman of the whole world. You have determined to conclude this evening's proceedings by chanting some religious songs. May I request that one at least of these should be one of those incomparable songs which Ram Mohun Roy has bequeathed to us? Gentlemen, I cannot miss this opportunity to tell you that in my humble opinion these songs, in point of religious fervour and sublime sentiment, would not suffer by comparison with any sacred song that has ever been composed. I challenge the literature of the whole world to produce a hymn equal to the one which he composed on landing in England :—

কি স্বদেশে কি বিদেশে যপায় তপায় থাকি।

তোমার রচনা মধো তোমাকে দেখিয়া ডাকি।

দেশ ভেদে কাল ভেদে রচনা অসংখ্য,

প্রতিজন সাক্ষী দেয় তোমার মহিমা।

তোমার প্রভাব দেখি না থাকি একাকী ॥

DOORGA POOJA IN THE COUNTRY. No. II.

TO THE EDITOR, Reis and Rayyet.

SIR,—In continuation of my letter of last week on this subject, may I solicit the favour of your publishing the following few lines in the next issue of your paper?

From my long observation of the celebration of the Pooja both in the urban and rural towns of Bengal, I have come to discern some peculiarities or, more properly speaking, some sort of difference, however slight, in regard to the immersion ceremony of the Pooja. In my native town of Krishnagar, the immersion ceremony, which takes place on the tenth of the moon—the last day of the Pooja—is performed in a manner somewhat different from what Holloway's Ointment and Pills—A Cure for Abscesses, Piles, Fistula, and Sores of every description. The very satisfactory results arising from the use of this invaluable Ointment, when the patients have been suffering from any of the above disorders, have induced the Medical Profession to introduce it into the hospitals and their private practice, and in many instances where the sufferer was considered incurable, Holloway's Ointment, in conjunction with his Pills, healed the most desperate cases. They are also unequalled for the cure of scrofula, scurvy, and all diseases of the skin, and the cures they effect are not temporary or imperfect, for by their purifying powers they bring about a marvellous and most beneficial change in the whole system, and enable it, with renovated powers, to resist the approach of all future attacks of the same disease.

I have seen in Calcutta. In days gone by, when the Krishnaghur Raj was, by reason of its unbounded authority in social matters, all supreme in the town, every citizen had to wait with his idol outside the Raja's Chawk (four large buildings forming a sort of fortification) till the Maharaja came out with his long retinue, consisting of elephants, chowpalkis, shukhashans, richly decked with rich embroidered cloths, flag-bearers, aska-burdars, chonta-burdars, et cetera to perform the last melancholy rites.

The Maharaja usually leaves his palace with his magnificent and large group of divinities just after the bar lala (the prohibited hour in the Hindu almanac) between the hours 4 and 5 O'clock in the afternoon, and as soon as he in his saffron coloured dress walking—without shoes—through the middle of the procession, advances a little way, on the high road, two hundred Doorga groups, accompanied by the elite of the Krishnaghur community, follow in succession to one another.

There is a beautiful method in this grand procession of divinities. It is regulated by considerations of social prestige of the different families in the town. Next to the Raja's divine group come those of his near relatives. The next in precedence is the statuary of the Barendra Brahman Chowdry Zemindar of the town. In this way, every house of consequence, with its group of gods, retinue, drummers, dhakis, is, in its place, pursuing one another, through one broad street, forming a long-drawn procession extending over a mile. The entire population of the town, numbering over 30,000, is seen crowding on the road-side, as well as on the balconies and roofs of the houses lying on both the sides of the high street of Krishnaghur. The large elephant of the Maharaja, painted artistically with various colours, and adorned with golden embroidered cloths, carrying a huge flag, proclaims from a distance that the Raj Pratima (the Raja's goddess) is coming. All sight-seers, however exalted their rank may be, stand up to shew respect to the Brahman Maharaja, who walks with slow, majestic steps, heralded by sounding Nakhi, followers, durwans, servants, all too numerous to be mentioned here in detail. The women folk lustily cheer him with oolons, as the noble personage proceeds on to the river-side, where the immersion takes place. When I was a young boy, I saw at the tail-end of the Raja's procession, a cart with large earthen pots filled with Pechona (water mixed with lime and haradra) and sweetmeat which used to be thrown among the by-standers. The Maharaja comes to the river-bank before five o'clock in the day, and after taking a little rest in the tent, specially erected for the occasion, looks at his watch, and just at the appointed hour of sunset, the idol is let down into the river Jellinghee. As soon as Mother Doorga is dropped down through the empty space between two boats kept in juxtaposition to one another, a bird locally called Neel Kanta Pakki (a bird with blue neck) and a Shunka kite are freed and sent flying in the air. The Maharaja, it is said, watches their auspicious flight, bathes in the river, mounts his Shakha bana and comes back to his palace on the shoulders of his bearers. When he comes back, only one of the band sounds occasionally his trumpet along the long march extending over a mile from the river to the Rajbati. In the town of Krishnaghur, it is generally considered a sacrilege to perform the dipping ceremony after nightfall. But, in Calcutta, the practice is otherwise. To a Brahman scholar and student like your honoured self, the custom of the flight of a kite and Neel Kanta Pakki, on the melancholy occasion of the consigning of Mother Doorga to the river is too curious to be lost. I do not know what it signifies, and hope you will enlighten the public as to its meaning and moral.

THE HYDERABAD DIAMOND CASE.

MANIFESTO BY THE NIZAM.

Hyderabad, October 3.

THE following Manifesto, in the shape of a letter from H. H. the Nizam to H. E. the Minister, was issued to-day in the Hyderabad Government Gazette:—"Your Excellency,—I have been informed, and have also received some memorials asking me to believe, that some of my subjects take exception to the Commission issued to take down my evidence in the diamond case. It is said that the idea of a reigning prince giving evidence in a judicial matter is distasteful to the people, as being derogatory to his dignity as a ruler, and foreign to the usage of the country. This expression of opinion seems to me, on consideration, to be traceable to several sources. First and foremost, it emanates from men actuated entirely by a feeling of loyalty and devotion to the person of their ruler, so characteristic of the people of Hyderabad, but it is to be feared that in the case of some of them it is due to a desire to create in my mind a distrust of the faithful officials who have been acting for me in this matter, and to bring discredit on the administration, and possibly in the case of a few individuals to a design to get rid of the commission and thus defeat the prosecution. I am fully satisfied that the great majority of those who have any feelings on the subject belong to the first class, and I am pleased to think that I hold such a high place in the affections of my people. It is the pride and privilege of a ruler to be loved by his subjects. For the rest it is only necessary to say that every step taken by my officials in this matter has been taken with my knowledge and approval, and that it is my pleasure that the law should take its course, whatever the result may prove to be. The feeling expressed by the first-mentioned class, however, gives me concern, and I shall therefore be pleased if your Excellency will cause this letter to be published in the Fareeda, in order to remove the misapprehension under which they seem to be labouring. The fact, in brief, is that Mr. Jacob came to me highly recommended, and I was led to place in him greater trust than he deserved. The result was that he acted in such a manner that it became necessary to take criminal proceedings against him. Assuming that this could have been done in one of the Courts here, it was nevertheless found more expedient to institute proceedings at Calcutta, with result that the diamond was at once recovered, together with a considerable sum of money, from Mr. Jacob and placed in deposit, and Mr. Jacob himself was arrested and only enlarged on bail pending trial. As for the Commission, it is not perhaps generally known to the people of Hyderabad that it has been issued at the request of my own lawyers, a request preferred with my knowledge and approval. It was the opinion of the best legal authorities engaged on my behalf that my evidence was absolutely necessary, in order to complete the case. The same necessity would have arisen had the case been tried in Hyderabad, since my own Courts are not now what they were at one time, being presided over by able and conscientious Judges who would never have decided the case in the absence of my evidence. It has been remarked that written questions might have been sent to me, to which I might have replied in writing. Such a course, however, could only suggest itself to one ignorant of law and procedure, for, putting aside British law and saying nothing of my own earnest desire that Mr. Jacob, whatever cause of complaint I may have against him, should have a fair trial and the fullest opportunity of defending himself, it will be found that Mahomedan jurists themselves in such cases refuse to admit against either party evidence obtained in writing in reply to a written question, or set of questions without the parties concerned being given an opportunity of cross-examining the witness. It is true that the Courts at Hyderabad were accustomed in the old day to accept such replies, or even a simple letter, from either party as evidence; but this lamentable state of things was due to the fact that the Government of the day was weak, and therefore unable to support the administration against the influence of the nobles and other powerful men; and the judges, however able and well inclined, were not in a position to maintain their independence. It can easily be imagined under the circumstance, how much the rulers of the day had to answer for, and I feel perfectly assured that when my subjects are made aware of these reasons, they will not for a moment consent that their present ruler should lay himself open to the same animadversion in this world, or incur a similar responsibility in the next. It may be said, however, that it was worth while risking the loss caused by Mr. Jacob's conduct in order to save myself from the supposed indignity of giving evidence; but a little reflection will show that such a course would in the first place have amounted to holding out a premium to other persons to act as Mr. Jacob has done, and furthermore the people of Hyderabad would have been confirmed in an erroneous estimate of the dignity of their Sovereign, equally foreign to the faith of a true Mussulman and his most cherished traditions. The holy Koran clearly and emphatically declares, that witnesses shall not excuse themselves when they are called, and the proudest and most powerful Mussulman Prince must bow to the precedent of Ali, when he—a Khalif of the time and Prince of the Faithful—appeared as a litigant before one of his own courts of justice; and of Hassan and Hossain, the grandsons of the Prophet, when they appeared before the same Court as witnesses. I, whom the grace of God has made a ruler of over twelve millions of men, dare not place myself above the nearest and dearest relations of our Prophet, whose veriest slave and bondsman it would be my glory and my pride to be. As for the usage of the world and the custom sanctioned by other princes and rulers, it is only necessary to refer to His Imperial Highness the Prince of Wales, who appeared in person more than once before some of the English Courts, to give evidence. In conclusion, I wish my well-beloved subjects, of all classes and ranks, nobles, jagirdars, soldiers, and people in general, whom I look upon as my children, to understand clearly, and once for all that what ever may have been the usage of former times, and whatever privileges any other ruling prince or sovereign may choose to set up for himself, I do not wish to claim any privilege higher than what has been granted to me by God and His Prophet, and I hope and pray that God may give me strength to abide by this resolve to the last day of my life.

Yours sincerely,

MIR MAHBOOB ALI KHAN.

To his Excellency the Nawab Sir Asman Jah Bahadoor, K. C. I. E., Prime Minister."

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE DEAD CHILD.

LET in the light of the fair sun,
And leave me here alone ;
This hour with thee must be the last,
My dear, unspotted one !

Thy bier waits in the silent street,
And voiceless men are there ;
While, in sad, solemn intervals,
The bell strikes on the air.

Through the bare trees the autumn wind
With rustling song complains
To the deep vales, and echoing hills,
In sad funeral strains.

And this is death ;—these heavy eyes,
This eloquent, sweet face,
Where beauty, throned in innocence,
Sat with celestial grace.

These limbs, whose chiselled marble lines
But shame the sculptor's skill,
In more than mortal slumber wrapt,
Unconscious, cold and still.

Seal up the fountains of mine eyes,
This is no place for tears ;
These are but painted images,
That mock my hopes and fears.

Backward, this little hand in mine,
Feeling thou still art here,
I trace the blissful joys and cares
That filled thy short career.

The bright intelligence that gleamed
From out these infant eyes
Seems still to point, with blessed beams,
The pathway to the skies.

But this is death ! beneath whose touch,
Cold, unrelenting power !
Beauty's unwithered garlands fall,
To perish in an hour.

Take up the bier, and bear it hence—
It were in vain to weep ;
But gently, and with noiseless step,
As to the couch of sleep.

The measured journey to the grave
Is dark to him who fears
To scan the blotted memories
Of unrepented years.

To us who bear this child to-day
No pang like this is given ;
The door we shut upon its tomb
Encloses it in heaven.

THE MOANS OF THE OCEAN.

STREAMS that sweep where thousands languish
On the mountain, in the glen,
Seaward bear each cry of anguish
Uttered by the sons of men—
Hence it is that ever ocean
Hath so sad, so deep a moan—
Calm, or lashed in wild commotion
Therefore is its dirge-like tone.

Moaning for the dead and dying,
With its ever voiceful waves,
For the countless forms that lying,
Whiten in its coral caves.
Earth the broken-hearted pillows,
Rivers tell it to the sea,
Shall not ocean with its billows,
Their eternal mourner be ?

YONAH

LAST WISHES OF A CHILD

BY JAMES T. FIELDS.

" All the hedges are in bloom,
And the warm west wind is blowing
Let me leave this stifled room,
Let me go where flowers are growing "

" Look ! my cheek is thin and pale,
And my pulse is very low,
Ere my sight begins to fail,
Take my hand and let us go.

" Was not that the robin's song
Piping through the casement wide ?
I shall not be listening long,
Take me to the meadow-side—

" Bear me to the willow-brook—
Let me hear the merry mill—
On the orchard I must look,
Ere my beating heart is still.

" Faint and fainter grows my breath—
Bear me quickly down the lane ;
Mother dear, this chill is death—
I shall never speak again "

Still the hedges are in bloom,
And the warm west wind is blowing ;
Still we sit in silent gloom—
O'er her grave the grass is growing.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

LORD LANSDOWNE is touring in Cashmere. He left Simla in thunder, lightning and in rain. More fortunate than Lord Ripon, fair weather awaited his entry into the Valley Happy, to be succeeded by a spell of foul—as if to warn him of the compliments of the season in store in case he failed to behave himself. It is to be hoped the visit will set His Excellency right with the Maharaja and the trip thoroughly reestablish his Lordship in health.

SIR Charles Elliott left Darjeeling on the 26th October for his Behar tour, reaching Bankipore on the 27th at 11-55 P.M. by the ordinary passenger train, which was late by fifteen minutes.

MR. F. J. Marsden has returned to his own, as Chief Presidency Magistrate. His locum tenens Mr. Handley signalized his last term in the Police Court by the issue of the Hyderabad Commission to examine the Nizam. Before making over charge, Mr. Handley committed jeweller Jacob to the Sessions.

THE Sessions will open on Monday, the 30th November, the High Court resuming regular work on Thursday the 12th November.

THE University Examination season draws nigh. A test examination of private students, namely, those who have not studied in any institution since the 1st September 1891, for the ensuing Entrance Examination will be held at the office of the Inspector of Schools, Presidency Circle, 4, Dalhousie Square, Calcutta, on the 8th and 9th December next. Deputy Inspectors, Sub-Inspectors, and bond fide teachers of recognized English schools, in the Presidency and Chota Nagpur Divisions, are eligible for this examination on certain conditions.

THE Amrita Bazar Patrika says:—

"The crushed kurkutch salt is gradually replacing the salt imported from foreign countries, and the Bengal Government considers that 'the result is a subject for congratulation, since salt is an article which India ought to manufacture for itself, and not to import.'"

Thereupon, "we must say," remarks the voracious political Patrika,

"We must say, that this desirable improvement in the taste of the people is mainly due to the Age of Consent Act."

Much as the Goodwin Sands were mainly due to the Tenterden steeple.

HERE is a bulletin from "society":—

"One of the latest fashions is making tea in a little silver ball. It is said by tea connoisseurs to be very healthy. You get the pure tea with as little tannic acid as possible. And there is nothing that shows off a pretty hand to such advantage."

THE death of the Earl of Portsmouth gives the Peerage the first Quakerless Countess, the wife of the son and heir of the late Earl, Viscount Lynton, having been a Miss Pease, a daughter of the well-known broad-brimmed family of that name.

D. A. APPAYA NAIDU, the Deputy Tahsildar of Tekkali, was sentenced, by the Sessions Judge of Ganjam, to four months' simple imprisonment and a fine of Rupees one thousand, for submitting a false nil return of land in his enjoyment and repeating the same false return in a subsequent revenue enquiry. There was an appeal to the High Court of Madras. The Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Wilkinson set aside the conviction and acquitted the prisoner. They held that Naidu was undoubtedly guilty of an offence but not under the Penal Code. He might be punished departmentally, but the Code did not contemplate such an offence. He was not legally bound to furnish the information and there was no evidence that the information he had furnished was false.

AT Vienna they have just discovered—too late by many years—the evidence of a great crime—a systematic robbery on a colossal scale extended through years by a magnificent scoundrel:—

"Early in the century attention was fixed in Austria on one Peter Chevalier, known as Peter De Boors. He had followed the French armies in Holland and Italy, and by his own account made a fortune as an army contractor. It was evident that he rolled in wealth. But the Austrian Government could never find out any trace of his commissariat dealings. Nevertheless he became the boss of Linz on the Danube, and was a rival of the Prince of Turn and Taxis in spending money. At the end of twenty years the Viennese Bank found that about £600,000 of notes had been forged from the time that De Boors came to Linz. He was suspected of being the forger, but as no material evidence could be found against him he died out of prison and was buried with great pomp. The other day the house in which he lived was being demolished, when the workmen, in pulling it down, found his press for printing the bank-notes and other implements. His descendants enjoy his fortune and will continue to do so, the law of limitation being in their favour."

Some sociological antiquarian might enquire whether any Police Superintendents suddenly grew rich, and, above all, any bank clerks.

THE Russian Government has sanctioned a large sum for a Russian archæological and ethnographical institution at Constantinople.

THE Overland Mail concludes a dispassionate article on "The Bangabasi Prosecution" with the words:—

"It is to be earnestly hoped that the Government both here and in India will leave matters of this kind for the future to the action of time and education. It is to be hoped also that when the next general election comes on, and the usual number of Bengali Baboos begin to canvass for seats in Parliament, the British elector, even in his hankering after strange meats, will consider whether men who support the Bangabasi and consider the Age of Consent Act a grievance, are fit representatives of English men and women."

MR. W. M. Conway, the wellknown Alpinist climber and author, will shortly lead an expedition of British Philistines to the Himalyan Glaciers.

THE charge of theft against the Parsee lady, Meherbai, brought by Manockji Hormusjee, has, we see, fallen through, and she has been set free and her bail bond and personal recognizances have been cancelled. But who will indemnify her for all that she has suffered in consequence of this precipitate accusation?—four days' imprisonment followed by 23 days' suspense on bail and recognizance, to say nothing of the other incidents involved in the fate of a defendant in a criminal court?

THE Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Handley of the Madras High Court have held that a petition of appeal filed through the post is not a presentation within the meaning of section 419 of the Criminal Procedure Code. A pleader would have been all right. It is time though that at the Post and the Telegraph should be recognized in this connection

THE Bombay Gazette, of Oct. 24, says:—

"When the Protected Age Act was spontaneously incorporated by the Maharajah of Bhownuggur in the laws of his State, the measure was interpreted by the Government of India as one amongst many reasons for believing that they had not in this matter gone so far in advance of native opinion as they were charged with having gone. The attitude of the Maharajah of Jeypore in regard to early marriages in his State tells powerfully in the same direction, and now there comes from one of the most influential States in India a new indication of the concurrence of enlightened native opinion in the spirit of Sir Andrew Scoble's Act. At the recent Dussera Assembly of Mysore—the first assembly in the State, be it noted, which has been constituted on representative principles—some of the delegates urged that being a Hindu Government the Government of Mysore could legislate with more freedom than the Government of India upon matters relating to Hindu society. Accordingly it was suggested that the Protected Age Act should be adopted for Mysore, and that infant marriages and the marriages of men of over forty with young girls should be prohibited. Of course the conservative party made themselves heard in opposition to this, and it was scarcely to be expected that the Maharajah's Government would at once accept the invitation to put themselves in line with the British Government in this matter. The Dewan pleaded for fuller discussion before taking action on so important a subject—which was what might have been expected. But the reactionary delegates can scarcely have been prepared for Mr. Shesadri Iyer's admission that the marriage of young girls by others than actual parents to men of advanced age was a public evil which the State might well interfere with. For this is a practice for which it is just as easy to find Shastric authority as for others which the Mysore Dewan thinks the State had better leave alone for the present. However it was a significant discussion, showing as it did that there is a spontaneous and real movement towards better things in the premier Hindu State in India.

Such symptoms would be satisfactory enough only if they were real. One at least of the above instances we have been assured was a mere juggle.

THE following editorial note appears in the South of India Observer of the 10th October:—

"Many papers have, of late, been calling upon their subscribers to pay up or look out!"

That is all. And it is sufficient. Nothing more is needed for force.

THE following staggering passage appears in the same paper:—

"The Chief Commissioner (Bengal) is prepared to procure the services of a specialist to examine into the mineral resources of any estates at Coorg, if the Planters' Association so desire it."

IN view of the great advantage to health which might ensue in crowded Indian cities by the adoption of a really scientific method of cremation, the Pioneer throws out a hint that Government, or at all events municipal bodies, might be doing well in keeping open house, so to speak, for the national dead, and giving all comers the hospitality of the fiery chamber free of charges or fees.

If a free fiery chamber for the national dead could be started without national opposition, such a salutary disposal might, with greater safety, be adopted for the unclaimed dead of whatever nationality.

A NUMBER of medical practitioners and others are being tried, at Odessa, for conspiring to procure, by illegal means, the physical disqualification of Jewish conscripts. The doctors would do greater good to humanity if they could develop the method to eradicate, or prevent skin diseases altogether, or, at any rate, arrest their heredity.

THE Dainik of the 25th October says:—"Good-news. It is said that the Secretary of State has ordered the payment of rupees ten monthly to the widow of Sheikh Selim, who met with his death at the hands of O'Hara and others of Dum Dum. We shall be happy if the news proves true."

Your happiness may be cheaply earned, Dainik Bahoo, if you will take the slightest pains to enquire. Dum Dum is but a few minutes' journey. But these papers which would circulate the wildest stories about places like Manipur, of the geography of which they are ignorant, would not step out a dozen steps from their door to verify an account.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE distress down South is distinctly diminishing. The prospect in Burma too is looking up. Not so in the parched tract of Rajasthan. There is abundance of food for man, however, specially in the British centre, Ajmere. But even there cattle have no subsistence.

THE prospect of rice in Bengal is gloomy indeed. The state of the plants was promising enough up to the end of September. But, as usually happens whenever there is a failure of the October rains, the aspect of things is now very different. Famine is now apprehended and will be certain if there be not a good shower of rain at once.

THE Madras Government has been endeavouring to bring in rain by the explosion of dynamite in the higher regions of the atmosphere. The experiment is well worth trying just now in Bengal also. Jesus Christ said "knock and it shall be opened unto you." Our scientists promise the same result now. It behoves us therefore to see what we can gain in a crisis like the present by battering at the gates of heaven.

The idea is by no means new. It has been known from a long time in India.

WE have it on the authority of the Liverpool Courier that there is not only a Moslem Institute at Liverpool, but that it has recently received an important accession to its strength by the conversion of a clergyman of the Established Church to the Faith of Islam. So mournful an event for Christendom has scarcely occurred in Western Europe since the Middle Ages. The secession of John Henry Newman and the Tractarians was nothing to this. We sympathise with our British fellow-subjects in their humiliation.

IF we are to believe all that has appeared of late in the papers relating to the movements of "General" Booth, his mission, or to use his own metaphorical phraseology, his "campaign" in Australia has been attended with remarkable success. Yet, after all, he must be a bad "general" indeed who carried on aggressive wars abroad while his ground at home was slipping away behind him, and the stronghold which forms the base of his operations was threatened.

THE profit which the shipowners and merchants of England have been making during the last thirty-five years, by the success of their iniquitous agitation for the abolition of salt manufacture in Bengal, is about to be diverted to other channels. It appears from the latest reports relating to our foreign commerce, that the import of German and Arabian salt is steadily increasing and threatens to oust Liverpool from our markets. If our "patriots" have any idea of their business, they ought to get up an agitation now in order to have the salt industry in the seaboard of Bengal restored to its former footing. It is mere idle talk to say that, although the Government monopoly which existed before has been abolished, the manufacture of salt by the people is not prohibited. That the fiscal regulations render local manufacture practically impossible, ought to appear clear from the fact that, although the cost of production of salt in the sea coast of Bengal and Orissa cannot exceed six annas per maund, yet the people there are not only unable to compete with foreign salt, but actually buy it for home consumption at Rs. 3-12 per maund, including the duty of Rs. 2-8.

THE importance of having the milch cows in and near the large towns regularly inspected by skilled veterinary surgeons, cannot be overestimated. It is therefore somewhat astonishing that neither our legislators nor our civic rulers have yet taken any action whatever in the matter. The want of duly qualified cattle inspectors is at present perhaps the stumbling block in the way. Sir Charles Elliott, it is said, intends to open a veterinary school in or near Calcutta before long. Such an institution is badly wanted.

ACCORDING to official returns, the number of deaths caused in India last year by snake bite, was 21,412, nearly half of these having occurred in Bengal alone. The total extirpation of the cobra and the kerar may not be within the range of practical politics. But we think some good might be done by entertaining the services of professional snake catchers for the destruction of the venomous reptiles, in tracts where they are known to abound. The system of granting rewards for snakes actually killed, has not been attended with any marked success, and practically the money which is expended for the purpose is thrown away for nothing.* In last year's Resolution on the subject, the Government of India pronounced against the system, and suggested that pressure should be brought to bear upon municipal Committees to keep village sites and surroundings clear of jungle and refuse. We feel no doubt that the mofussil municipalities can do something in the matter, though not exactly in the way suggested by the Government. But as snakes abound more in the villages than in the towns, their destruction to an appreciable extent can be brought about only by entertaining the services of snake catchers and making them work under the District Boards, Local Boards, &c. What is wanted most is the periodical inspection of the huts of the villagers by the snake destroyers.

THE Calcutta Corporation proposes to take more power for control of theatres. The following byelaw awaits confirmation by the Local Government:—

"Every owner of a theatre or other place of public resort, shall, within 14 days after he shall have received notice from the Commissioners so to do, provide such urinal or latrine as, in the opinion of the Commissioners, may be necessary for the frequenters of the said theatre or other said place of public resort, and the site and construction of the said urinal or latrine shall be subject to the approval of the Commissioners."

The existing byelaw runs thus:—

"Every theatre or other place of public resort shall have such latrine accommodation as the Commissioners may, from time to time, require."

We hope the present is not an attempt to force Macfarlanes on the theatres. Mr. Cramenburg, the Pleader and enterprising law publisher, could tell the public how this patent is recommended to owners or lessees of theatres at the point of the—Municipal Act. A Macfarlane, after all, though a decent and neat structure, is as bad as any other urinal. The one set up in the south-west corner of Wellington Square in April last, has already begun to spread its odoriferous miasma in the neighbourhood.

WE read in a Bombay paper that Mr. F. S. P. Lely, the Collector and Agent of the Governor, gave an Evening Party on the 24th, at which the creme de la creme of the Smit community were present, numbering some 300 Europeans and native gentlemen. "Mrs. Lely was unremittingly assiduous in making the gathering the success it became. One of the most striking features of the party was the condescension of the European officials in mixing themselves freely with natives and attending to the personal wants and comforts of each individual member." Each guest, we find, had a garland placed round his neck and presented with a nosegay.

Such a gathering is a rarity in Bengal. Even if the Covenanted Whites condescend to meet the native Blacks on equal terms, the Covenanted Blacks refuse to lend their august presence to a Party in which uncovenanted and noncognizable Blacks may be invited. To take the latest instance, Sir Charles Elliott had asked all Dajeeeling during the holidays, on the 15th October, to a Garden at Shrubbery. It was a great success. Every one who cared to attend at His Honor's call went home highly delighted with the charming manners of the Lieutenant-Governor and his lady. It was a sight to see great Civilians like Secretaries Buckland and Risley talking all grace to the 7th grade assistants and the pure white ladies—their number was limited—seeking an opportunity of conversation with the black oleaginous Baboo of the Secretariat." It is whispered two native Civilians, high in the service, kept away from the Party to which humble clerks had been commanded. Perhaps, Sir Charles, in his thorough way, will want to know the reason why.

MONDAY afternoon was occupied by Lord Lansdowne and party in visiting the Maharaja's hospital at Srinagar and Collection of curiosities and local manufactures, and witnessing the game of polo as practised by the inhabitants of Skardo. Like everything notable in this world, the origin of Polo is involved in obscurity. It is a question, who invented Polo? as men still ask who invented plum-pudding? or who wrote Homer? The Skardowallahs certainly contest with the Manipuris for the honor. And on very substantial grounds. Indeed, both races are well entitled to the credit.

THE trial, in the Bombay Sessions Court, of Dorabjee Dhunjeebhoy Shroff, the Parsee Assistant Manager of the Oriental Life Assurance Company, charged with criminal breach of trust of (1) Rs. 19,490-13-1, (2) Rs. 33,828-12-10 and (3) Government promissory notes of the value of Rs. 2,45,000, resulted in the acquittal of the accused. The actual date of embezzlement was not proved, and the point was reserved by Mr. Justice Bayley, the presiding Judge, like Mr. Justice Prinsep of Calcutta, in the prosecution of Shama Churn Sen of this city. In his charge to the jury, the Judge remarked:

"It was the duty of the prosecution to make out, for the satisfaction of the jury, such facts as would lead them to find the prisoner guilty, but if they had any doubts upon the matter they should give him the benefit. It had been said that all the matters rested on books, and it was to be regretted that no check of any kind was put on the accused as the amount of Government paper purchased was very large. In the interest of the shareholders, his Lordship thought that the practice should be amended, and asked the jury if they were satisfied with the books, there being no suggestion that they had ever been tampered with. The accused had every opportunity of altering them as he liked, no one checked his accounts from one year's end to another. The case, however, did not rest there, the prosecution relying on the communications which he had sent to a clerk and Mr. Slater. They had it that the accused took the key of the safe away with him and went up-country, from whence he sent the telegram stating that the G. P. was all right. What did G. P. mean? His Lordship said the prosecution had pointed to an entry, either written by the accused or initialled by him, in which it was shown in the books as meaning Government paper, and if this was so, the prisoner at the time of sending the telegram must have known that the paper was not in the safe. That was strong evidence against the prisoner, the prosecution relying very strongly on it as well as the letters, as a distinct admission of guilt, he having said that he alone was to blame. It was satisfactory to know that he did not blame his subordinates or Mr. Slater, (the Manager) the latter who had behaved, he said, like a father to him. On the other hand it was said the letters were vague and only a general admission of dishonesty, and it would be the duty of the jury to decide in what light they regarded the letters. Referring to the law on the subject, his Lordship said that two cases had been cited from the Calcutta Courts in which the accused had been discharged, and said that the rulings of the Calcutta Courts did not affect those of the Bombay High Court, and read to the jury a decision by Chief Justice Cockburn and three other Judges, which was to the effect that an aggregate of offences could be proved even if the date was not accurately fixed. In the present case his Lordship thought the best course he could follow was to inform the jury of the law and ask them to apply their minds to it and consider if the prisoner was guilty or not, his Lordship not thinking it desirable, as had been done in Calcutta, to direct them in what manner to return the verdict. He thought it unnecessary to tell them that it had been conclusively proved that the prosecution had shown that a defalcation was discovered on the 16th April, but owing to the want of supervision in the office it was quite impossible to arrive at the exact date upon which the money was taken. He expressed a hope that he had placed the salient points of the case before the jury in the very difficult case, in which the prisoner had been most ably represented. It was a great help to the jury to have the case for the prisoner put before them as ably and clearly as Mr. Judine had done; for the prosecuting counsel had merely to place all the points he could against the prisoner keeping out of sight altogether any points which might stand in favour of the accused."

The Jury retired for thirty minutes, and returned a verdict of not guilty on the first two charges, and a divided verdict on the third, namely, 6 not guilty and 3 guilty, the three coupling their opinion with recommendation to mercy, on account of the lax manner in which the books and accounts of the company had been kept. The Judge, concurring with the verdict of the majority, ordered the discharge of the prisoner. There was cheering among the Parsees who had mustered strong in Court.

ON the 19th September last, we reported the prosecution, by Mr. C. W. Christian, a minister of the Gospel, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, at Bangalore, of Mr. J. W. Hayes, junior, barrister-at-law, of the same place, for defamation. At that trial, in the presence of the magistrate, Colonel Magrath, who advised the complainant to accept the verbal apology the accused was willing to make, Mr. Hayes libelled his adversary saying "you cheated people in Hyderabad, and had to leave the ministry." The Magistrate seems to have taken no notice of the remark, but Mr. Christian had asked him to take it down and he came down upon Mr. Hayes with a second prosecution for defamation.

Holloway's Pills.—The Greatest Wonder of Modern Times.—They correct bile, prevent flatulency, cleanse the liver, and purify the system, renovate the debilitated, strengthen the stomach, increase the appetite, invigorate the nerves, promote health, and reinstate the weak to an ardour of feeling never before expected. The sale of these Pills throughout the globe astonishes everybody, convincing the most sceptical that there is no Medicine equal to Holloway's Pills for removing the complaints which are incidental to the human race. They are indeed a blessing to the afflicted, and a boon to those who suffer from disorder, internal or external. Thousands of persons have testified that by their use alone they have been restored to health after other remedies had proved unsuccessful.

That complaint was heard by Captain Ravenshaw, and he has sentenced Hayes to a fine of rupees 300 or one month's simple imprisonment. The defence admitted the defamation but pleaded the privilege of an accused. The Magistrate overruled the plea saying:—

"Accused was not at the time making any statement as an accused person, nor were the words spoken in any statement made by accused in his defence, nor formed any part of the written statement tendered by him, and the accused at the time was under trial for using words uttered on a different occasion of a different purport. The expressions now complained against were uttered voluntarily, and cannot be accepted as a part of the proceedings which were carried on before Col. Magrath on September 2nd. The result of the proceedings on September 2nd was that accused admitted his fault by tendering an apology. The case referred to in Queen's Bench Division, Master v. Lamb particularly refers to an action against an advocate for defamatory words spoken with reference to and in the course of an inquiry before a judicial tribunal, and although in the course of the judgment the benefit of the privilege enjoyed by an advocate is ruled to extend to parties and witnesses, I am not prepared to accept this in the unqualified sense which accused's Counsel would have me accept it, and while admitting that there are certain occasions on which the privileges can extend to an accused person, I consider that the rulings under the Indian Law are sufficiently clear; when they occur otherwise there would be no protection against the vilest abuse and defamation which an accused person might say against his prosecutors. The Indian Law Reports quoted therefore are most useful in defining these occasions and point to statements which might be termed defamatory, being privileged when uttered in the course of pleading and arguments as that on P. 29, Vol. 10, Madras Law Reports, Sullivan v. Norton, while the statement complained of on page 97, 14, Bombay Law Reports, was made in the petition submitted for defence in a civil action, and was obviously made for the protection and interest of the person who made it. Similarly at page 110, Mysore Law Reports, Vol. 7, it was ruled that the statement was made with due care and attention for the protection of the defendant's own interests, and they were not wholly untrue so as to imply bad faith. The circumstances of the present case are not in my opinion similar to those under which defamatory statements were held to be 'privileged' in the above quoted ruling. No attempt has been made to show that there was an atom of truth in the imputation made, or that it was made bona fide, and admitting that there was some latent bad feeling between the parties none is put forward as an excuse or aggravation. I accordingly hold that the defamatory statement was not privileged nor the accused privileged in making it."

THE prosecution of the Indian Mirror for libel in the Lucknow Magistracy has been compromised—but not before both the editor and his printer had been dragged up to the capital of Oudh and presented for exhibition before a gaping crowd. The editor expressed his regret and apologised for allowing two Lucknow letters—the subject of the complaint—to appear in his daily, and withdrew all the imputations. That satisfied his good natured assailant, and we shall hear no more of the complaint. The editor and printer were at first excused personal attendance, but had subsequently to present themselves to the far off magistrate, who then allowed them leave to keep away in Calcutta, when the time would come for him to pass the final orders.

OVER-RULING a circular of the District Magistrate and setting aside the order under it of a Deputy Magistrate of Sarun, the Vacation Bench of the Bengal High Court have held that a client is not to be restricted to the number of pleaders or muktears. He is free to engage any number of them, but the number of pleaders addressing a court on one side was to be regulated according to the practice obtaining in that court.

OUR remarks on the case of the French newspaper of Chandernagore have, we see, touched our contemporary to the quick. We trench upon delicate ground and were quite aware of the risk we ran. We freely apologise for having, in pursuit of a benevolent mission, caused him pain.

The Petit Bengali notices our comments on Dourga Charan Roquitte's proceedings against it with characteristic spirit. The defendant-under-sentence's sang froid—we have to go to his own tongue for the appropriate word to describe his attitude—is charming. He has no notion of contempt of court, from which, indeed, his downright earnestness saves him. But his scorn for the enemy is simply immortal. He curseth most who knoweth best, we suppose. Our contemporary says:—

"Commenting on the action of Babu Dourga Charan Roquitte against the Petit Bengali, Reis and Rayyet expressed regret that common friends did not interpose between the parties. We thank him for this good thought, but it is evident that he knows little the Babu whose enemy we have become in trying to purge Chandernagore of his poison. There could be no reconciliation between the Petit Bengali with Dourga but by gagging the journal. It is not the bold editor of Reis and Rayyet who would make such a proposition! No, one could not be in the good graces of M. Dourga but by becoming his very humble servant, a part, our Editor has never consented to play, not even when he worked in conjunction for the foundation at Calcutta of the firm Dourga Charan Roquitte & Co., to which M. Dourga is indebted for all his fortune, and some distractions that he has gained.

"The Reis and Rayyet concludes that the Petit Bengali is not perhaps an enterprise peculiarly prosperous, that M. Dourga was not bound to avail himself of the benefit of the judgment by claiming the damage adjudged. Our contemporary perhaps had no mind to offend us, yet he offends us deeply in believing us capable of any bargain whatever with Dourga. At first we look forward to the appeal, afterwards if the journal can not continue it will stop but never sell itself."

THE Maharaja of Punná has asked the Government of India for a mineralogist to explore his state, to ascertain its gem-producing resources. Punná is one of the oldest diamond-producing tracts in the world, and gives name to one kind of the gem. The mines are now exhausted. But as they have hitherto been worked under the rude primitive system, it might be worth trying a more organized method under scientific direction. When the Maharaja was last here he evinced a commendable interest in the progress of science. He cultivated the acquaintance of Father Laloni, visited the Observatory at St. Xavier's College and other institutions, and made many inquiries, not omitting the subject of the precious minerals. From that time, we believe, he has been on the look out for an expert in economic geology who might discover reefs of precious stones in his territory and help him to work them with profit. He has to this day apparently not yet got one. We do not know that the Government of India has a specialist of the kind required to lead. If it is disposed to help the Maharaja, one will have to be engaged. Nor are such experts to be had for the asking even in Europe, we suppose. The most useful for the Maharaja's purpose would be a scientific man who has had experience in the Southern Hemisphere. A high premium will be demanded by such a man.

We would advise the Raja to extend the scope of his inquiry to the mineral resources of his State, instead of confining it to gem-producing resources. He has had enough of gems. For hundreds of years, Punná has produced diamonds without being any the richer for it. On the contrary, she has many a time suffered from the envy of neighbours and the cupidity of her liege lords on account of the natural advantage. It speaks not a little for the moderation of the British Paramountcy that the autonomy of this insignificant principality has been so long spared. At any rate, the addition of a gold or even a silver mine would not be amiss. But it was time for the Maharaja to be disabused of the notion that gems and costly minerals are the only or chief sources of national wealth. The Maharaja is by no means singular in his prepossession. Most of our Princes, Hindu or Mohamedan, share it. Indeed, the prejudice runs all through native society. From some statements that we have read, the Punná State did not appear to make much by its mines. The general impression has always prevailed that Punná was not only rich in mines but also rich from them. No doubt, the income was always understood to be out of all proportion to its general resources, Punná being a small tract of bleak hill thinly populated. Yet, in the earlier part of the century, when the revenue from the mines was divided between the three neighbouring States of Punná, Banda and Chikari, the entire yield of the mines was estimated at a lac and Rs. 20,000 a year, so that the revenue received by the Punná Raja, who was entitled to the lion's share, amounted to only Rs. 30,000. A good iron or even coal mine is worth a dozen such miserable precious mines.

THE noticeable features in the last Dourga Pooja are the discontinuance of the nautches at the house of Raja Nabakissen of Shovabazar, the performance of the sandhi puja at two different hours, and a sympathetic article in the Englishman recommending the fortnight's holidays during the Poojas.

The Nautches at the Shovabazar Rajas', on both banks of Raja Nabakissen's Street, are famed from a long time. It is there, of all other parts of the metropolis, that the general Pooja interest centres. The tradition cherished by the family is that these nautches were instituted by Raja Nabakissen in commemoration of the victory of Plassey. Be that what it may have been, the former Rajas regarded them with special pride. Raja Sibkissen, the eldest son of Raja Rajkrishna, and grandson of Maharaja Nabakissen, had, after a gay youth, been, for many years, relegated to obscurity as a demented imbecile, before he was finally summoned out of the world. This was on the eve of the Doorga Pooja. There was sadness in Shovabazar. Not in sorrow for the dying Raja, who was simply dragging on the burden of existence and had long ceased to be of any account, but in anxiety for the festivities on the occasion of the Pooja. The worship might proceed, quietly, in some name or other; but the amusements must be stopped in case the Raja died. The poor dying man—the head of the family by blood, if shelved for incapacity—himself felt the gravity of the situation, and, in his last moments, strictly enjoined on his brothers Rajas Kabhkrishna and Kamalkrishna not to suspend the nautches owing to his death. We need scarcely add that the recommendation was strictly carried out. Though the pomp of the Pooja in the rajbati had ceased for sometime, our multiracial community still looked to the Shovabazar house for affording the public opportunities for sharing the superior secular delights of the Poojas. The wisdom of the present year, however, replaced the nautches by one of the city theatrical companies. It is a great fall from Maharaja Nabakissen to Maharaja Sir Narendra Krishna, K. C. I. E.

The Hindoos in particular were much exercised on a point of practice in the ritual. The most important part of the ceremony is the sacrifice at the exact time when the second day of the Doorga Pooja passed into the third, and to the distraction of the worshippers and the whole orthodox world, that chronological conjunction had this time been very differently calculated. In the absence of astronomical observations, the Hindu almanacs have not been able to keep pace with the progress of the stars and planets, which accounts for occasional differences of time for observance of essential ceremonies. On the present occasion, the Maharajas of Krishnagar and Burdwan and not half a dozen houses in Calcutta performed the Sandhipooja in the afternoon, while the hour for general observance was in the forenoon. The Calcutta minority includes the new nobility which could scarcely be expected to allow themselves to go to Heaven by the public entree of the mob of worshippers. There is great anxiety in the Hindu mind on the subject, however. For, if the true time has been missed, the whole proceedings—the fasts and feasts and gifts and elaborate ceremonies—have gone for nothing. The Doorga Pooja qua Pooja has been ultra vires—theologically. One gentleman, however, in this town, wiser than his generation, has adroitly ensured his passage to heaven, by holding that pooja on both the hours—to the confusion of the gods, the shasters and the shastris.

THE worst disaster to the poor in the late Pooja was the withdrawing of his usual largesses by that philanthropist unknown to fame, Kali Kristo Pranamk. His charities were not on the scale of his father, for the sufficient reason that the days of making money, in their profession at all events, have gone by. Still they amounted to a goodly figure—a figure that staggered the purse-proud plutocrats and shamed the titular sovereigns. This year, he has thought it prudent to withdraw his Pooja benefactions. The effect upon the poorer classes may be imagined. The quiet but really princely way in which Kabiraj Gunga Prasad Sen has celebrated the sibadh of his wife has more than made up for the other's inaction. This magnificent Vaidya freely threw open his purse, paid the beggars handsomely, besides feeding them well, and fed all castes. To the chief of the twice-born classes his homage was due, and it was meted out with a golden hand. But a true Hindu according to his lights, serving God without fear or favour of mortals, he had nothing to do with such of the Brahmans as have compromised themselves by accepting presents of the Peralis, thereby keeping out Mahamahapadhyaya Mohesh Chandra Nyayaratna and his servile crew.

! BABOO BIBBLEBABBLE.

POOR dear Joseph Clarke! He is much to be pitied. He came to grief at the Dublin Police-court for loving not wisely but too well, perhaps. He pursued ladies to the catholic church in Clarendon street and kissed them even while at their devotions. He resented the interference of the Police with his interesting proceedings and knocked down a couple of constables. He probably remembered the Poet's statement about a particular kind of attendance at divine service. Part of the congregation, to be sure, to church repair,

Not for the doctrine, but the music there:

If the church may be resorted to as to an opera for the music there, why not for any other light amusement? And what amusement so harmless as kissing? It may be done so airily and charmingly as not to hurt any Peri however delicate.

THE following is just now being circulated through the European press in this country as "a good example of the kind of error made frequently by educated Indians:"—

"A Deputy, Magistrate had applied for leave, but after a time, as it had not been granted, he went to the Magistrate and asked him to write again, saying 'You know, Sir, in the Secretariat they have a way of dovetailing things.' He had mixed up dovetailing and pigeon-holing."

Not necessarily so, by any means. The Baboo Deputy Saheb possibly meant what he said. There is nothing incoherent in his talk. In saying that they have a way of dovetailing things at the Secretariat, he was literally true to fact as well as to Her Majesty's tongue. The geniuses there have such a way of piecing together different and even conflicting correspondence, of taking the enclosures of excise on to educational circular. Pigeon-holing is one thing and dovetailing another. And the Secretariat is great at both. To pigeon-hole is, in general, to shelve—not quite to bundle out but rather bury alive. An application for leave can not, in the very nature of things, be treated this way. There is neither rhyme nor reason for burying it, much less to preserve it in the records as a testimony of neglect. But there is a good chance, more or less exigent according to the pressure on the despatching branch, of its being forwarded to the Protector of Emigrants or to the Chinese Amban. That is being dovetailed—not pigeon-holed.

It is quite possible that the native official had mixed up dovetailing and pigeon-holing. It is so natural. From dove to pigeon, the step is so easy. The things belong to the same category and are linked together by association of ideas. But this is no peculiarity of the Indian mind. The phenomenon is common to both natives and Europeans.

HALLIDAY II. goes into retirement immediately—without a pang. Smith the Simple succeeds. He has been confirmed on the Board of Revenue. It will be a short reign. His time too for retirement is nigh happy man! Mr. C. C. Stevens is spoken of as the next member. A just man, just the man to preside in a great judicial office. The accomplished Commissioner Mr. J. Beames, Bhagulpore Division, on furlough, is Gazetted for the Presidency Division, Mr. E. V. Westmacott continuing to act in that capacity till Mr. Beames' return. Mr. Lewis shortly turns his back on the service but not on India. The Commissioner of the Rajshyhe Division sinks into the Superintendent of the Cooch Behar State. He will draw a lower pay than his predecessor, to set right the finances of the State. Mr. P. Nolan, of the Bengal Government, the only Secretary who would not be moved by the activity of the Local Head, but kept to his own, succeeds the retiring Mr. Lewis. Mr. Nolan has the reputation of in every respect the best Secretary in the Bengal office. As a revenue expert, he would have been of great service at a time when under a Revenue Lieutenant-Governor revenue questions will come to the fore. Unfortunately, Mr. Nolan was too sterling a man to be fussy. His worth could be felt in time only. But men in these days, specially Britons, lack the necessary patience. Besides, we are afraid Mr. Nolan had already given offence. He was just the man to do so. His calm imperturbability is apt to be resented by the more restless. At any rate, his self-respect would not allow him to fall down at the feet of the new Power, as both his seniors and juniors were doing. Hence he is kicked up to the serene heights of the upper shelf—to the inefficiency of the administration and the misfortune of the country.

IT is vain to war with caste. You cannot conquer. Caste is inevitable and irresistible. You cannot escape it. Suppress it in one name, it starts up in another. There is caste among the Pariahs. There are distinctions even in democracy. There is certainly a well-recognised aristocracy in the Great Republic of America. The Astors of Boston hold high rank in that aristocracy. Considering that Boston, the Athens of America, is one of the most intellectual and refined cities in the world, and that the millionaires have, for generations, been at the head of its élite, they may well be regarded as the nobles of Civilization.

Millionaires are not such rare birds as they used to be, even in America. But there are millionaires and millionaires, and, apart from the question of self, an heir of one of the Revolutionary fortunes, swelled by successive accretions, is worth more than half a dozen working men who have struck oil or stumbled on a silver mountain. The Hebrew plutocrats of Europe are different. They are infinitely superior to the mushroom millionaire of the United States—the Goulds and the Vanderbilts and the Mackays. But, superior as they are, they are left far behind by the Astors, who have the advantage of an aristocracy of a sufficiently long standing. We have just now seen an account of some jewellery belonging to this Boston family which shows that its very trinkets are characteristic.

The wife of Mr. William Astor keeps for finger jewellery a live moving snake of the red Kāṭhagiri kind. It is a tame harmless thing of course, or else not even the passion of Eve for adornment and finery would have tempted her to wind it round her person; being in fact a being of mechanical zoology. At any rate, the illusion is complete of a thin little gorgeous reptile dragging round the finger. It is all a matter of wires. Our Cuttack jewellers are famous for their skill in silver wire-work, but they have not the skill of the artist in Egypt who made Mrs. Astor's ring. It is thus described:—

"It is constructed of flexible gold wire, each scale being represented by a loop of wire in which a ruby, an emerald, or an amethyst is firmly set. The slightest movement of the fingers sets the wires aquiver, and the ring scintillates and seems to go round and round the finger with a serpentine movement that has something airy in it."

Of course, this is not the only notable thing in her possession. There are single-speech orators and single-book authors. With her vast wealth and her fine taste, at once magnificent and recherché, Mrs. Astor is far from being a single-jewel beauty. She has no end of fine things in the person-decorational way. At any rate, she has a suit of jewellery of the highest cut and most difficult mechanism. It were absurd to sport the fascinating Kāṭhagiri without a jewelled background to match. No wonder, we hear of her "marvellous necklace, composed of six strings of magnificent diamonds, all the stones being invisibly set, so that they look as though they were simply strung together like beads."

These are characteristic ornaments. They display a rare taste, a rich fancy, high skill, and science and culture—in a word, the civilization of the last quarter of the nineteenth century. And, in our estimation, worth more than a dozen misshapen, uncut Kohinoors. They are, in fine, fit decorations for the Peri of aristocracy of enlightened America.

AN APPEAL ON BEHALF OF HINDU WIDOWS IN BENGAL.

THE life of Hindu widows is miserable enough in every part of India. But in Bengal, the fact that they are precluded from marrying again is not the most important item in their list of grievances. There are many men and women in every country who, during the best years of their lives, are compelled to pass their days in single wretchedness, on account of the protracted illness or absence of their better or worse halves. What makes the life of Hindu widows in Bengal or rather in its metropolitan districts, simply intolerable, is the fasting of the Ekadasi or the eleventh days of the moon. On these days, they have to abstain from every kind of food and drink. Bitter are the curses which they sometimes openly pronounce on the day. Each Ekadasi means to them a sore trial, the very approach of which gives rise to alarms and apprehensions that it is impossible fully to realise. Our countrymen are too much accustomed to the spectacle of misery we refer to, to think seriously of it. But to the man whose humane feelings are not blunted altogether by the atrocities of our religion, the cruel treatment to which we subject our widowed mothers, sisters, daughters, &c., would appear to be simply shocking. The Draconian regimen of Ekadasi practically makes no exception in favor of infancy or extreme old age. Even the exigencies of health meet with indulgence at the hands of our spiritual tyrants. A widow be on the point of death, still even her own sons and daughters would not put a drop of water into her mouth to alleviate her thirst. What this means in an Indian summer, may be more easily imagined than described.

With regard to the cruel treatment to which widows in Bengal are thus subjected, the most remarkable fact is that it is not supported by any inspired text that can be held to be absolutely binding on the conscience of orthodox Hindus. The practice is based solely on an overstrained and altogether unwarranted interpretation of a text of Raghunandana's, the real founder of the Bengal School, though the departure in the Laws of Inheritance and Succession had been inaugurated by Jimuta Vahana. No Pandit worthy of the name can honestly say that there is anything in our revealed scriptures which enjoins absolute fasting by widows on the eleventh day of the moon. In fact, any hard and fast rule enjoining total abstinence from food, seems to be inconsistent with the very object of ekadasi. The Brahma Vaibarta Purana says:—

"A person incapable of fasting on the Ekadasi day should either feed a Brahmin or give a gratuity equivalent to double the amount that such feeding would cost."*

We leave it to our readers to draw their own conclusion from this.

Without entering farther into any shastric discussion, we call upon our coreligionists right earnestly to take into consideration the question of having the practice abolished. We appeal not only to go-ahead reformers, but to the orthodox members of the Hindu community also. As to what we have stated above regarding the absence of any revelation enjoining the periodical starvation of widows, our orthodox coreligionists may, if they deem it necessary, satisfy themselves by referring to the authorities cited by Raghunandana, in support of his view in his Ekadasi Tatwa and Tithi Tatwa. It may be easy enough for some of our countrymen to discover some hidden beauty in the practice which we condemn. Hook-swinging and satti rite had their admirers and justifiers too. If some widows willingly submit themselves to the discipline, that is no argument in its favor. The victim of moral tyranny is doubly to be pitied.

There is hardly a member of the Hindu community who is not interested in the question to which we draw the attention of the public. There are very few Hindu families in the country in which there is not a widowed member. Let all petty jealousies therefore be thrown aside, and, by emancipating our women from the moral thralldom in which our spiritual leaders have kept them for ages, let us show that we deserve, at the hands of our present political rulers, the privileges which we claim from them. We need not conform to their ideas of social reformation. But, while we patiently submit to all the cruelties which are practised in the name of our religion, we have very little right to demand political freedom. The rights of free men cannot be safely exercised by people who are weak enough to submit blindly to the despotism of religion. At any rate, we cannot expect our British masters to get off from our shoulder by their voluntary act, so long as we show no sign of shaking off the domination of the wolves in sheep's skin, whose tyrannies are far worse than those of a Nero or Caligula.

A MISUNDERSTANDING AND AN EXPLANATION.

THERE surely is some mysterious element in the British nature. How we have come to give offence to our contemporary of the Bengal Times, we really fail to make out. In writing as we did before the holidays, no offence was in our mind, and we took care not to be misunderstood. For that matter, we purposed to show our regard, and chose our language accordingly, and we made it explicit to the end in view, with full knowledge of our contemporary's weakness—a rather excessive sensitiveness. Not that we always do so. We can be naughty when we quarrel. But having no bone to pick—no grudge to repay—we expressed our genuine sentiments towards a veteran brother of the quill, whose character and talents we respect. Notwithstanding all, our contemporary has found, or made, enough matter in our leaderette of October 3, for indictment against us. In a long but excellently written jeremiad, the Dacca editor, while sparing our people and even complimentary to ourself, refuses to see the wit of the example of the literature of the native press adduced by us, and complains of our impropriety (speaking mildly) in giving it circulation. To avoid the possibility of blundering in the act of rectification, we will place our contemporary's entire article before the reader.

The Bengal Times of October 7 writes : —

"HUMOUR, WIT AND VIVACITY.—Years ago, a poet wrote :

'As in smooth oil a razor best is whet,
So wit is by politeness sharpest set.'

There are various kinds and degrees of wit ; some not set sharply and others having no connection with politeness. Of this latter order, we have a specimen before us. Our astute contemporary of Reis and Rayyet charges us among Anglo-Indian guffs with concluding that people of this country 'are devoid of the faculty of wit and humour'—an accusation upon which we can hardly be condemned, so far at least as he is concerned, since our appreciation of his humour—when possible—has never been grudgingly expressed. If we have failed as regards others, our justification is as palpable, as our contemporary's superiority to his fellow-scribes is obvious. He is not always happy, however in his selection. In last Saturday's issue, he remarked :

'From a paragraph in the Lahore Tribune of the 10th September, apparently taken from a journal of the Eastern Delta, we see Native wit assert itself at the expense of the critic who ignored it.'

He also reproduces a paragraph, which, for vulgar untruth and malicious innuendo, we have not seen equalled, hence, and upon this ground alone, we are sorry our contemporary of Reis and Rayyet should have lent himself to disseminate so stupid and palpable a falsehood. As truth is always strongest in its naked, unvarnished relation, we will narrate what actually took place, a simple story—which persons now living can verify. A European gentleman of this town, many years ago, was proceeding to a special dinner-party to which he had been invited. It was a fine, bracing evening in winter, and as he had not very far to go, he elected to walk. He was unarmed, and had not any suspicion that he was about to meet with an adventure. Not far from our town kotwali, he was set upon by a small mob of budmashers, lattie in hand. One made a feint at him, and in another moment was sprawling at his feet, half-stunned by a right-hander ; a left-hander sent another to earth, and then there was a general stampede. Mr.—who was without a scratch, secured one of his would-be assailants, gave him a tidy dressing with his own lattie and walked him off to a sub-inspector, to whose tender care he consigned him, intending to prosecute next day. Several considerations, however, were urged why his cowardly prisoner might, upon private grounds, be forgiven, which accordingly he was, having been taught a severe lesson. Years after, perhaps ten or a dozen years ago, and some eight or ten subsequent to this incident, it was casually alluded to : no names were mentioned, nor any details given, all having by that time been nearly forgotten, when a Native writer, chucking over his ingenious unveracity, dressed up this simple incident to represent a gentleman well known in this town, as having been struck by a budmash on his head with a lattie, which, far from damaging him, broke, leaving Mr.—unhurt—a story at once stupid and false, as no such incident took place, nor could it, in its very nature, be true. We now see a phoenix of this story reproduced, with a few embellishments, and published as authentic, which it not only is not, but we are not quite sure if it be altogether free from an element of defamation. Our Reis and Rayyet's contemporary appears to imply that, in relating an encounter we had had with some roughs, we related this story as he has reproduced it, in its garbled and deformed shape. This is an entire misconception. We know of but one story and that we outlined in purport, as we have now again done, not to vindicate any person from a false and absurd implication launched at him by blackguard malignity, but to set right a contemporary, who, in his literary tourneys with us, has ever comported himself as a man and a gentleman. We have a right therefore to expect that, as he has fallen into an error, by publishing a gentleman's name in connection with an alleged incident distorted in all its main features, he will, upon our solemn assurance of its falsity, give it an equally public denial. From a cadet of an illustrious family, from a highly cultured Brahman, and a gentleman by feeling and habit, one whose own antecedents and surroundings are in no whit inferior, may sorely anticipate this modicum of justice, with assured confidence. One word before concluding. Our Calcutta weekly contemporary indirectly styles his quotation 'wit and humour,' and follows it up by an implication relative to its 'Indian vivacity.' Utterly ignorant of what constitutes Indian wit, humour, or vivacity, we must perforce, accept this as a true index, though, sad to confess, in our unimaginative dulness, we could find no better designation for it than an unmitigated and silly falsehood, emanating from an author, who, apparently, mistakes vulgarity for satire and misrepresentation for jocularity. That our friend Reis and Rayyet should appear to lend countenance to such nauseating puerility, excites in us surprise at this its one and only notable feature. We had given our contemporary credit for better taste, more pride of journalistic dignity, and more friendliness of feeling."

That raises two issues, of two different descriptions. The one is critical and the other ethical. Of these, the former is the less formidable. If our example failed to conquer our contemporary, we shall not be so foolish as to cry, no matter. But at the worst, it is no serious matter. We have made a bad selection, that is all. At the very worst, we do not know what is wit or humour. That is not an agreeable imputation for an educated gentleman to lie under, yet it is not one, at all events, for one to hang himself from the nearest tree. But even from that imputation, such as it is, we are individually protected, in fact if not in form, by the kind appreciation of our own self—for which, thanks—with which our contemporary's scornful and vehement condemnation of the passage quoted by us is accompanied. Not so the other charge. That affects character. We are taken to task for giving circulation to a malicious falsehood. Although this charge is made more in sorrow than in anger, yet the condemnation is there, and it is one that no gentleman can be indifferent about. Now, in reproducing the paragraph we quoted on the 3rd October, we had a twofold object. We wanted to learn the exact truth about an alleged assault against a brother journalist. And, assuming the general accuracy of the statement, we meant to discourage, first, such cowardly physical attacks by the agency of paid desperadoes on peaceful pedestrians, specially gentlemen like the Dacca editor who do a difficult public service faithfully and, secondly, such questionable fun as the paragraph makes of the incident. Even after our contemporary's strongly worded reproaches, we do not yet see that we were to blame in this. Were we wrong in taking the thing to be true? At that time its truth had not been questioned, to our knowledge at any rate. Nor is its substantial accuracy questioned even now. Although the Bengal Times denounces the falsehood of the account we quoted, yet it admits the incident in the main by its own version. In his wrath, the editor does not vouchsafe information on the important point whether he had been the victim of an accidental raid, an attack of mere Budmashery or of Budmashery acting as the tool of an unworthy Bhadracacy. Indeed, without waiting for intelligence in the particular case of our contemporary, knowing the rowdiness of Dacca and the baseness of many of its citizens in employing bullies and roughs against one another, we meted out our condemnation against so anarchical a practice.

And now, is it necessary for us to confess that we did not believe that the narrative is all true, in each particular and on every point? We scarcely think. Our presentation of it as a specimen of wit itself implied that the passage could not be literally true. Exaggeration is of the essence of humour and wit. Without a leaven of fiction, there is neither literature nor enjoyment—no wit, repartee, caricature, poetry, drama. It was in the falsehood of the passage in question that the joke of it lay. We certainly are not such simpletons as to believe that our Dacca* friend's head broke the bludgeon of the brave. But the fun arises out of the air of simplicity with which the incident is related. And the B. T.'s passion is unworthy of the Editor.—We have left no space to discuss the general question of wit and humour and of Indian vivacity in particular.

THE VICEROY IN KASHMIR.

THE TOAST OF HIS HEALTH AND HIS REPLY.

At the State banquet on the 24th, at Lal Mandir, after dinner, the Maharaja entered and took his seat to the right of the Viceroy. Colonel Prideaux then rose, and, on behalf of the Maharaja, proposed the health of the Queen. After a brief pause, Colonel Prideaux again rose and spoke as follows :—

Ladies and Gentlemen,---I have been commissioned by His Highness the Maharaja to express the great gratification he feels at the visit which their Excellencies the Viceroy and Lady Lansdowne have paid to his capital. (Applause.) It has been a long-cherished desire on the part of His Highness that a Viceroy of India should visit Kashmir, and he is extremely thankful to say that that desire is now fulfilled, and that His Highness's wishes have been responded to. The romance of travel in Kashmir has perhaps suffered to some extent by the construction of the Jhelum valley road, but it is, I think, satisfactory that His Excellency has been able to see for himself one of the great engineering works which in future times will serve to commemorate His Highness's rule. (Applause.) His Highness has always shown interest in public works, and amongst other great works completed within the last few years have been the Sialkot and Jummoo Railway, the Waterworks at Jummoo which have been a source of great convenience to that town, and also we hope to see completed next winter the Savi Bridge, which will serve to connect both sides of the river which flows past Jummoo, and which will be not only a source of convenience to the inhabitants of Jummoo, but, I trust, also a source of revenue to the Kashmir State. Besides, this road which His Excellency has just travelled is but the first section of one of the most important highways, I may say, in India. Within a year or two will be completed that road as far as Gilgit, and I think I may say without any hyperbole, that the road will be an artery of which the pulsations will be felt from the fertile plains of the Punjab to those arterial limits which form the northern portions of His Highness's territory. (Applause.) Colonel Prideaux concluded by asking the company, on behalf of His Highness, to join him most cordially in drinking to the long life and happiness of their Excellencies the Viceroy and the Marchioness of Lansdowne. The toast was very heartily received.

His Excellency the Viceroy then rose and said :—

Your Highness, Ladies and Gentlemen,—I thank your Highness cordially for the kind manner in which, by your Highness's instruction, Colonel Prideaux has proposed my health. The visit which I am paying to Kashmir is the realisation of a wish which I have cherished for a long time. There is, I suppose, no part of the British Empire which any Englishman arriving in India is more anxious to see than that of which your Highness is ruler. Its marvellous beauties have, from the time when European visitors first found their way into the Valley, been celebrated by the traveller and the poet, and even on my way here I have seen enough to convince me that the expectations which I have formed are not likely to be disappointed. (Applause.) Having now had some experience of the scenery of India, as well as of that of the North American Continent, I will venture to say that the Jhelum valley need not fear comparison in point of beauty with any other part of the world. (Applause.) I am glad to have this opportunity of expressing my thanks for the arrangements which were made for our journey, both by land and water. Nature provided the scenery, but we should not have enjoyed it as we did but for the excellent new road along the Valley, a thoroughfare to which Colonel Prideaux has just referred, and the importance and convenience of which can hardly be over-estimated. Even if the Kashmir State has to wait for a few years before it is connected by a railway with British India, the existing cart road supplies an admirable channel of communication, which I have no doubt is specially appreciated by those who, in former years, were condemned to travel by the old road. (Applause.) But, your Highness, anxious as I was to visit your State, it was certainly not merely with the object of seeing its great natural beauties that I undertook my present tour. If I had been coming here merely as a tourist I should have regarded my visit with much less interest than that which I feel in it at the present moment. It is not necessary for me to remind your Highness that almost from the time of my arrival in India, affairs in Kashmir have constantly engaged my thoughts. The principal cause of my anxiety not to postpone my visit to you was the desire which I felt to make your Highness's personal acquaintance, a desire which I am glad to think was reciprocated by you, and to effect a full and frank interchange of ideas with you upon a matter of interest to us both. I was also anxious to meet again your Highness's brothers, Raja Amar Singh, President of the Council, and Raja Ram Singh, the Commander-in-Chief, and to hear from them something of the work upon which the State Council has recently been engaged. That work has been of an exceptionally important character. The reports of the Council claim for it, and, I am glad to say, claim for it not without reason, that it has, during the last few months, initiated several very substantial improvements in the administration of the State. I say initiated, because the real difficulties of reformation begin when reforms which have been elaborated on paper come to be submitted to the test of practical application. I believe, however, that the Council has made a good and courageous beginning. (Applause.) The preliminary work of revenue settlement has, I am glad to learn, made good progress, and the whole question of revenue administration is under consideration. In this branch of administration Raja Amar Singh has, I know, taken a particular interest. (Applause.) At this moment a British official—I refer to Mr. Logan, an official of special experience in financial matters (applause), whose services we have temporarily placed at the disposal of the Durbar—is engaged in a full inquiry into the finances of the State, an investigation which the Council has done well to court, and which it has, I am happy to say, facilitated to the best of its powers. The results of this inquiry will, I hope, be laid before me shortly. I trust that amongst those results will be the introduction of a sound system of audit and account, which I need not say is the very backbone and essence of good administration, whether in a Native State or in an Indian Province. (Applause.) In the Judicial Department, presided over by Pundit Bagh Ram, several changes are likely to produce useful improvements if they are properly carried into effect. They have, I am told, been approved by the Council. Last but not least, the administration of the army has been vigorously taken in hand by Raja Ram Singh (applause) who holds a commission in the British army, upon which I beg to congratulate him, and has, I rejoice to know, been greatly assisted by Colonel Neville Chamberlain (loud applause), an officer who, at the special request of the Council, I placed at its disposal nearly two years ago. (Continued applause.) I believe I am not exaggerating when I say that in place of a large and irregularly paid force, indifferently equipped and badly disciplined, the State is in a fair way of obtaining a smaller force, much more efficient, and much more likely to prove a source of strength to the State and to the empire. (Applause.) Your Highness will, I am sure, think it only natural that I should desire to satisfy myself upon the spot of the extent of these reforms, that I should wish to learn from the Resident, who, I am glad to know, enjoys the entire confidence of your Highness, from the Council, and from your Highness, what has already been done and what yet remains to be achieved. I have only been a few hours in Srinagar, and we have as yet been able to do little more than commence the discussion of these important subjects, but before I leave the State I shall, I hope, be able to obtain much information which will enable me to form a clearer opinion with regard to the measures which it may be desirable to adopt for the future government of the State. (Applause.) Your Highness may depend upon it that I shall approach the consideration of these questions, in which you are so deeply interested, with feelings entirely friendly towards your Highness. (Applause.) I am indeed glad to be able, on this interesting occasion, to assure your Highness publicly, as I have already done in my private communications, that the Government of India has throughout entertained towards your Highness and towards the Kashmir State no sentiments other than those of sincere good will and sympathy (loud applause) coupled with an earnest desire to assist you in surmounting the many difficulties and in bearing the heavy load of responsibilities with which you have been confronted. (Continued applause.) I trust that the assurance which I am thus able to give your Highness will dispel once and for ever the mistaken idea that in its dealings with the Kashmir State the Government of India harbour for a moment any ulterior designs upon its rights and privileges. (Applause.) The connection of the Kashmir State with the Government of India has always been of a specially intimate character. The State owes its very existence to the grant made to your Highness's ancestor in 1846, and upon more than one occasion in its subsequent history it has given evidence of its loyalty and attachment to the Government and the Crown. I feel no doubt, that the loyalty of the Kashmir State is at the present time entirely above suspicion, and that, just as it came forward at the time of the Mutiny as our staunch ally, so, if an opportunity should again arise, the Kashmir troops, commanded by your Highness's brother, Raja Ram Singh (applause), and particularly that portion of them which have been placed under special discipline for Imperial Service, will be again found ready to take their place by the side of ours. (Applause.) I shall be glad if my visit to Kashmir serves to strengthen and to consolidate the amicable relations by which the State has been bound to the Government of the Queen-Empress, and I offer to your Highness and to the State Council my sincere thanks for the manner in which you have received Lady Lansdowne and myself in the State of Kashmir. (Loud and continued applause.)

THE POLITICAL ASPECTS OF THE DIAMOND CASE.

SIR DENNIS FITZPATRICK EXPLAINS.

The following is the statement appended to the depositions of Sir D. Fitzpatrick, Resident of Hyderabad :—

I think it will be for the convenience of all concerned that I should state at once the reasons which I consider, subject to what I shall have to say later on, absolutely preclude me from giving evidence as to such confidential communications as have taken place between me and his Highness the Nizam or his Highness's officials regarding this matter.

These communications, or at least the more important of them, I may mention are duly on record in the proper quarter and open to the inspection of those under whose supervision and control I act here, and so far as my personal feelings are concerned I should have no objection to them or indeed any other such communications I have ever had with his Highness or his officials, being published to the world; but if they ever are to be so published, it must not be by me. The trust is that there is here involved a question which is of the first magnitude and importance from what is commonly called in this country the political point of view. I must explain that the Resident at Hyderabad, and the same may

As said of Residents and Political Agents at many other Native Courts in India, is not merely a representative of British interests. It is of the essence of the relation subsisting between the Imperial Government and the Native State that he should be constantly called upon to advise on some of the more important confidential affairs of the state or of its ruler. In those cases it is frequently his duty as Resident to advise, though it is always open to him to decline, and he frequently does decline to do so. I may add that in some cases it may be his duty to tender his advice though it is not sought.

It has been my policy since I came here to avoid anything like over-interference in the affairs of Hyderabad, and the only criticism I have seen made upon me in this connection is that I have not interfered enough; but nevertheless I have found I am constantly referred to confidentially on the more important affairs of the State or its ruler, and, though I often abstain from giving an opinion, I am on the other hand often in private consultation with his Highness or his advisers on such affairs. I think I may say with some confidence that generally, when I have advised, the result for the State and its ruler has been good, and I feel sure that his Highness and his advisers, with whom my relations have invariably been of the pleasantest and most confidential nature, would be the first to acknowledge this. But what, I would ask, is to become of all this if his Highness or his advisers when confidentially discussing any matter with me were haunted by an apprehension that I might before long be compelled to disclose publicly what had passed between us, or even that I might some day ask their permission---a permission which there might be some difficulty about refusing---to disclose publicly what had passed?

I have no hesitation in saying that if there were the smallest shadow of a ground for such an apprehension, it would completely alter the relation between the Resident and the Native Court, and would altogether undermine the strict confidence which at present exists between them, and which is absolutely essential to the working of the Indian Empire in what is perhaps its most beneficial aspect. I am clearly of opinion that all confidential communications that pass between me as Resident and his Highness or his Highness's advisers are protected from disclosure by the law, and that to compel their disclosure would be quite as much contrary to public policy as to compel a member of the Supreme Council to disclose what had passed in that Council, or to compel a solicitor to disclose communications passing between him and his client, or to compel a husband to disclose a communication made to him by his wife.

As for any suggestion that might be made that I should, while asserting the general principle, waive it in this particular case, it is impossible for me for a moment to entertain it. I cannot waive the principle, for the simple reason that I am of opinion that it is not in my discretion to waive it, and moreover that to waive it in any particular, however small, would be to give it up altogether. The confidence to which I attach such very high importance rests on the conviction that the principle holds absolutely and in all cases, and there is an end of that confidence altogether if the Resident is to be at liberty to waive the principle at his discretion.

I have not omitted to consider an objection which may suggest itself to some persons, namely, that nothing connected with the purchase of an ornament for his Highness's use can be deemed a matter of State, and subject to the considerations to which I have up to this been referring; but it seems to me that even assuming that there is room for any real distinction between the public and private affairs of a personage like his Highness there are two answers to this objection. The first is that though a matter may be in the strictest sense a private one, the treatment of it by or between public authorities may be a matter of State, and a matter regarding which evidence cannot be given in a Court of Justice. Thus the treatment of the most ordinary private affairs of private persons in Parliament or the Executive Council in this country would be undoubtedly a matter of State, and no one could be compelled to give evidence in regard to it. The privilege in such cases rests just as it does in the case of communications during marriage, not on the nature of the subject matter to which the communication relates, but on the medium, if I may say so, in which the communication passes. Similarly, in my opinion, when the private affairs of private persons come to be discussed confidentially between his Highness's Government and the Resident, as they not unfrequently do, the discussion must be treated as a matter of State similarly privileged. To take any other view would be fatal to the freedom of such discussion, and fatal to the system under which we work. And if the confidential discussion of the private affairs of private persons between the Resident and his Highness or his Highness's officials must thus be treated as a matter of State, a fortiori the like discussion of the private affairs of his Highness himself must be so treated.

My second answer to the objection is that what would in the case of private persons be considered as in every respect private affairs sometimes have in the case of a personage like his Highness highly important political bearings, and this I say, with confidence, is so in the present instance. The position I feel it my duty to take up in regard to this matter of necessity precludes me from entering in detail into all its bearings, but I may point to one consideration which lies on the surface, and will be obvious to every one without any disclosure on my part. I mean the magnitude of the transaction and its effect upon the finances of the State on which any heavy extraordinary expenditure of this sort in a State like Hyderabad must ultimately fall. The price put by Mr. Jacob on his diamond is in fact equal to, or more than, the total amount usually provided in the annual budget of the Hyderabad State for payments to his Highness, and in the event of His Highness contemplating the purchase of such an article, the provision of funds to meet an extraordinary charge of so large an amount, especially in a season like the present, with a serious danger of scarcity impending, would be a most important matter of State, which would have to be considered before determining to make the purchase.

The observations I have made are of general application, but they have a special force in the case of Hyderabad. I frequently heard confidential communications likened by the people of Hyderabad to a pebble dropped into a deep well, and I believe that every one from his Highness downwards regards a communication made to the Resident in that light. Any officer new to Hyderabad coming here as Resident would be surprised at the confidence which, almost from the first, and except on rare occasions, is reposed in him; but if he is compellable to disclose in a court of law communications made to him in official confidence, there must be an end of all this---the position of the Resident will be completely changed, and the utility of the office immensely diminished.

It only remains to say in order to complete this statement of the reasons for my silence, that I regard all the communications which I remember to have had with his Highness or his officials in respect of this matter, and in particular the one interview I had with his Highness on the subject, as in the strictest sense private and confidential, and that I consider that for me to give evidence regarding what passed between us in those communications would be distinctly contrary to public policy.

I wish, however, to add that if the counsel for the defence will mention any particular matter of fact regarding which he supposed I have learned anything from my communications with his Highness or his Highness's officials, and can show me (privately if he wishes) that there are reasons for believing that it is material in the interests of the accused to have that matter of fact proved, and that he after all reasonable endeavours failed to obtain evidence of that matter of fact from any other source, I should feel it my duty, so far as that matter of fact is concerned, to consider my position after referring to his Highness, and perhaps (if I felt a doubt about my duty) consulting other persons more competent to judge on so very delicate a point than myself. My own belief---and I am now pretty familiar with the details of the case---is that there is absolutely no matter of fact in the predicament above described; but in this I may of course be mistaken. I have further to add that when any particular matter that has passed between myself and his Highness has been disclosed by him in his evidence, that particular matter is in my opinion subject to somewhat different considerations.

It was for this reason, as the learned counsel for the defence is aware, that I expressly asked him to examine his Highness on all particulars he desired to ascertain regarding the interview between his Highness and myself.

D. E. P.

THE RESIDENT'S ACKNOWLEDGMENT TO THE MINISTER OF THE NIZAM'S MANIFESTO.

The Residency, Hyderabad, Deccan, 19th October, 1891. No. 1948. My dear Nawab,---I have to thank you for yours of the third instant, enclosing copies of the letter addressed to you by His Highness in connection with his examination as a witness in Mr. Jacob's case. The incessant labour of the Commission must be my excuse for not acknowledging it earlier. I read His Highness's letter with much pleasure, and was much impressed, not only by the breadth and liberality of view and high-minded independence it exhibits, but also by the kindly feeling of His Highness towards his subjects, and the tender regard shown by him for their pardonable prejudices, which are apparent throughout. I was further glad to learn from His Highness's letter that the important principles referred to in it, and on which Western lawyers so strongly insist, are supported by the teaching and example of the great leaders of Islam. I am convinced that this letter will have a most beneficial effect, which will not be confined to the present occasion, or to Hyderabad; for I believe that the example set by the Native Ruler who stands first in dignity in this country, cannot but have an important influence both upon other Indian Princes and upon the host of magnates of lesser degree, who at present imagine it to be derogatory to them to give their evidence in the manner essential for the furtherance of the ends of justice. I have forwarded a copy of your letter, and its enclosure, to the Government of India. Yours very sincerely, (Sd.) D. Fitzpatrick.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE CHILDREN IN THE MOON.

(From the Scandinavian.)

Hearken, child, unto a story !
For the moon is in the sky,
And across her shield of silver,
See ! two tiny cloudlets fly.

Watch them closely, mark them sharply,
As across the light they pass,—
Seem they not to have the figures
Of a little lad and lass ?

See, my child, across their shoulders
Lies a little pole ! and, lo !
Yonder speck is just the bucket,
Swinging softly to and fro.

It is said, these little children,
Many and many a summer night,
To a little well far northward
Wandered in the still moonlight.

To the wayside well they trotted,
Filled their little buckets there,
And the Moon-man, looking downward,
Saw how beautiful they were.

Quoth the man, "How vexed and sulky
Looks the little rosy boy !
But the little handsome maiden
Trips behind him full of joy.

"To the well behind the hedgerow
Trot the little lad and maiden ;
From the well behind the hedgerow
Now the little pail is laden.

"How they please me ! how they tempt me !
Shall I snatch them up to-night ?
Snatch them, set them here for ever
In the middle of my light ?

"Children, ay, and children's children
Should behold my babes on high,
And my babes should smile for ever,
Calling others to the sky !"

Thus the philosophic Moon-man
Muttered many years ago,
Set the babes with pole and bucket,
To delight the folks below.

Never is the bucket empty,
Never are the children old ;
Ever when the moon is shining
We the children may behold.

Ever young and ever little,
Ever sweet and ever fair !
When thou art a man, my darling,
Still the children will be there !

Ever young and ever little,
They will smile when thou art old ;
When thy looks are thin and silver,
Theirs will still be shining gold.

They will haunt you from their heaven,
Softly beckoning down the gloom—
Smiling in eternal sweetness
On thy cradle, on thy tomb !

CLOISTER-ROBBING.

(From the Scandinavian.)

Sir Morten finds his betrothed shut up in a convent, gains access by entering in a coffin as if he were dead, and then carries off his bride, to the good-natured envy of some of the nuns.

Softly Sir Morten led her forth
Out of the chapel wall,
And over her shoulders, for a cloak,
He threw the sable pall.

All silent stood the cloister maids,
Reading by candlelight ;
They thought it was an angel bore
Their sister off by night.

All silent stood the holy maids,
Save only two or three.
"That such an angel," murmured these,
"Would come by night for me !"

Honour to young Sir Morten Dove !
His heart was staunch and stout,
He bore her to his dwelling-house,
And bade the bells ring out.

Honour to young Sir Morten Dove,
And to his sweet ladye !
May more such maids be carried off
By angels such as he !

The roses and lilies grow bonnily !

HERE is a literary intelligence of no small interest :—

"The history of Dupleix's Government was written in Tamil characters, day by day, by his Dewan, Ranga Pille. This manuscript, which is in several folio volumes, was, we are reminded, discovered in the possession of the descendants of the author by the late Gallois-Monthuon, a former Director-General of Domains in Pondicherry. It contains precious historical materials. One copy of this manuscript is at the Bibliothèque Nationale, and forms part of the collection bequeathed by the late M. Abel, who was as distinguished a Tamil scholar as M. Gallois-Monthuon. M. de Guvartie suggests that a translation of the whole, or at least extracts, should be published by M. Hipp. Vurson, the learned Professor of Tamil of l'Ecole de Langue, or by some missionary knowing the idiom."

THERE is no end to grievances. "A Mahratta" correspondent of the Madura Mail starts one. There is a little linguistic difficulty under which a section of the people in the Southern Peninsula labors. The Madras Presidency is divided between four different tongues—Tamil, Telugu, Malayalam, and Canarese. These are the recognised vernaculars. They are taught in the schools, and they are the languages of the courts. This obviously places the Mahrattas at a disadvantage. It is easy to say that that is the fate of all strangers. But the Mahrattas are numerically not such insignificant strangers. At any rate, they must provide for their own wants if the state cannot be induced to lend its helping hand.

We extract the most interesting portions, as we find them, of the letter :—

"There are two kinds of alphabets in the Mahratti language one of which is called Balabodhu and the other, Modi. The former is generally and mostly used for printing purposes and the latter for writing letters and it formed 30 years ago the language of our chief courts in this Presidency. It is therefore found in some of the Collectors' offices that the old records are written in Modi characters. This shows the Modi characters were in common use in the public offices also, as they were in the homes of the Mahrattas. These characters, I am sorry, are lost sight of, by the Mahrattas save those old few who still adhere to their mother tongue, especially in this Presidency."

"Their fathers and forefathers were corresponding only in Modi characters. Now, if a father likes to correspond with his son in Modi characters, the son has to do nothing but take his father's letter and run door to door to make out the contents thereof from those who know it. Even after learning the contents he is obliged to write replies only in Tamil and other different languages. His father feels sorry of his son's ignorance and advises him to learn the characters of his mother tongue in addition to the other characters he has learnt. His advice is not heeded to by his son."

MR. A. P. Handley, barrister-at-law, the late officiating Chief Magistrate of Calcutta, has been Gazetted an Honorary Presidency Magistrate. The reason for this unusual appointment seems to be that, as Chief Magistrate, Mr. Handley had left unfinished a perjury case which he will complete as an Honorary Presidency Magistrate. There have been three more appointments as Honorary Magistrates of this town, namely, those of Sahibzada Mahomed Bukhtyar Shah, Mirza Mahomed Baksh Shirazi and Shams-ul-Ulema Ahmed.

SIR Dennis Fitzpatrick, K.C.S.I., Resident at Hyderabad, goes on privilege leave for three months from the 12th instant, and goes home, to prepare himself for the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab. Mr. T. Chichele Plowden, Commissioner of the Hyderabad Assigned Districts, officiates as Resident at Hyderabad, while Colonel K. J. L. Mackenzie, Judicial Commissioner, acts as Commissioner of the Assigned Districts, and Mr. R. Obbard, Civil and Sessions Judge, the Judicial Commissioner.

MR. A. J. Fraser, Deputy Magistrate, Raniganj, has convicted, under Sec. 304 A, I. P. C., an Austrian by birth and domicile, and sentenced him to a fine of five hundred rupees, and in default of payment to one month's simple imprisonment, for causing the death of a native by a rash and negligent act. The circumstances are thus given by the Magistrate :—

"The accused Adolf Sonnenschein has been sent up under Section 304A, I. P. C., for causing the death of Ranjit Roy by a rash and negligent act. The prosecution and the defence state differently the cause of the death. The prosecution give evidence to show that Sonnenschein who was shooting in a tank fired a gun, and the deceased, who was on the other side of the tank working, was struck by the shot, and died from its effects, and was afterwards taken into the tank by Sonnenschein and thrown into the water. The defence give evidence to show that the deceased went willingly into the tank to get a bird the accused Sonnenschein had shot, that he got entangled in the weeds and was drowned, and that in searching for the body with a bamboo, and subsequently a roller or a pole, the wounds in the deceased were caused. The pole used (vide McFarlane's statement) was at the bottom end cut sharp to a broad sharp edge with a slight groove in the edge. I may add here that the head constable, Indro Charan Biswas, who conducted the search, and the witnesses Jibon and Luchmon, deny that any bamboo or pole was used in searching for the body. The third evidence against the accused is that Roy, son of the deceased, a lad of about 14. This boy was working a short distance away from his father. He states that shots were fired, and in this he is supported by the witnesses Chand and Nadai. The first shot he said killed a bird ; a second shot was fired which struck his father. He heard his father call out "gelai, bib, gelam sahib," and saw him fall backwards. He saw then both the boys whom he identified as accused (Sonnenschein and McFarlane) on the new arrival who had accompanied Sonnenschein, and McFarlane came up to his father, and then accused gave his gun to McFarlane, and took hold of his father by a hand and leg pushed him into the water. The witnesses Chand and Nadai, who were some distance from the tank, heard him call out that the sahibs had killed his father, and when coming up saw the sahibs going away, and the accused, whom they had identified, had wet clothes on. Nadai states that the sahib said a man had been drowned. The Assistant Surgeon, Gopal Chundra Bose, who held a post mortem examination, deposed that the injuries on the deceased were from lacerated wounds, elliptical in shape, one above the inner angle of each eye, and one below the inner angle of each eye. The bullets below the inner angle penetrated into the cavity of the eye near the inner angle. The upper two wounds pointed inwards towards the cavity of the eye near the inner angle. This destroys the theory for the defence, that the wounds were caused by the two sharp points of the pole; as the breadth of the space between the wounds if caused by such means would have been the same throughout and not irregular. The medical testimony shows that the wounds were caused by gunshot, but death was caused by hemorrhage and shock from the injuries received, and that the injuries were caused before death, and that there were no signs of drowning, and this fact disproves the statements urged by the accused that the deceased was drowned. The case was accidental; of this there is no doubt; but had ordinary precaution been observed the accident would not have occurred, as the deceased was near the edge of the tank and could have been seen. To fire at a bird in a tank without seeing ahead or about is inexcusable and a rash and negligent act. The accused has aggravated the offence by placing the matter in a false light."

Even this moderate condemnation is not to go unchallenged. The non-official European residents of the Raniganj district met, on the 3rd November, at the Railway Institute at Assensole, in protest against the prosecution and conviction of a European, though not British-born. Mr. E. H. Wells, the general manager of the Bengal Coal Company's Colliery at Raniganj, was voted to the chair. The Chairman justified the meeting, among others, in these terms:—

"For gross injustice, for suppression of evidence on behalf of the defence and for false evidence for the prosecution this case was unequalled. Any one of them might any moment be placed in a similar difficulty, or in more serious difficulty. In the mofussil it often happened that Europeans living in isolated localities were entirely at the mercy of unscrupulous native policemen, who had no respect whatever for truth so long as they could get a European into trouble. This case had proved how great the danger was to which they were all exposed—and how utterly regardless native policemen were of doing the right, and it was an urgent duty they owed to themselves to adopt some measures to defend themselves against such iniquitous proceedings. Gross injustice had been done to both Mr. Sonnenschein and Mr. Macfarlane, and they should in this matter stand shoulder to shoulder and insist that right should yet be done them. They should not let this matter drop. They should go up to Government in a body and demand that the whole action of the police and the judicial authorities in this case should be sifted thoroughly. If they let this matter drop—if they took no further action in regard to it, they would be false to their own interests, and they would accentuate the danger to which they were all equally exposed. There were higher authorities than the magistrate and police officers who had already dealt with the case, authorities able and willing to see justice done and wrong redressed, and to these they must appeal; and he understood that the Anglo-Indian Defence Association and the Austrian Consul in Calcutta would strongly second their efforts. And here he would throw out a suggestion which, considering the very great danger to which each and all of them were so exposed, required no special recommendation, and that was that they should all become members of the Defence Association. With the help of that Association they would no doubt be able to insist that in districts where there are several European residents, such as the Raniganj district, there should be more European supervision over the native police."

Thus worked up, the meeting passed certain resolutions, the first being:—

"That in the opinion of this meeting the conviction of and sentence on Adolf Sonnenschein, on the 21st ultimo, under section 301A of the Indian Penal Code, by the Deputy Magistrate of Raniganj, was a gross miscarriage of justice, inasmuch as the said A. Sonnenschein, as appears by the evidence adduced at the trial, was not in fact guilty of any offence whatever."

It was necessary to absolve the Austrian of all guilt to prepare the ground for what followed.

"That this meeting pledges itself to use every legitimate means in order to secure a reversal of the said conviction and sentence."

• From particular to general; the sympathy for the one developed into the sympathy for the class and nation.

"That in the opinion of this meeting the provisions of the Criminal Law affecting European British subjects and Americans should be extended to the case of all Europeans in British India irrespective of nationality."

LIEUTENANT King stands committed to the Sessions, for causing the death of a toll gate-keeper at Ootacamund. His defence is that he does not know that he killed him or that if he killed him it was with no intention to kill, that he used a stick only to frighten not to kill, and that he is not aware that the stick fell on the gate-keeper and struck him dead.

PRIVATE James Whitely, of the South Wales Borderers, committed to the sessions charged with causing grievous hurt to Somai Lal by shooting him at Ghamani, in the Rewah territory, has been acquitted by the Allahabad High Court. The jury were divided, six being for acquittal and three for conviction. The presiding Judge, Mr. Justice Knox, agreeing with the majority, ordered the discharge of the prisoner.

"THE Lady Indebtedness Commission," says the Pioneer, "will conclude its labours as a collective body by April." The reader must

IN Bombay, they are said to have discovered from the sea, after 2,469 years, an idol which was removed to a temple in great pomp.

J. B. MACKINTOSH sued J. G. Shapcott in the Calcutta Small Cause Court, on two promissory notes of Rs. 100 each executed by him and A. W. McLeod on the 27th September, 1888. His claim against them is Rs. 435 for each of the notes. McLeod was not sued as his whereabouts were not known. An assistant in the Revenue and Agricultural Department answering to the other name appeared before Mr. Sconce, the Chief Judge, and denied indebtedness and execution of the notes and knowledge of the plaintiff. He further explained that he had been absent from Calcutta for the last 15 years, that he has a brother named George whom he had not seen or heard of for the last six years, nor does he know any Shapcott with initials identical with his own. Thereupon, the Judge let him off and granted the plaintiff four weeks' time to find out his man.

THE Shah-jogee, a Bengali newspaper of Barisal, reported at the time:

"During his visit to the Jail, Sir Charles Elliott saw a prisoner preparing mocha and asked Assistant-Surgeon Kunja Lal Sannyal what it was. On learning that it was a delicious article of food with the Bengalees, His Honor turned to the Magistrate and enquired if he had ever tasted it. 'Possibly not,' replied the Magistrate. At this juncture Kunja Baboo advanced up to Sir Charles and solicited permission to present a few dishes of mocha for His Honor's table. Permission was graciously given and Kunja Babu sent 4 different dishes of mocha and thore on board the Rhotas which were tasted and spoken highly of by Sir Charles."

We have ever since been troubled with various ideas. Was this encomium spoken in civility or earnest?

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE weather has been cyclonic since Wednesday night. Here is the summary of the weather in Bengal and Assam for the 24 hours preceeding 8 A.M. Thursday, the 5th of November:

Pressure.—The cyclonic storm, the centre of which was yesterday to the east of Vizagapatam, increased rapidly in intensity yesterday and advanced slowly in a northerly direction. The observer at Gopalpur telegraphs that the centre of the cyclone passed near to or over his station just before 5 P.M. this morning, and at 2 A.M. the very low pressure of 29.39 inches was registered. No telegrams have been received from False Point and Pooree, and probably the telegraph line has been blown down. It is therefore impossible to state the precise position of the storm centre this morning beyond saying that it is in the south of Orissa, or very close to the South Orissa Coast. Pressure is a quarter of an inch below the normal at Cuttack. It is also below the normal over the whole province, but by amounts which gradually decrease down to about 0.05" at the northern stations.

Temperature has fallen in the neighbourhood of the storm, but risen elsewhere. It continues rather largely above the normal at almost all stations.

Winds are governed by the existence of the cyclonic storm in the south of Orissa, round which a perfect circulation exists. A strong gale of wind is blowing in the north-west angle of the Bay. Before the telegrams from Pooree ceased, that station registered an average wind velocity of 44 miles an hour, while Gopalpur averaged 42 miles during part of last night, both representing a severe gale of wind. A gale of wind is indeed now reported from Balasore southwards. At the inland stations, winds are only moderate in force.

Humidity and cloud.—Humidity is now very high, and the sky is overcast at the majority of stations.

Rainfall.—Heavy rain has fallen in Orissa and showers in South-West Bengal, Chutia Nagpur, and part of East and North Bengal and Assam. Gopalpur reports 2.84 inches, Cuttack 2.48 inches, Balasore 0.75 inch, Silchar 0.27 inch, and Berhampur 0.26 inch.

Weather.—In the absence of some of the Orissa telegrams, the nature of the path of the storm cannot be stated accurately, but it is probably moving in a northerly direction and will give stormy or squally weather to Orissa and the south-western districts of the Province generally. Rainfall will also probably gradually spread over the whole of Bengal.

On Thursday, the Port Office hoisted the No. 3 storm signal, and despatched the Government Steamer Resolute to Saugor to visit the brigs and light ships and to render any assistance that might be required. The day before the steamers Warren Hastings, Curlew, Seagull and Ooryah had left Calcutta and anxiety was felt for them, for they could not have reached Chandbally at noon on Thursday. They, however, met with no disaster. The Ooryah finding the weather threatening returned from Saugor. The Curlew and the Seagull ran back to Diamond Harbour for shelter. The Warren Hastings braving the weather had completed her voyage before noon on Thursday. The P. and O. Bengal with three or four large steamers are at anchor at Saugor awaiting better weather, and several vessels are collected at Diamond Harbour to avoid the storm. On her return, the Curlew picked up at Fisherman's Point two natives who had fallen overboard from a steam launch. The cyclone has veered round towards Chittagong. We have a clear and bright sky this morning.

THE Congress itself being in a moribund condition, the Bengal Provincial Conference, which is only one of its offshoots, appears also to be in its last struggles. The interest which these political assemblies excited at the outset, has subsided, and if they still seem to have a spark of life in them, it is due not so much to any inherent vitality in them as to the manipulations of their promoters. There were in this city two meetings last week in connection with the Provincial Council or Conference. The number of so-called delegates who met together on the first day was not more than 25, and most of these were from places in close proximity to Calcutta. On the second day, there was an improvement in the attendance, though we are not in a position to say whether the gentlemen who took part in the deliberations on the latter occasion represented any one besides themselves. At the first meeting, the Rev. A. P. Begg, of the London Missionary Society, was pitchforked into the chair in the absence of a more eligible headpiece. On the second day, the milkop of the Indian Mirror was prevailed upon to play the part of President.

From the reports that have appeared in the daily papers, it seems that there were no long harangues. There was, of course, the usual firing of Resolutions embracing every variety of subject that is not to the purpose, from the "boon of self-government" and village chowkidars to acquisition of land by Government for public purposes. We wonder why nothing was said by our amateur councillors as to the watering of streets and the cleansing of latrines. These items are perhaps reserved for the next season. Even as it was, the programme of our political pedagogue was in style very similar to the curriculum of his famous Yorkshire prototype, who professed to teach his boys spelling and practical philosophy. Surrender Not's political spelling-book, embracing his orthography of voluntarism, Chowkidari Panchayet, &c., has been fairly mastered by his pupils. He has now only to call upon them to learn his political philosophy by serving as village watchmen and Panchayets, if not by actually doing the work of groomers like the pupils of Mr. Squeer.

It is a Reign of Law—in more senses than one. We often hear of the tyranny of the man of science. But the true despots of the age are the men of Law. And the world is more and more going down at the feet of the pettifoggers. The growing preponderance of thriving attorneys and writers to the signet, to say nothing of distinguished barristers, in the British House of Commons, has long been noticed with reproach. The influence of lawyers and litigateurs in the French Chamber has always excited, through almost every change of régime and constitution. And now the complaint comes from beyond the ocean. It is authoritatively stated that, in the present fiftyfirst Congress of the United States, three-fourths of the Senate belong to the legal profession and nearly the same proportion of the members of the House of Representatives. The remainder is made up principally of retired businessmen. It is the same in the municipal boards as in the national chambers. These two classes, after having drained the pockets of their fellow-citizens, rule over them. None others have any chance.

It is the same in India—or fast becoming so. With this difference, that here it is only one class that fattens, professionally as well as politically. Here the lawyers are all in all. Here no other spheres of activity have been opened, and the prosperous pedlar has not yet entered appearance to serve as a foil to the prosperous pettifogger. It is the Reign of Law in India under British auspices.

We poor fools dare not to fathom the wisdom of the wise men of the West among us. We can only see and note and, if possible, inwardly digest. Just now, both Executive and Judiciary seem to have come to a curious rapprochement. Both have been suddenly filled with a tenderness for witnesses. The Lieutenant Governor of Bengal has been enjoining on all judicial officers to avoid inconvenience to witnesses as one of the prime points for consideration in judicature. And now we find the High Court of Madras animated with equal solicitude for the interests of the interesting profession which helps the administration of justice with their unflinching observations.

ON the 27th October, at the Madras High Court Criminal Sessions, a soldier of the Norfolk Regiment was put on his trial for murder of a comrade—another soldier of the same regiment. The Crown Prosecutor suggested a postponement of the case as a number of witnesses were not present. The presiding Judge, the Chief Justice, would not grant the adjournment. He was anxious that the Special Jury should not be troubled again to hear the absent witnesses. Another reason for the refusal was that no body ever seemed ready for anything in a criminal case. The trial proceeded and the prisoner was acquitted. In discharging the prisoner, the Chief Justice remarked that even if the absent witnesses had been called, they would not have carried the case any further. Was that the secret of the refusal?

WE do not know if Sequah, the globe-trotting mountebank of a medicine-man, is still "doing" India and doing its denizens in the eye (to use an expressive slang) and in the pocket into the bargain. Having bagged his booty on the Coast and in the Delta, he proceeded up the country. From the British capital in Bengal, he went through the chief cities in the valley of the Ganges and the Jumna to the old capital of the great Mogul. In Calcutta, he lived as a professional but paraded the streets in state, dressed in a golden laced uniform with cocked hat to match, and driving in a four horse chaise, attended by a bodyguard of four gorgeous European troopers, looking like so many stage clowns on horseback. In fact, he was his own best advertiser. We wonder whether he has changed his "properties." Did he at Benares abandon the barouche for the Rath and a quartet of Nagori bullocks? And did His Sequamish Majesty make his entry at Delhi on an ambani on the back of a towering elephant? His cavalry uniform was the perfection of art—theatrical, and he needed not to make any change in it. Although Nil amirari is the motto of the Delhi population, this mountebank must have managed to make the old capital of—the majesty of the Blood of Timoor gape in astonishment at his unique sawari. From Delhi he pushed on to Lahore, taking in doubtless other great cities in the Panjab. We lost sight of him during the holidays. He is an interesting stranger and we gladly give him this advertisement free. He has taught his class an idea or two in the practice. He is useful to enquirers as a "foolometer." Where is he? and what is he at now?

UNDER the Cattle-trespass Act, 1871, "cattle" is made to include elephants, camels, buffaloes, horses, mares, geldings, ponies, colts, fillies, mules, asses, pigs, rams, ewes, sheep, lambs, goats, and kids. The canal officer within the neighbouring Manicktola Municipality has further enlarged the definition. He seized a number of geese that had gone down the canal for a ducking and sent them to the pound to be released by their owner by payment of the prescribed fines and charges to the pound-keeper. But the pound-keeper was none the richer for the arrest, for the Chairman of the municipality who is also the Sub-divisional Officer, on the matter being reported to him, ordered the immediate release of the impounded "cattle" without any penalty whatever for their trespass. The Deputy Magistrate evidently took the arresting officer as no better than the arrested, and let him off with a gentle reproof.

For every kind of impounded cattle under the Act, the law lays down the fine to be imposed by the pound-keeper. It ranges from two rupees for an elephant to one anna for a kid. In the absence of directions regarding a "cattle" not included in the definition, the pound-keeper was free to levy for each goose the fine for an elephant, besides the prescribed charges for feeding and watering it. He was deprived of that satisfaction by the present Chairman of the Manicktola Municipality. We are not sure that the Deputy Magistrate has not thereby trod on other people's corn.

The Cattle Trespass Act allows compensation up to rupees one hundred for illegal seizure or detention of cattle, of course, as defined in it

By implication, therefore, a person so illegally acting in respect of a creature not arrestable under that Act, lays himself open to greater damages. That Act, however, does not provide against such illegalities, although it exempts from its penalties persons rescuing from seizure and detention cattle not coming under it. It thus leaves a wronged owner to the general law for such relief as it may afford him. That relief can hardly be sought for by the ignorant, or by those who are not prepared for the sacrifice of time and money involved in that pursuit of justice.

ON the 25th October, there was a rather serious emute, which threatened to be disastrous, in the State Jail of Rampore. It appears there had been discontent brewing which burst in connection with a recent order requiring prisoners to submit to the jail uniform. Accordingly, on the 25th, the Vice-President of the Council, Major Vincent, visited the jail. He was accompanied by no superior force than an escort of two orderlies. He went gaily, as poor Mr. Quinton went to Manipur, to lay the spirit of discontent and mutiny by the charm of his British presence and the spell of his name. We don't know if this military Dictator's presence is anything particular. As for the other talisman, although his might be

A name at which the world grew pale, whether on land or sea, the people of Rampore, in their ignorance of James' Naval History and Kaye's and Malleson's Afghan and Indian books, had never heard of it before. In fine, the charm failed. The Dictator of course proceeded summarily to work. Three prisoners were singled out as ringleaders and brought before the British Wizard, whose mantras and incantations scared them away instantaneously. As they retreated in panic, the orderlies were sent after them, to bring them back. By this, the whole jail was in commotion and the other prisoners attacked the orderlies. Major Vincent now ran to the rescue, which he effected, taking at the same time the precaution of having the gates of the jail closed by the guard outside. Before long, a detachment of the State troops entered appearance on the scene. But in the meantime the prisoners had broken off their fetters, and when called upon to surrender and retire quietly to their cells, they showed no sign whatever of being disposed to obey the order. On the contrary, their attitude was so defiant, that in order to terrify them, Major Vincent was obliged to order the troops to fire upon them, whereupon they fled to their barracks leaving only one of their number dead on the ground. As a matter of course, an investigation was held afterwards to vindicate the majesty of law and of Major Vincent also. The result of the proceedings was that five of the ringleaders were condemned to death and forthwith executed.

"GOLDEN GANG" is the name of a notorious brotherhood of swindlers in Western India. Its brightest jewels were a Cooverji Shapori alias Cooverji Shorabji and his colleague Parshotam Thakersey. The exploits of these two eminent personages are full of interest on account of the originality displayed by their authors. Cooverji began his career in Bombay. But desiring to shun the attentions of the Police which became rather too troublesome to him latterly, he sought refuge in country life in the district of Dharwar. Here he might have passed his remaining years in peace. But it was not in his nature to be satisfied with the dull prosaic life of an Indian villager. One of his most brilliant performances was a clever trick by which a young Hindu was "done" by him to the extent of more than two thousand rupees. The victim of his villainy was made to believe that he could make two currency notes out of one. The foolish young man brought him a thousand rupee note which he dexterously pocketed, substituting for it a bad note that he put at once into a bottle, at the same time pouring into it some strong acid. Thus, while the bad note was destroyed, the foolish owner of the thousand rupee note was made to believe that it was his property that was melted in the acid. Cooverji and his colleagues affected to be surprised at the result, but promised better success by a second experiment. The victim of his sharp practice had been made to believe in him so implicitly that he brought him a second note of the same value which, it is hardly necessary to say, was spirited away in the same way. The Police got scent of the business, through one of the accomplices, but the prosecution became very nearly abortive on account of the refusal of the party chiefly interested in it, to appear as a witness and confess his folly in public.

The trick which has at last brought Cooverji to grief is not quite original. It is only a revised form of the game of stuppā, well known to most people in this town. However, it has served to cut short his career of adventure. Our paternal Government has taken him now under its direct protection, and he will pass the rest of his life as an imperial guest at the Andamans. His accomplice Parshotam has been sentenced to only three years' imprisonment, and may have a chance of resuming his career.

A TERRIBLE railway accident has occurred on the G. I. P. Railway twelve miles from Nagpur. The Nagpur passenger train left Bombay at 7-30 in the morning of Wednesday, the 4th instant. A tyre of the wheel of one of the two engines working the train broke, the two engines, the two tenders and fourteen carriages left the rails near a bridge over a nulla, wrecking the rails. Both the engines with the tenders were completely destroyed. The carriages were piled one on the top of the other. The saloon of the Commander-in-Chief of Bombay, who was a passenger by that train, stood on its end down the bank. The Commander-in-Chief and his staff were unhurt, but nine men of the North Lancashire Regiment were killed, and twenty wounded and several natives hurt and killed. The number of the last is not given, though each European killed or wounded is named.

THE Lord Wardenship of the Cinque Ports, though unremunerative, is a coveted appointment. On the death of the Right Honorable W. H. Smith, the last Warden, the general belief was that the office would go to Lord Cranbrook—a Kentishman, who has besides identified himself very closely with local matters. The choice, however, has fallen on the Marquis of Dufferin and Ava.

SIR Charles Elliott has resumed his touring. This time His Honor has been doing the Patna division. At Bankipore and Gya, he had a splendid ovation. The day of his arrival at the latter place, happened to coincide with the Dewali festival, and there was general illumination of the town, which was partly at least for the secular purpose of doing him honor.

Sir Charles Elliott visited Budha Gya on the 1st instant. The Buddhist delegates from Ceylon, Japan, China, Burma, Siam and Chittagong, who have been trying to acquire possession of the historical temple that makes the locality famous, were there at the time. But it does not appear that His Honor took any interest in the success of their mission, and the uneasy feelings which the announcement of his intention to visit the shrine gave rise to, have been completely removed.

THE BENGAL INDUSTRIAL CONFERENCE.

It appears that a meeting of what is called the Bengal Industrial Conference was held last Saturday in the rooms of the British Indian Association. If we are to believe the reports that have appeared in the daily papers regarding the gathering, there were present in it 50 delegates representing every district of Bengal. Considering, however, all the circumstances connected with it, and especially its time, place and numerical strength, it savours strongly of being one of Surrender Not's shams. Whatever it was, the speech of the chairman, Mr. P. N. Bose, fully deserves notice. Mr. Bose is a man whose name ought to be better known than it is. He is a distinguished graduate of the Calcutta University and was in Europe for several years in order to study the physical sciences. He is the only native who has ever been admitted to the staff of the Indian geological survey. His speech at the conference would do credit to any veteran publicist. The most noticeable feature in his deliverance is the tact with which he tried to educate the shallow headed politicians with whom he was associated for the time being. He did not directly attack their faith in industrial survey and technical education. But he made himself intelligible enough, as the following extracts from his speech will, we trust, show :—

"It is industries alone that can relieve the distress of the mass of the people by lightening the pressure upon land; it is industries alone that can relieve the distress of our middle classes by affording them openings other than clerkships. The Government and the people are alike beginning to understand this * *

"This brings us, gentlemen, to the first topic which has been put down for discussion at this conference, viz., the industrial survey of the whole Province. Before we can suggest any remedy, we must first know what industries are capable of revival or of expansion. Many such do no doubt occur to you. Cotton manufacture has a very wide field before it. In 1888-89 we imported over 30 crores worth of cotton piecegoods, yarn, thread, &c. There is no reason why we should not be able to make the greater portion of the cotton articles we require. The iron industry has also a promising future before it. Then there are various small industries—coal, petroleum, glass, soap, match, paper, pottery, dyeing and tanning which are likely to afford scope for enterprise.

"The next question that is to engage our attention is, How are these industries to be developed? This brings us to the much talked of topic of technical education, the second in the programme before us * * Yes technical education is very badly needed in this country. But what kind of technical education is it that we want? * * Now industries may be grouped under two heads :—(1) Art Industries such as carpentry, shoemaking, engraving, modelling, &c., that is to say, industries which have a remote, if any, connection with science. (2) Science Industries, industries more or less dependant upon some branch or other of natural science, such as mining, glass manufacture, cotton manufacture, &c. From what I have already said it will appear that it is the science and not the art industries that require to be specially developed.

"Gentlemen, we find schools rising here and there where a little carpentry, a little watch repairing, a little tailoring or a little modelling is taught, which are dignified with the name of technical schools. * * They are not likely to do much good to the country and may do considerable harm.

"Having decided what kind of technical education is needed, the next more important and difficult question is, how and when it is to be imparted. To start an independent technical school would be a very costly affair. Two or three lacs would be nowhere. The problem before us, at least for the present, would be how to utilize the existing Government institutions such as the Shilpore, the Roorkee, the Presidency Colleges, the Government Railway workshops, and the Government factories for the purpose of technical education."

The views contained in these passages are precisely the same that we expressed on the subject in a recent issue. Mr. Bose has, no doubt, in general terms, given some importance to industrial survey and technical education. But the observations that he has made in connection with these subjects clearly show that his real creed is very different. It is much to be regretted that he did not, or could not, in the situation in which he was placed, boldly proclaim that an industrial survey was not needed. But it gives us sincere pleasure to find that he has studied the statistics of our foreign commerce with sufficient care to appreciate the importance of cotton mills and iron foundries.

The programme of the conference embraced the following subjects :—

1. Industrial survey.
2. Technical Education.
3. Encouragement of indigenous manufactures by Government.
4. Organising Joint Stock Companies.

The first three items are precisely those that form-

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—For bad legs, bad breasts, scorbutic and scrofulous sores this is a genuine specific. The grateful and earnest gratitude of thousands who have experienced its unrivalled power over these complaints, and who have been raised from prostrate helplessness and a condition loathsome to themselves and others, renders it quite unnecessary to enlarge in this place upon its extraordinary virtues. The parts affected should be bathed with lukewarm water, and when the pores are thereby opened the Ointment should be well rubbed in, at least twice a day. It is always advisable to take Holloway's Pills in these disorders, as this much assists the Ointment's action. The Pills check the fever, purify the blood, and eject all morbid matter engendered by these diseases.

ed the basis of the deliberations of the Poona Conference.

The last item is in accordance with a suggestion which we made in these columns more than once. In reviewing the proceedings of the Poona Conference, we said :—

"We have in Bengal very few capitalists who, by means of their individual resources, can possibly set up a manufactory of piecegoods like one of those that have made Manchester so rich and famous. A business of the kind requires a capital of at least 20 lacs of rupees to start with. But from what we know of our Rothschilds and Vanderbilts, our belief is that there are scarcely half a dozen among them whose investable capital is sufficient to set up even a single cotton mill. Thus it is that we cannot hope to effect any improvement in our national industries except by organising joint stock companies. If we want Congresses and Conferences, it is only to organise such Companies and to watch their operations."

It gratifies us much to find that the suggestion which we made has been accepted by the Conference, if only for the purpose of talk. It is only the big guns of the Congress who can give practical effect to the idea. We hope their attention will be drawn to it, and also to the importance of offering small rewards for the improvement of our hand looms, and for the publication of books giving full account of the mineral resources of our country, and practical directions for setting up iron foundries and cotton mills. As to the mineral resources of the country, Mr. P. N. Bose is perhaps better qualified than any one else to enlighten his nation.

THE HINDOO LAW OF ADOPTION.*

To notice the works of living writers, in the usual style of newspaper criticism, is easy enough. The task of indiscriminately showering compliments on friends is neither an arduous nor a very risky business. But the spirit in which Cromwell warned his painter to paint him as he was, is at a heavy discount in this country, and if you will not describe all your geese as swans, your review of men and things is ascribed to a misanthropic nature or to jealousy or to malice. However brilliant your general coloring may be, if, for the sake of truth, one single line of shade be introduced into the picture, it is treated as a vile misrepresentation fit only to be destroyed by the hand of the hangman.

The Tagore Lectures on Hindu Law have materially increased the bulk of the literature on the subject. But, except as digests of case law, very few of them possess such value as to justify the cost at which they have been brought into existence. With regard to the particular volume before us, we reserve our judgment for the present. All that we propose to do just now, is to examine the soundness of the late Mr. Mandalik's arguments, in favour of the validity of the adoption of an only son, most of which our author has adopted in his work. At the time when his Lectures were delivered, the question awakened great interest in connection with the Burdwan adoption case. As an unsettled point of law, it still has an importance, and the discussion cannot be regarded as altogether unprofitable.

The adoption of an only son is prohibited by the following texts :—

"An only son is not to be given or taken in adoption, for he is for perpetuation of lineage."

Vashistha cited in the Dattaka Chandrika, Sec. I.
"By no man, having only one son, is the gift of a son to be ever made. By a man having many sons such gift is to be made in distress."
Saunaka cited in Dattaka Chandrika, Sec. I., para 29.

The point of law about which there has been a great deal of conflicting rulings and unprofitable

* Tagore Law Lectures for 1888, by Golap Chundra Shastri discussions, and which is still far from being settled, is whether the adoption of an only son is not legally valid if otherwise duly made. The answer to the question lies in a nutshell. If the power of giving a son in adoption is founded on any natural right, then the shastric prohibition regarding the gift of an only son cannot affect the power of giving. A natural right is a thing which, according to the principles of Hindu jurisprudence, cannot be affected by a text of law. But, even on the theory that the power of giving a son in adoption is founded upon a natural right, it does not follow that the acceptance of an only son by the adopter makes him an adopted son. The power of affiliating the son of a stranger by adoption, is certainly not a natural right. It is based entirely on the shasters, and there can be no reason for presuming that a valid affiliation is effected where the modus operandi is clearly in contravention of the law.

As to the nature of the dominion possessed by parents over their children, the texts of our Rishis are conflicting. But modern Hindu jurists are unanimous as to the patria potestas of the Hindu father not being wide enough to warrant a sale or gift of children in the same way as any other kind of property. In fact, if the Hindu father possessed any such right, there could not have been a valid marriage by swamvara, forcible seizure, or mutual consent. There is a long disquisition on the subject in the Vyavahara Mayukha, at the end of which Nil Kantha says:—

"It may be asked may there be no ownership in daughters, sons, &c., begotten on one's own wife as there is in the offspring of one's own cow and the like? [The answer is that] it is not so; because there being no ownership over a wife, as there is in a cow, there cannot be any property in the children begotten on her. * * * Therefore, according to Misra, the gift of a son can be only in a secondary sense. Nor can ownership be inferred from the popular use of such language as one's own wife, son or daughter, for it is possible in such cases to explain the use of the term sva (one's own) by understanding it in the sense of kindred, as is done when we say one's own father, one's own mother."—Mandalik's Mayukha, pp. 35-36.

Pandit Golap Chundra has not cited the authority of the Mayukha on the point, but has relied on a passage of the Mitakshera to show that, according to the leading authority among modern Hindu jurists, the parental dominion over children is complete and absolute. But, even if it be admitted that such is the doctrine of the Mitakshera, still it does not follow that an only son can be legally adopted. The father of an only son may have the right to give him away, but the validity of the act of affiliation must depend upon proper compliance with the ordinances of the Shasters.

Like Mr. Mandalik, Pandit Shastri derives an argument in favor of his position from the passage in the Mitakshera, in which Vignyaneshwar says, with reference to the prohibition of the gift of a son except in distress, that the restriction applies to the giver. According to Nilkantha's interpretation of the passage, it lays down that the prohibition does not affect the ceremony but applies to the person. If rightly expounded by the author of the Mayukha, the Mitakshera admits the legal validity of the adoption of a son given otherwise than in distress, but declares that the giver becomes blameable under such circumstances. Nilkantha himself rejects this view. And we shall presently show that not only is he himself right, but that the Mitakshera does not support the opinion that he ascribes to it.

Nilkantha's own opinion as to the validity of the adoption of a son given otherwise than in distress, being rather against the view which our author has sought to establish, he has not made any reference to it. The manner in which he has utilized Mitakshera's exposition of the law on the subject will appear to some extent from the following extract:

"The authority of the Mitakshera is universally respected throughout India, except in Bengal where it yields to the Daybhaga in those points in which the latter lays down any different rule. * * * Referring to Manu's text describing the adopted son, the Mitakshera says:—'By specifying distress, it is intimated that the son should not be given unless there be distress. This prohibition regards the giver. Similarly an only son should not be given. For Vashishtha ordains, 'Let no man give or accept an only son.' Similarly, though more than one son exist, the first born should not be given; for he chiefly fulfils the office of a son.' Colebrooke's Mitakshera, chapter I, sec. XI. Here there are three prohibitions expressed in the same words. * * * Now the first rule is undoubtedly one of moral obligation. * * * It follows therefore that the second prohibition is also of the same character. * * *"

With reference to what is said in the concluding passage, it is to be observed that, in the original, Vignyaneshwar does not say anything as to whether the first rule involves a legal or a moral prohibition. The author of the Mitakshera says only that it is a prohibition with regard to the giver. Nilkantha's interpretation of the passage points to an antithesis between the giver and the act of giving. Our author lays stress on the fact that the prohibition is not declared to apply to the taker. But the antithesis really intended is between prohibition proper and what is called paryudish or exceptional clause in a general rule of law. If the right to give is a natural right, then the prohibition as to the giving of a son otherwise than in distress, is certainly a pratisedh or prohibition proper.

But there is nothing in any text which prohibits the taking of a son given otherwise than in distress; and certainly the rule prohibiting the giving cannot, in the view that it is a pratisedh or prohibition proper, be regarded as having any bearing on the legal validity of the act of taking. For these reasons, an adoption in violation of the first rule, i. e., the one which forbids the giving of a son except in distress, is not deemed void in law. The second rule, i. e., the one which prohibits the adoption of an only son, is very differently enunciated in the texts. Vashishtha expressly says that an only son should neither be given nor taken.

The ceremony of adoption partakes of the nature of a religious observance, which produces an occult result. The question whether an only son can be adopted, is to be solved only by referring to what is said in our shasters as to whether a yag can be performed with a thing the use of which is prohibited. On the principle that, in the absence of the precise thing required for a sacrificial purpose, something like it may be used, black kidney beans might have been used where green kidney beans are not procurable. But there is an express text which interdicts the former. It is therefore settled that a yag cannot be validly performed with black kidney beans. Similarly, the giving and taking of an only son being prohibited, such a son cannot be validly affiliated. The affiliation is an occult result, which cannot be brought about except by a valid performance of the ceremony.

The argument on which Mr. Mandalik lays the greatest stress and which has been adopted by our author, is that founded on the reason assigned in Vashishtha's text cited above. The Rishi says that an only son should not be given or taken, because he is for the perpetuation of lineage. Applying to this the hetuman nigadadhikarana or the topic of "precept with reason" as constructed by Sabarāswami, in his commentary on the Jaimini Sutras, Mr. Mandalik arrives at the conclusion that the prohibition as to the adoption of an only son has no legal force.

But his translation of the Adhikarana is inaccurate, and his conclusion is far from being well grounded. The principle established by Sabaraswami's Adhikarana is, that, where the reason given in a text for the rule of law contained in it, tends to extend its scope, the reason is not to be taken as such, but as a statement of fact to heighten the importance of the act enjoined. It is a general principle of interpretation that an utpatti vidhi or original injunction of the shasters must always be taken to be so worded that there may not be any mistake as to its meaning. A reason given in an utpatti vidhi cannot therefore be treated as such where such a view may affect the interpretation of the part of the text that enjoins the rule for which the reason is given. The text which forms the basis of Sabaraswami's Adhikarana, enjoins the use of the winnowing basket in certain ceremonies, and concludes with the observation that its use is enjoined because it is required in making rice fit for food. If the reason thus given were taken as a reason, then the result would have been that not only the winnowing basket, but all the instruments for making rice would have had to be used in connection with the ceremony in which the use of the winnowing basket is enjoined. Hence, Sabaraswami says that the reason given in the text, surpena juhoti, must be treated as stuti or commendation.

Where the reason given in a text cannot possibly affect its meaning, it may be treated as such. This is the case in the text of Vashishtha, which prohibits the adoption of an only son. The author of the Chandrika is, therefore, justified in drawing the conclusion that the prohibition does not apply where the only son of one brother is taken in adoption in the Dwyamushayana form, by another. According to Mr. Mandalik, the reason given in Vasistha's text is only a commendation. Yet, in the same breath, he says that the prohibition does not apply to one who aspires for moksha (complete salvation) or intends to beget another son. If the reason given in Vashishtha's text is a commendation only, then the rule itself is always applicable, whether the reason applies or not to the particular case. Even on the correct view as to the effect of a reason in a text, the adoption of an only son cannot be justified by the supposition that the giver of an only son may achieve his salvation in other ways. The gift of an only son may, without postulating any such supposition, be treated as valid in law, simply on the ground that it is warranted by a natural right. But, as a religious ceremony cannot be validly performed by the use of a thing which is absolutely prohibited, the taking of an only son in adoption can, under no circumstances, be regarded as having any legal validity.

The other arguments on which Messrs. Mandalik and Shastri rely in support of their position, are not of much importance, and we refrain from noticing them. What we have said above, will, we hope, suffice to show that, with regard to at least one most important question relating to the subject dealt with by our author, he has only blindly followed the late Mr. Mandalik. As to the value of his work in other respects, we are not prepared to pass any opinion at present. In conclusion, we have only to note the fact that he has adopted some of the views which were propounded for the first time by Dr. Jogendra Nath Bhattacharya. The famous dictum of Juntavahana, which led English scholars and lawyers to ascribe to him the doctrine of factum valet, was first correctly explained in Dr. Bhattacharya's work on Hindu Law. Pandit Sircar has accepted that interpretation without any qualification, but has not been consistent enough to eschew the application of the exploded doctrine altogether. Dr. Bhattacharya's theory as to the position of a female adopter has also been accepted by our author, though in a half hearted manner. He admits that, when a widow adopts, she does so in her own right and not as agent for her husband. In conclusion, however, he avoids giving due importance to the distinction by observing that the modern doctrine, i. e., the doctrine of the courts of law, is different. But if he has studied the subject at all, he ought to know that the apparently conflicting decisions of the several High Courts, as to the conditions on which a widow is allowed to adopt, can be reduced to harmony only on the theory propounded in Dr. Bhattacharya's Commentary on Hindu Law.

MONGHYR.

Jamalpur, November 1, 1891.

The grand autumnal festival of the Doorga Poojah is now over. Before resuming our task I must offer my sincere greetings for the year to your goodself, Mr. Editor, and your readers. There was nothing worthy of note which might interest your readers, excepting that the Pooja was celebrated in Monghyr, in purely Bengalee fashion, distinct from the Beharee style, by a Bengalee Baboo resident at Monghyr. This is no doubt a novel feature in the kingdom of Jara Sindhoo.

As usual the Ram Lila went off in the Monghyr maidan during the vacation with some enthusiasm.

With reference to the query made by your correspondent Baboo Ramgopal Sanyal regarding the Nalkunt bird, I beg to point out that the practice of freeing that kind of bird before the immersion of the goddess into a river or tank on the fourth day of the Pooja, prevails not only in Krishnagore and its vicinity but in other parts of lower Bengal. For instance, in the ancient house of the Chatterjees of Sursoona Behala, in the 24-Pergunnahs, from time immemorial the practice holds. I do not think it has a religious basis. It is the belief of the worshippers, confirmed by long usage, that the freeing of the bird on such auspicious occasions serves two ends—viz., first to gain virtue, secondly to find an indication by its flight whether the goddess is likely to be worshipped the next year or not. If the bird in question, after being freed, flies and takes its seat within the boundary of the house in which she was worshipped, say either on the terrace or on a tree close by, the deity is supposed to come in the following year. When the bird flies straight in an opposite direction, there is no likelihood of her being worshipped the next year.

The whole station of Jamalpur is now being surveyed and levelled by the local municipality, with a view to draw out a plan, shewing the roads, mubullas, drainage arrangements, &c., for sanitary improvement of all the quarters of the little town. This, no doubt, is a move in the right direction, and sooner its operation is taken in hand the better. This little town, though famous for years past for salubrity, is not unlike lower Bengal now-a-days as regards its climate. Fever seems to be the order of the day, tending to assume a malarious type.

For want of rain, the food grains, &c., are becoming dearer day by day. Without a heavy downpour within a short time, famine is apprehended in no distant date.

THE LATE KALI CHURN LAHIRY, OF KRISHNAGHUR.

SIR,—The above native physician, wellknown in the district of Nuddea for his liberality to the poor, and for his skill in his own profession, breathed his last, on Wednesday the 7th of October last. No proper obituary of this remarkable man having appeared in any of the Bengal newspapers, I solicit the favour of a little space in your journal, for the purpose of describing the chief events of his life which, I dare say, will throw an incidental side light on that of his eldest brother, I mean Babu Ram Tonoo Lahiry. Babu Ram Kristo Lahiry had five sons, viz., Babus Keshub Chunder Lahiry, Radha Bilash Lahiry, Ram Tonoo Lahiry, Sree Prosad Lahiry and Kali Churn Lahiry. But of these five brothers, only Babu Ram Tonoo Lahiry, an alumni of the old Hindoo College, and a class-friend of Babu Ram Gopal Ghose, Raja Dhukhinarunjun Mookerjee, and Baboo Rusik Kristo Mulik, et hoc genus omne, still survives. The father of these Lahiry brothers, Babu Ram Kristo Lahiry, was a Barendra coolin Brahman of high caste, and possessed high moral qualities which the brothers Ram Tonoo and Kali Churn inherited. How their good and pious father came to settle in Krishnagur, I cannot say, but this much can be said of the family, that the marriage of Babu Ram Kristo Lahiry with the daughter of the Dewan of the Maharaja of Krishnagur gave it a locus standi and a recognized position in the local Hindu society. Babu Ram Kristo Lahiry was a poor man and maintained himself and his large family with a monthly income of Rs. 6, which he used to receive from the Roy Mohashoy (the relatives of the Maharaja of Krishnagur) as their gomasta. The family thus remained in somewhat obscure position, till the first child Babu Keshub Chandra Lahiry got an appointment as a clerk under the circuit Judges of the late Sudder Dewany Adalat. From a recent enquiry I made from my uncle-in-law Babu Ram Tonoo Lahiry (for, I married the youngest daughter of the fourth brother, Babu Sree Prosad Lahiry) I came to learn that, it was Babu Keshub Chunder Lahiry who brought Babu Ram Tonoo Lahiry in his thirteenth year to Kidderpore, where he had a separate lodging and put him into the Hindoo College. Babu Keshub Chunder had a tolerable knowledge of English, and Babu Ram Tonoo says that it was acquired from a Calcutta Babu who was then a clerk in the Nuddea collectorate. Babu Ram Tonoo relates a little incident in the life of his eldest brother which is too good to be lost and forgotten. When Babu Ram Tonoo was in the college classes of the Hindoo College, his eldest brother entertained the idea of retiring from the Government service and insisted upon him to put a stop to his college career abruptly, with a view to serve in the same appointment from which his brother contemplated a speedy retirement. The proposal was made in accordance with the then prevailing idea that a smattering of knowledge in English was quite sufficient for securing a clerkship either in a mercantile or Government office. Babu Ram Tonoo demurred to this proposal and incurred the displeasure of his brother. While Babu Ram Tonoo was a subordinate teacher in the Hindoo College, the boys Kalicharn and Sree Prosad came down from Krishnagur and lived with him in his lodgings at Tunthania in Calcutta. Babu Sree Prosad Lahiry, the fourth brother, was a favourite pupil of David Hare. I have heard from the late Babu Shyama Churn Sirkar, whose life I have described in my biographical work entitled "Bengal Celebrities," Vol. I, that one day, in the rainy season, boy Sree Prosad was found ailing and no sooner the news reached David Hare, than the philanthropist came to their lodging house at Tuntuniah, with a large talpata (cocoanut leaves) umbrella over his head. The night being dark, stormy and rainy, David Hare was obliged to remain in the Lahiry Brothers' lodging. He slept by the side of Shyama Churn Sirkar who was then a free chum with them. Boys Kalicharn and Sree Prosad used to accompany Shyama Churn to the College Square tank in front of the Sanscrit College buildings, to fetch water for their own use, and while robust Shyama Churn used to carry a large kolai (earthen pot) one on his head and another in his loins, boy Kally Churn, then in his teens, used to fetch water in a ghote or garoo (a kind of brass utensils of smaller size). Babu Kalichurn after leaving the Hindoo College was induced by David Hare and his eldest brother to prosecute his studies in the Calcutta Medical College, where he took his degree in medicine in 1884, I believe. He was a contemporary of Dr. Durga Churn Banerjee, the father of Babu Surendra Nath Banerjee. In 1882, I believe, Babu Ram Tonoo threw off his holy thread, while taking a pleasure trip to the North West, where often times he used to go to Gazipur where the late Babu Ram Gopal Ghose had a great sugar factory. Social ostracism was the consequence of the abjuration of his ancestral Hindu faith, and the Lahiry family had to suffer in a variety of ways in the estimation of the Hindoo local public. The old father, the hoary headed Babu Ram Kristo, was then living, and the news of Ram Tonoo's abjuration of Hinduism came like a thunderbolt to him and his brothers. Babus Kali Charan and Sree Prosad managed to ride over this social crisis by celebrating Poojahs in their house at a great cost and performing other Hindu social ceremonies in a similar manner.

Babu Kali Churn being the first native allopathic physician in the district, he had the entire field to himself, and in the hey-day of his professional career, he used to earn Rs. 1,000 a month. This sum he continued to earn for more than thirty five years. With such large income in such a quiet place as Krishnagur, he lived like a true gentleman and spent the major portion of his income in helping the poor. His house was the resort of all the enlightened people of the district, be he an official or non-official. In my younger days, I have seen almost every night men like Babus Deno Bundhu Mitter, Coomar Brojendra Narayan Deb Bahadur, Babu Ram Lochun Ghose, the father of Mr. M. M. Ghose, Babu Dwarka Nath Dey Bahadur, and a host of others too numerous to be mentioned here in detail.

With the death of my father-in-law, Babu Sree Prosad Lahiry, in 1858, the family was split up and lost its grandeur and prestige. Babu Kali Churn, after leaving the Medical College, obtained a Government appointment and was placed in charge of the Charitable Dispensary at Krishnagur, but he had to give up that service very soon.

The late Maharaja Srish Chunder Roy Bahadur appointed him as his family physician, which appointment he held for the forty years till the time of his death. He was an ornament of Krishnagur society which has suffered an irreparable loss from his death at the advanced age of seventy. May his soul remain in peace in Heaven! Yours &c.,

RAM GOPAL SANYAL.

Taltollah, Calcutta,
3rd November 1891.

A SHORT RESUME OF THE SALIENT FACTS OF THE PERSECUTION OF THE JEWS IN RUSSIA.

1. The Jews of Russia have long been compelled—with certain exceptions only—to reside either in Poland or within the fifteen provinces known as the "Pale of Jewish Settlement." This, though a geographically large tract of country, contains comparatively few towns.

2. They may not live within fifty versts (about thirty-three miles) of the frontier. A large smuggling business is carried on by Russians, and the object of the law is to prevent Jews from participating in this profitable business. The effect, however, is to prevent them carrying on legitimate trade with neighbouring countries.

3. Under the May Laws, which prohibit Jews from settling "outside of cities and towns," those settled in villages since May, 1882, are expelled therefrom, and driven into the overcrowded towns of the Pale. Even "skilled artisans," heretofore allowed to reside anywhere, have been expelled from the villages of the Pale.

4. Under certain decisions of the Senate, interpreting the May Laws, Jews settled in villages before May, 1882, have the right of remaining there, but only provided they do not move therefrom. Few can earn a livelihood under such a condition; so the force of circumstances drives many who have the right to remain villagers into the towns of the Pale.

5. Many have been driven out of the villages who had been settled there before 1882, but whose names had not been inscribed as villagers. Others have been expelled because they had temporarily left the village, and returned since 1882. Many who had temporarily left on military duty have been similarly expelled.

6. Suburbs of towns and small towns have been in many cases officially declared to come within the category of villages, and the Jews have been expelled therefrom.

7. Under the May Laws, Jews are prohibited from owning or holding on lease, or even managing, land. Those, therefore, who have that right to remain villagers, in consequence of settlement before 1882, cannot find a livelihood, and the majority must, therefore, migrate to the over-crowded towns of the Pale.

8. Jews are, under the May Laws, not allowed to take a mortgage of land; so they are debarred from the ordinary security for loans on farms.

9. Skilled artisans and their families have hitherto been allowed to reside outside the Pale of Settlement, subject to certain conditions. Under recent rules the Guild masters are required to examine Jews claiming residence in Russia proper; and if these are found inefficient in their trade, or not actually in work, or past work by reason of age, they are expelled, and returned into the Pale of Settlement.

10. Skilled artisans, who formerly held the right of permanent residence in Moscow and St. Petersburg, have lately been deprived of that right by an arbitrary and summary administrative order. Wholesale expulsions of Jews from these capitals have ensued, in most cases at a few hours' notice, no time being allowed for collection of debts or realisation of effects.

11. The definition of "skilled artisan" has been contracted for the purpose of excluding Jews. It has lately been declared that bakers, vinegar makers, glaziers, printers, compositors, and other workers in light occupations, are not artisans, and Jews carrying on these trades have been accordingly expelled from towns in Russia proper, and driven into the towns of the Pale.

12. Until lately Jews of all classes were allowed to reside in the Grand-Duchy of Finland and in Courland. This year large numbers not being artisans or merchants of the First Guild have been expelled and driven into the Pale. Widows of men who resided in Riga have, though natives of Riga, been expelled therefrom and driven into the Pale, the reason given being that their husbands were natives of the Pale, and would, if still living, have been sent there.

13. Jews have lately been also expelled in large numbers from certain important commercial centres outside the Pale, such as Rostoff on the Don, Tomsk in Siberia, and other towns, where, for commercial reasons, they had hitherto been allowed to settle; also from the Transcaspian provinces, and from Batoum, and other Asiatic places formerly owned by Turkey. Many thousands have been so expelled. Those in the Transcaspian provinces have not been merely expelled, but have been conveyed into the Pale of Settlement by étape; that is, conveyed in gangs of prisoners on foot between 1,500 and 1,600 miles, halting on the way only in places where there are prisons. This has taken place during the past winter, and it is reported that large numbers of the victims have died on the journey. Those who reach their destination find in the Pale no manner of livelihood.

14. The result of all these expulsions is not only to deprive of their livelihood the persons expelled, who have to commence anew a career in the Pale of Settlement, but also to injure the original inhabitants of the towns of the Pale, who have to sustain the competition of the new arrivals, to incur the burden of a crowd of pauperised people, and to find for them house-space within limits that were already too contracted.

15. Besides expulsions from Russia proper into the Jewish Pale, a very large number of expulsions of foreign Jews has taken place, not only from Russia proper, but from the Pale itself. Under recent legislation no foreign Jew may reside in Russia, the exceptions being so rare as to be scarcely worthy of notice. Among those classed as foreign Jews are those inhabitants of Bessarabia who, when that province was transferred to Russia, under the Treaty of Berlin, neglected to register themselves as Russian citizens. All these are now expelled or prosecuted as alien vagrants, or rogues and vagabonds (trudagi). Any Jew who is unable to prove the place of his birth may be prosecuted in the same way, and, as registration was formerly a lax institution in Russia, prosecutions and expulsions of Jews, as alien vagrants, are of no rare occurrence.

16. Jews are not allowed to occupy any Government or public appointment. They have accordingly been dismissed from railway and post-office service, from the posts of schoolmasters, and from notarial offices. They may no longer be appointed doctors, or even veterinary surgeons, in the army. Under a law made about a year ago, no Jew may become an advocate, though fully qualified by examination, without the special sanction of the Minister of the Interior, and, as a matter of fact, that sanction has not once been given. According to a report of the Times' correspondent, Jewish advocates in St. Petersburg and Moscow are to be restricted in their practice and number, and no new advocates, though qualified, are to be admitted. No dentists or apothecaries of Jewish extraction are to receive a licence to practise, even though fully qualified. No Jew may become an officer in the army, though bound to serve in the rank and file, like all other Russians. The penalty of evading military service is higher for the Jew than for others. Notwithstanding many evasions, the Jews serve in the army beyond their due proportion. No Jew may serve in the navy.

17. The attainment by a Jew of the highest degree in any University Faculty entitles him to the privilege of residing outside the Pale. A large number of Jews have hitherto been candidates for University distinctions; but recent laws have limited admissions not only to the Universities but to the Gymnasias, the proportion fixed four years ago being 10 per cent. in the Pale 5 per cent. outside it, and 3 per cent. in St. Petersburg and Moscow. The injustice of this limitation in a place like Odessa, where one-third of the inhabitants are Jews, is obvious. The Jews are not allowed schools of their own. Baron Hirsch's proposal to give two millions sterling for establishing technical schools for the Jews was rejected by the Russian Government. In the special technical schools built and endowed by certain rich Jews, the proportion of Jews admitted is limited in the same way as if they had been established by the Government.

18. Jewish children attending the public schools are required to be present on the Jewish Sabbath, the law stating that "their entrance to such institutions serves as evidence that they and their parents are no longer bound to that exclusiveness which demands the severest observance of Saturday."

19. Jews are not allowed to sell intoxicants except in houses which they own as freeholders. Jewish waiters may be employed only by Jews.

20. Jews are not allowed to engage in any mining industry, or to hold mining shares, or to act as agents for persons engaged in mining. If they already hold any mining shares they must sell them within a year.

21. Those Jews who, as high graduates of a University, or as merchants of the First Guild (men paying at least 1,000 roubles taxation annually), are allowed to reside outside the Pale, may have no more than two Jewish employés in their service. A privileged Jew, who wished his aged parents to reside with him outside the Pale, had to register the one as his valet and the other as his cook.

22. Jews are prohibited from forwarding goods, as agents or employés, from frontier custom-houses to localities outside the Pale. There are numerous other laws tending to cramp the trading of Jews both inside and outside the Pale. Even the merchant of the First Guild, who is allowed to reside outside the Pale, is subject to these laws, which greatly check his industry and enterprise.

23. There is a special tax, called the "box tax," levied on the animals killed according to Jewish ritual law—a tax payable on the slaughter of the animal, and another on its retail sale. The tax is farmed out, and the contractor is allowed to make a profit on it.

In the town of Berditscheff the legal tax on the Jews for the slaughter of animals and birds amounts to £5,500 a year, while in reality they pay, in consequence of an illegal conspiracy between the tax-farmers and the police authorities, £27,500 a year. There are also special taxes on house property owned by Jews, on business profits of Jews, on the skull-caps used by Jews during domestic prayer, and on the Sabbath candles used by Jews; besides other special imposts.

24. Jews on reaching their fourteenth year may be received into the Orthodox Russian Church, notwithstanding the objection of their parents or guardians. All Jews, on conversion, receive from the State a considerable money payment, and are thenceforth free from all disqualifications and restrictions.

25. Synagogues are only allowed in places where there are no less than eighty Jewish houses; houses of prayer, where there are no less than thirty Jewish houses. Jews holding divine worship in their houses without permission of the authorities are punished by law.

26. Rural communities of Jewish agriculturists (specially exempted from the May Laws) must keep apart from settlers belonging to another persuasion. These agriculturist settlements are few in number.

27. No Jew may be elected Mayor of a town, or as Councillor in a town, or as Police Judge. Nor may a Jew hold any other town office. The law says, "The duties of judges cannot be entrusted to Jews with convenience or decency."

28. The Russian law declares all Jews "to be aliens whose several rights are regulated by special ordinances." This law and the mass of special ordinances cause the Jews generally to be regarded as a pariah caste, not only by the officials, but by the Christian population generally.

29. The minute legal restrictions which hem in the action and movements of every Jew, and compel him to obtain police sanction for everything he requires to do, renders him a ready subject for blackmail, and he can only live by a series of evasions always purchasable by bribing the officials. The poverty of the bulk of the Jews has now reached that stage where bribery is impracticable. Hence the laws are now enforced with all possible rigour, and the means of living are rendered unattainable by the great majority. —Darkest Russia, Oct. 16.

TEXT OF THE MOSCOW EXPULSION UKASE.

As the expulsion of the Jews from Moscow has now attained formidable dimensions, we think it right to produce the actual text of the Ukase under which the expulsions are effected:—

"Concerning the expulsion of the Jews from the city and province of Moscow, the cases to be dealt with are divided into several classes.

"To the first class belong those Jews who have resided in the district for not more than three years, those who are unmarried, also those who are married but have no children, and those who only employ one assistant in their handicrafts.

"To the second class belong those who have as many as four children, those who employ four assistants, and those who have dwelt in the district at least for six years.

"To the third class belong those who have large families and those who employ more than four assistants.

"Those who voluntarily leave the city or district and belong to the first class are allowed from three to six months, the second class from six to nine months, the third class from nine to twelve months, in which to depart.

"Those who are to leave the city must receive notice from the police three months before the period fixed for them, and their acknowledgment of this notice must be obtained. Those artisans who possess real property shall be granted an interval of two years, and they too must receive notice from the police.

"The same principles must be applied to the other Jews who dwell in Moscow by virtue of the rights conferred by the circular of the Minister of the Interior, dated 1886, paragraph 30. These Jews, however, fall only into two categories—first, those who have licences as commercial travellers or clerks, or those who have no special employment, are to be allowed six months in which to leave the place. Secondly, those who are engaged in business or have partnerships with Russian manufacturers, shall be allowed a full year's respite. The manufacturers must receive six months' notice before the expulsion. Those who have licences from the larger manufacturers are to be allowed a period of two years. In all cases the renewal of the annual licences must be carefully guarded, for these licences have force only until the 1st of January. Those Jews who would otherwise be included in one of the classes to which shorter periods are allowed, must be permitted to remain until their licences have run out.

"As to those individuals who may be permitted to remain permanently in Moscow, each separate case must be separately and specially investigated. The period of expulsion fixed for each of the three classes shall date from the time that the special order arrives." —Darkest Russia, Oct. 16.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

GAUDEAMUS IGITUR.

BY DR. T. HELMUTH.

'Tis midnight, now, and curious thoughts are weaving
Mysterious spells athwart my dreamy mind,
Which drowsily is in the distance leaving
The world, the joys, the follies of mankind,
And as I ponder o'er the mighty past,
With ghostly memories my spirits teem ;
Now forms grotesque are rushing o'er me fast,
And fairies come to lull me to a dream.

'Tis not a dream of love, as Dido fain,
Would pray to rest upon her anxious brain,
When faithless son of old Anchises swore
Eternal friendship and then fled her shore.
Nor such an one as Enone, whose charms
Awhile brought faithless Paris to her arms,
Would raptured wake from and would wailing cry,
"Many-fountained Ida, harken ere I die."
'Tis not a dream of horror, crime or blood,
As told of Aram by the poet Hood,
But one in which compounders of new pills
Doctors for patients making monstrous bills,
Female physicians, literary hacks,
Charlatans, empirics, regulars and quacks,
A wild incongruous and motley mass
Stand by to see a grand procession pass.

A youth moves forward, bearing proud on high
A torch of "Bark" and "Pitch of Burgundy,"
While in "Etherial" air from founts obscured,
With golden spouts "Ol. Terebinth" is poured,
Which ceaseless streaming on the flickering fire,
Creates new brightness, never to expire.

Then there appears Old Chiron in the van ;
Medicine's instructor—partly horse, part man.
His noble front is bound with leaves of fig ;
His locks anointed with "Ol. Croton Tig."
With vig'rous tail he slays the flies that tease,
While imps of "Sheepskin" shout "Cantharides."

His pupil next, great "Aesculapius," see,
With grace sublime, he sips strong "Catnip tea."
His daughter, "Hygeia," near, with tresses loose,
Divides her time 'twixt "Apple Sauce and Goose."
While "Shining Mercury" o'erhead doth flit,
Bearing his son in arms, "Chloride Mit."

But, oh ! what grace, what dignity is seen
In "Galen's" bearing as he moves supreme.
One mighty arm supports a "pail of tin,"
With "Lime" and "aqua pura" mixed therein ;

While on his shoulder rests a "sculptured hod,"
Rich with "six livers from a single cod."
And thus prepared, he joins with master art,
Those structures fair, disease has torn apart.

"Four patent legs" a "flaxseed cushion" bear,
On which there rests "a carbuncle" most rare.
The gem a dragon guards with iron teeth ;
"Noli me tangere," the motto 'neath.

In solemn state "a hundred donkeys" pass,
Laden with "Tumors well preserved in glass ;"
A Hottentot with setons in his ears
Bearing Koch's Dead Tuberculine appears.
The tubes are covered with a sombre pall
On which is written "He hath fooled us all."
Ten tottering gray beards tote a tin petard
Inscribed "Catholicon of Brown Sequard."
They chant this song in tones of deep regret
"We've taken tons but have not got there yet."
But Lords supreme of all who move before,
The doctors come, the heroes we adore ;
Ancient sarcophagi, encased with dust,
With old traditions filled and moist with must ;
Their chariots form ; the glowing wheels of brass
Creating deafening thunder as they pass.

Then over all falls deep Cimmerian gloom.
And I behold the yawnings of a tomb.
So vast in size, mine eye can scarcely see
The full extent of its capacity,
The whole procession, with convulsive din,
Wavers a moment, and at once falls in ;
While from the earth, the air, the skies,
Clad in the draperies of Truth, arise
A host of men, true, honest, strong and brave,
Who close the sepulchre and seal the grave.
And then I see, in new effulgence bright,
A Buffalo reporter here to-night,
I cry aloud, "Oh ! Paragon of truth,
What awful accident is this forsooth."
He smiles and says, "It is—(my words are true),
The burial of the Old School by the New."

I woke and thought—this may be only fun !
But, 'pon my word, the thing is almost done.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Dyspepsia, Jaundice.—These complaints are the result of a disordered liver, which secretes bile in quality or quantity incapable of digesting food. Digestion requires a free flow of healthy bile, to insure which Holloway's Pills and Ointment have long been famous, for eclipsing every other medicine. Food, irregularity of living, climates, and other causes are constantly throwing the liver into disorder, but that important organ can, under all circumstances, soon be regulated and healthily adjusted by Holloway's Pills and Ointment, which act directly upon its vital secretion. The Ointment rubbed on the skin penetrates immediately to the liver, whose blood and nerves it rectifies. One trial is all that is needed ; a cure will soon follow.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THE Viceroy and his party left Srinagar on their return journey from Cashmere on Sunday. They are timed for Amritsar this day.

GENERAL Roberts is about to complete his extended term of office as Commander-in-chief of the Indian Army. The report that Major General Sir George White will succeed him has been contradicted.

SIR Auckland Colvin will probably pay a visit to Calcutta early in December, with a view to hold consultations with the Viceroy on matters connected with the administration of the Upper Provinces.

THE arrival of the Russian Prince Galitzin in Cashmere through the steppes of Central Asia, just at the time of the Viceroy's visit, is naturally regarded as having some political significance. But all that is yet known of him is against the supposition that he has any connection with Central Asian politics. It is said that he is a savant in archaeology and a Buddhistic scholar, and that the only object of his visit to India is to improve his learning. He is expected to pay a flying visit to Calcutta about the first week of December. Then he goes to Burma and thence to Ceylon. He had been in England and speaks English fairly.

ACCORDING to present reports, both Captain Younghusband and Lieutenant Davidson speak in high terms of the courtesy shown them by Colonel Yanoff in Pamir. So the attempt to repeat the Ali Musjid story for bringing about a casus belli appears to be given up for the present, though the St. James' Gazette still professes to believe in the myth of the arrest of, and insult to, Captain Younghusband by the Russian Colonel.

ACCORDING to the Standard's Berlin correspondent, Russia intends, next spring, to make a caravan road through Pamir to the Cashmere frontier.

REUTER says that the Police of Russian Poland have expelled Mr. Pennel, the correspondent of the Illustrated London News, from the Russian territory.

THE Amir of Cabool is said to have sent an envoy to St. Petersburg to conclude a commercial treaty with Russia. The Czar will grant an audience to the Afgan Vakil about the middle of December.

THE Russian military authorities have decided not to allow Dr. Koch's method of curing consumption to be practised in hospitals under their control. The doctor had feathered his nest before he made his cure public.

LORD Tennyson has addressed the following letter to a member of the Russo-Jewish Committee:

"October 1st, 1891.—Sir, I have read what is reported of the Russian persecutions by your paper and by the Press generally and if that be true, I can only say that Russia has disgraced her Church and her nationality. I once met the Czar. He seemed a kind and good natured man. I can scarcely believe that he is fully aware of the barbarities perpetrated with his apparent sanction."

The Czar, it may be hoped, will be wise enough to take due note of the warning thus gently given to him by the British Laureate. With all his power on earth, the Russian autocrat can have no terrors for the immortal poet. But the genius of the bard may hand over the mightiest potentate on earth to the execration of the whole world for ages.

THE man Tsuda Sanzo who attempted the life of the Czarevitch at Otsu, and was in consequence cast into prison for life, has died of pneumonia. He will, however, be always remembered for the subject of his attack.

THE Pope has addressed an "Epistola" to the German and Austro-Hungarian bishops against duelling. His Holiness denounces the practice of thus obtaining "satisfaction." "That private citizens should, individually, by the use of lethal arms, constitute themselves the vindicators of their rights or of their 'honour' when they suppose this is violated, argues a licence more in keeping with barbarism than civilisation." He then calls upon the bishops "to form, so to speak, a confederation, and pledge themselves on no occasion and under no circumstances whatever to engage in a personal encounter."

THE third International Statistical Congress was held at Vienna, on the 28th September last. Sir Rawson Rawson gave the presidential address. Dr. Longstaff took up the interesting subject of parentage and incidentally alluded to the decrease of marriages and births in England.

HAVE you seen a cat with two legs? Professor Leon of Jassy has one such. The animal's forelegs are absent from the shoulder blades, yet it can go about easily, the body being in normal position. When startled, it rises up like a kangaroo, supporting itself on its tail. It has borne kittens twice, two at a time, one has four feet and the other only two.

THE Middlesex County Times reports the fortunate escape of three men from the accident of a falling meteor. A gardener was sawing a detached bough of a tree while two gentlemen were watching the operation. It was just before noon, when one of them saw a ball of fire strike the tree in an oblique direction and fall within two or three yards of them. It then rebounded and exploded, producing a sound like dynamite. The men were not struck, but the shock was so great that all were dazed, and one of them rolled over two or three times. They recovered quickly, complaining only of headache which lasted for some hours. The trunk burnt presented the appearance of a zigzag line of some 20 or 30 feet.

THE Governor General of Portuguese India has had his salary reduced from Rs. 25,000 to Rs. 15,000 per annum, so that pecuniarily he will be now not much better off than a first grade Joint Magistrate in British India.

THE great annual solemnities at the old Portuguese church at Bandel, near Hooghly, take place to-morrow, when a large attendance of Roman Catholic pilgrims from Calcutta and its neighbourhood is expected.

THE N. W. Provinces have already got a local legislature. A similar experiment is now seriously contemplated for the Panjab.

THE earthquake in Japan seems to have been more destructive than at first telegraphed. An official report gives the number of the killed at 6,500 and the injured at 9,000. No less than 86,000 houses were destroyed.

ACCORDING to the latest reports relating to the movements of "General" Booth, Calcutta ought to be prepared for an "invasion" by his army under his immediate command. There is, however, no sign as yet of anything to disturb the usual quietness of the Metropolis of British India. There is no indication of the possibility of anything like even the Panic Sunday.

WITH the commencement of the new year, the cavalry of the Madras Army will be organized in three regiments of four squadrons each. From that date, the 4th Regiment of Madras Light Cavalry will be disbanded, and simultaneously the three remaining regiments—the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd, Regiments of Madras Lancers—will be augmented from three to four squadrons each, with an establishment, for each regiment, of 10 British officers, and 625 Native ranks. The native officers, non-commissioned officers and men now serving in the 4th Madras Light Cavalry will cease to be borne on the rolls thereof from the 1st January next. But such of them as have served for pension for twenty-five years and upwards will be transferred to the pension establishment on the superior rate of pension of their rank (irrespective of the period they may have served therein), plus rice compensation, with the option of being transferred to other regiments of Madras cavalry. Those of fifteen years' service and upwards will be relegated to the ordinary pension of their rank and will be eligible for the other facilities granted to 25 years' officers and men. The like for those of more than ten or less than fifteen years' service with transfer to the pension establishment on two-thirds of the ordinary rate of pension of their rank. Non-commissioned officers and men of more than five years' and less than ten years' service will receive their discharge with a gratuity of one month's pay (including good-conduct pay) for each year of service, or will have the option of being transferred to other regiments of Madras cavalry. Such officers and men of less than five years' service have the option of being transferred to other regiments of Madras cavalry or of taking their discharge with a gratuity of three months', including good-conduct, pay. Transfers to the Body-Guard and to the other regiments of Madras cavalry will be made to the extent required to complete those corps.

WE take the following from Nature of October 22, 1891:—

"Mr. W. L. Slater, the Deputy Superintendent of the Indian Museum, Calcutta, will proceed to Upper Assam in December next, upon a collecting expedition for the benefit of the Museum. From Makuin he will ascend the Dihing river in the north, and establish his camp at some convenient spot in the Dapha valley. At the head of the Dapha valley rises Dapha Bum, a mountain of some 15,000 feet in altitude, on the frontiers of the Chinese territory, so that there is a good prospect of the occurrence of Chinese forms in the district. The Dapha valley has been described geographically by Mr. S. E. Peal, who visited it in 1882, but has not been much explored zoologically. Mr. Slater will pay special attention to mammals and birds."

THE Sibsagar Mounted Rifles, the Darrang Mounted Rifles, the Lakhimpur Mounted Rifles, and the Nowgong Mounted Rifles will henceforth form one corps under the designation of the "Assam Valley Mounted Rifles."

THE Secretary of State for India has sanctioned the construction of a permanent line of railway through the Mushkaf Valley, from Sibi to Kalpur, on the Sind-Peshin Section (Quetta loop) of the North-Western Railway, a distance of 56 miles.

MR. Justice Mathu Swami Iyer is laid up with fever.

THE Pioneer says:—

"All is quiet in the Rampore State, and the troops encamped within a few miles of the capital town will probably be complaining very soon of the monotony of their lot. It will, however, be necessary to keep them there for some time to come, in view of further attempts being made to raise trouble in the State."

THE report is gaining ground that a portion of the Chinsura barracks has been purchased by a company of Manchester merchants for setting up a cotton mill in the locality.

BY the retirement of Mr. Halliday, Sir Henry Harrison is now the senior Member of the Board of Revenue. He has also been appointed Chairman of the Port Commission in the place of his late senior in the Board.

AFTER the long Dussehra vacation, the High Court opened for its regular work on Thursday.

THE Deputy Educational Inspector in Broach, Mr. F. M. Khimjiani, struck a boy of a school he had examined. A complaint of assault was laid in the District Magistrate's Court against the Inspector. The Educational officer demurred to the jurisdiction of the Court, on the ground probably that he received his orders from a different authority than the Magistrate. The Court held that his jurisdiction extended to all departments including educational. Thus over-ruled, Mr. Khimjiani had no other plea to advance. He apologized for the assault committed and received his release from the clutches of the law.

FOR theft of official letters, the Cantonment Magistrate of Rawal-Pindi has sentenced Pooran Singh, lately a clerk in the office of the Controller of Military Accounts, to two years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of rupees five hundred, or, in default, to additional imprisonment for six months.

THE Warburton defamation case has at last ended—in an apology by Babu Sitala Kanta Chatterjee, the late editor of the Tribune, and on payment of substantial pecuniary compensation by the proprietor, Sardar Dyal Sing Majitha. The sum of money paid to appease the Afghan ire, is not mentioned, but is believed in some quarters to be Rs. 12,000.

RAJA Amar Singh, brother of the Maharaja of Cashmere, appointed a Knight Commander of the Most Exalted Order of the Star of India.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

NOTWITHSTANDING denials and contradictions, they still talk of retirement before time of Lord Lansdowne. They even mention Lord George Hamilton as the next Viceroy. There is, however, no foundation for the rumour, and Lord George Hamilton has himself denied that he comes out to India to succeed Lord Lansdowne.

AFTER his tour in South Behar, Sir Charles Elliott is enjoying a few days' sojourn at Sonapore. The presence of the Lieutenant-Governor and that of most of the big Rajas and Reises of Behar has materially added to the gay scene of the Hari Har Chattrra Mela this year, though Behar is just now under a gloom in consequence of the cadastral survey ordered by Government. The Maharaja of Cooch Behar has run up to Sonapore to add to the festivities of the week.

THE decision of the Viceroy with regard to Cashmere, has been announced. The Maharaja has been partially restored to power. He will henceforth become President of the State Council, his brother Sir Raja Amar Sing, continuing in it as Vice-President. In the event of a difference of opinion arising between the Maharaja and the Council, reference will have to be made to the Resident, whose advice must also be taken in connection with every measure of importance. This may be regarded as a kind of annexation. But if the administration be carried on through native officials, there ought to be no reasonable ground for complaint. A really strong and wise ruler is a blessing to his country, and we may regret much if such a prince is dethroned or prevented from exercising his powers according to his own discretion. But we can not shut our eyes to the fact that there are Chiefs and even petty landholders whose imbecility and profligate character make them a curse to their people. The sympathy of our countrymen for native princes of whom they know nothing is natural. But the supersession of an individual ruler cannot be regarded as a national grievance. What we deprecate is the swamping of native States by British officials. The appointment of Colonel Neville Chamberlain to organise the Cashmere State troops may be justified on the ground that a similarly qualified native military officer is not available at present. But are there not, among the natives of this country, men who can manage the revenue and finances of Cashmere quite as efficiently as any Englishman?

ON Monday last, the Goalunda Mail brought to Calcutta the ex-Maharaja Kula Chandra Sing and his brother Angao Sena, with thirteen other Manipuri State prisoners. From Sealdah they were conveyed under a strong Police escort to the Alipore Jail, where they are staying for the present, their final destination being, as is well known, the Andamans for which they will be made to embark by the next steamer available.

At a meeting of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, held on Saturday last, it was unanimously resolved to appoint a standing committee to advise the Chamber on affairs connected with indigo. Notwithstanding the progress of the chemical science in the present century, the "blue dye" of India hitherto successfully maintained its ground. But the time has now come when the indigo planters of our country must, to avoid general ruin of their business, take immediate steps to reduce the extent of it gradually. While the competition of aniline and azalean dyes has been increasing of late years, the cultivation of indigo has been at the same time rather extended, instead of being brought within narrower limits. The result of this expansion is that the country is now producing more indigo than it ever did when it had no rival to compete with. In the year 1889-90, the total outturn was one lac and forty thousand maunds, and exceeded the average of previous years by at least 25 per cent. The glut in the market resulted in the falling of the prices to a point which could hardly yield any profit beyond the manufacturing expenses.

Last year, the outturn did not exceed a lac of maunds. But there was no improvement in the rupee price of the dye on account of the rise in the exchange. The production of the season just over, is estimated at one lac and fifty thousand maunds, and the prospect of planters is not very cheering. In the state of things which has now arisen, they cannot hope to carry on their business with profit unless they resolve unanimously to reduce the extent of their cultivation in the future.

THE Britons' passion for amusement flags nowhere. They can afford to be merry everywhere and under any condition. The murky old goods shed of the G. I. P. R. at Khandwa, lately presented a spectacle to which the poet's description of the famous hall at Brussels that preceded the great battle of Waterloo might well apply. In the dull prosaic Railway godown to which British decorative art gave, for the nonce, the appearance of fairy land, were assembled the local battalion of engine drivers and guards—not with sooty faces and dirt-laden garments, but washed and dressed in fancy costumes in the stylish fashion of aristocratic theatricals. Like Belgium's capital the little town of Khandwa in the land of Kalidasa

Gathered then

Her beauty and her chivalry, and bright
The lamps shone o'er fair women and brave men;
A thousand hearts beat happily; and when
Music arose with its voluptuous swell,
Soft eyes looked love to eyes which spoke again.

The tomfoolery was carried to the utmost extent possible. The Railway bands and their guests played various parts. They disguised themselves in different characters—from rollicking sailors to crafty diplomatists in full political uniform. The Anglo-Indian's favorite butt of ridicule, the Baboo, was wanting. But his place was, we believe, taken up, in some respects, by the Vakeel from Bombay. Upon the whole, all went merry as a marriage bell, and there was neither "cannon's opening roar" nor any railway accident to mar the merry-making.

THE Zemindari Dak Tax is an assessment which was originally imposed on Zemindars as commutation money in lieu of the practice under which they had formerly to convey all official letters from place to place. In these days of penny post and pice post, when there is hardly even a rural village in the remote mofussil which is not served by the Government dak, the tax levied under Act VIII (B.C.) of 1862 can have no justification whatever. Section 4 of the Act expressly provides that "no Zemindari dak shall be established or maintained between any two places between which a Government post for the time being exists." The raison d'être of the tax is in fact altogether wanting in these days. Knowing well, however, the history of the Income Tax, the Zemindars can hardly expect the total abolition of a cess to which the Government has acquired almost a prescriptive right by length of time. But now that the rate of the assessment is going to be fixed permanently, it seems worth considering whether its proceeds cannot be applied to purposes other than that for which it was originally levied, as, for instance, to village sanitation. To the Zemindars who have to pay the tax, it matters little how the money is spent. At any event, they are certainly more interested in village sanitation than in the maintenance of a dak service that is quite unnecessary in these days.

THE Governor-General in Council has directed that, in future, when any immovable public property is made over to a local authority for public purposes, the grant shall be made expressly on the condition, in addition to any others that may be settled, that, should the property be at any time resumed by Government, the compensation payable therefor shall in no case exceed the amount (if any) paid to the Government for the grant, together with the cost or their present value, whichever shall be the less, of any buildings erected or other works executed on the land by the local authority.

IN the Bombay Presidency, compulsory vaccination is only legal in the city of Bombay and the town of Karachi. It has been proposed to legalize it for other areas as well. For this purpose, Sir C. B. Pritchard has introduced a Bill in the local Legislative Council. It is urged in support of the measure that the voluntary system has not been effectual and that there have been outbreaks of smallpox, especially in Sind. The failure of the existing system is attributed not to any rooted objection to vaccination among the various populations of the presidency but rather to their indifference, indolence and ignorance. This statement, it seems to us, is rather, inconsistent with the provision that it will be competent for the Governor to extend the compulsory system to any local area in the presidency with the further power to withdraw it, permanently or temporarily, from any area to which it might have been applied. The Bill also legalizes compulsory vaccination of convicts and persons detained for long periods in jails, reformatories and lunatic asylums. Under-trial prisoners are saved the operation.

DR. Bhandarkar, the well known Sanskrit scholar of Western India, has been excommunicated by his caste, for permitting his widowed daughter to marry. It is very convenient for caste men sometimes to persecute one of their members for his supposed transgression of the shasters. Petty jealousies and personal grudges suffice to deaden the capacity for sympathising with neighbours in their afflictions. But the time usually comes when the quondam leader of social tyranny finds himself in the position of its victim, and then he discovers the folly of his so called orthodoxy. Those who have begun to abuse us for our appeal regarding the fasting of Ekadasi, ought to remember that a day may come when they may have to repent bitterly for their upholding one of the greatest cruelties ever perpetrated in the name of any religion. They, we may presume, are all family men. If they have children, they ought to be able to see how miserable they may be made at any time by the death of a married son or of a son-in-law. If they have not been so unfortunate as to have suffered such a bereavement already, they know at least what a misfortune of that kind means.

THE Raja of Bobbili, in the Madras Presidency, is doing everything in his power to get his people to reduce the heavy expenditure which they incur in marriage ceremonies. If the British Government made any such attempt, the leaders of "Baboo Hinduism" would have rent heaven and earth with their cry of "religion in danger." Those who have any idea of the nature of their national creed, cannot in their hearts possibly entertain any apprehension as to the stability of its essential principles.

CONSISTENCY is not an essential characteristic of Babu "Hindooism." The exponents of the new fangled orthodoxy have recently given the honor of sainthood to one of the most heterodox members of their community. And now it appears that the University of Calcutta, despite the Hindoo element predominating in it, lately held some of its examinations on a Hindu festival day.

WE have to thank our contemporary, the Statesman, for its sympathetic notice of our appeal on behalf of Hindu widows in Bengal. It says:

"Reis and Rayyet makes a strong appeal on behalf of the Hindu widows of Bengal, and on what certainly appear to be very good grounds. It is a practice rigorously enforced on widows in Hindu households, we are told, that they should absolutely abstain from all food and drink on the Ekadasi or eleventh day of the moon. The cruel treatment to which widowed mothers, sisters, and daughters are thus subjected, is described as simply 'shocking.' No exception is made in favor of infancy or extreme old age. Even though a widow be at the point of death, her children will not put a drop of water into her mouth to quench her thirst. The most remarkable fact in connection with this practice, Reis and Rayyet observes, is that it is not authorised by any inspired text in the Shastras that can be held absolutely binding on the conscience of orthodox Hindoos."

Fasting on the eleventh day of the moon is obligatory on every Hindu male as well as female, excepting, according to some authorities, married women during coverture. But while we of the male persuasion honor the injunction more in the breach than in the observance, it is enforced on widows with even greater rigor than the Shasters require. It is a fundamental principle of our sacred scriptures that their ordinances apply only to those who have the capacity of complying with them. With regard to the fasting of the Ekadasi, there are numerous authoritative texts, which expressly say that persons incapable of observing it by abstaining altogether from every kind of food and drink, may have their hunger appeased by roots, fruits, milk and water. There is, in fact, no Shastric authority for the cruel discipline of Ekadasi in the form in which Hindu widows in the central districts of Bengal are made to observe it. In other parts of India, their sisters, in the same unfortunate situation, abstain only from cooked food on the day sacred to the god Hari. The Shasters require nothing more, and there is no justification whatever for the extra cruelty to which we in Bengal subject the widows. The question is one in which every Hindu householder is deeply interested. We hope the vernacular papers will take it up in a proper spirit as behoves unsophisticated citizens and practical men. We do not ask them to give up their enthusiasm for their religion or their shasters. Our appeal is only for better compliance with the ordinances of our sacred codes, so that they may not be discredited by the continuance of a shamefully cruel practice in their name.

THE Madras Times takes our countrymen to task for the treatment usually given to our domestic animals. Our contemporary goes further, and finds fault with our shasters for having failed to secure even to the sacred cow sufficient food, and protection from wanton cruelty. But our religion has done all that spiritual teachings and discipline can possibly do to make men humane, and to soften their natural callousness towards the sufferings of the lower animals. To people who do not regard beef-eating as a heinous crime, and who, being conversant with the stories of their shipwrecked sailors, know well enough what men professing even the noble religion of Christ are capable of doing when pressed hard by the cravings of hunger, it must appear extraordinary that, even in times of famine and utter destitution, the Indian peasant would rather die of starvation with his wife and children than kill one of his bullocks for the purpose of food. It is true that our cattle and beasts of burden are not properly housed and fed. But the semi-starved peasantry of our country cannot be expected to keep their live-stock in a better condition than themselves and their children. In former times, there were large tracts of pasture land in the vicinity of every village. With the demands of the abnormal foreign commerce which has grown up during the present century, the area of our commons has been reduced almost to nil, and the cattle breeders, cart owners and agriculturists are driven to their wits' end to provide fodder for their cows, bullocks, buffaloes and ponies. The brutalities sometimes practised by cart drivers on their bullocks may be effectually checked by making such acts criminally punishable throughout the country. But until, by the expansion of our manufacturing industries, there is a larger town population, no amount of bullying or even actual prosecutions can increase the means of the Indian rayyet to keep his cattle in the condition in which English farmers keep their live-stock.

In any case, the peroration with which the Times of India concludes its advocacy of the cause it has taken up, mars its effect altogether. In the tone of an omnipotent autocrat, our contemporary observes:—

"Where we see so much abominable cruelty strangely coupled with a professedness of veneration we can but pity the ignorance and perversity, which sanction such a disgraceful anomaly; but our sympathy with the dumb creation should not end here—we should teach, by condign punishment of the offender, wherever his transgressions bring him under the finger of the law, that as long as hard-fisted rule in India, the dumb hutes as well as 'India's dumb millions' are under her protection, and may not be tortured with impunity."

By language like this, a really good cause is spoiled. Criticism in such spirit only provokes retaliation in the same style, the ultimate result being the widening of the breach which already exists between the rulers and the ruled.

BENIGHTED Madras is now going ahead of her sister Presidencies. She has suffered enough from the vagaries of the rain god, and is determined not to depend entirely upon his voluntary charity which is provokingly irregular and precarious like that of men. The result of the rain-making experiments made in the district of Cuddapah has been sufficiently encouraging. Ten packages of dynamite, of ten pounds' weight each, were exploded on a rock about 2,400 feet above the level of the sea. About six hours after the explosions, there was a magnificent shower of rain which lasted for nearly half an hour and which gauged about 1 inch, over a portion of the area benefited by it. Here, in Bengal, the question of having similar experiments for the benefit of our winter rice has ceased to be a pressing one, after the heavy downpours that we had last week. But what are our savants doing? To them the question has an interest irrespective of the immediate physical needs of the people.

We believe there is a rule that no Executive or Judicial officer can be posted in the sub-division, if not the district, of which he is a native. The rule is certainly a salutary one. A solemn judgment pronounced by the Lord Chancellor himself was on one occasion set aside in appeal, on the ground of the Judge having had, unknown to himself, purchased some years back a share of the value of £5 in the company whose affairs had been under adjudication. As long as human nature will remain human nature, sympathy with, or even active interest in, all the parochial disputes of one's native place, is sure to be felt or taken. Such sympathy or interest may not interfere, even appreciably, with just and impartial discharge of one's duties, but administrative policy should not ignore its possibility even in the case of tried servants. Upon the same principle, we think, is founded the rule about never allowing an officer to continue for more than five years in any station. Both these rules, however, are more honored in the breach than the observance. This is very often due to the weakness of particular Secretaries or Under-Secretaries in yielding to private solicitations. An instance may be cited of an Executive officer at Howrah fully hearing out this observation. He has not only been posted in his native town, but has even been allowed to continue there for a much longer period than five years. In consequence of his religion again he is looked upon as the representative of the Native Christians of his town and, every time, since the grant of an elective municipality to Howrah, he has entered the municipal Board by official nomination, although the truth is that he represents none but himself. He was on one occasion allowed to even stand as a candidate for election in his own ward and canvass as actively as anybody else for securing his return. A petition was made to the Government of Bengal sometime back for the transfer of this officer. The Police, however, with its usual adroitness, succeeded in showing that the majority of the signatures to the petition had been obtained on incorrect representations and the officer himself explained that the house in which he resided belonged to his mother. He could not but admit that both he and his father before him were residents of Howrah. For all that, a gracious secretariat hushed the matter up, to be reopened, perhaps, upon receipt of another petition more pungent than the former. Executive officers should never be allowed to mingle in the parochial disputes of their stations. Armed with authority and with the Police ever obedient to them, they can swamp all opposition and always secure their own ends.

SIR John Gorst has been quietly removed from the position of Under-Secretary of State for India. The indiscreetness which he betrayed in vindicating the Mumpur policy of the Indian Government, brought upon him the displeasure of his official chiefs, and they have taken the earliest opportunity to place him out of harm's way by shelling him as Financial Secretary to the Treasury. Sir John's place, Mr. W. L. Jackson who has been appointed Chief Secretary for Ireland.

THE prospect of silver is still uncertain, despite the optimistic view taken by the Financial Age. Not only has the speech of Mr. Foster, Secretary to the United States Treasury, dealt a severe blow to the free coinage agitation, but it is now announced that the New York Chamber of Commerce favors the suspension of purchases and of the coinage of silver, until an agreement on the question is concluded between the States and other commercial nations.

THE financial panic caused by the failure of the Berlin Bank has resulted in a run on all the banks in the Fatherland. In this state of things, German capitalists may not be able to give effect to their project of opening a Bank in Calcutta, at least for some time to come.

FROM the dividends given by the Banks here, they appear to be all in a prosperous condition. But a writer in the columns of a Calcutta daily recently reminded us that large dividends do not always mean a sound financial position. The confidence of the Indian public in their Banks has never been seriously shaken since the failure of the Union Bank. The temporary collapse of the Agra Bank, the Oriental Bank and the Comptoir des Comptes de Paris created panics for a time. But their revival has at least partially restored the confidence reposed in them by the public. Yet we think that the affairs of all the banking corporations and joint stock companies ought to be subject to the supervision of responsible officers of Government, who may be referred to by their shareholders, creditors and constituents for information, and who may publish from time to time such reports as may, without divulging the business secrets, enable the public to form correct estimates of their position. The history of most of our now defunct Joint Stock Companies shows that the Indian Companies Act now in force does not afford to shareholders sufficient protection against the misconduct of Directors and Managing Agents.

GAMBLING is practised in some shape or other in almost every part of the world. But the form of it recently adopted by the sweetmeat vendors in and near Manchester, is quite an original invention. The victims of their sharp practice are not grown up men but little boys and girls, who buy their so called "lucky sweets," not to eat but in the hope of finding a three penny piece in one of them. We should wonder much if the contagion failed to spread in other countries, especially among the children of our Marwari brethren.

IT is more than ten years that the Czar Alexander II. was murdered in the streets of St. Petersburg. To mark the deed or rather the spot where he fell, it was decided to erect a memorial church, with funds contributed by all classes of the population, even of the farthest wastes of Siberia. Millions of roubles have been collected, and the work is proceeding, though slowly. The spire rises above the fatal spot, and light is made to fall from above on the two paving stones upon which the Czar sank mortally wounded.

THE famine in Russia is growing keener and keener. The wheat stocks are dangerously depleted, and it is feared that next spring wheat will have to be imported. In the meantime, the Czar has prohibited the export of that article of food. It is estimated that the famine will entail an outlay, during the next six months, of eight hundred million roubles. To heighten the horrors, typhus has shewn itself and causing great havoc among the starving peasantry. Thirteen whole provinces, with an area of half a million square miles or more than twice the size of France, and a population of 26 millions, are suffering from the want of the barest necessities of life. These form a solid area of the richest cornfields in the Empire.

WE Hindoos who believe in the doctrine that charity ought to begin at home, can make great sacrifices for the benefit of our kith and kin. But it is impossible not to admire the charity of the apparently selfish and hard-hearted Anglo-Saxon race, that does not require to be stimulated with vociferous cries of Babu-ki-jai and similar other expressions of good wishes. The Behar famine of Sir Richard Temple showed that their hearts can overflow with the milk of human kindness where there is real occasion for it. They do not found *Sadabrata*s and Annachutras for the sake of name. They have no such inexorable custom as to make it obligatory on them to feed every vagrant and idler at Pujas and Shrads. But they can feel for human misery in a manner which is truly astonishing. In connection with the Russian famine, we read in the papers that the Americans have come forward to succour the distressed subjects of the Czar by sending several ship-loads of corn as free gifts to them.

ON the 10th instant, a storm swept over Great Britain. It is said to have been the worst known for years. Three vessels were driven ashore on the Kentish coast and forty persons killed. There were severe floods in the West of England and numerous casualties in London through the falling of wires and boardings.

MAN is still a mystery to himself, by a great deal. Here is just a casual glimpse of self-acquaintance come all the way from Berlin. A doctor there, with a view to ascertain how weak a solution of cocaine would prove efficacious as a local anæsthetic in minor surgical operations, went on reducing the quantity of cocaine by successive degrees, till he was surprised to find, as an ultimate result, that pure water, injected under the skin with a syringe, renders the flesh at that point insensible to pain. Miraculous is the effect of pure water. It causes a slight swelling, resembling that caused by the sting of a guat. The space thus differentiated remains insensible to pain for some minutes, during which incisions can be made without causing pain.

AT Denbigh police-court, J. W. Barnwell, a schoolmaster of twelve years' standing and church organist, was committed to the assizes, on a charge of having effected the ruin of his niece, Rose Allen, aged twelve years and eleven months, whom he had received from her father and adopted as his child, and under his intimate tuition was on the eve of reaching the high status of maternity.

THE British Medical Journal finds fault with the evidence of Dr. Smith in the Bombay Tower case. On a review of all the medical testimonies before the jurors, it comes to the conclusion that sufficient care was not taken in the post mortem examination. Dr. Smith ascribed all the injuries to the fall, but he was quite mistaken. There were rents in the clothes corresponding to parts of the body which unmistakably point to outrage or attempted outrage. Dr. Smith laid much stress on the absence of spermatozoa in the mucus he had examined, but it must be known that he did not take sufficient precaution to examine the clothes, for his answers in this connection were very vague. Though the culprits have not yet been detected, there is no doubt as to the cause of the two ladies' death.

THE Emperor of Germany has conferred on Professor Von Helmholtz, the great scientist of that country, the much esteemed distinctions of "Wirklicher Geheimer Rath" and "Excellency." They are further enhanced by the following message from the Emperor. "Your whole life has been given to the service of humanity, for whose benefit you have made a great number of glorious discoveries. Your mind, always directed to the purest and highest ideals, in its high flight left politics and party strife far behind. I and my people are proud to call so distinguished a man ours. I have chosen the birthday of my dearly beloved and never to be forgotten father for this mark of appreciation, knowing well how highly he valued you and how devoted a friend and subject you were to him. May God long preserve your life for the good of Germany and the entire world."

TWO men bearing the same name were sentenced to different terms of imprisonment by two different Magistrates and lodged in the Jhelum Jail. It so happened that the fathers of the two prisoners were known by one and the same name. One of the two prisoners appealed to the District Magistrate, who reduced his punishment to 10 stripes. The other prisoner who had not questioned the justice of the sentence pronounced against him, got, however, the benefit of his namesake's appeal and was let off with 10 stripes. When the jail authorities discovered their mistake, they could not any longer detain the other prisoner whose discharge had been ordered. So he too, having been subjected to the revised punishment, was let go his way. A warrant of arrest has now been issued against the first discharged, and he will have to complete the term of his imprisonment, without any deduction on account of the flogging to which he was subjected by mistake. A contemporary suggests the remission of his first sentence, for the punishment wrongly inflicted on him. But nothing has been said or suggested by any one as regards the other prisoner, who was detained in jail beyond his time and yet received no consideration and on that account the order of the appellate Court was carried out in its entirety. It seems to us that both the convicted persons are entitled to compensation, the first for wrongful flogging and the second for wrongful confinement.

THE Senate of the Calcutta University appointed a Committee of eight members to consider the needs of the University and the best mode of providing for them. Five of these unanimously find that, as a piece of land in the vicinity of the Senate House is available at a reasonable price, the University should purchase the land immediately, and hold its examinations there, either in tents or temporary structures, until it is in a position, with the help of the Local Government and the Municipality, to raise a substantial structure to accommodate all the examinees. There is not a building available in Calcutta which could serve that purpose. To hold the examinations in different schools and colleges, as is the present practice, deprives those institutions of two or three weeks' regular work at a time when it is most required. The members report that "the Commissioners are willing to let the lower floor of the Town Hall to the University, but this would not be sufficient, and the upper floor might be used for other purposes which would interfere with the conduct of the examinations." Their second recommendation is that a whole-time Registrar be appointed on the pay of an officer of the second grade in the Bengal Education Department, that is, Rs. 1,000 rising to Rs. 1,250 a month. To meet the increased cost, it has been proposed to raise the admission fees in the F. A. Examination from Rs. 20 to 24; in the B. A. from Rs. 30 to Rs. 36 and in the B. L. from Rs. 30 to 50.

Dissents have been recorded by three of the members. One is not convinced of the necessity of a building, though he has no objection to one, if funds permitted. Another signs the report but reserves his opinion as regards the pay of the Registrar and the construction of a new building. The protest of the third is thorough. He objects to the recommendation for a whole-time Registrar on an increased salary as premature which may have the appearance of forcing the hands of the Senate, for it never expressed a decided opinion on the point. He has always been opposed to the construction of a building on account of the costs, and he has found no reason to alter it. There is no knowing that the raising of the fees as proposed will cover the extra expenditure. Why then impose a heavy burden upon poor candidates who already find it difficult to pay the present high rate of fees? He admits the necessity of a building but would not raise the fees until all other sources for raising the necessary sum have been exhausted.

The Senate will receive, whatever that may mean, the said report of the Committee on Saturday, the 21st November.

GRIEVANCES OF INDIAN SHIPPERS.

IN a letter addressed to the Government of India, in April last, the Bengal Chamber of Commerce made out a very strong case for amendment of the sections in the Sea Customs Act, under which Customs House passes have to be taken before shipment of goods for export. Chapter XIII of the Act contains, among others, the following provisions:—

"Unless the chief customs authority shall, in the case of any customs-port or wharf, or of any class of goods, otherwise direct by notification in the local official Gazette, no goods except passengers' baggage, shall be shipped or water-borne to be shipped for exportation, until

(a) The owner has delivered to the Customs-Collector, or other proper officer, a shipping-bill of such goods in duplicate, in such form and containing such particulars in addition to those specified in section 29 as may from time to time be prescribed by the Chief Customs-Authority.

(b) Such owner has paid the duties (if any) payable on such goods; and

(c) such bill has been passed by the Customs-Collector.

If any goods mentioned in a shipping bill or manifest be not shipped, or be shipped and afterwards reloaded, the owner shall, before the expiration of five clear working days after the vessel, on which such goods were intended to be shipped, or from which they were reloaded, has left the Port, give information of such short-shipment or re-landing to the Customs-Collector.

Upon an application being made to the Customs-Collector any duty levied upon goods not shipped, or upon goods shipped and afterwards reloaded, shall be refunded to the person on whose behalf such duty was paid. Provided that no such refund shall be allowed unless information has been given as above required."

The inconvenience which merchants and ship-owners are put to by the law as laid down in these sections, is altogether without any justification, at the present time when, with the exception only of rice and opium, all our exports are duty free. For statistical purposes, the shipping bills, which are required to be delivered to the Custom Collector, under sec. 137 of the Sea Customs Act, are no doubt necessary. But it is difficult to discover any rationale for the continuance of the present law so far as it makes it incumbent on shippers to take out passes before shipment of their goods. The law in force in the United Kingdom is not so unreasonable. The British Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 44 and 45 Vict. C. 12 provides:—

"The exporter of goods for which no bond is required shall (except as hereinafter provided), within six days after the final clearance outwards of the exporting ship, or within such other period as the Commissioners of Customs may direct, either by himself or his agent, deliver to the proper officer of Customs at the port of shipment a specification in the Form No. 8 or No. 9 in schedule B to the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, according to the nature of the goods, and containing the several particulars indicated in or required thereby, or in such other form and manner as the Commissioners of Customs may direct, and shall subscribe the declaration at the foot thereof, and on the demand of the proper officer of Customs shall produce the invoice, bill of lading, and other documents relating to the goods, to test the accuracy of such specification, and on failure to comply with any of the foregoing requirements the exporter or agent shall for every such offence forfeit five pounds; and in case any of the particulars contained in any such specification shall be incorrect or inaccurate, the person subscribing the declaration shall forfeit the like penalty."

The law as contained in this section has been recommended for adoption in British dependencies by the Committee lately convened in England for the purpose of framing a scheme for securing uniformity in the compilation of Colonial Import and Export statistics. So the Sea Customs Act now in force in India is likely to be amended before long, in accordance with the prayer of our Chamber of Commerce.

The initial mistake of our Government was to abolish the import duty on cotton piecegoods. By yielding to the iniquitous demand of Manchester, our rulers not only sacrificed a large revenue and made the Income Tax inevitable, but they are now compelled to maintain a costly establishment only for compiling figures. The clerks in the Customs House, nay the very shippers who are benefited by the unasked generosity of Government, cannot but feel disgusted at the worry and drudgery they are subjected to without any tangible advantage to Government. They cannot avoid feeling at times as if they have to work at a tread-mill. The work which is done under such conditions must necessarily be perfunctory. The Committee referred to above state in their report:—

"In general terms it is not too much to say that while goods subject to an ad valorem duty are valued with considerable care and correctness, those liable to a specific duty are valued with but little care, and duty-free goods with no care at all. In the last two cases the importer's declaration is in the majority of cases allowed to pass practically unchallenged, under the supposition that as he has nothing to gain by a false declaration his statement may be accepted as correct. The experience of the British Customs House, however, shows that this inference cannot safely be drawn; for it not infrequently happens that goods, although duty-free, are found to be declared at values which are wildly above, or below, the truth. This arises not from a wish to deceive, but from sheer recklessness, and a desire to avoid trouble, on the part of the importer's clerk, on whom, in practice, the duty of preparing the declaration generally devolves, and it is an important source of error, which has to be remembered and guarded against.

To the Padshaw's favorite, who obtained a commission from him to count the waves in the river near his master's palace, his occupation may have been very agreeable and lucrative too. But to ordinary clerks and mercantile agents, the compilation of figures that are apparently useless cannot possibly be interesting.

THE LATE CYCLONE.

FORTUNATELY for Bengal, the recent cyclone did not penetrate very far into the interior of the Province but spent its fury chiefly in the tracts bordering on the sea. It originated in a portion of the water between the Diamond Island and the Andamans. From the 1st November, the sea was rough and there was a barometric depression in almost all the stations on the Bay. Mr. Pedler, the meteorological reporter to the Government of Bengal, expected the centre of the cyclone to lie in the south-west corner of the Bay. The Signaller of the Diamond Island telegraphed on the 2nd instant, that the weather was distinctly cyclonic on the south west. Indications were next given by the barometer of gradual fall at all the West coast stations from Gopalpore to Coconada and a gradual rise in the East coast stations. On the 4th of November the cyclone was moving in a north-westerly direction, the centre being opposite Vizigapatam. Storm signals were hoisted that day at Calcutta and other stations. On the 5th, the centre was, as predicted by Mr. Pedler, very near Gopalpore between 2 and 3 A.M. This was the time when the storm centre touched the land, the telegraphic communication between Pooree and False Point was stopped and no further information could be gained at that time. Storm danger signals were put up at all the stations on the Hooghly and the Orissa coast. At 1 P.M. of the 5th November, the centre passed close to the east of Cuttack and from 8 to 11 P.M. it was to the south of Balasore, and on the morning of the 6th, near the Sagar Island, thus taking a north-easterly direction. At the Sagar Island the velocity of the wind was about 50 miles an hour. During the forenoon, the centre passed about 80 miles South-east of Calcutta, and between 5 and 8 P.M., a little to the North of Balisal. After a respite of a good weather for two days, the alarm was again given on the 11th that a fresh cyclonic centre was forming most probably on the West of the Andamans. It is not as yet known to which direction it is destined.

Here are some casualties of the storm that has blown over :—

"The cyclone which has lately been raging in the Bay and vicinity of Cuttack brings in its train a long list of devastation and suffering, of loss of property and life, and damage to the ships which were unfortunate enough to encounter it. From Pooree a heavy cyclone is reported to have blown from 10-25 P.M. of the 4th to 30 P.M. of the 5th instant accompanied by an unusually large rainfall, 13.61 inches having been registered. This resulted in severe loss of house property and some lives, and Native vessels especially, which may have encountered its force, are likely to have suffered badly. The following telegram was received on Saturday night at the Port Office :—'Fame dismantled at the Sandheads, Coleroon not on station, Ship Lena, with emigrants, dismantled, anchored near South Channel buoy. Intermediate light vessel anchored near her.' Yesterday morning the following wire was received :—'Intermediate light vessel anchored west 18 miles Eastern Channel light vessel; steamer Alexandria attending; Lena lost her masts; Dalhousie attending; Warren Hastings rescued three men from a wreck.' There are now four tugs outside as well as the Port Commissioners' steamer Resolute communicating with the damaged vessels and Pilot Brigs, so that we need have no anxiety on that score, but, on the other hand, it is rumoured that an Arab barge has not been seen since the cyclone, and from the numberless dry coconuts and other debris floating about the Sandheads we fear that there will be a sad loss among the poor little native craft that visit this port annually. The Lena with emigrants on board is reported dismantled, and in tow of the Dalhousie at Sagar. The Port Officer, Captain Petley, is now sending another steamer down in charge of Branch Pilot Mills to seek for further information and to attend on the Pilot Brigs, and the Tigris is being fitted out with all despatch to proceed to the Refuge Houses.

At 3-30 P.M. on Friday the storm signals at Sagar were lowered, and the ships at anchor at once went out to sea, the Bengal leading the way, followed by the Canara and Kistna. On Saturday the steamers Maharaja, Holyrood, Bucephalus, Straits of Magellan, Mira, Lilpoora, Junshower Head, Golconda, Swanby, and Nawab, the ship Terpsichore, and the barque Huth Canon proceeded to sea. The same day the arrivals were—the steamers Saint Regulus, Lincolnshire, Lipin, Wivedev, City of Vienna, Shihzala, Lawada, Congella, and Baria."—The Englishman, Monday, Nov. 9.

The only vessel still unheard of is the Coleroon. She was at one time reported to have been seen anchored to the eastward of the Muthah, but she is neither there nor anywhere. A total destruction of the Indian Marine ship Enterprise is reported from Port Blair, Andaman Islands. The storm broke over the island at midnight on Sunday the 2nd November. The ship was moored in the harbour, and unable to get up steam in time, she met the full force of the cyclone, and, after fairly weathering the storm for about two hours, suddenly broke from her moorings and was dashed on the South Point Reef, composed of jagged iron stone rocks. The ship's complement, all-told, excluding the private servants of the officers, was 77 men. All these perished, excepting four lascars, one fireman and one native steward. The only vestiges of the lost vessel were her stern and her boilers. The six survivors hung on till break of day, when they swam ashore, but on account of the heavy surf then raging, could not gain land. A band of convict women, unasked, now came heroically to their rescue. They went into the water, unpunished of the angry sea, formed a chain by joining their hands, and landed the six in safety. The entire settlement suffered. About 60 convicts were killed and two hundred injured by falling buildings. The bungalows of several of the officers were unroofed, the Government House itself not escaping. Two steam launches and almost all the boats and lighters were destroyed, and the paddy crops utterly ruined.

FASTING OF HINDOO WIDOWS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE Statesman.

SIR,—On the subject of the fasting of Hindoo widows which has led to such heated controversy in the vernacular journals, I address this letter to you only to draw the attention of my co-religionists to the following questions :—

(1) Whether there is any inspired text disallowing Anukalpa, or fruits, roots, milk and water to widows on the ekadasi day?

(2) Whether it is not a fact that throughout the greater part of India even Brahmin widows do not observe the fasting of ekadasi in the manner insisted upon by the interpretation of Raghunandan of Nul-Mea? With regard to the letter on the subject in to-day's issue of the Statesman, it is to be observed that the fasting of the ekadasi, in its strict form, is practised only by the widows of the higher castes in Bengal. The lower castes do not practise it at all, or make it the occasion for eating daintier food. Your correspondent says that 99 per cent. of Hindoo widows in Bengal never abstain from all kinds of food and drink on the ekadasi day. The correctness of this remark depends upon the relative strength of the higher castes to the total Hindoo population. If it be that the Brahmins, Kshetriyas, Vaidyas, and Kayasths form only one per cent. of the total Hindoo population, then your correspondent may be right. But the point at issue is not whether all the castes observe the practice of ekadasi. The appeal made by the Reis and Rayyet has reference to widows of the higher castes only. Among Brahmin widows in Bengal there is hardly one in a thousand who has not to observe the ekadasi by total abstinence from every kind of food and drink. I need not expatiate upon the absurdity of supposing that the widows who practise it are not subject to any undue influence. From personal experience I can say that the most pious widows sometimes openly curse the ekadasi day.—Yours, etc.,

A TRUE HINDOO.

ACQUISITION OF LAND FOR MUNICIPAL IMPROVEMENTS.

HIGH COURT.—ORIGINAL JURISDICTION.

An application was made yesterday (Nov. 12.) to Mr. Justice Wilson by Mr. Jackson and Mr. Stokoe, moving on behalf of Mr. Miller, the Official Assignee and Assignee of the estate of Jaganath Khannah, for a rule calling on the Corporation of Calcutta to shew cause why an injunction should not issue to restrain the Corporation from further prosecuting proceedings under the Land Acquisition Act to acquire certain lands for the new Central Road. He also moved for a like ad interim injunction. The facts of the case were stated to be as follows :—

In May 1889 the Corporation published a declaration that part of Nos. 6 and 7 Cross Street Bye Lane, which belonged to Jaganath Khannah, was required by them for their new Central Road, the construction of which was then in contemplation. A portion of these premises was afterwards marked out as being required for this purpose. This portion comprised not only such part of the premises as was needed for the Central Road itself, but also a breadth of 50 feet on either side of the road which the Corporation claimed to acquire in connection with the road. Jaganath Khannah, being desirous that no more of his premises should be compulsorily acquired than actually required for the road itself, entered into negotiations with the Corporation for that purpose, and an arrangement was come to under which Jaganath Khannah agreed, in consideration of the whole of his premises other than such part as was actually needed for the new road being exempted from acquisition, to make over to the Corporation free of cost such portion of the premises as was actually required for the road, and to pay, in addition, to the Corporation, a sum equal to a third of the value of the other portions of the premises which had been marked out for acquisition. These terms were embodied in a Resolution of the Central Road Committee of the Corporation, which Resolution was confirmed by the Corporation and was communicated to Jaganath, who accepted the offer embodied in it. Jaganath informed the Collector under the Land Acquisition Act, of this arrangement, and requested him to ascertain the value of the surplus land, the acquisition of which was abandoned. The Collector intimated that there was no hurry about the matter, and that the value might be ascertained later on when he took up the valuation and acquisition of the Burra Bazar section of the road. Consequently the amount of the third of the value of the surplus land was not then ascertained, but it was eventually fixed at Rs. 7,843-12. In February last, Jaganath was adjudicated an insolvent. At the beginning of June the Corporation applied to him for payment of the sum due to them in consideration of their exempting his surplus land from acquisition, and on the 15th of June, in consequence of his being an insolvent, forwarded their letter of demand and bill to Mr. Miller, who sent them a cheque for the amount on the 22nd of June. With the cheque Mr. Miller sent a letter stating that the cheque was in payment of the amount demanded by them for exempting the surplus land from acquisition. This cheque was cashed by the Corporation, but on the 30th of June they repudiated the agreement and returned the money. In a letter of that date Mr. Cowie, the Secretary to the Corporation, stated that the land was acquired by the Corporation on the morning of the 22nd of June before the receipt of his letter and cheque which would be regarded as an offer to buy back the land and would be considered at the next meeting of the Central Road Committee. Mr. Miller wrote in reply pointing out that the delay in settling the matter was caused in the first place by Jaganath's insolvency, and, secondly, by the postponed delivery of their letter till the 15th of June, and claimed to be entitled to the agreed arrangement. Mr. Cowie replied on the 15th of July to the effect that his letter of the 22nd of June had been considered by the Committee, and that they could not accept his offer to buy back the land for Rs. 7,843-12. On the 28th of July Mr. Miller wrote a letter in which, after expressing his surprise at the contents of the last letter, he criticised the action of the Corporation in taking from the insolvent free of cost the land required for the road and further making him pay a money contribution for that portion of his land which was not required for the road. This transaction, he wrote, at the first blush, looked very like legalised blackmailing, was opposed both to the spirit and to the intention of the legislature, and was indefensible on public grounds as an unnecessary and arbitrary interference with the rights of private property. He pointed out that the delay in payment was not due to any default on his part, that his cheque was accepted and cashed by the Corporation, and that, in acquiring the property as alleged by them, they had violated the agreement. He stated that he had instructed his solicitors to institute legal proceedings, and later on should refer the matter to the Government in order that it might have an opportunity of rightly appreciating the mode in which a legislative enactment intended for the public benefit would be wrested from its original purpose through a misconception of its scope and objects and made to subserve with, however honest an intention, a distorted policy of commercial bargain and sale, and in that manner rendered oppressive and subversive of private rights. On the 3rd of August the Secretary wrote enclosing a copy of the proceedings at the meeting of the Road Committee at which the Resolution in question was passed. He further wrote:—"The Commissioners are not concerned in establishing the morality of the principle of a betterment tax which finds partial recognition in clause (b) of Section 204 of Act II of 1888, under which section the marginal lands to a depth of 50 feet have been acquired for the new Central Road, but the Chairman observes that the ethical question is interestingly discussed in the May number and two subsequent numbers of the Contemporary Review for 1890 between Mr. John Rae and the Duke of Argyll." On the 6th of August Mr. Miller wrote to point out that there was a misstatement in the proceedings of the Committee to the effect that the bill for the money was presented on the 1st of June, the real date of presentation being the 15th. On the 17th of August he further wrote: "I regret to note from your rather cynical statement that the morality of the question involved is a matter of unconcern to the Commissioners. I should prefer to think that you were expressing rather the individual views of your Chairman than those of the Commissioners generally. It would appear as if he were somewhat desirous of illustrating the truth of the old aphorism—an aphorism which has been discredited in recent years in all civilised communities, and which explains in rather epigrammatic language that the conscience of a Corporation is impervious to appeal because owning no body which is sensitive to physical punishment. I beg to thank your Chairman for his literary reference, but I may be pardoned for saying that I hardly think it necessary to consult an ephemeral controversy in a current review in order to fortify or displace the generally received conviction as to the inviolable sanctions which regulate or ought to regulate all honest and honourable dealings. In my letter to which you reply I did not so much complain of the existing law as enter a protest against its unintelligent misapplication, and therefore a possible oppressive abuse of its machinery. . . . I have also to correct the mis-statement conveyed indirectly that the Official Assignee made any proposal 'to buy back the land.' All that the Official Assignee did was to pay in the amount for which this office had been billed in order that the agreement entered into by the Municipality might be duly carried out. The statement that the Act X Collector acquired the land and 'made it over to the Corporation at 7 A.M. of the 22nd of June, the sale taking place at noon of the same day' is not very intelligible. This is the first time that I have heard of the Collector selling the land in addition to his having acquired it. Possibly, however, it was intended to refer to the Official Assignee's sale. . . . The fact is unquestioned and unquestionable that whilst the bill of the Corporation remained in the office of the Official Assignee for examination and without any sort of remainder for payment, the Corporation, in direct violation of their deliberate agreement, stepped in and professed to acquire the very land which had been exempted from acquisition, and it is well to remember that the Corporation had already accepted a portion of the consideration for their very usurious forbearance to abstain from acquiring the property of the insolvent which they did not require in the shape of a free grant of land from the insolvent.

Now the keynote to this rather dubious Nabothvineyard sort of land-hunger seems to be somewhat naïvely expressed in the Chairman's statement, viz., that the insolvent's land was now probably worth some Rs. 20,000, so that for the sake of acquiring land which constituted private property and which the Municipality had expressly contracted to exempt from acquisition, they seized upon a specious pretext, however legal in form they may have deemed it, for repudiating their undertaking and hastened on their acquisition of the land in question without making any attempt to ascertain whether the Official Assignee was prepared to pay the amount levied as part consideration for its exemption. In the first instance the Municipality entered into a most usurious contract to exempt certain land belonging to the insolvent which was not required for the purpose of the Central Road arranging for the payment of what, if I had not been describing the action of so honourable a body as the Calcutta Municipality, I should have almost been tempted to call a sort of legalised bribe or black mailing for such exemption, and then, having so far profited by the contract as to have accepted part payment in the shape of the free grant of land, they would seem to have become bitten with a still more usurious greed to increase the profit which had already been made though unearned at the expense of the insolvent, and so under an allegation of legal right they suddenly threw overboard the obligation which they had deliberately settled and ratified, and proceeded to possess themselves of the very property which had been specially and expressly exempted from acquisition. Had this very excessive zeal in the public service been perpetrated by a private individual I should have been strongly tempted to have defined it by the French word Louche, but as I am dealing with the conduct of highly honourable Corporations and citizens and that of their responsible, or, perhaps I should say, irresponsible Chairman, it is more than probable that my judgment in the matter may be mistaken. At all events, I think it more respectful to them to refer their conduct undescribed to the superior arbitrament of the High Court and the Executive."

The Collector of Calcutta subsequently referred the matter of the amount of the compensation to be paid for the land in question to the Court of the Additional Judge for the disposal of cases under the Land Acquisition Act, and a notice was issued to the Official Assignee that the matter would be heard by that Court on the 20th instant.

Wilson, J.—Before making the reference had the Collector first fixed a day for considering the question of compensation, and had he tendered compensation? the law lays down that he cannot refer the case before so doing.

Mr. Jackson.—It is not even suggested that he did so.

The Court then granted a rule nisi for an injunction returnable after four days, but refused to grant an ad interim injunction on the ground that it was not necessary to do so.—The Englishman, Nov. 13.

ORIENTALS IN LONDON.

Socially considered, Orientals in London include only two classes, at opposite ends of the scale. They are either quite inferior or quite superior—either of Limehouse or Whitehall. Between these there is nothing. The former class consists almost exclusively of seafaring men. Their head-quarters are the "Strangers' Home" in West India Dock Road, and the history of that institution is practically the history of the poor Oriental colony in London during the last forty years. It is often said, and commonly believed, that there is a regular Asiatic—and particularly Chinese—quarter in East London, something like that of which we hear so much at San Francisco, only on a smaller scale; and a good many years ago there was some foundation for the belief. The "Royal Sovereign," in Bluegate Fields, was a recognized rendezvous of Asiatic seamen, and in the neighbourhood were a good many low lodging-houses, kept and frequented by Chinese, Lascars, Malays, and Japanese. But the opening of the Strangers' Home proved the death-blow, as it was intended to be, of this unseemly settlement. Customers gradually deserted the lodging-houses in favour of the Home, and they were eventually shut up. An interesting account of the movement is given in "The Asiatic in England" by Joseph Salter, published in 1873. At present the "Chinese quarter" in London consists of three very small houses in Limehouse Causeway, a narrow street running out of West India Dock Road, not far from the dock gates. In these houses all the accommodation is a couple of small rooms upstairs frequented by Chinamen ashore for smoking and gambling. A few sleep there too, but space is limited. The most vivid imagination cannot manufacture anything very dreadful out of these places. They are quite as clean and unoffensive as any other houses in the same locality, and at least as much may be said of their inmates. No class in the East End gives the police so little trouble as the Chinese. Most of them, however, do not live in the Causeway, but over the way at the Home, which really constitutes the East End Oriental Colony.

Like most institutions of the kind, it sprang originally out of missionary efforts among the seafaring population of the river-side. It was opened in 1857 by the Prince Consort, and the Maharaja Dhuleep Singh was one of the principal contributors. Since then it has been supported mainly by English charity, although some of the Eastern Governments subscribe to the funds. Its best friends have always been British officials connected with the East; among whom may be mentioned the late Lord Napier, Lord Reay, Sir Charles Aitchison, and Sir William Muir. Considering the very admirable work done by the Home in keeping Asiatics of all kinds out of the hands of river-side harpies, and in looking after their physical, mental, and pecuniary welfare, it is matter for surprise as well as regret that it should receive no support from the wealthy Oriental houses established in London. This may be due to an idea that it is a proselytising centre, but that is a mistake. Although the underlying spirit is that of the Christian mission, no religious pressure is brought to bear on any man. The objects of the institution are practical: to afford good food and accommodation to Asiatics ashore, to take care of their money, to find ships for those out of employment, to take in such as are stranded here, destitute and friendless, and assist them otherwise. The majority pay, and, so far, it is self-supporting; but about 800*l.* a year is required above the receipts for board and lodging. The accommodation is from 150 to 200, over a varying number pass through in the year. Last year there were 506, representing the following nationalities:—Chinese 138, Indians (lascars) 131, Japanese 92, Arabs and Egyptians 58, Africans 40, Malayas 27, natives of Mauritius 10, of Ceylon 10. With all this mixture, prejudices of caste and race have to go by the board, but there is very seldom any trouble. The Japanese gave most. They are very fond of drink, and being of an extremely gallant disposition, are totally unable to withstand the blandishments of the Limehouse Circes. Lascar seamen, it must be understood, form a comparatively small proportion, because the great Oriental liners, on which they serve, only come up now to the Talbury or Albert Docks, and the crews do not live ashore. A good many of those who use the Home have come from India on purpose to man some particular vessel, and are simply waiting until she is ready; for the custom has grown in recent years of engaging crews at Indian ports and bringing them over as passengers merely for the voyage out. It is cheaper than taking out a European crew and paying their passage money home. The Chinese are almost exclusively firemen. Opium-smoking is not allowed in the Home, and there is generally no attempt at it. Those who use the drug go over to the Causeway to have their pipe and game of cards or ting-ko. The dissipation is not nearly so injurious to themselves and other people as the public-house. Only they will sometimes go in for a regular debauch, when they have nothing to do, and refuse to stir from their beds for days together. This happened once at the Home, and gave a good deal of trouble. One of the great objects of the place is to keep these men out of the hands of crimps, who still infest the docks. A good many deposit their money at the office, so as to be out of harm's way during their stay on shore. Last year nearly 3,000*l.* was so deposited.

Besides the seafaring class, there are two others to be sometimes found here—the “chickon-wallahs” and the “claimants.” The former are itinerant vendors of cheap Indian goods, who may be occasionally seen in the streets. They do no good, and often fall into great straits through poverty or the climate. When they come to the Home they are sent or persuaded to go back to India. The “claimants” are poor men who come to seek legal redress in English Courts of justice for real or fancied wrongs. They have the true litigant's obstinacy, and are sometimes very troublesome. These, too, are frequently saved from the work-house by being sent back. No women are taken in except when actually on their way to India; ayahs are cared for at another institution in the West End. Altogether the Strangers' Home does a very good work in a very unpretentious way. The superior Orientals in London are almost exclusively from India, except such as represent diplomacy and they include two classes—men of business and students. The former are few, but represent very large commercial interests. The latter number about 200. They have their head-quarters at the Northbrook Club in Whitehall Gardens, of which the majority are members. The practice of sending young Indians to study in England is increasing. They come from all parts of India and include Mahomedans, Hindoos, and Parsees. The luxury of a European education is not to be had for nothing, and as a matter of course only men of means can indulge in it. These young fellows are, as a rule, extremely intelligent, with charming manners, and they speak English admirably—far better than most European foreigners who have lived for many years in England. They study law and medicine in London; but some go to Cooper's Hill for the engineering service and others to Cirencester for agriculture. The English universities and Edinburgh also have their contingent. In nearly all cases they go back to practise in India; but of late a tendency to settle here has been visible. The only other Eastern country which occasionally sends us a similar class is Japan.—St. James's Gazette.

THE POPULATION OF THE WORLD.

According to the latest issue of the “Bevölkerung der Erde,” published by Pethes of Gotha, the population of the world is 1,479,729,400, scattered over 52,841,684 square miles. The highest percentage to the square mile is in Europe, where it reaches 94. The population of the respective divisions are as follow:—Europe, 357,379,000; Asia, 825,954,000; Africa, 163,953,000; America, 121,713,000; Australia, 3,230,000; Oceanic Islands, 7,420,000; and the Polar Regions, 80,400.

Among European countries Belgium still exceeds all others in density of population; the proportion is 530 persons to a square mile. Belgium is followed by Holland with 365 to the square mile, and the United Kingdom with 312. If we take England alone we find the density to be close on 480 to the square mile, still considerably below that of Belgium. The density in Scotland is only about one-fourth that of England, while that of Ireland is one-third. The most thinly-populated countries in Europe are Norway and Finland, which have only 16 people to the square mile. Turkey occupies considerable space in the new issue, the statistics of the area and population of the various divisions and sub-divisions of Turkey in Europe, Asia, and Africa, and of her tributary States being given in minute detail, with copious references to authorities.

There are some curious and delicate estimates of the area of Europe according to various calculations and within various limits. Thus, according to Strelbitsky, the area of Europe is 3,756,545 square miles, while according to Wagner's estimate it is 3,755,493—a difference of about 1,000 miles. But if to this we add Nova Zemla, Cis-Caucasia, and Cis-Uralia, the Marmora Islands, and Iceland, we get, according to Strelbitsky, 3,865,417 square miles; and according to Wagner 3,865,279, a difference of only 138 miles. Again, if we take Europe within the limits of administrative divisions we obtain an area of 3,836,912; but this includes Iceland, Nova Zemla, the Canaries, and Madeira making 79,165 square miles. Here comes in the question as to what are the natural boundaries of Europe—a question to which Drs. Wagner and Supan briefly refer. They regard as outside of Europe the Canaries, Madeira, the Azores, and the Marmora Islands. The inclusion or otherwise of Iceland, Spitzbergen, and Nova Zemla will make a difference of 103,093 square miles; while there will be a further difference of 424,750 square miles, depending on the limits adopted for the eastern boundary of Europe. Europe in the narrowest sense, according to these highly competent authorities, covers 3,570,030 square miles. This excludes the Polar islands, and draws the boundary of Eastern Europe along the crest of the Urals and the line of the Manytch River, thus excluding the Caspian Steppe but including the Sea of Azoff. By including the Polar islands another 103,000 square miles would be added. If the Caspian Steppe be included, the area of Europe would amount to 3,688,792, or with the Polar islands to 3,791,792 square miles. If the boundary of Eastern Europe be drawn along the Ural crest, the Ural River, and the crest of the Caucasus, we obtain an area of 3,790,504 square miles, or, including Iceland and Nova Zemla (Europe in Strelbitsky's acceptance), the area is 3,866,605 square miles. Finally, taking Europe in the widest sense, including the Ural mountains, the south slope of the Caucasus, the countries on the east side of the Ural, and the steppe between the Ural River and the Emba, we obtain an area of 3,988,618 square miles, or, with the Polar islands, about 4,092,000 square miles.

For the section dealing with Asia, Herr B. Trognitz, a land surveyor, has undertaken a new and elaborate calculation of the area of the continent on the basis of the best maps at his command. The general result is that for the continent we are now given an area of 16,021,078 square miles, which may be slightly increased or diminished according as the boundary between Asia and Europe is drawn.

As to the population of China proper (the eighteen provinces), which at one time was greatly exaggerated, some authorities making it out to be 500,000,000; after a careful examination of all available data, Drs. Wagner and Supan are inclined to estimate the total population at only 350,000,000, in round numbers, or about 68,000,000 more than the estimate reached by Sir Richard Temple. Including Manchuria, Mongolia, Kansu, and Thibet, the total population of the Chinese Empire is given as 361,500,000, living on an area of 4,674,420 square miles. Corea is credited with a population of 10,500,000. The total population of Arabia is reduced by Dr. Wagner to 3,472,000, very different from the estimate of 10,725,000 given by Rashid Bey in 1875. The area assigned to Arabia by Wagner and Supan is 1,153,430 square miles.

As regards Africa, the result shows that the population has been reduced to 164,000,000, whereas a few years ago a common estimate was 220,000,000. To Africa south of the Equator Herr Trognitz assigns an area of 3,540,740 square miles. Of this, 951,000 square miles are assigned to British South Africa, including Nyassaland and the whole British region from the Zambesi to the Cape. The total population of this area is estimated at only 3,800,000. Neither to the Niger Protectorate nor to the British East Africa Company's sphere do Drs. Wagner and Supan venture to assign either an area or a population. The area, they tell us, is “offen,” and for population they simply put a (?). To Portuguese East Africa (Mozambique) an area of 310,000 square miles is given, and Portuguese West Africa, including Portugal's share of Loanda, 517,000 square miles. The Congo Free State is credited with an area of 865,380 square miles and a population of 14,000,000. Of the total area, 309,000 square miles are under forest.

"Dinanzi a me non fur cose create,
Se non eterne, ed io eterno duro."

DANTE.

ON the deep rock of ages have I set
My everlasting pyramid, and look round
From its great throne on oceans without bound ;
Time shoreless, shifting sands, and realms as yet
Growing to being. Of all here who met—
Persian, Greek, Roman, Arab—who hath stood ?
All, all have drifted onward by my base,
And here I hold amidst their surge my place !
Before me things were not, or such as could Endure like me, eternal. The broad Nile,
Young as the day it leaped to life, and made
Life wheresoe'er it moved—the godlike sky,
Star-written book unfathomable—the pile
Of mountain-walls around—these shall not fade,
They were—and are—and shall be !—So shall I !

I HAVE FOUND A VEIN OF GOLD

BY MRS. C. W. DENNISON.

I HAVE found a vein of gold,
By the valley green and old ;
Where the summer smileth ever,
And the floweret dieth never ;
Where the sun is flinging glistening
Mantles on the hill-tops, listening
Late I stood,
By the rustling, delicate fountain,
Weeping from the gray old mountain
Tears of blood,
As the red rays tinged their glowing Drops, adown the rough rocks flowing ;
So, while listening
There, I found a vein of gold.

Not in earth's deep bosom sleeping,
Through her sluggish arteries creeping,
In her heart its tapers burning,
In her gloom its charms murning ;
Not with knife, and spade, and ladle,
Not with miner's pick and cradle,
Did I find this treasure golden,
By the valley green and olden.

In a simple cottage maiden,
With a soft fleeced lambkin laden,
And bare feet
Gleaming on the carpet glossy,
With the fresh young grass—her flossy

Yellow curls, by zephyrs lifted,
Shone like sparkling amber, drifted
From the Baltic, on its snow-white
Banks, that glitter by the moonlight.

In that sweet,
Gentle, loving, happy creature,
Angel-like in form and feature,
I have found a vein of gold.

Through her eyes my soul went glancing,
While the fringed spites were dancing,
Brightly beaming ;
Many a nook I searched, till 'minded
They who dare the sun are blinded
By his gleaming.

O ! a heart, so rich in holy
Love and sweet devotion, lowly
As a little child, that met
My spirit eyes ! could I forget
Its gentle charms ?

No ! I sought, and soon I brought her
To my home beside the water,

And my arms
Daily clasp that guileless creature,
Angel-like in forms and feature.

Still, when old,
Dimmed by sorrow, or unkindness,
Mute with grief, or touched with blindness,
She shall be my vein of gold.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

MRS. Greenwood's experiences of Manipur have been published in book form under the title of "Three years in Manipore." She portrays the character of the unfortunate Jubaraj Tikendrajit very favorably. The book is in its second edition, the first being bespoken before publication.

THE last of the Waterloo British officers—Lieutenant-Colonel William Hewett—has passed away. He was born on July 2, 1795, and was a son of General Sir George Hewett, a former Commander-in-Chief in India. He served at Waterloo as junior Captain of the 3rd battalion 14 Foot. He married, in 1828, Sarah, daughter of the late General Sir James Duff, of Funtington House, Sussex.

THE Emperor William wears a new face. The Empress never liked his beard and he, on October 22, her birthday, congratulated her without that facial appendage. The removal of the imperial beard has also given peace to Her Majesty's Judges by saving them the trouble of deciding a nice point of law. A maker of busts had received orders for a thousand likenesses of His Majesty, when the

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion

Emperor had not grown any beard. When ready, the delivery of the busts was refused, because they did not represent the emperor. The matter went into court, but there was no need for the order of the Judge, for the original had himself settled the question by becoming beardless again. It is further said that the beard never suited the martial physiognomy of the emperor.

MR. Gladstone is not alone given to tree-felling. The present Czar, says a writer in Phcadilly, takes daily a vast amount of violent open-air exercise; when at home he not only walks, but wheels heavy barrows full of stones, chops wood, or romps boisterously with his family.

SOME of the rich merchants of Moscow petitioned the Czar for permission to organise a society for the relief of distress caused by the famine now raging in his dominion. The Minister of the Interior has not only refused his sanction, but is said to have also declared that persons visiting the famine stricken districts with the object of administering relief to the sufferers would be arrested. Without further explanation, the report seems incredible.

A DECREE of the Czar forbids the singing or playing of the "Marseillaise" at all clubs, restaurants, and places of amusement.

SERIOUS anti-Jewish riots are reported from the Russian province of Tcheuingoff. The houses and shops belonging to the Jews in the town of Staradoub were pillaged and destroyed by fire. The persecution of the "children of Israel," has given a rude shock to the belief that in the dominion of the Czar all classes of his subjects receive equal treatment.

ON the principle that one must never prophesy until he knows, it is now being asserted that General Boulanger had some of the most important incidents of his life foretold by a Madame Reinal, an adept in palmistry. At the time when he was minister of war, the lady, after examining the lines in his palms, is reported to have said:—"You are in an unhelped for situation; but you will not keep it. A fall is awaiting you shortly. But do not despair. Later on you will attain an even higher position. The lines of your hand indicate that you will almost reach a throne." Being informed subsequently that it was General Boulanger to whom she had made these predictions, she replied, "ah," "in that case I am glad that I did not tell him all. It is written in his hand that he will die a violent death." The prediction, it is said, was quoted at the time in the Figaro. But the date or number of the issue is not given.

THEY have discovered the birth certificate of Mme. Sarah Bernhardt. She is not a native of Havre, as she herself supposes, but a Parisienne of the Latin Quarter. She was born in 1844, of a Berlin Jewess, a struggling milliner in the Rue de l'Ecole de Médecine, in an old and dilapidated house. She was educated at a convent at Versailles, at the cost of M. Meles, le financier.

THE Times writes:—

"A remarkable gathering took place at St. Ives, Hunts, on Oct. 27, in the form of the first public meeting held in England or Scotland since 1745 in furtherance of the Stuart cause. The Legitimist Jacobite League sent several speakers from the central executive in London, and these gentlemen addressed a large and fairly orderly meeting in the Corn Exchange. The Rev. R. C. Fillingham spoke on the effects of the revolution of 1688, and the Hon. Stuart Erskine on the repeal of the union between England and Scotland. Other speakers contended that the direct succession to the Throne of England belonged to the House of Stuart. A resolution in favour of the Jacobite movement having been proposed, the chairman of the St. Ives School Board moved an amendment to the effect that the audience were in favour of the maintenance of the present dynasty, and he elicited hearty cheers by remarking that it was owing to the magnanimity of her Majesty that the gentlemen on the platform had been allowed to hold such a meeting. The Mayor of St. Ives seconded the amendment, which was carried amid great enthusiasm."

MR Gladstone will leave England about the middle of December, and pass the winter months in the Riviera.

REUTER announces that Mrs. Besant's medical advisers have forbidden her contemplated visit to India. We may assure her that our countrymen will not be in sackcloth and ashes for the disappointment. We have had enough of indigenous prophets and prophetesses to be too eager for the addition of a foreign element to our already overcrowded pantheon.

IN the Magazine of Art, Mr. Thomas Woolner, R. A., thus illustrates the value of drawing. Mr. Nasmyth, of steam-hammer fame,

"was travelling in Norway, and one day in a wild out-of-the-way place reached an inn, very hungry, but unable to make the hostess understand his wants by anything he could say. He was considerably perplexed, till he happily thought of his pencil. He then carefully drew a dish in perspective, with steam rising from it; beside this he drew a plate with a knife and fork, and on the other side of the dish a bottle and a wine-glass. When he had completed this diagram of his wants, the face of the hostess brightened, and she at once left him to execute his design. He then went for a stroll, and on returning found the picture complete. There was the bottle, with wine-glass beside it, the plate, knife and fork, and the dish covered. So soon as he sat down, the hostess lifted the cover, displaying a fine hot fowl that sent forth a cloud of steam, and thus was the finishing touch given to the Norwegian design of the great Nasmyth."

The Norwegian hostess completed what the great Nasmyth had designed. She was no ordinary woman who could fully understand a pencil drawing.

LORD Lansdowne's visit to Burma at the end of January next is postponed sine die.

NOT only Sir Auckland Colvin, but the Governor of Madras also, is expected to visit Calcutta about the end of this month. Lord Wenlock has already started on his journey. He will, after visiting Ganjam and Vizagapatam en route, embark for Calcutta at Gopalpore, on the 25th instant.

CASHMIRE is to be penetrated with railroads before long. The Consulting Engineer to the Government of India, lately made a rough survey of the tract between Jummoo and Srinagar with a view to ascertain the feasibility of a railway by the direct route. It is now believed that Mr. Bell has decided in favour of the route via Abbottabad.

TWELVE HUNDRED ponies have been collected at Srinagar for transporting grain to Gilgit.

ST. Mary's Church, Fort St. George, which lately celebrated its 211th anniversary, is perhaps the oldest church built by the English in India.

MR. White, Director of Public Instruction, N. W.-P. and Oudh, proceeds home on furlough in March next. Mr. W. N. Boutflower of the Muir College is likely to succeed to the vacancy. Mr. Boutflower is a clever mathematician and a thorough gentleman.

AT the Indian Medical Service Examination to be held in London in February next, sixteen appointments as Surgeons in the Indian Medical Service will be thrown open to competition.

A NEW Nanuk in the person of a Moulavi preaching at Ludiana, is said to be winning the admiration not only of his co-religionists but of all classes including Hindus and Christians.

WE have it on the authority of the Pioneer, that a reduction of the rates at which inland telegrams are charged at present, is one of the possibilities of the near future.

CANDIDATES for appointment as Deputy Collectors and Sub-Deputy Collectors are required to forward, with their applications for permission to appear at the Subordinate Executive Service Examinations, statements showing the landed property owned by them in these provinces, or in which they may have any interest, or which may be held by, and managed by, their wives or by other members of their families living with, and in any way dependent on, them. Such a statement must show

1. The district in which the property is situated.
2. The nature of property and extent of interest held.
3. Whether held in his own name or in the name of another, or by his wife.
4. How acquired (inheritance or purchase).
5. If held under superior landlord, his name and place of residence with district.
6. Annual value.

ACCORDING to the Buddhist preacher who recently lectured in this town, the ancestors of the Grand Lamas of Thibet were Bengalis.

A VERY small part of the opium that is produced in this country, is consumed locally. The total area under the poppy crop in the Patna and Benares Agencies, is about 15 lacs of bigahs, and the average output of opium in Behar and Benares, is about a lac of maunds, out of which only 2,500 is consumed in India. The total output of opium in this country is about one lac and fifty thousand maunds.

THE Chief Justice of Madras, while passing sentence on Sergeant McNamara, convicted of having caused the death of a shoe maker, addressed the prisoner as follows:—

"You have been convicted on the clearest evidence of grievously hitting an unfortunate chuckler who did you no harm. He came to your compound to claim a small debt, and instead of paying the debt, your wife abused him, and you committed a very brutal and cowardly assault, beating him with your hands while he was on the ground, and kicking him where none but a coward would kick in. Your defence at the first trial was a wicked defence. You allowed your wife to go into the witness-box and commit unblushing perjury; you allowed your comrades in the Ordinance Lines to come in and endeavour to deceive the court and jury, and they partially succeeded. In the second trial, Conductor Smith gave evidence which, if any more evidence was wanted, conclusively showed the violence you used. You and men in your position must be taught you have no right to strike the lowest native in this country. He is just as much a subject of the Queen as you, and just as much entitled to the protection of the law. I have considered the sentence I am about to pass on you. It is a severe one, and will, I hope, be a lesson to others. The sentence is that you be rigorously imprisoned for three years."

BABU Mohendra Nath Chatterjee, Pleader, and editor and proprietor of the defunct Eastern Herald of Mhow, who, by a gross perversion of the criminal law and procedure, was, in April last, sentenced to nine months' imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 1,500, for publishing articles defamatory of Captain Norman Franks, English Secretary to the Maharaja Holkar, has been, before the expiration of the full term of his incarceration, released from jail by order of the Viceroy. It is much to be regretted that Viceregal mercy could not step in earlier to give more effectual relief to the unfortunate Vakeel and publisher who has, we fear, been simply ruined by Central Indian justice.

A GAY Lothario hailing from Singapore had lately a narrow escape from the clutches of law—for loving too much and not wisely. Our hero, Mr. Gibbs, is a member of the colonial civil service, who availed himself of the leave granted him by his Government in sojourning for nearly a year at Ootacamund, which had some mysterious attraction for him. For aught we know of him, his character and abilities as an official may be of a very high order. But with the history that we have of his recent campaign, it is impossible to give him any credit for being either a high-minded gentleman or a veteran strategist in the game of love-making. Without any preliminary survey of the ground he was venturing upon, without any reconnoitring, he supposed that he could, with merely the effusions of his poetic genius, carry the heart of his lady-love by storm. But the lady whom Mr. Gibbs sought to immortalise, could not appreciate the value of his gibberish. On the contrary, she resented his effrontery and for his folly had him dragged before the local magistracy on a charge under section 509 of the Indian Penal Code. Mr. Gibbs could not deny that the verses by which he gave offence to the complainant and the address on the envelope were written with his own hand. With the confidence that he apparently had in his genius, he did not contemplate the possibility of his discomfiture, and committed himself in black and white in a manner that left him no loophole for escape. He had in fact no defence whatever. But his own resources or those of his advisers did not fail altogether to make out an explanation. His case was that he did not send the obnoxious lines to the complainant, but gave them to Mrs. Morgan, the heroine of the matrimonial suit of Ross v. Morgan. The lameness of the defence was apparent on the face of it; but the Court was lenient enough to believe his story, and let him off scot-free. Nevertheless, it may be hoped that the lesson he has got by the exposure and by his narrow escape from punishment as a criminal will serve to make him a wiser, if not a better, man in the future.

THE priests of the temple dedicated to Mahadeo at Sonapore cleared over two lacs of rupees at the last full moon.

DR. Babadurjee has returned to Bombay. During his brief sojourn in England, he did yeoman's service in the cause of Indian mill owners and mill hands. He won the ear of the Times, and seems to have "shut up" completely Mr. Holt Hallett.

THE Municipal Commissioners have determined not to allow adulterated ghee to be sold in their market. The owners of private markets in the town ought not to be behindhand.

It is said that Government has decided in favor of the use of Roman character for Kathi in all documents prepared by public servants in Behar. We entertain grave doubts as to this innovation being within the range of practical politics. A more feasible plan certainly would be to insist upon the vernacular clerks to write everything in a clear legible hand. This was the plan which the late Mr. Justice Louis Jackson, while District Judge at Kishnaghur, enforced on his amla with very remarkable success.

ON Sunday last, the S. S. Pilot arrived in port from Balasore having on board as passengers 6 out of 9 of the crew of a country vessel which, on her voyage from the Maldives to Calcutta, was caught by the cyclone on the 5th November, west of Shortt's Island. She was swamped near the mouth of the Myapore river. Three of the crew had previously been washed off the deck and drowned. The remaining six clung on to planks and wreckage, and managed thereby to reach the shore. They walked thence to Balasore where some native merchants paid for their passage to Calcutta.

THERE is still no news of the Coccyzus.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

SIR Michael Hicks Beach, in a speech at Bristol last week, hinted that the present Parliament was not likely to be dissolved before the expiration of its full term in 1893. The assurance was hardly needed, either by friends or by foes. There never was any ground for entertaining the least apprehension that Lord Salisbury would risk his present position on the chance of being returned to power again. The premier regnant of England is certainly shrewd enough to perceive that the result of a general election, while the Grand Old Man is living, may not necessarily be in his favor. The giant leader of the Opposition is in his eighty-first year. In the natural course of human affairs, he may be removed from this world any day by the hand of death. The longer that the present ministry can, by holding on, postpone the next contest for power between the rival parties, the greater is their chance of an easy victory.

PREPARATIONS are being made for a gathering of our Congress politicals in London in the early summer of 1893. A reception committee has already been formed, for the purpose of raising funds to meet the necessary expenses. The meeting will bring to the front some mediocre men at home who are acting as wire-pullers. Backed by India, they may be able to secure a seat in Parliament, or even a position in the cabinet. But this country can ill afford the waste of energy and capital which the London Congress will involve. The late "uncrowned king of Ireland," with all his power and influence in Parliament, could do nothing to secure Home rule for his country. Even the Grand Old Man's powerful advocacy and support have not yet been able to achieve any practical result. If our Mazzinis and Garibadis can secure political privileges by begging or by clamouring or by long harangues, it would be quite a novel phenomenon in the history of the human race.

WE do not mean to say that we condemn the aspirations of the Congress in toto. What we disapprove of, in the most unqualified terms, is its modus operandi. Our firm conviction is that it is pursuing an e-essentially wrong course, and that it is bound to be a failure. If they are open to advice, we would ask the Congress leaders to study carefully the science of political economy and the statistics of India's foreign commerce. If they can give that impetus to the manufacturing industries of the country which it sadly needs, everything else, including perhaps even higher political privileges than those claimed by the radicals of the Congress, would come as a matter of course.

At the next general election, Mr. A. O. Hume, of the Indian Congress, will be in the running for the honor of an M. P. We do not know whether any English constituency has yet taken any fancy for him. It is said that he intends to offer himself to Dulwich, a borough in the suburbs of London. But we are told that Dulwich is in the possession of a conservative wizard, having a much longer purse than the conjurer of the Indian Congress.

Those who deplore the depression of our manufacturing industries under British rule, may take heart now. The Pioneer itself has pronounced a strong condemnation of the practice of procuring from England materials for public works which can be supplied as well in India. Our Allahabad contemporary lays special stress on the continuance of importing railway plant from England, and the shabby treatment given to local iron foundries. The Pioneer justly observes :—

"It may be said at once that the various pretexts alleged by the Government for not granting a fair field to the Indian industry would deserve to be stigmatised as purely hypocritical, if it were not that everyone knows that the Government of India is not a free agent in the matter, and that these are the forced excuses of one who has to say something."

However humiliating this apology may be to our rulers here, it is nevertheless an undeniable fact that the Indian Government, being subordinate to the Home Government, is altogether powerless, when Her Majesty's ministers sacrifice the interest of her Indian Empire for party purposes. But the competition of German commerce has now arrived at a stage which makes it clear enough that the English cotton spinners, iron manufacturers, and salt merchants cannot long continue in the enjoyment of the undue advantage which they have hitherto taken of India's dependent position. And we may now look forward to the possibility of English capitalists themselves setting up cotton mills and iron foundries in India, and taking an active interest in encouraging local industries, instead of bringing about their ruin. The purchase of the Chinsurah barracks by Manchester merchants is a good sign. The sentiments expressed by Sir Charles Elliott in his recent Resolution on the administration of the Salt department, incline us also to be hopeful.

THE system of trade statistics obtaining in British India has been described as follows :—

"The valuations are based for imports on the bills of entry, and for exports on the shipping bills, which every importer and exporter must put in when landing or shipping goods. These documents are prescribed by the Sea Customs Act VIII of 1878, section 29 of which requires that the quantity and value of goods shall be truly declared; the value being, under section 30 of the Act, the wholesale value at the place of import or export, less trade discount. These declarations are subject to scrutiny in all cases, whether the goods are dutiable or not, and the Collector of Customs has the power to examine any goods at any time, and call for invoices or other documents where he doubts the accuracy of declarations. Importers and exporters are liable to penalties for false declarations, whether the goods are dutiable or not."

The recommendations of the English Committee appointed to enquire into the Compilation of Import and Export Statistics in the Colonies, are :—

"IMPORTS. I. Imports should be valued as they lie in the port of entry.—This method not only has the advantage of bringing the Colonial practice into conformity with that of Great Britain, India, and most foreign countries, but it is also the most correct. For the cost of a commodity to its consumer (represented in this case by the importing country) is, for the most part, ultimately measureable by the labour expended upon it before it reaches the consumer's hands, and there can be no justification for arbitrarily excluding from the calculation that part of the labour which has been expended on the sea transit.

II. The value at the port of entry will be made up of the following items :—

- (a) Invoice value, less trade discounts where these are allowed ;
- (b) Freight ;
- (c) Insurance ;
- (d) Value of packages.

III. The value should be obtained from a declaration of the consignee, which it should be obligatory on him to furnish in each instance.

It will be seen from Appendix E that in most foreign countries the values are calculated from average prices fixed officially once a year ; and prior to 1871 the system of computed values was followed in the British Custom House. The relative accuracy of the two methods has been warmly debated, but we are of opinion that the principle we advocate is the better for two reasons. In the first place, if the declaration is correctly made in each instance, it is evident that the totals must be accurate ; and in the second place, where there are fluctuations in prices, the official value is always behind the true value, prices being under-estimated in a rising market and over-estimated in a falling one. Nor do these opposing sources of error necessarily balance themselves in a given period of time, for the experience of the British Custom House, in the cases referred to below in section IV, where it is necessary to use computed values, has shown that very considerable errors may arise in this way.

Under this system the correctness of the returns will be dependent on the accuracy of the declarations, which is to be secured in two ways : (a) by a Customs check, and (b) by a penalty on the consignee for making an incorrect declaration—

(a) The Customs officials in abstracting the entries into their books will, from the experience they thus gain as to the normal prices of commodities, be able to detect at once any departure from current values. They should query such cases and refer them to the head of the department, who would then call on the importer for an explanation to be accompanied, if necessary, by production of the invoice.

(b) If the explanation is unsatisfactory, as showing either wilful carelessness or an intent to deceive on the part of the importer, the latter should be punishable by fine."

For the law for enforcing regulations by fine, the Committee recommend 39 and 40 Vict., C. 36, secs. 64, 65 and 72 ; 44 and 45. Vic., C. 12, sec. 11, and 39 and 40, Vict., C. 36, sec. 209, as the model for Colonial legislation. They lay special stress on sec. 209 for waiver of proceedings, and remark :—

"The power given to the Customs authorities to waive penalties on terms, in other words to impose mitigated penalties, is of special value. It avoids the cumbrous procedure of suing for penalties before a Magistrate, and the offender will generally be very glad to escape with the mitigated penalty. In practice it will be found that a fine of 5s., or 12s. in bad cases, will usually be quite sufficient to secure correct returns, if regularly inflicted ; while in grave cases the full penalty would be sued for in the Courts. It should be understood, however, that the object is to secure accuracy and not to harass traders, and that each recommendation for a fine must be submitted to the head of the Customs Department and approved by him before being acted on. Moreover, it not uncommonly happens that the importer, with every desire to afford information, has not the requisite particulars at the moment of landing the goods ; and this case will be met by the permission given in section 64 of the Act of 1876 to amend the entry within 14 days without fine."

So far as regards Imports ; for Exports, the recommendation is that—

"VI. The value of the goods shown in the ship's manifest should be ascertained from the declaration of the exporter, to be supported, when required, by production of the invoice ; and penalties should be imposed for incorrect declaration exactly as in the case of imports."

MR. Forbes Mitchell, an advocate of Eurasian interests, has recently thrown out certain suggestions which, if the necessary capital were forthcoming for being given effect to, might benefit not only the particular section of the community, but the country generally. Mr. Mitchell's sympathies being confined to a particular class, he is naturally very bitter towards the other sections of the native population which are numerically far more important than the comparatively small class whose patron he has constituted himself. But we nevertheless heartily concur with him in the views expressed in the following passage :—

"India possesses many natural advantages for industrial enterprise * * My own opinion is that the salvation of the Anglo-Indian and Eurasian poor must be worked out through a special system of industrial workshops and factories."

THE last decade of the nineteenth century is preeminently a period of congresses and conferences. Not the least of these is the Folklore congress recently held in England, under the presidency of Mr. Andrew Lang. Many and varied are the superstitions which serve to terrorise men and women, or keep them now and then in fools' paradise. The Englishmen who come out here may laugh at the Hindus' belief in astrology and palmistry. But in their native land they have superstitions quite as bad as those that prevail in this country. There are very few among their untravelled and uneducated countrymen who like to sit down thirteen to table, or to spill salt, or to walk under a ladder, or to break a looking glass, or to receive a present of a knife. Some of their superstitions are quite identical with ours as the following lines shew :—

Hadst thou been kille'd, when first thou didst presume,
Thou hadst not liv'd to kill a son of mine.

And thus I prophesy,—that many a thousand,
Which now mistrust no parcel of my fear,
And many an old man's sigh, and many a widow's,
And many an orphan's water-standing eye,—
Men for their sons', wives for their husbands' fate,
And orphans for their parents' timeless death,—
Shall rue the hour that ever thou wast born.
The owl shriek'd at thy birth,—an evil sign ;
The night-crow cried, aboding luckless time ;
Dogs howl'd, and hideous tempest shook down trees ;
The raven rook'd her on the chimney's top,
And chattering pies in dismal discords sung.
Thy mother felt more than a mother's pain,
And yet brought forth less than a mother's hope ;
To wit,
An indigested and deformed lump,
Not like the fruit of such a goodly tree.
Teeth hadst thou in thy head when thou wast born,
To signify, thou cam'st to bite the world.

ON the 7th of November last, died at Lucknow Nawab Akhtar Mahal Rounuck Ara Begum Sahibah, the younger of the only two married Queens of the late King of Oudh, Wajid Ali Shah, and the third daughter of the late Prime Minister of Lucknow, Nawab Ali Nuckee Khan. It is a striking circumstance that this Princess having accompanied her royal husband from Lucknow to Calcutta in 1856, and passed the greater part of her life at Garden Reach without leaving it even for a day—should have revisited the city of her birth to breathe her last there and to be buried in the family grave-yard of her fathers, at Tulseeunge.

The elder Queen of Oudh, Nawab Khas Mahal Sahibah (who is still alive) had been married to her husband, when he was heir-apparent ; but Akhtar Mahal was married when Wajid Ali Shah was on the throne in all his glory and royalty. The wedding was celebrated with great splendour and magnificence in the midst of unlimited festivities and rejoicings, throughout Lucknow, and her dower was fixed by her royal lord at rupees one crore and twenty-five lacs. In a book composed by the king, during his incarceration in Fort William, he has lavished great praise upon Nawab Akhtar Mahal, as the most handsome lady in his Harem.

This lady gave birth to only one son, named Prince Muza Khoosh Bukht Bahadur, who grew up a handsome and sweet-tempered youth of twenty, when he died. His premature death without any issue drove his mother mad, and made her miserable for the rest of her life. The king had also become inconsolable on the death of this Prince, as he was then the only son by a married Queen,—the only other son by the elder Queen, Prince Muza Mahomed Haund Ali Bahadur, who was the heir-apparent, having died several years previously.

Nawab Akhtar Mahal bore an exemplary character. She was marked out for fidelity to her lord and husband. She clung to him while living and cherished his memory when dead.

This unfortunate lady, when she came from Lucknow 35 years ago, was possessed of vast wealth ; but she was gradually deprived of all by her relatives and servants, until at last a few years before the king's death, she was reduced to the allowance granted by her husband.

On the death of the king in 1887, a pension of only Rs. 600 per mensem was settled upon her by Government, but it was hardly sufficient to keep her in comfort and dignity.

THE Statesman of the 14th instant has the following :—

"A marriage has been arranged between H. H. the Begum Ahmedee, youngest daughter of Sir Syed Ahmed Ali, K. C. S. I., and Mr. A. Fowler March, of The Hembs, Great Barr, Birmingham. The Begum Ahmedee is through her father a lineal descendant of the Emperor Akbar."

Who is this lady with H. H. prefixed to her name and claiming descent from the Royal Line of Timour ? Who is her father ? Who is Sir Syed Ahmed Ali, K. C. S. I. ? The Knight we know of with the nearest approach to that name is Sir Syed Ahmad Khan, K. C. S. I. He is no Ali, however. He had been to England it is true, but he neither married there nor had he any issue by that marriage. We must therefore give up the distant Aligarh and try and find out, if possible, a Knight-errant in our own neighbourhood. We are reminded that there is in the Bamboo Villa, Syed Ahmed Ali, of the Chit-pore family, who left his English wife and the daughter by her in England when he returned to India several years back. But then he is neither a Knight, nor a K.C.S.I., nor a descendant of the Emperor Akbar ; neither is his daughter entitled to the prefix of H. H. Who then is this Begum ? Will the Statesman enlighten us on the point ?

If we are to believe all the stories current in the country about dead and dying men, there may be cases of suspended animation which are liable to be mistaken for actual death. A Lahore paper reports an instance of the kind in which a Hindu in Kulu narrowly escaped being cremated alive. Fortunately for him, it was rather late in the evening when his life appeared to be extinct, and his cremation had consequently to be postponed till the following morning. While the body of the supposed dead man was being carried to the burning ground next day, it suddenly sat up on the bier and demanded its clothes. The bearers dropped their burden in fright and bolted, leaving what they supposed to be a ghost to shift for itself. The story spread like wild fire, and when the man reappeared in his village, his friends and neighbours dispersed in every direction, uttering the name of the god Ram, who alone, according to Hindu notions, can protect men from the mischievousness of ghosts. Thus disowned by his relatives and his fellow villagers, the man has since embraced the faith of Islam.

Two high appointments recently made by the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal have been the subject of comment among the natives of both Bengal and Behar. Mr. C. F. Worsley has been appointed Commissioner of the Dacca Division, although during the whole career of his service he has always been in Behar, and never held charge of a District in Eastern Bengal. Mr. D. R. Lyall has been posted as Commissioner of Patna, who has always been in the Eastern Districts, and never saw service in any District in Behar.

TOWARDS the end of last week, the Government of Bengal published the Resolution on the Cadastral Survey of Behar which will be found elsewhere. In fact, it was hastened by the alarm created in that Province and the consequent agitation as manifested in several meetings on the subject. By way of introduction, as it were, Sir Charles Elliott had been recently expatiating on the usefulness and necessity of survey and of a record of rights. But those chiefly affected by the measure are not satisfied with the explanation in the resolution, and they held a meeting at Sonapore, during the fair, under the presidency of the Maharaja of Durbhunga. The meeting passed resolutions condemning the survey. That meeting is likely to have as much effect on Government, as the Government resolution dated Arrah, the 9th November, had on the meeting. We find that, by a notification dated the 17th November, 1891, published in the Calcutta Gazette of the next day, the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal is pleased to order that a survey (under the Bengal Survey Act V. of 1875) shall be made of the lands situated in the districts of Mozufferpore, Durbhunga, Sarun, and Chumparun, and that the boundaries of estates, tenures, mouzahs, and fields shall be demarcated on the lands so to be surveyed. Mr. J. S. Pemberton, Surveyor of the Survey of India Department, has been appointed the Superintendent of Survey for the survey thus ordered.

MR. Justice Wilson will preside at the Criminal Sessions which begins on Monday, the 30th November. He refused an application, on Wednesday last, for a subpoena on the Prime Minister of Hyderabad to give evidence in the Hyderabad Diamond Case set down in the calendar of that sessions. He was not sure that the High Court had authority over a foreigner residing in a foreign jurisdiction. An order for production of certain documents was made on the Chamberlain of the Nizam, who had submitted to the Court's jurisdiction by appearing to prosecute the accused in the Calcutta Police Court.

THE Dacca bribery case transferred to the High Court and set down for trial at the next sessions, bids fair to be quite as sensational here as in its place of origin. We are told that the record in the case is missing. It was despatched from Dacca on the 30th of September last, but has not yet reached the High Court. The matter has been placed in the hands of the Police.

THE Bangabasi people will receive their final discharge at this sessions.

MR. Baker, late of the Bengal Secretariat now Magistrate and Collector of the 24-Pergunnahs, has conceived no very favorable opinion of municipal elections. He thinks that the best men as a rule stand aloof from municipal administrations, while seats at the Municipal Board are wholly contested by those who lead, or who have to serve, village factions, or seek to acquire or keep up influence with the people of the locality. He admits that there are honorable men who seek to accept office from purely unselfish motives, but says that the number is extremely small.

He takes exception also to the constitution of the Local Boards. He does not find fault with the personnel but with the system under which they have to work or are rather prevented from working. He says that the Boards as now framed, can not be of much real use. They are not given the power of initiation, and their functions are practically limited to disbursing fixed grants for prescribed work. They take no part in the financial administration of the district, and their efficiency as executive agents of the District Board is necessarily limited. A portion of the money at their disposal is expended on establishments, office buildings and the like, which he would put to better uses.

THE Age of Consent Bill naturally occupies a prominent place in the reports of the year in the Bengal Presidency. One Commissioner writes:—"The Bill may be said to have monopolised public attention, and its opponents did not spare misrepresentation as a means of adding to the number of their followers. Still the suddenness with which, as soon as the Bill was passed, the agitation subsided does not say much for its genuineness; and as a matter of fact, the arguments, the denunciations, and the resolutions were provided from Calcutta, whilst the meetings were got up by paid emissaries, who made all the arrangements. The very futility of the attempts made to do mischief by creating and exciting popular indignation, shows what the apathy of the people really is, or rather how strong, outside the large towns, is their confidence in the Government which rules and protects them. In the rural tracts there is no public feeling; litigation, social ceremonies, the state and prospects of the crops, the best way to get the better of a bargain, or to evade payment of just dues,—these are the topics which occupy men's minds, and the common weal is not even a name to them." This view is supported by one District Magistrate who reports:—"No one thinks; 'the narrow round the common task' engross the minds of all—of the late scholar of the high English school as well as of the illiterate cultivator. The former after having been introduced at school to the magnificent periods of Johnson and Addison, and after having been told of the wonders of the Western world, leaves school never to open a book again, or to give a thought to any matter out of the range of his everyday life. How can there be public opinion in a society so constituted?"

Another Magistrate of a nearer and more advanced District writes to the same purport though in a different strain:—

"Public feeling in this district is naturally confined generally to the educated few. So far as these are concerned, there are no doubt certain vague yearnings of a political character which may be gathered from the deliberations of the Congress, to which * * * contributed largely. I do not think that by any means all the Bengali educated community consists of ardent reformers, and among those who support or take an interest in the Congress, which I accept as the exponent of the views of the most ambitious class of reformers, there are men of every shade of opinion,—from those who are led by curiosity to take part in a tamasha, to those of aspirations which fall little short of sedition. I think, however, that the mass of the sympathisers with the Congress are at heart sound conservatives, and taken individually and apart from the intoxicating influences of the national assembly, are wonderfully mild reformers."

A native Civilian has no better opinion of the agitation against the Consent Bill:—

"All discussion regarding the Age of Consent Bill was entirely confined to the so-called educated classes, who took up the cry raised by the vernacular newspapers of Calcutta about their religion being in danger, and held a meeting to protest against its provisions. But all feeling regarding it appears now to have effervesced away."

Holloway's Pills.—In general debility, mental depression, and nervous irritability there is no medicine which operates so like a charm as these famous Pills. They purify the blood, soothe and strengthen the nerves and system, give tone to the stomach, elevate the spirits, and, in fact, make the patient sensible of a total and most delightful revolution in his whole system. They may be commended most unreservedly as the very best family medicine in existence. Though so powerfully efficacious, they are singularly mild in their operation, and might be given with perfect confidence to delicate women and young children. They contain not a grain of mercury, or any other noxious substance, and cannot do harm. Delicate females and all persons of sedentary habits will find these Pills a blessing.

His opinion on vernacular journalism is not creditable to the editors, who, he thinks, are for the most part people of very little education, who have betaken themselves to journalism as a last resource.

"It is said," says the Indian Daily News, "that a change is contemplated as regards presentations at Government House." It is not in a position to say what the nature of the change is to be, but would prefer some "weeding" process, as the assemblies are becoming too numerous and less select than is desired by the Home authorities." One innovation has already been announced. Gentlemen making new presentations at the Levée must themselves be present.

THE death of the young lady Sreemutty Mamada, now being investigated in the Coroner's Court, is painful in the extreme. Bereft of a mother's care in her childhood, she might have expected a mother's affection from her mother-in-law, after marriage. Yet her domestic life in the home of her husband was never a happy one. Somehow she dragged her existence for a few years, all dutiful to her husband and obedient to her mother-in-law. But the mother-in-law made her life a daily torture to her. Yet she bore it meekly. Whether the poison that caused her death was self-administered or not, the Coroner's jury will have to decide. But it is significant that her letter to her father immediately before her violent death, has not the slightest allusion to self-destruction. She complains, it is true, that life had proved a burden to her and that she preferred death to the treatment she was receiving, but she did not breathe one word to hint that she had made up her mind to put an end to her life. On the contrary, the request which she makes to her father to reply to her letter, clearly shows that she did not entertain any intention to be a felo de se. She only implores him to deliver her from the tyranny of the mother-in-law. That deliverance she has received. The question is, Who paved the way?

THE champions of orthodoxy who were foremost in opposing the Age of Consent Bill, have initiated a little reformation on their own account. Although the almanacs prepared by the native astronomers have hitherto been and are still accepted by the Pandits of Bengal without question, the leaders of the new fangled conservatism are against conserving what they consider to be errors on the part of the authoritative expounders of our shasters. They held a meeting on Sunday last, at the house of the late Maharaja Kamal Krishna. There were present Dr. Gurudas Banerjee, Sir Jotendra Mohun Tagore, Raja Peary Mohun Mookerjee and a few others less known to fame.

Dr. Gurudas Banerjee having declined the chair, Raja Pearymohun Mookerjee was put into it. But it was the political Mahamahapadhy Mahesh Chandra Nyaratna who did the actual work of chairman. The great Pandits of Bengal were conspicuous by their absence. A few of the minor Pandits holding different opinions attended. There were Resolutions as usual; but the speakers confined their attention chiefly to the question of the proper time for Sandhi pooja at the last great festival of Bengal. Those only of the speakers who justified the view of our "conservative" reformers had free scope, whilst those who attempted to take exception to the innovation sought to be introduced into shastric observances, on the authority of the English nautical almanac, were made to enjoy the luxury of being promptly snubbed down. In the words of a gentleman who was present at the meeting, Mahesh Chandra was like a boiling cauldron from the beginning. The reformation contemplated, no doubt, is laudable, but, we are afraid, the promoters of the movement took a course which is sure to widen the breach between the opposing combatants.

THE Governor-General in Council has declined sanction to the Law Publisher Mr. Cranenburgh to publish 1,000 copies of a fac-simile reprint of the Indian Law Reports up to December 1890. While making the application in April last, Mr. Cranenburgh had, as he thought, provided against a possible refusal by offering to purchase from Government as many sets of the Reports as had been sold during a specified period at Rs. 400 a set. He was so confident of the success of his request that, in anticipation of a favorable reply, he indented for machinery from England to manufacture his own type, and made other arrangements to bring out the reprints. Being therefore, unwilling to retrace his steps, after having gone so far, he will apply again, and, if Government still refuse, will proceed to publish the Reports, unmindful of any legal action that might be taken against him. He will then have the satisfaction, as he says, that "the doubtful question as to the copyright of the Government in the above Reports will have, once for all, to be finally settled." This attitude of Mr. Cranenburgh looks like a threat which the Government may be justified in resenting.

A CASE FOR A NEW LAW.

THE history of most of the gold mining companies which were floated in Calcutta last year, emphasizes, in the strongest manner possible, the necessity of vesting the department of Finance and Commerce, or a special staff of Government officials, with legal power for superintending the affairs of joint stock companies and banking corporations. A law requiring the managing agents and directors of such concerns to submit periodically duly verified reports, and also to give unequivocal replies to all reasonable questions addressed to them, may go a great way to safeguard the interest of investors. The existing law requires that a balance sheet shall be made out and filed with the Registrar of joint stock companies annually. But the case of defunct concerns like the late Ganges Steam Tug Company and the Orissa Coasting Company, which for a long time successfully maintained their credit, proves beyond doubt that it is easy enough to make out balance sheets and get them passed by auditors. What is wanted is that some officer of Government should have the power of calling for such reports and returns as he may deem necessary. The most essential element in a company's balance sheet is the correct valuation of the assets owned by it. But with regard to this, the auditors have no power and they have to accept the company's valuation which, if its directors be not honest enough, may not be necessarily correct. Then, again, where the directors make a profit by a fraudulent contract, investment, sale or purchase, the auditors cannot possibly detect the trick, even if they discharge their duties conscientiously.

The power which the law now gives to shareholders to prevent misconduct on the part of their directors and managing agents, is altogether inadequate to meet the necessities of the case. The company promoters who float a new enterprise with the sole object of benefiting themselves, take good care to secure to themselves a predominating interest. The trick by which they usually continue to be in power, even after being found out, is well known. Their first move in their game is to purchase the property to be required for the projected company. When the company is formed, then the property previously acquired by the projectors is sold to it, partly for cash and partly for shares. The cash portion alone secures a handsome profit, while the shares serve to make the vendor virtually the owner of the business. A clear case of fraud may be liable to punishment criminally. But the shareholder cannot, after being once fleeced, be inclined to throw away good money after bad, on the chances of a criminal prosecution. They suffer quietly, and resolve in their heart never again to invest a penny in any joint stock concern. It is for this reason chiefly that even bonâ fide companies can very seldom be successfully floated in this country.

That the protection given to investors by the existing law is altogether inadequate, has been proved over and over again by the test of experience. Among the latest instances in which it has been found wanting, are the case of the Dadkha Mining Company and that of its offshoot the Bengal Trust and Loan Company. The Dadkha is one of those Gold Mining Companies which started into existence in quick succession, when the gold mania was at its height in August 1890. It owed its origin to a Mr. Vansittart. This jewel of Calcutta's "golden gang" played even a bolder game than most other members of his cult. He succeeded in floating his enterprise, and in selling his shares at a high premium at a time, when he had not yet been able to buy out all the people claiming rights over the property on the acquisition of which the working of the company depended. The property then belonged to certain gentlemen associated together under the name of Boro Bhoom Syndicate. As usual, Mr. Vansittart contracted to buy the property, and to sell it to the company of which he was the originator and managing director.

That Mr. Vansittart made a handsome profit by the business, will appear from the following passage in the prospectus issued by him in the first week of October 1890:—

"The agreement with Mr. Vansittart, the vendor, is the sole contract entered into by the Company, and the vendor shall not be answerable to the Company for any profit made upon the sale of the company."

This prospectus, which was the outcome of some ugly revelations in the press by the Pioneer's commercial correspondent, contained also a statement to the effect that only forty three sixths of the rights of the Boro Bhoom Syndicate had been acquired. Mr. Vansittart thus himself admitted that the property which he contracted to sell to his company, and which was essential for its working, was not even then entirely his own. The issue of this prospectus had a prompt effect on Dadkha shares, which from Rs. 4¾ fell at once to Rs. 2¾. But it is in the hour of danger that the light of genius shines with the greatest brilliancy. The correspondent of the Pioneer, to whom the public is indebted for most of the facts yet known regarding Mr. Vansittart and his bubbles, says:—

"Every attempt was made by Mr. Vansittart and his friends who had been behind the scene of the gold gamble force from the beginning, to bolster up prices. All expedients failed; but as a last resource the Bengal Loan and Trust Company, with a capital of 100 lacs was advertised as in course of incorporation and the public were further notified that it would 'grant advances on approved mining and other stocks.' Its formation was one of Mr. Vansittart's last undertakings here. * * * The next really important incident in the history of Mr. Vansittart's connection with the Dadkha occurred at the meeting called to consider the statement of accounts made up to 31st March 1891. * * * Some shareholders present at the meeting drew attention to the fact that Rs. 3,57,741 of the Company's money was invested in Mr. Vansittart's Bengal Trust and Loan Company. An amendment however to the effect that Mr. Vansittart be instructed at once to remove the money was negatived."

Thus the entire capital of the Dadkha has been swallowed up by Mr. Vansittart, and the investors who trusted him with their money are in vain trying to make him disgorge the amount. That the financial juggler who has been able to deceive them and to fill his own pocket at their expense, by the mere project of a gold mine, deserves credit for originality, goes without saying. But such inventive genius can be sufficiently recognized only by being provided with free accommodation, at state expense, in No. 1, Chowringhee.

THE NEW INDIAN PANACEA.

To Surrender Not and his political associates belongs the credit of having discovered a panacea for every kind of Indian grievance—political, social, mental, moral and physical. Like the religious teachers who dupe men by professing to be able to cause the death, or to bring about the subjugation of their enemies, by the recitation of a few mantras or choice words, the political high-priests of New

India are always prepared for every kind of feat—possible and impossible. They have a cure for all ills that our flesh and brain and the material world round us are heirs to. Their treatment is simplicity itself. There is no variety in their nostrums. They are no poly-pharmacists. They are all single-medicine disciples of Æsculapius. Whatever may be the nature of the complaint they are called upon to deal with, they have the same remedy, the difference being only in the packing and the label. Whether their clients want political independence or technical education or the prevention of inundations, they come forward with a solution which, whether effective or not, has at least the merit of being easy of application. If the problem to be solved is, How to improve our manufacturing industries, they would not be so foolish as to think of organising or floating joint-stock companies for the purpose. They know the difficulty of inducing the capitalists of this country to open their purse for financing new ventures. They know well enough that men who understand business, seldom believe in talkers. They are far too wise in their generation to go through the drudgery without which real success in any sphere of life can never be achieved. The solution of the problems brought before them, cost them nothing beyond a little theatrical display.

By the exercise of their vocal organs once or twice a year, they can achieve what practical men of the world shrink from undertaking, or cannot hope to accomplish except after years of hard labor. They hold a congress or a conference and give their countrymen political independence and an ultra-radical constitution by recording the following resolutions:—

1. That in the opinion of the delegates—deputed by no body and from nowhere—who are assembled in this meeting, "the down-trodden and dumb millions of India" owe a deep debt of gratitude to their mother Queen-Empress and her late representative the Marquis of Ripon for the "boon of local self-government."

2. That this meeting desires to place on record the yearning of the noble Arya race, as represented by new Indian Babudom, for the privilege of being enrolled as volunteers and village watchmen.

3. That a sub-committee, consisting of every one who desires to be on it, be appointed to deluge the country with declamations on the blessings conferred by the vocal gymnasiums yclept congress and conference, and to send telegrams to the Calcutta newspapers regarding enthusiastic mass meetings.

• With these and a few other Resolutions, backed by a speech calling upon India's sons—to gird up their loins—to awake, arise or be for ever fallen—the political regeneration of India is completed—at least for the year.

Then comes the question of improving the material condition of the starving Indian rayyet. The problem is beset with almost insuperable difficulties. But the resources of our Babu politicians can never fail. With the infallible panacea that they have patented, they are provided with a ready solution for every question which they are called upon to meet. The poverty of the Indian peasantry cannot be removed by an elected parliament or by volunteering. Our "politicians" recognise the fact and, like practised theatricals, they assume at once a new character. They are no longer political delegates, but reappear on the stage as representatives of the manufacturing industries of the country with which they have no earthly connection whatever. By the industrial conference thus organised or conjured up, and by its Resolutions dilating on the value of technical education, i. e., shoemaking, tailoring, &c., the country is literally overflowed with rupees, and famine is chased away from it for ever. As a pedagogue, Surrender Not is always for beginning from the beginning. The cardinal principle of his political philosophy is that we, as a nation, are mere children and that we must learn the art of government, by serving an apprenticeship as managers of burning ghats, pounds and latrines, if not as nightsoil men and undertakers' assistants. The economical philosophy of his school is based on the same principle. He and his followers do not believe in cotton mills and iron foundries. If we are not greatly mistaken, the only industry which we are fit for now, in their opinion, is shoe-making, and we should not be surprised if they advise our youths to perform a pilgrimage to England, to learn the art in the firm of Messrs. Dawson & Co.

We have not yet had a sanitary conference of new Indian Babus. But as, like Bottom the weaver, they are always ready to act any part by which they can hope to bring themselves to prominence, we hope before long to have a few Resolutions which will drive out cholera, malaria and small-pox from the country for ever. With such an infallible solution for meeting any difficulty, the fuss that our rulers and publicists are making about the gradual advance of the Russian Bear towards India, is simply unmeaning. With a couple or two of Resolutions not only can the Cossack army be driven away from the Pamir, but the Czar with his ministers and generals may be all polished off the face of the earth. What is an Armstrong gun, a mitrailleuse or a chassepot compared with a Resolution manufactured by the firm of Messrs. Surrender Not & Co. We wonder much that the great Powers of Europe are yet maintaining their unwieldy and ruinously expensive standing armies, instead of adopting our new Indian weapon. The reason perhaps is that the patentees have not yet been able to advertise it sufficiently. We advertise it for them gratis, and we hope that the Congress to be held in London in 1893, may lead to a better appreciation of its virtues. In the meantime, a specimen of it might with advantage be sent to the World's Fair at Chicago. Surely, a conference meeting in the Indian village to be transplanted to America, would be at least quite as enjoyable as the "artillery practice" of the Salvation Army.

THE CADASTRAL SURVEY OF BEHAR.

REVENUE DEPARTMENT.

RESOLUTION. NO. 1243 L.R.

Arrah, the 9th November 1891.

THE Government of India having sanctioned the resumption of survey and settlement operations in Behar, the Lieutenant-Governor considers that it will be to the advantage of all parties concerned that he should take an early opportunity of stating publicly the objects and intentions of Government in carrying out this undertaking.

2. Soon after the Bengal Tenancy Act, VII of 1885, came into force, Mr. E. W. Collin, c. s., was appointed to carry out the survey and settlement of a portion of the Mozufferpur district. These operations were initiated with the object of gaining some experience of the difficulties to be met with, and of the best and most economical methods of dealing with them, as well as of gauging their probable cost. They were avowedly intended to be of an experimental character, in the hope that, if successfully accomplished, they might be generally extended. The experiment lasted about a year, during which about 400 square miles were cadastrally surveyed and a record of rights was prepared for about 150 square miles.

3. The late Lieutenant-Governor, Sir S. C. Bayley, in submitting the final report of this work to the Government of India, expressed himself satisfied with the results of the experimental survey, and stated his opinion that there was good reason for desiring to extend the process to other tracts in the position of that dealt with in Mozufferpur. He also intimated his view that, should the experiment which had been tried at the expense of the State be extended, the cost must be paid by the zemindars and rayyets concerned, and that a charge of 8 annas an acre would be by no means excessive for the benefits conferred. The Government of India in reviewing this report concurred in Sir S. C. Bayley's view that it was desirable to extend the measure to other tracts. They regarded Mr. Collin's report as throwing much light on existing agricultural conditions in Behar, and as a valuable addition to the evidence already collected of the depressed state of the cultivating classes in that part of the country. They particularly noticed the fact that the Tenancy Act had defined and enlarged the rights of the tenants, and that in tracts like Behar an authoritative survey and record appeared to be indispensable to give reality to the provisions of the Act. In the review of this correspondence the Secretary of State wrote as follows:—

The Settlement Officer, who appears to have conducted his operations with skill and judgment, is careful to say that, for statistical purposes, generalisations cannot be safely based on the facts ascertained over a limited area of 56,588 acres. Still, so far as the proceedings went, they show—

- (1) that the work of survey and of recording rights in Behar was smoother than had been expected; that it was satisfactory to the rayyets and not disliked by the zemindars;
- (2) that the whole operation can probably be carried out at a cost of not more than Rs. 320 per square mile;
- (3) that the work has not given rise to litigation, or class enmities, while it has safeguarded the position of the rayyets and increased the value of their rights.

His Lordship went on to say that he noted the opinion expressed by the Government of India that, even if the continuous maintenance of the village record cannot be fully secured, still an accurate knowledge of existing facts would be of great advantage as affording a basis on which a better state of things might grow up under the Tenancy Act, and that a survey and record of rights ought to be attempted in other permanently settled tracts, where doubts prevail as to existing tenures and rents. He laid weight on the conclusion that the cost of the survey and of the subsequent maintenance of the village record must be kept within the narrowest possible limits, as the expenses will have to be defrayed by the classes and localities concerned, and said he would await with interest further information and proposals on these most important matters.

4. In March 1889 Mr. Boxwell, Commissioner of Patna, submitted a report on the question of extending the survey and settlement operations in his division. His conclusions were stated in the following words:—

- (a) The evidence produced from many different places prove that all over the division there is a general uncertainty differing in intensity.
- (b) Both the complaints of landlords and the attitude of the rayyets prove that the rayyets are beginning to appreciate their widespread right of occupancy.
- (c) Transactions between zemindars, indigo planters, and rayyets prove that there is uncertainty with respect to tenure.
- (d) And individual rayyets are not strong enough to deal commercially with either of the other two parties.
- (e) The effect of the Tenancy Act in diminishing uncertainty about both rent and tenure is already felt.
- (f) The effect of the Mozufferpur survey and record is universally acknowledged.

When this report and other papers connected with the subject came before Sir Stuart Bayley, in September 1889, he reviewed the question as a whole, and, with full knowledge of the condition of Behar, recorded his deliberate opinion that the considerations in favour of the proposed resumption of the Mozufferpur experimental survey-settlement proceedings decidedly preponderated. He asked the Government of India to accord sanction under the Tenancy Act to a survey and settlement of rights of the Patna Division with power to exempt particular tracts for special cause shown; and he explained the delay in making this application by a reference to the proceedings which had been undertaken to gain further experience in lands under the control of Government, and to the surveys of estates the proprietors of which had voluntarily offered to pay the necessary expenses.

5. Sir Stuart Bayley considered that the effects of a survey-settlement would be to define the holdings and rents of each rayyet, to place in the landlord's hands means which very few now have of proving without difficulty what they are entitled to claim, and to give the rayyets the power of resisting illegal and improper claims. He foresaw that such a measure would be unfavourably received by the zemindars' employes, as it would put an end to the large profits made by those who collect rent for the proprietors, a numerous and powerful class divided into various grades, from the farmers of many villages to the patwari or gomashita. After giving all such considerations their full weight, the late Lieutenant-Governor, as has been said, recommended the adoption of the measure in question. At the same time, having regard to the partial failure in the Patna Division of the autumn and winter harvests of 1888-89, and to the serious injuries caused by the floods of 1889 to the autumn crops in Chumpann, Mozufferpur and Durbhunga, he proposed to postpone the commencement of the work until the effects of these calamities of season had disappeared.

6. The Government of India in reply stated that survey parties would be provisionally reserved for employment in Bengal upon the supposition that the Behar survey would be commenced in 1891-92; though, it was added, no final decision could be given authorizing the survey until the question of cost and the share which it was proposed to accept on the part of Government was more precisely determined. In reviewing this correspondence, the Secretary of State for India wrote on the 20th February 1890:—"I am glad to learn that it is proposed to carry on this important work as soon as the people recover from the loss caused by the scarcity of 1889. It is satisfactory that the Government of Bengal expect the cost of the work to fall below the sum, eight annas per acre, first estimated. I have no doubt that your Government will arrange for the diligent prosecution of the undertaking as soon as the circumstances of the country permit."

7. The outline of the correspondence as above presented is sufficient to show the progress made with the project, up to the time when the late Lieutenant Governor had to abandon it temporarily on account of the scarcity of 1888-89. The question reserved by the Government of India for more precise determination has been fully examined and settled in the usual course, and, as a direct result of the Secretary of State's orders last quoted, the whole subject has again recently been laid before the Government of India, and proposals have been submitted for carrying out the survey and settlement of the four districts of the Patna Division which lie north of the river Ganges.

8. The Government of Bengal did not fail to represent, as clearly as possible, the difficulty of the work in prospect, and the fact that the scheme will not in the commencement commend itself favourably to the landed interests concerned. But Sir Charles Elliott expressed his complete concurrence with the views expressed by his predecessor that the advantages which will accrue to the people from the survey and settlement proceedings outweigh the inconvenience and difficulties that may arise, and that they justify the undertaking. His Honour entirely agrees with all that has been said during the course of the discussion as to the advantage and, indeed, the absolute necessity, of such a survey-settlement if administration is to be conducted with complete and accurate knowledge of economic facts, if famine is to be successfully combated when it comes, and if the relations of landlords and tenants are to be put on a secure and definite basis by the authoritative registration of areas held and rents fixed. He regards such a measure as a necessary corollary to the Permanent Settlement, and as the only way in which Government can give full effect to the principles laid down by the Bengal Tenancy Act as to the rights of the different classes of rayyets, by creating an accurate record of those rights, and establishing a system for registering them in future.

9. In reply to this communication, His Excellency the Governor-General in Council has now been pleased to issue orders sanctioning the proposed operations. In view of the partial failure of the late rains and the prospects of some degree of scarcity, it is not proposed to begin the survey this year, but arrangements are being matured for making a commencement of the work this season, by demarcating the village boundaries and starting the skeleton or traverse survey (the cost of which will be borne by Government), while the field-to-field survey will be put in hand in November 1892. The reasons why it is in contemplation to confine the survey and settlement to the districts of North Behar are that the evils arising from the uncertainties of tenures and want of a record of rights have been felt there more than elsewhere, on account of the poverty and density of the population.

10. Sir Charles Elliott has not failed to notice indications of uneasiness felt by the classes interested, and especially the zemindars, and there can be little doubt that much of this uneasiness is due to misconception on the part of those classes of the objects of the survey-settlement proceedings, and of the spirit in which they will be carried out. He has therefore deemed it desirable, besides recapitulating briefly the official history of the measure in hand, to give some explanation of its scope and character.

11. The objects of the cadastral survey and settlement of Behar are to obtain an accurate record (1) of the area and situation of all villages and estates, of each tenure and of each rayyet's holding within an estate, and (2) of the status of everyone who has rights in the land and of the rent paid by each rayyet and tenure-holder. In other words, the intention is to carry out accurately what every zemindar is understood to attempt to carry out more or less accurately, but often fails in doing. On every estate zemindari accounts are kept up, which correspond in all but accuracy to the khasra and khata of the settlement, and it is incredible that the zemindars should really wish not to have the opportunity of making these accounts correct. The Lieutenant-Governor has recently ascertained by personal enquiry the value which gentlemen of such experience as Messrs. Burrows, Thomson and Myline of Becheea in Shahabad attach to the information collected in the cadastral survey which was effected for the canal-irrigated villages in the district. His Highness the Maharaja of Tipperah is so convinced of the utility of a cadastral survey that he has recently made application to the Government to have such a survey carried out in all his estates which lie in British territory. It is within the knowledge of the Court of Wards and of Government that, in the zemindaris which have come under the temporary management of the Court, there is generally an ignorance on the part of the late proprietors' officials of the rights and interests appertaining to the estate which is altogether incompatible with successful administration. In one important estate still under the Court whose mahals had been lost sight of and had paid nothing to the proprietors for many years; in other estates, where survey settlements had to be undertaken, it came to light that managers were ignorant whether the estates were compact or scattered, or where the lands were situated. It is a fact also, of which zemindars must be fully cognizant, that purchasers of estates are often unable to find out what are the boundaries of the property they have bought, or to obtain any records showing who the rayyets are, where their lands lie, or what their rents are. These are instances of the inconveniences and defects which would all be removed by a field-to-field survey and an accurate record of rights.

12. On the other hand, the gain to the rayyet of having his rights recorded and his status and rent determined is incontestable. The law has bestowed on him certain rights, and the Government has decided that it is the duty of the administration to provide him with the means of knowing precisely wherein they consist. This knowledge will benefit him in his dealings with his zemindar in any dispute as to the rent due to him with falling short of the rent which he is entitled to.

to lease his fields to them, and with the Opium Department officers when he applies for an advance for growing opium on his land.

13. Putting aside the fear of the unknown, which will be dissipated as the work of survey goes on, and the fear of increased litigation, which the experience of Mr. Collin's experimented survey shows not to be probable, it appears to the Lieutenant-Governor that the main reason for which the contemplated cadastral survey of Behar will not be welcomed, in the first instance, by the land owners of the division, is their fear of the cost of the proceedings. The Lieutenant Governor cannot hope altogether to dispel this fear, but he believes that explanations will do a good deal to diminish it. After carefully examining all that has been written on this subject, the Bengal Government has come to the conclusion that, as an estimate based on the actual cost hitherto incurred elsewhere, the entire charge cannot be safely taken at less than eight annas an acre, though it is hoped that there will be some reduction in the expenditure when the operations are undertaken on a wider scale than they have hitherto been carried out anywhere. Of this estimated cost of 8 annas an acre, the Government of India has accepted the charge of one-eighth of the total expenditure as representing the cost of traverse surveys. Of the rest the Lieutenant-Governor has decided that half, or three-and-a-half annas an acre, should be paid by the zemindars, and the other half divided among the subordinate interests. Thus a rayyet holding an area of 3 or 4 acres may have to pay 10½ or 14 annas, an amount which certainly cannot be considered excessive, since it ensures him security in the possession of those rights which the Tenancy Act has declared to belong to him. The lowest charge for a copy of an extract from the jamabundi exceeds one rupee, and His Honour understands that cultivators often pay even larger sums for documents or considerations of much less real value than the extracts from the khasras and khatians will be to them. The zemindars who own large properties will necessarily have larger total sums, but not proportionately larger charges, to pay; but in return, though no general increase in the rents of rayyets can be contemplated, they will reap some return from the discovery of concealed holdings, and of tenures in which a large increase of area has taken place without any corresponding rise in rent, which will go some way towards compensating them for the outlay entailed upon them. Moreover, the survey itself will, it has been calculated, take about five years for two parties at the rate of 2,500 square miles a year, so that the total sum payable by the general body of zemindars each year will be distributed over a considerable period. In some cases, no doubt, the aggregate amounts which will fall upon single zemindars in any one year will be large; and to meet this difficulty, the Government intends to facilitate payments by allowing them to be liquidated by instalments. Sir Charles Elliott has no doubt whatever that in the end the zemindars will find the results well worth the money they will have, under the law, to pay for the survey and settlement operations. He feels sure that the zemindars of the large estates in which such proceedings have recently been completed would agree in the view that they have received, by an accurate and a well-ordered reft-roll which has been generally accompanied by a slight increase in rents, good value for their expenditure. It is the Lieutenant-Governor's intention to have published shortly an account of what the surveys and records of rights in those large estates have cost and the returns they have produced to the landlords, so that the zemindars of North Behar will be in a position to judge for themselves of the advantageous results which they may anticipate.

14. His Honour need hardly notice the suspicion, if any such exists, that the survey and settlement operations are intended to restrict just rights. There is no intention whatever on the part of Government to restrict the just rights of a single individual or of a class; nor would Government have the power to do so if it so desired.

15. The Lieutenant-Governor's object, in making the statements contained in this Resolution, has been to dispel the prevailing ignorance of the real objects of a survey settlement and the intentions of Government, and to make known the truth; and he trusts that the effect of what he has ordered to be published will be to show that some of the suspicions which may have obtained credence are unfounded and some are exaggerated; and that in the minds of those who are best able to judge, the conviction will be established that the settlement survey of Behar is likely to produce great benefits to all classes who are interested in the land.

By order of the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal,

C. E. BUCKLAND.

Offg. Secretary to the Govt. of Bengal.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

SONG OF THE ROYAL DIAMOND.

"A full true Account of the wonderful Diamond, presented to the King's Majesty, by Warren Hastings, Esq., on Wednesday the 14th of June 1786, being an excellent new song, to the tune of Derry down." Such was the title under which the following song appeared in its time. It was reprinted, (with a slight necessary alteration,) sixty years after as an illustration of the class of literary productions to which it belongs. We reproduce from that reprint.—EDITOR, Reis & Rayyet.

I'll sing you a song of a diamond so fine,
That soon in the crown of our monarch will shine;
Of its size and its value the whole country rings,
By Hastings bestow'd on the best of all kings.

Derry down, &c.

From India this jewel was lately brought o'er;
Though sunk in the sea, it was found on the shore;
And just in the nick to St. James's it got,
Convey'd in a bag by the brave Major Scott.

Derry down, &c.

Lord Sydney stepp'd forth, when the tidings were known—
It's his office to carry such news to the throne;
Though quite out of breath, to the closet he ran,
And stammer'd with joy ere his tale he began.

Derry down, &c.

"Here's a jewel, my liege, there's none such in the land;
Major Scott, with three bows, put it into my hand;
And he swore, when he gave it, the wise ones were bit,
For it never was shown to Dundas or to Pitt."

Derry down, &c.

"For Dundas," cried our sovereign, "unpolish'd and rough,
Give him a Scotch pebble, it's more than enough;
And jewels to Pitt Hastings justly refuses,
For he has already more gifts than he uses."

Derry down, &c.

"But run, Jenky, run!" adds the king, in delight,
"Bring the queep and the princesses here for a sight;
They never would pardon the negligence shown,
If we kept from their knowledge so glorious a stone."

Derry down, &c.

"But guard the door, Jenky—no credit we'll win
If the prince in a frolic should chance to step in.
The boy to such secrets of state we'll ne'er call;
Let him wait till he gets our crown, income and all."

Derry down, &c.

In the princesses run, and surprised, cry "O la!
"T is as big as the egg of a pigeon, papa!"
"And a pigeon of plumage worth plucking is he,"
Replies our old monarch, "who sent it to me."

Derry down, &c.

Madam Schwellenberg peeped through the door at a chink,
And tipp'd on the diamond a sly German wink;

As much as to say, "Can we ever be cruel
To him who has sent us so glorious a jewel?"

Derry down, &c.

Now, God save the queen! while the people I teach,
How the king may grow rich, while the commons impeach;
Then let nabobs go plunder and rob as they will,
And throw in their diamonds as gust to his mill.

Derry down, &c.

HOME

Thou, whose every hour
Is spent in home's green bower,
Where love like golden fruit o'erhanging grows,
Where friends to thy soul sweet,
United, culling meet,

As lapping leaves that form the entire rose;
Thank thy God well—soon from this joy, thy day

Passes away

Thou, at whose household fire,
Still sits thine aged sire,
An angel guest with lore as those of old,
Make thy young children's care
That crown of honny hui

Which the calm heavens love as they behold!
Soon, soon, the glory of that sunset ray

Passes away.

Thou, from whose household nooks
Peep forth gay, gleaming looks,
Those "fairy heads" shot up from opening flowers,
With wondrous perfume filled,
The fresh, the undistilled,

The overflowing bliss that childhood shrouds,
Praise Him who gave, and at whose word their stay

Passes away

Thou, with another heart
United, though apart,

As two close stars that mingling shine but one,
Whose pleasant pathway lies
'Neath tender watchful eyes,

Where love shines clearer than the morning sun,
Praise God for life, that in such soft array

Passes away.

More—more—thou hast yet more!
These, thy heart's treasured store
Transferred to heaven, may win immortal birth,
With radiant seraphs there
May tune ambrosial air

To ever-glorying hymns of praise, while earth,
Like lingering music from some harper gray,

Passes away

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

It is some twenty years that the Prince of Wales was attacked with typhoid fever, the first symptoms shewing themselves on November 19, Prince George of Wales is now reported to be suffering from the same malady. It is satisfactory to know that it has taken a favorable turn.

MR. George N. Curzon, member for Southport, succeeds as Under-Secretary for India Sir John Gorst, transferred to the Treasury.

At Melbourne, a lady journalist, by name Miss Connor O'Brien, read before the Austral Salon—a "swell" ladies' club—a paper proving, by quotations from Shakespeare, Tennyson and Ruskin, that "woman was the equal of man in almost every sphere of life." To prove her point, she could have cited the old saying—the grey mare was the better horse.

A WOMAN is being tried in Servia for fourteen murders and an endless number of robberies.

A LADY in the South of France has left by a will 320,000*l* for a caravan of 500 or more persons to penetrate into the wilds of Africa yet untrod by any explorer. The condition is that the organizer must bring back safe and sound to France one half of the entire number. The will is being contested by her relatives. A Toulouse correspondent explains the object of the bequest to be to kill the slave trade by making Africa well known.

At the present time when famine is devastating the dominions of the Czar and is raging with greater or less fury in some parts of India also, the news that the Canadians have had a beautiful harvest this year must be singularly refreshing. We read in the Times of India :—

"The prairie farmers are still struggling with their colossal wheat fields. For a month past the vast plain has been alive with reapers and threshers. Miles of grain trains go eastward to the European boats. Farms are almost blockaded by their own stupendous produce stocks. Wheat has been yielding fifty-five bushels to the acre. Twenty millions of dollars from Europe will be distributed among 25,000 farmers in Canada, and many settlers will become rich this year. The weather is superb."

DR. J. Edward Polak, an eminent Persian scholar, paid the last debt of nature, at Vienna on October 8, at the age of seventy-one. He was the lecturer of the Medical School at Teheran in 1851 and had the honor of being appointed as a royal physician in the court of the Shah. He was in Persia for 9 years, and on his return to Vienna published his well-known work "Persien: das Land und Seine Bewohner." He was again invited by the Persian monarch and therefore had occasion to be at Teheran for a second time. At the Geographical and Anthropological Societies of Vienna, he read many valuable papers on Persia and its antiquities.

GEORG EBERS, a German Egyptologist, has in his possession an old medical work, acquired at Luxor. He thinks it the oldest medical work in the world and traces its age to 1550 B. C. It has been translated into German by Dr. Heinrich Joachim, a Berlin medical man. Is not Charaka more ancient?

SIR Edwin Arnold has republished his letters to the Daily Telegraph as a book under the title of Scas and Linds.

THERE is an alarming decrease of population in France. In 1890 there were 2,69,332 marriages, 5,457 divorces, 8,38,059 births and 8,76,505 deaths. Compared with 1889, there is diminution in marriages by 3,602, in births by 42,520 and an increase in divorces and deaths by 671 and 81,572 respectively. The death rate, in fact everything relating to population, is against France. There have been innumerable discussions on this subject in the Academie de Medicine and various remedies proposed.

THE supersession of steam by electricity, has been, from a long time, regarded as one of the future possibilities of science. The ideal is now about to be a fait accompli. It is said that Mr. Edison, the inventor of the phonograph, has devised a novel method of using electricity in the propulsion of trains which, with three stationary engines, will be adequate to the traffic on the Pennsylvania Railway between New York and Philadelphia, a distance of 90 miles. In the mother country, the town of Leeds has already made a small beginning in utilizing the mysterious energy of electricity for locomotive purposes. We read in the English papers to hand :—

"Leeds has the first overhead wire electric tramway in England. The first car has just made a trial trip over the line which runs to Roundhay. It is on the Thomson-Houston principle. The experiment was completely successful. Each car holds 22 passengers, and several cars can be coupled and run together. The power is supplied from a central station to overhead wires carried along the road on tall posts."

THERE was an outbreak of cholera at Damascus. To prevent its spread, sanitary cordons were established round Beyrout, Jaffa and other ports. A convoy of 100 camels having left Jaffa, in violation of these precautions, the camels were, by order of the Governor, destroyed and the drivers imprisoned. The death of the animals might have killed the germ they had imbibed, but how could the imprisonment of the men purify them or arrest infection?

To avoid the dangers to the public health arising from their "agglomeration," the Porte issued instructions prohibiting the entry of Israelite emigrants into Ottoman territory. Accordingly, the captains of two vessels, each carrying about eighty Jewish families from Russia, Roumania, and other countries, were prevented from landing their passengers.

THE Morning Post of Allahabad writes :—

"A queer feature of American taste and sentiment has just been displayed by a leading daily newspaper of New York which devotes no less than five columns of one of its recent issues to the enumeration of the 'finest things' in New York, together with the names of their possessors. It is entitled 'Prizes of New York Life,' and constitutes a list of the men and women who have the finest houses, the finest wine, the finest clothes, the finest yachts, the finest cooks, etc. No article that has been recently published by the American press has attracted more widespread attention or been more generally discussed, especially as it is known that the information in each case was given for publication by the owners of the so-called prizes. Thus we are informed that Mrs. William Astor has the finest diamonds and emeralds, including a stomacher which belonged to Marie Antoinette, and the famous bow-knot of diamonds presented in 1645 by Louis XIII. to Cardinal Richelieu. Mrs. Vanderbilt is stated to own the finest rubies and a pearl necklace once the property of the Empress Catherine of Russia. Mrs. De Forest is stated to have the finest clothes; Mrs. Seward Webb the finest diamond and sapphire crown; Mr. Havemeyer the finest collection of pictures; Mrs. Robert L. Stewart (the widow of a sugar refiner) the finest collection of old laces; Mr. Whitney the finest cook; Mrs. Seligman the finest collection of fans; Mrs. Butler Duncan the most elaborate collection of silk petticoats; Mr. Frank Work the finest stables; Mr. Ellbridge Gerry the finest yacht; Mr. Stanley Mortimer the greatest assortment of English-made clothes; Mr. Malcolm Graham the finest team of horses and turnout; and Mr. Abram Hewitt the finest house. The finest wine-cellar in New York and in America is that of ex Judge Henry Hilton, the lawyer who acquired such an immense fortune by attending to the interests of the demented widow of the millionaire, A. T. Stewart; and the finest country house or villa is that of Mr. Ogden Goellet, the plumbing of which is of solid silver."

MR. Tom Anderson, of Dibrugarh, though Scotch beyond redemption, is a philanthropist beyond question. For the good of human kind, he proclaims, in the Englishman of Thursday, what a fool he is,—how, of a night in wild Assam sleeping in his bungalow, he perceived a shuffling sound and directly proceeded in the dark without a stick in hand to see what it was, how in this state he introduced his hand into every nook and corner, how the brave British Tartar thus turned up all manner of things, men's and women's apparel, odd shoes, and so on, until he caught a snake, when all his foolhardiness nozed out of his fingers and wisdom entered. The end of it all is, that Tommy teaches others of that ilk and the Johnnies in general this unimpeachable moral, namely, that "In India, at any rate, it is unsafe to make investigations at night without a light."

MR. George Sibley, a retired Engineer of the East Indian Railway, well-known to many of the old residents of this city, breathed his last at his residence at Catherham, on Sunday the 25th October, at the age of sixty-seven. Mr. Sibley has left a legacy for the purpose of founding engineering scholarships in the University of Calcutta.

THERE is water famine in New York and Brooklyn. The ordinary supply has failed—how, it is not stated. To add to the distress, that failure has compelled the stoppage of work in a number of factories and the elevated railway, which, in their turn, have thrown out of employment so many as thirty thousand persons.

A BUST of Mathew Arnold has been placed in Westminster Abbey, Lord Coleridge delivering an address before the unveiling.

It is believed that Sir Andrew Scoble will be in the running for a seat in Parliament at the next General Election.

WE read:—

"Madame Melba the celebrated Australian prima donna, now recognised as superior to Madame Patti, has been served by her husband with a petition for divorce, on the ground of adultery with the Duc d'Orleans at Vienna and St. Petersburg. She declares the charge to be untrue and simply instituted in retaliation for her steps to secure a judicial separation owing to her husband's cruelty. He claims £20,000 damages. The Duc d'Orleans was served with a writ directly he alighted from a train upon reaching Vienna after a visit to Baron Hirsch's. The Duc d'Orleans is furious at being ticked into the acceptance of the writ, which he believed to be a petition tendered by a gentleman in evening dress. The leaders of the Royalist party in France, including the Duc d'Anjou, are believed to be disgusted at the Duc d'Orleans' behaviour. The Countess of Lytton and the Countess DeGrey have visited Madame Melba, assuring her of their belief in her innocence."

LAST Sunday, the annual Harvest Festival was celebrated in St. Paul's Cathedral and in all the Anglican Churches in Calcutta. It is the counterpart of our Lakshmi Pooja.

THE Procurator of the Madura Roman Catholic Mission has procured permission for manufacture, at Trichinopoly, of raisin wine. The consumption is to be limited to Church uses, and not extended to the public. But cannot the "Church uses" be made to include a portion of the public?

ONE Hammond was taken up before the Chief Magistrate for refusing to pay Rs. 5, the hire of a first class plectron for nine hours. The defence was that the huer did not know that the carriage was registered as first class, and that he all along, while being driven in it, understood that it was of the next lower class, and that if he had known it to be different, he would not have used it at all. He was willing to pay the usual second class fare. Mr. Handley, in the absence of Mr. Marsden, ordered him to pay the first class fare, but saved him the cost, as very few people were aware of the new Act being in operation.

Ignorance of law being no excuse for its transgression, it is plainly the duty of municipalities, as of Government, to give due publicity to their laws and byelaws. But our civic rulers and legislators would rather hide the light of their wisdom under a bushel than willingly incur any expense in advertisements that might put a few rupees into the pocket of the greatest of sinners in this world—the Indian journalists. It is enough that they are not required to pay any royalty when they choose to entertain or enlighten their readers with municipal lucubrations.

THE Maharaja of Benares will be invested with the order of the K. C. I. E. by Sir Auckland Colvin next Saturday.

THE Syndicate of the Allahabad University have unanimously resolved to bestow the honorary title of Doctor of Laws on the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Straight previous to his retirement from the bench next March.

WE read in the official reports that "Homœopathy, as a novelty no doubt, is beginning to engage the attention of the educated classes, who prefer it to allopathic treatment. A leading resident in—(in the Burdwan Division) distributes medicines free, and they appear to be on sale at many druggists." Homœopathy has long ceased to be a novelty.

As a preventive against railway accidents, the Magistrate of Hooghly recommends better pay to the railway staff.

A DIVISIONAL Commissioner explains large balances of outstanding fines in these words:—

"Fines are often imposed inconsiderately; but the real reason why the balances mount up is that the quarterly comparison of the court and than registers is not what it should be. The Aetage Deputy Magistrate scrawls his initials against the last, or what he thinks is the last, entry in each register without its once occurring to him to find out why the fine is outstanding. Then at irregular intervals a list of lapsed and unrecoverable fines is put up by the Court Sub-Inspector, and on it remission follows. As to the way in which fines are imposed, I would mention a case in which nine Barois were fined amongst them Rs. 1,650 for illicit manufacture of country spirit, and of course went to jail in default. The trying officer's explanation was that he thought the men's unknown employer would pay the fine sooner than let the men go to jail—a reason which said little for his knowledge of the world or of character. Sessions Judges are often offenders in this way. They appear to think that if they fine at all they must fine heavily, and without the least regard for the accused's circumstances. Then, too, it is a common thing to find a man fined Rs. 51 where Rs. 5 or Rs. 10 would have been ample, because the pleader asked to have it made high enough to give his client the right of appeal. The appeal is dismissed, perhaps struck off if the client has come to the end of his money, and then we have the old story of periodical visitations by the police to the disgust and discomfort of the man and his neighbours, who are called upon to entertain them."

THE death of the Nawab Consort paved the way for missionary enterprise in Bhopal. A branch of the Quaker Mission, which has its headquarters at Hoshungabad in the Central Provinces, has been established in Schore.

A COLLISION occurred on Thursday, at noon, between the river side goods train and the Burmah special train at the Howrah down platform, resulting in considerable damage to rolling-stock. Fortunately, there was no loss of life. The Burma special was completely wrecked. The driver and the fireman of its engine escaped by jumping. The clerks in the postal van were soon extricated. They had a good shaking, but have not sustained any visible injury.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Bengal Times, signing himself "Islam" and professing to be "a friend to both Nawabs," reminds them of their condition in the days of their ancestor Khajeh Almoollah, and advises them either to "pension or send out of this district" two of their relatives, who have "set up in business, one as a shoe-shopkeeper and one as a tobacconist." The editor, without making any public avowal of his friendship for the Nawabs, completes the picture by remarking, "As to rank and social status—all that is nonsense, unless a man be born to both. Gentlemen, like poets, must be born as such."

THE paper mills at Titagur are working successfully. During the past official year, the output was 2,756 tons against 1,864 and 1,656 in 1889-90 and 1883-89, respectively. They can produce white printing, badam and colored papers, cartridge, foolscap and blotting papers, but their productions are not yet equal to English papers in point of texture or color.

THE Madras Government has made a further grant of Rs. 500 towards the boring of Artesian wells, which was first commenced in 1886 by the Rev. Father Dominic at the village of Kichery, in the Chingleput district. After the well had been sunk to a depth of 285 feet, operations had to be suspended last year for want of funds.

THE Viceroy and Governor-General has recognized the claim of the Zemindar of Rannad to the title of Raja.

SIR Auckland Colvin has declined to grant any compensation to Babus Sitaram and Brojomohun for the damages sustained by them during the late riots at Benares.

Holloway's Pills are admirably adapted for curing diseases incidental to females. At different periods of life women are subject to complaints which require a peculiar medicine; and it is now an indisputable fact that there is none so suitable for complaints of this nature as Holloway's Pills. For all the debilitating disorders incidental to the sex, and in every contingency perilous to the life and health of woman—youthful or aged, married or single—this great regulator and renovator of the secretive organs and the nervous system is an immediate cure. Their purifying qualities render them invaluable to females at all ages. They are searching and cleansing, yet invigorating; a few doses will speedily remove every species of irregularity in the system, and thereby establish health on a sound and firm basis.

THE new Imperial Central Library, Calcutta, which is under the charge of Professor Forrest, has been almost completed and arranged in the recently erected Secretariat building in Government Place.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

UNDER the head of Contemporary Poetry we unearth as suitable to our time when the Jacobite Imperial Jewel is on the Indian mind, a song of the last century of another Diamond. Although inferior by far in size and importance to the Imperial, the Royal caused far more sensation and even trouble than the other will ever do, we may be sure. It, in fine, created history. The persecution long drawn out of the presenter followed close upon the loyal presentation. The reason of such a queer return for the compliment, is avowed with cynical bluntness in the song itself.

"* a pigeon of plumage worth plucking is he,"

Replies our old monarch, "who sent it to me."

The year of the present is the year of the great Impeachment.

THE Viceroy arrived here this morning. His receptions at Gwalior, Indore and Bhopal were splendid and he too was highly complimentary to his hosts and hostess. Lord Lansdowne specially marked his appreciation of the lady ruler by foregoing the customary nuzzer.

LORD Lansdowne will dine with the loyal Scots on the 30th November, at the Town Hall.

THE Viceroy will hold his levée next Saturday.

THE Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal is still on tour and will not return to Belvedere till next Saturday.

THE Governor of Madras is in Bengal. Lord Wenlock, accompanied by his Private Secretary Mr. J. D. Rees, arrived here yesterday by the B. I. S. N. Co.'s steamer Lanana. He was received by Sir P. Hutchins on behalf of the Government of India, Mr. C. E. Buckland representing the Local Government. After a view of the Government House, Lord Wenlock lunched with the Home Member at his residence and then left for Darjeeling. He comes back to Calcutta on Tuesday next, and starts on his return voyage to Madras by the Dunera on the 8th December.

THE Maharaja of Vizianagram arrived at Calcutta about the same time as the ruler of Southern India.

THE Dacca bribery case has been taken out of the calendar of the sessions. Mr. Justice Wilson who has been deputed to preside at the next sessions held that, as Sessions Judge, he could try only cases as arose within the original jurisdiction of the court. There was an application to the Chief Justice on behalf of the defence for a special Judge, and Sir Comer Petheram has now authorised Mr. Justice Wilson to take up the transferred case after the conclusion of the sessions. In the Hyderabad Diamond case, a special jury has been ordered in accordance with the prayer of the accused.

MR. J. H. S. Cotton has returned and resumed his place as Financial Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

THOUGH there are some who still fondly believe that the Coleroon may yet turn up, it seems that no doubt can any longer be entertained as to her being lost. The cruiser Guide, which was sent out for searching her, came back to town on Saturday last with a large quantity of wreckage found at a place about 32 miles east of Puri, in Latitude 19° 45' N. and Long 87° 41' 18". The relics include among other things six life buoys with the name of Coleroon on them.

THERE was again another formation of cyclone from almost the same part of the Bay of Bengal, but this time it travelled towards the Arracan coast. On the 22nd November, the Meteorological Reporter found by his observations that the centre of this cyclone was to the West-South-West of the Diamond Island or at the North-West of the Andamans. In the Diamond Island the velocity of the wind was greater in the second cyclone than in the first. From the absence of any telegraphic communication, no information could be received from the Andamans. After the lapse of 24 hours, the wind increased in intensity and was moving in a North-North-Easterly direction. The centre passed to the West of the Diamond Island on the morning of the 23rd, where the velocity was 45 miles per hour. Approaching near the coast, its direction was more easterly, and reached it about midway between Akyab and the Diamond Island. After this, the Meteorological Reporter assumes that it was broken up through the obstruction presented by the Arracan Hills.

THE ex-Empress Eugénie proceeds to Egypt in December, where she will spend the winter. She was there in the days of her glory, just after the opening of the Suez canal, which owes to her its existence. When England opposed its construction and M. de Lesseps was in despair, the French Empress started a subscription in France for the prosecution of the work, and by appealing to the patriotism of Frenchmen made almost every middle class household give its mite to finance the undertaking. When the canal was open, Egypt was en fête, and the magnificent reception which Ismail Pasha gave the French Sultana at the time, is still fresh in the memory of those who witnessed the scenes at Cairo and its neighbourhood. Of all places in the world, she should never visit Cairo in her present condition.

YOUNG Kaiser Wil of the Fatherland has been adopting vigorous measures for the suppression of the "social evil" which is the special disgrace and danger of great cities, in his dominions, as in every other part of the world. Our old Wil— of British Indian Street has taken up the same question with the usual vigor of his pen. He observes:—

"It is too much the fashion to shirk and ignore problems of this awkward character, to attempt to hide them out of sight, with the result that the evils grow rapidly in the dark, which suits them. The criminal record—drunkenness, robbery, murder—attached to it is not the only, perhaps not the worst, mischief attending the spread of the social evil, as it has been well called. Other sad results are produced, which are not the less injurious to society and national life because they are less conspicuous. Social hypocrisy is one of the least of these evils, if the most common. The head of the Madras Education Department recently remarked on the 'double life' which educated Natives lead. How many Englishmen lead double lives in which the hypocrisy is quite as pronounced and harmful? How many young men—older ones, too, for that matter—deceive their parents, sisters, or wives by an outwardly reputable demeanour, while they are secretly engaged in pursuits at which parents, sisters, or wives would be horrified and grievously ashamed. The character of a man cannot benefit by this duplicity, but on the contrary his moral fibre must become coarser and more callous, his sense of right and wrong dulled, his conscience blunted. Then there are the purely physical evils, as distinct from the moral evils, which are in themselves sufficiently appalling to impress any man of sense and feeling, who prides himself on being able to make his life very much what he chooses by his own rule of conduct."

In conclusion, we are told:—

"that repressive measures are being discussed in Paris, and in England the Watch Committee of the Liverpool Corporation has declared a crusade against 'disorderly houses.' Something needs to be done in Calcutta, where the evil is becoming yearly more pronounced, more shameless, and more mischievous. We are told that brothels are being opened in hitherto respectable streets, and the police are powerless to interfere unless upon complaint and proof of annoyance by the neighbours."

The state of things in Calcutta as described above gives only a part of the truth. The impudent solicitations by words, gestures, or actual physical demonstration and the "disorderly houses" in respectable quarters, are nuisances which might surely be stopped and weeded out, if the Police and the citizens be armed with a little more power than they possess at present.

THERE is a foundling hospital at Moscow, which was founded by Catherine II and is maintained by the Government of the Czar at a yearly cost of £180,000. Any mother who finds her baby an inconvenience, may bring it to this hospital. The name of the baby, if it has one, is registered in the books of the hospital; if it has not been already christened and baptised, that ceremony is performed on the day following its admission. The child is immediately ticketed with a particular number; the ticket is tied on its back and never removed, so that there can be no future mistake as to its identity. A corresponding ticket is given to the mother, by the production of which she can reclaim the child at any time within ten years after its admission. The child remains in the hospital until he or she is 17; then if a boy, he is put into some agricultural employment, and if a girl, she is apprenticed to some other trade. About 40 children are admitted every day, or about 13,000 in a year, most of whom are illegitimate. The percentage of bastards among nations that favour late marriage and marriage by self choice, is everywhere large. But it must be specially so among the subjects of his Russian Majesty.

THE idea of making village schoolmasters serve as local postmasters in addition to their ordinary work, is not a new one in this part of the country. We are now told that this plan of extending village postal arrangements may, before long, be introduced into the Punjab. If the services of village chowkidars be utilised in the same way, then not only would the network of the postal system be complete, but the problem of giving them adequate remuneration would be solved without entailing additional taxation.

ST. GEORGE'S EAST is one of the poorest districts in East London. There are nevertheless in it 81 public houses, which supply drink to the 11,000 people who reside within its limits. From the case of this single parish, we may form some idea of the extent to which drunkenness prevails in England. Liquor shops in the island home of our rulers are frequented by the majority of their customers openly and without any feeling of shame. Even little children are found to enter them with cans, jugs and bottles in their hands. We ought to regard ourselves as fortunate that we are yet very far from coming to that stage.

OUR ancient legislators included the drinking of spirituous liquors in the category of heinous crimes. Manu says :-

"Killing a Brahman, drinking forbidden liquor, stealing gold from a priest, adultery with the wife of a father, natural or spiritual, and associating with such as commit these offences, wise legislators must declare to be crimes of the highest degree. Any twice-born man who has intentionally drunk spirit of rice, through perverse delusion of mind, can atone for his offence only by burning himself to death, by drinking incandescent wine, or boiling urine of cow, or pine water, or milk, or clarified butter, or juice extracted from cowdung."

The result of this legislation was that, throughout the greater part of India, a drunkard was, until recently, a rare spectacle. In the native jastras or theatrical exhibitions, which had their headquarters in Calcutta and were occasionally invited by country gentlemen for entertaining the mofussil people by their performances, the actors who took up the part of sweepers generally delighted the audience by pretending to be under the influence of liquor. But a real drunkard was a rara avis in those days. Most of our elderly countrymen who passed their earlier days in places remote from modern towns, must remember a period when they felt an eager curiosity to see the freaks of a real drunkard, and yet could not gratify their desire. Drunkards have, however, become now too common to be regarded as enjoyable sights. In fact, they have become quite a nuisance, and the question everywhere now is—How to check the mischief that is being done by wine.

THE legislation of our early Rishis gave such bent to the moral sense of the Hindus as a nation, that when latterly another class proposed to legalise and sanctify almost every kind of abomination, they found very little favor. To prevent disobedience to their injunctions by their own followers, they laid down that cocoanut water in a copper or bronze vessel was equivalent to wine, and that the merit of drinking spirit could be attained by quenching one's thirst with the pleasant beverage which nature provides, and which is quite as harmless as filtered water, even though taken in a vessel made of copper, brass or bronze. There are orthodox Hindus of the Kowl sub-division of the Sakta class who do drink real wine. But their number is very small, and most of them drink only once in the year, namely, on the Kali Pooja day, and even then in such small quantity that half an ounce suffices for a whole family. The only classes who freely indulged in strong drink in former times, were the hairs, bowris, chamars and other aboriginal castes that lived in a completely isolated condition in the outskirts of some of the Hindu villages.

It is not an uncommon thing for an Indian or Colonial Judge to resume practice when he has left the Bench. But there is no precedent for an English Judge appearing again at the Bar after retirement. The question, whether a retired Judge can practice again at the Bar may arise for decision before long, if the report be true that, after his retirement next month, Mr. Justice Hawkins will resume his old rôle of advocate.

THE Bengali Babu is taken to task very often for his distaste of everything except the drudgery of service. But the true Briton, who is always good enough to advise us to take to agriculture and trade instead of seeking Government employment, is himself never tired of the trammels of office. Mr. Justice Hawkins may have some excuse if he attempts to resume practice in the bar in his native country. But what justification can there be for the action of the late Civilian ruler of North Bengal who, after securing a handsome pension that is or ought to be more than sufficient to enable him to pass the "sear and yellow leaf" of his life in peace, is about to harness himself again as the servant of a Raja over whom he lately exercised the authority of suzerain? It appears that when there is prospect of money-making, even the heaven-born members of the Indian Civil Service may be altogether indifferent towards their personal ease and the dignity of their Government. With our oriental ideas, it seems to us that the humiliation to which Mr. Lewis is going to subject himself may have a prejudicial effect on the tone of the service.

IN Austria, they have started a club of the rich—bachelors, of course—the members whereof are under a vow to marry poor girls. The non-observance of the pledge is saddled with a penalty of 400*l*, which will go to an impecunious engaged couple to give them a good start in life. We are afraid, the forfeit of only 400*l* to a man of wealth is no strong bar to the attraction of a rich heiress. At any rate, the formation of the society shews that men of money are not always for self and that they are not dead to fellows less fortunate. In our country, where every girl must be married, a movement of the kind is loudly called for, specially at the present time when heavy demands are made, irrespective of all considerations, on the parents of the brides. There are plenty of men in our country to imitate European models in other respects. But is there none to follow their footsteps in sacrificing self interest for public good?

THE Grand Old Poet of England is in his eightysecond year. But, in spite of his age and the bereavements he has suffered, the freshness of his genius is still the same. From the nature of his pursuits, he cannot be prominently before the public at all times like the great octogenarian statesman whose "beacon light" is still very far from being quenched in smoke. But the weight of years sits lightly on both the great men. We are told that the Laureate is engaged in giving the finishing touch to some fresh inspiration which will enrich the literature of his country quite as much as the earlier productions that have already made him immortal.

MR. Justice Muthuswamy Iyer having taken three months' sick leave, Dewan Bahadur S. Subramania Iyer, C. I. E., has been appointed to act for him. It is an unexceptionable selection.

THE Congress papers are grieved at the elevation. Even the generally sober and practical Mahratta, while congratulating the Dewan Bahadur for Government recognition of his abilities, regrets his acceptance of the place. It virtually finds fault with Government for thus "absorbing our best intelligence and leaving few able advocates for the public cause." Does not the complaint lie the other way? The general grievance is that our best men have no chance with Government. Would our contemporary be satisfied, if Government ignored the claims of Mr. Iyer on the ground of his being a congressist? The grumbling of the Mahratta reminds us of the remark recently made in a private conversation that, to cripple the Congress, Government made Messrs. Telang and Ali Judges of the Bombay and Calcutta High Courts respectively, and now Madras has come in for her share through Mr. Iyer. Being told that Mr. Ameer Ali never belonged to the national assembly, the reply was that the Mussulman had uttered an indistinct sound in its favor.

WE have much pleasure in announcing the Jay Gopal Mallik Scholarship, the particulars of which will be found in another column. The name associated with the gift is that of a Kayastha gentleman of this town. The scholarship is not limited to one term. The selection of the scholar will be made every leap year, commencing with the next, in 1892, from among the successful bachelor examinees of the Calcutta University. The scholarship is open to every native of India, who, for want of means, though willing, is unable to finish his education in Europe. The selected candidate is free to prosecute his studies in any part of that continent or to fit himself for any profession or service or trade. In addition to the annual £150, he will receive his passage money to Europe as also for the voyage back. If necessary, the donor will bind himself for strict fulfilment of his part of the contract.

MR. John Charles Veasey, with twenty-five years' experience in the Bengal Civil Service in all the grades from Joint Magistrate and Deputy Collector to Commissioner, has come to the conclusion, that it is impossible to say that the Arms Act is worked with any severity, but he adds that in these provinces it is in some danger of becoming an anachronism. He would repeal the law altogether, and recommends a fiscal measure, treating arms as luxury with heavy fees for their possession, and doing away with the present exemptions. The suggestion is worthy of consideration. It is calculated to introduce uniformity, to put an end to racial distinctions, and to remove the suggestion of disloyalty which is the sting of the present Arms Act.

FOR the first time in the history of the native State of Rewa, a Brahman named Jhul Ram, convicted of murder, has, under British management of the State, been capitally sentenced and hanged. It is significant that the event did not give occasion to any excitement or demonstration.

THE Bengal Government has called upon all the Commissioners of Divisions to report, after due enquiry, what arrangements are made in the municipalities within their respective jurisdictions, with regard to the slaughter of cattle. Excepting the sacrifice of goats and buffaloes in the sacred shrines, which cannot be interdicted altogether without interfering with the religion of the Sakta sect of Hindus, the arrangements for slaughter of cattle for meat are generally unexceptionable. But the shocking sights presented by butchers' stalls and meat shops on the roadsides, with legs, rumps and ribs of slaughtered cattle dangling in the air, or, in the process of being boiled or fried, suffocating the passers by with the steamy vapour and the smell emanating from them, are a disgrace to the municipal administration of this town, predominated as it now is by Hindu Commissioners. The Hindu sellers of goat's flesh are quite as great offenders as the butchers who sell beef and mutton. In the town of Burdwan, the butchers' stalls have been all removed within an enclosure, and thus sequestered from public gaze. If similar action be taken by our metropolitan municipality, it would entitle itself to the gratitude of not only the Hindu community but of every citizen whose sensibilities are not blunted by his surroundings.

THE following serves to point a moral which not only young men going to England, but also the advocates of unrestricted female liberty, should not forget:—

"William Moore, 29, well-dressed, described as a racing man, and Alice Brooks, a young woman, fashionably attired in a light grey costume, who styled herself an actress, though the police say that she has no connection whatever with the stage, were together placed in the dock, before Mr. Sheill, charged with being together concerned in stealing, at their address, 11, Pelham-street, South Kensington, £4 in gold and 11s. in silver from the person of Mr. Lakhon Dass, an Indian law student, who resides at 2, Stephen's-road, Bayswater. The male prisoner was additionally charged with assaulting Mr. Dass, at the same time and place. The prosecutor said, that on Friday evening, the 23rd of October, he was in the Naval Exhibition with a friend, a Mr. Sing, who he got into conversation with the female prisoner. The young lady remarked, that she was tired of the exhibition, and suggested that he should see her home in a cab. Thinking that she was a very nice girl, and that most likely he would be introduced to her father and mother—(loud laughter)—he went in a hansomcab with her to South Kensington, but when he found that she asked him into the parlour alone, and told him stories of presents of £20 and £10 which she had received from gentlemen friends, he did not think she could be as respectable as he at first imagined. She suggested two sovereigns as a suitable present from him, but as he did not feel disposed to part with such a sum he told her that he had only got five shillings—which was not the fact. This announcement was not received in a lady-like manner, for the girl bounced out of the room, evidently to make a communication to some one else. On her return she said, she could not believe he had so little money about him, and suggested that he should just permit her in confidence to examine his purse; she promised faithfully not to take anything—only to see how much he had got. Then he put the purse in her hand, but as he saw that she went for the gold at once, he seized her wrist, and tried to get the purse back. She then called out, 'Landlord! landlord!' and the male prisoner rushed in the room and gave him a blow on the eye, bruising him severely."

After recording the evidence of the prosecutor, Mr. Sheill committed both the prisoners for trial, and refused bail, remarking that these cases often occurred, but it was very seldom that any one had the courage to prosecute. It was all very well for the counsel for the accused to attempt at holding up the prosecutor to ridicule for his "primeval simplicity." But with our parda system, there can be no Alice Brooks in our country. In the East, a young woman respectably dressed who can appear before the public, and talk familiarly to a stranger, is at once taken at her true valuation. But readers of Macaulay's Essays need not be reminded that in the metropolis of England, even her own country squires very often run the risk of mistaking painted women for countesses. That a native of India should make the same mistake in the modern Babylon is no wonder.

THE group of six figures 142,857 has remarkable mathematical virtues.

"Multiply it by 2, the answer is 285,714.

"Multiply it by 3, the answer is 428,571.

"Multiply it by 4, the answer is 571,428.

"Multiply it by 5, the answer is 714,285.

"Multiply it by 6, the answer is 857,142.

"Each answer contains the same figures as the original sum, and no others, and three of the figures of the sum remain together in each answer.

"Thus 285 appears in the first and second numbers, 571 in the second and third, 428 in the third and fourth, and 142 in the fourth and fifth.

"It is also interesting to note that taking out of any two of these sums the group of three common to both, the other three, read in the usual order, from left to right, will also be in the same order in both sums.

"Take the first and second sums, for example. The group of 285 is common to both. Having read 285 out of the second sum, read right along and bring in the first figure of the thousands last. It will read 714. All the others will read in the same way.

"Again, note that the two groups of three in the first sum are the same as the two groups of three in the fourth reversed in order, and that the same thing is true of the second and third. The last multiplication has its groups of threes the same as those of the original number, reversed again.

"Examine these results again, and you will see that in these calculations all the numerals have appeared save the nine. Now multiply the original sum by the mighty seven—and behold the answer

$$142,857 \times 7 = 999,999.$$

"No other combination of numbers will produce the same result."

What a potent charm the group of figures having these properties, would have been in the hands of our astrologers, if they knew its possibilities! It might have thrown into the shade even the square of sixteen figures, which gives a total of 32 in all directions, and which, according to their mock science, facilitates child birth.

THE opening of a separate head in the annual administration reports for shewing the extent to which Mahomedans are employed in the public service, has had its desired effect. It now appears that, in at least the Burdwan Division, they have been taken on in excess of the proportion which they bear to the total number of the population. If their number in the superior grades of the public service is not larger, it is ascribed to their own backwardness.

IN Bankoora, the Supore estate has been released from Government management, as it could not afford the cost. The management of the Court of Wards is generally more expensive than it ought to be. It is sometimes inefficient too, specially in the case of estates placed in charge of the favored hangers on of officialdom, utterly without any knowledge of, or experience in, Zemindari affairs. Nevertheless, by reducing expenses, if not by efficient management, the Court of Wards has saved many old families from absolute ruin. But the same can hardly be said of the appointments usually made by the High Court to the stewardship of estates under litigation. The Receivers have usually neither the experience nor the leisure to manage properly the estates in their charge. It seems to us that it would give greater satisfaction to all concerned, if the Court of Wards were vested with jurisdiction to take charge of estates under litigation.

LORD Lytton, the second of the literary peerage of Bulwer, died on Tuesday. The place and circumstances were all appropriate—from every point of view. The Ambassador died at his post at the Embassy. If the swan did not exactly sing and die, the writer at any rate expired in the act of writing.

It is said he had been suffering for a whole year and was lately confined through inflammation. The immediate cause of death was spasm of the heart.

So far as we can judge from remembrance of his Indian sojourn, his health was always bad. And small wonder therein seeing what little care he took of it. But we thought his complaint was hepatic rather than cardiac.

Weak to a child, he was unable in the least to resist temptation. Hence his habitual complaint. A continual struggle went on between his taste and his stomach. In India, it was necessary to appoint a gladiator of the Civil Service to help the representative of Majesty to stand on his legs and maintain his post. And that officer, though ever on the alert, and never aught but useful, did not succeed to the full of his mission.

His appointment to India was a great surprise. But the premiership of Benjamin Disraeli was a far greater one, and it was made by that statesman. It was a litterateur's preference for a litteratur and a litterateur's. The only point in the way of substantial recommendation in his favour for such a grave office, was a report that he had sent home from Lisbon, while Ambassador at that capital, on Finance, which was much praised. But a literary man is expected to be a good hand at reporting. And he remained so to the last. For the rest, he introduced into the administration of affairs the methods of literary business by division of labour of the Frenchmen of letters to whom he was expressly partial. He conducted the Government of India much as the Dumas and Erickmann-Chatrains produced their prolific works of fiction, one man supplying the plot, another the narrative, a third the smart dialogues, and a fourth the glowing descriptive writing. His Imperial policy and programme he carried out with him from Home, as from Home he expected and obtained their modifications according to times and circumstances, from time to time. His internal policy, originally the product of his own liberality, was soon what the dominating illiberality of his Council made it. The rest of the work was left to the Secretariat and the Departments. In fine, the great office was thus put to commission. There was but one exception. The speaking of the office he kept to himself. A master of sentences, he loved to compose fine essays and round of eloquent periods. So long as he had the making of the jokes and the epigrams, he did not care how India fared or Great Britain was involved. The Viceroy entered into the most serious undertakings with a light heart—launched on great wars as on a picnic. He was no doubt to blame for having placed himself in a situation to be so led. Otherwise, the poor man was scarcely responsible for the mischief caused by him. He was but a lay figure of state. Others ruled in his name or through him. He was scarcely cognizant of what was going on. His political morality was essentially low, belonging to the diplomacy of the olden times, of which we have the wellknown definition of an ambassador. His Afghan policy will always cover his memory with shame. His treatment of the Ameer was ineffably mean. In domestic administration and legislation, he was not his own master. Of wilful wrong-doing, he must be acquitted. Only as Viceroy of India he was a fish stranded on the dry bank. He made his début with the blunder of the Fuller Minute. That minute itself however, while it discovered his incapacity for a constitutional office, showed also the griffin's amiability.

MARRIAGE BROKAGE CONTRACTS.

THE Hindu of Madras comments in very strong terms on the judgment of the Madras High Court in Viswanatham v. Saminatham, I. L. R., 13, Mad. p. 84. We cannot fully agree with our contemporary in the view that this decision has practically legalised the sale of marriageable girls by Hindu parents. We take exception to the decision only so far as it declares that marriage brokage contracts may be legal where the match itself is a proper one. In the judgment delivered in the case, the court expressly lays down that when a father agrees for money consideration to give his daughter to an old or otherwise ineligible bridegroom, the contract may be treated as void, on the ground of being immoral and opposed to public policy. Our own view is that the decision is correct so far as Sudras are concerned. But in the case of Brahmans, marriage brokage contracts are altogether illegal, irrespective of the particular circumstances of individual cases.

In the case under comment, the suit was on a bond executed by the defendant, in consideration of the plaintiff having consented to give his daughter in marriage to a nephew of the obligor. The parties were Brahmans, and the contract was clearly invalid according to Hindoo Law and Hindu ideas of morality. No doubt, questions relating to the validity of contracts in British India, are not determinable now by the Hindoo Law, but by the Contract Act. Nevertheless, the law of our Shasters is a part of the law of the country, so far as Hindus are concerned, and a contract between Hindus the consideration or object of which is against the injunctions of our Rishis, is surely unlawful and void.

The written law of our Shasters clearly prohibits the taking of any gratification by parents from persons to whom they give their daughters in marriage. To contend that the practice is sanctioned by custom, is quite as absurd as to say that cases of robbery, manslaughter, and theft, being frequent in the country, are not unlawful though made punishable by its written law. It has been repeatedly held by our courts that, under the Hindu system, clear proof of usage will outweigh the written texts of law. The Collector of Madura v. Mootoo Ram Linga Satapaty, 2 P. C. R., p. 140. But the importance thus given to custom, has nothing to justify it beyond the erroneous translation of verse 108, in chapter I of Manu's Code, by Sir William Jones. The word āchāra, in its popular sense, may be regarded as equivalent to custom. The explanations given by the commentators, however, clearly shew that in the text of Manu referred to above, it is used in a very different sense. It there means not custom, but what may be called adjective law with reference to the performance of religious duties.

The other texts which are regarded as authorities for the doctrine that a custom can outweigh a written text of law, are Manu, Chapter VIII, verses 41, 46. Here, again, the commentators agree in laying down that tribal, local and family customs may be given effect to by the King, only if not opposed to express texts of law. A text of Goutama is cited by Kulluka and Raghavananda which says:—

"Local, tribal and family customs, if not opposed to express texts are binding as law."

Goutama, Chapter XI, v. 20.

In an old case, the Madras High Court itself held that "no custom how long soever continued, which has never been judicially recognised, can be permitted to prevail against distinct authority, Narasaumal v. Balaramachal, 1, Mad. 424.

From the fact that a marriage in the Asura form is nowhere declared as invalid altogether, the learned Judges who decided the case under comment seem to have arrived at the conclusion that the taking of bride price by the father cannot be illegal. From the nature of the connection which ensues, our Rishis have admitted the validity of marriage even by force and fraud. But it cannot therefore be said that the use of force or fraudulent means, for the purpose of marriage, is not punishable.

Whether the practice of taking bride price is immoral from an abstract point of view, is a subject as to which there may be difference of opinion. But there can be no doubt that it is immoral according to our Shasters, and according to the beliefs of orthodox Hindus. Yet, the Madras High Court observes in its decision under comment :—

"The paucity of decisions is in favor of the contention that the moral consciousness of the people is not opposed to the practice." I. L. R., 13, Mad. 84.

As a matter of fact, the sentiments of the Hindus are so strong against the taking of money by bride's parents, that, as a general rule, the utmost secrecy is maintained where money is so taken, and where there is a breach of such contract the aggrieved party would rather suffer the loss than incur the odium of being publicly known as a seller of daughters. That Hindus generally regard the taking of bride price as highly sinful, will appear clear from the case in the Allahabad Law Reports to be cited later on, and also from the summary of oral evidence in the judgment reported in I. L. R. 2 Bom. 9. In the last case, a witness belonging to the Bania caste stated in his evidence that the Asura form of marriage prevailed in his community; but when he was asked whether in giving a daughter of his in marriage he would deem it proper to take any money from the bridegroom's side, he was evidently offended and said that if he had a daughter he would consider it very disgraceful to receive anything for her marriage, and his caste would not tolerate such a thing. Any Hindu would deem himself insulted by a similar question and make the same answer.

With the highest respect for the learned Judges who decided the case, it seems to us that the taking of bride price by a Brahman is against both Hindu law and Hindu notions of morality, irrespective of the particular circumstances of individual cases. We need not offer any opinion as to whether the practice is against public policy. The view of the Madras High Court on the subject is, that there can be no harm in parents or guardians of girls taking money at the time of their marriage in order to feed them during the time that they remain in their paternal home. But, as a matter of fact, when a gratuity is taken from the bridegroom or from his relatives, by the father of a girl, he does not bind himself to feed her in his house for any definite term. Presents intended for the benefit of the girl, are not prohibited by our shasters. Such presents stand on a very different footing from gratuities given to parents in consideration of their giving their daughter in marriage. In the one case, the ownership in the unexpended balance passes to the daughter; in the other case, the whole amount is appropriated by the parents as their own property. A contract on the part of the bridegroom to give maintenance to the bride from the day of marriage, cannot be regarded as opposed to public policy. But the same can hardly be said with reference to a contract the primary object of which is to secure some material benefit to the bride's parents.

According to the Madras decision in Visvanatham v. Saminatham, marriage brokerage contracts are invalid where the father for a money consideration agrees to give his daughter to an ineligible bridegroom. To us, it seems that in such cases not only is the contract invalid but the father forfeits his right to guardianship altogether. Dr. Bhuttacharjee, in his Commentary on Hindu Law, says :—

"From the texts which make it incumbent on the father to give his daughter in marriage before maturity, and from the law as to Swamvar, it follows :—

1. That the power which the father possesses is more of the nature of a duty than a right.

2. That the father may forfeit the right by failing to discharge the duty in accordance with law.

"Modern Hindu jurists are agreed as to the father having no absolute dominion over his children, as over goods and chattels. It is said that the father has the right to give his daughter in marriage. But as gift can not be made of that which is not property, the word gift, in reference to the marriage of a daughter, must be held to be used in a secondary sense. Properly speaking, the right of the father in the matter, consists in his power to select the bridegroom, and to preside in the ceremony. So far as other people are concerned, it is a right. But so far as the daughter is concerned, it is a duty. While the daughter is yet a minor, she must submit to the will of the father or other guardian. But neither the father nor any other guardian can have the right to dispose of her in a manner not warranted by law."

In the Asura form of marriage, which is lawful for Sudras, a Sudra father may take money from the bridegroom. But where, for the sake of money or any other advantage, a twice-born or even a Sudra father is about to give his daughter to an ineligible bridegroom, the parental right may very properly be held to be forfeited. In the case of Shridhar v. Hirala, the Bombay High Court observed :—

"In the case of very gross misconduct and disregard of paternal duty the Court may interfere even in the case of a father; but the distinction between a parent and a more distant relative has been recognized by the English Courts and is founded in nature * * * The texts relied on by Colebrooke in 2, Strange's Hindu Law, 73, 74, 75 (Ed. of 1839) for the doctrine of a general supreme guardianship of the state have in view no doubt—at least primarily—the protection of minor's estates * * * But the extended authority ascribed by Colebrooke and Strange to the sovereign and the state is consistent with the range of authority assigned to the Courts by the chief Hindu writers." I. L. R., 12, Bom. p. 484.

The question under consideration arose directly, before the High Court of Allahabad, in the case already referred to. The suit was brought by a near relative of a Hindu who was outcasted for attempting to give his daughter to an old man. The plaintiff prayed

(1) for a declaration that the defendant had forfeited his right of guardianship,

(2) for an injunction restraining the intended marriage,

(3) for an order empowering the plaintiff to give the girl in marriage to a suitable bridegroom.

The plaintiff's suit was dismissed. But, in delivering his judgment, Mr. Justice Pearson observed that, in a suit properly framed for the purpose, the court might interfere so far in the matter as to restrain the defendant from marrying his daughter to an old and ineligible bridegroom. Kanahi Ram v. Biddya Ram, I. L. R., 1 All. 549. The decisions on the point are thus somewhat conflicting. But when the question arises again, we hope it will be settled in such manner as to check the abuses which have grown up in recent times, on account of the reluctance of the courts to give legal effect to one of the most important shastric injunctions. Hindu jurisprudence, no doubt, recognises the distinction between positive legal injunctions and mere moral precepts. But the line of demarcation has to be ascertained by the rules of interpretation laid down by our exegetes and not by mere conjecture.

SNAKE STORIES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "REIS AND RAYYET."

SIR,—On the occasion of the last Doorga Pooja, I met a young friend of mine who gave me two snake stories of lively interest for all Hindus who worship Doorga in the usual form. One of the instances was personally witnessed by my friend when he was a boy of 10 or 12 years of age. It occurred about 20 years ago, in the house of the Roys (an old family) of Khanakul, a few miles to the west of Calcutta. Everybody knows that the image of Doorga, as usually made, cannot be complete without that of a large-sized and broad-hooded whitish cobra, the tail of which is held in one of Doorga's hands and the body of which winds round the form of the demon whom Doorga is slaying. Of course, the snake in that attitude is the symbol of what is called the Nāgapaśa, a celestial weapon that could be created with certain mantras, and that could, when hurled against a foe, immediately wind itself round him and deprive him of all power of motion. The image of the cobra, in the Doorga group, is made and painted with great skill. Without further preamble, I will quote the words of my informant regarding what occurred in the house of the Roys of Khanakul about the time already mentioned.

"I was a boy of about 10 or 12 years of age. On the afternoon of the shashti (the day immediately before the first day of the Poojab), I went to see, accompanied by other boys, the completed image of Doorga in the house of a substantial neighbour. We were about 5 or 6 in number, and none of us was more than 12 years of age. The completed image of Doorga stood within the inner Pooja-hall upon a painted platform. The image and the bamboo frame had been decked gorgeously with the usual tinsel ornaments. While admiring all we saw, my eyes were suddenly directed towards the demon, when I noticed that instead of one cobra there were two of exactly the same size and color, and one of them frequently darted its tongue out. My companions also noticed it. All of us believed that both the cobras were inanimate. We began to speak, somewhat loudly, of this fact, which was a peculiarity. Our remarks were overheard by an elderly gentleman of the family who was standing in another part of the hall, engaged in supervising the cleaning of certain brass vessels, or some such work. He came to the spot, and, understanding the real situation, gently called upon us all to come out of the inner hall. By that time some other elderly members of the family had come up. A sort of consultation took place and it was resolved that the live cobra should not be hurt or killed but allowed to go to the place it had come from. The reptile, however, would not move. No amount of clapping would induce it to unwind its coils. Intelligence of this strange phenomenon gathered hundreds of persons to the scene. The cobra, with hood expanded and with its coils round its inanimate prototype, remained perfectly still, now and then gently waving to and fro, and darting its divided tongue out towards us. The shades of evening descended; the hall was lighted, and all persons were asked to leave the place. A watch was, of course, kept, but soon after the live cobra quietly deserted its clay prototype and moved away most unconcernedly, finally escaping through a water-hole (of the Poojab hall) into a spacious garden outside the house. At the time that we first noticed the cobra, some of us were standing only three feet from it. Never imagining that it was a live animal we would have touched it had it not been for the awe we felt for the completed image that awaited worship."

The other incident, of an exactly similar nature, occurred some years ago at Dashgara, near Tarakeswar. Only, the discovery was made on the morning of the first day of the Pooja by the family priest, instead of any one else. The live cobra was forcibly compelled to leave the companionship of its clay prototype, and was then killed by a young man of the family, the eldest son of the managing karta, in spite of the protestations of all the spectators gathered together at the Pooja hall. The young man died within three months of this incident, and all the villagers—men, women and children,—ascribed the sudden death to the sacrilegious act of killing the snake.

BHARGAVA.

THE EKADASI FAST

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "STATESMAN."

SIR,—Many of the statements of your correspondent "P. D. M.," published in the issue of the 8th current, do not square with facts. It is not a fact that girls losing their husbands at an infant age are exempted from the observance of the practice; neither it is true that the observance of the ekadasi is a matter of choice and not of obligation. The contention of your correspondent that, "instead of there being an exception made in favour of infancy and extreme old age, the practice is never enforced inasmuch as the widows observe it for the sake of purity here and salvation above" smacks of sophistry. That the widows refuse to take food and drink on the ekadasi day, is not because they are impervious to the agonies of hunger and thirst, but because they have been so trained up in the imperative nature of the ekadasi, that any infingement, be it for whatever cause, and however slight, is viewed with awe as a sure and smooth descent to eternal perdition. Besides there are heavy penalties following in the train,—social degradation, infamy and ostracism. Will any one suppose that in the face of so many mighty deterrents,—social degradation and ostracism for her and the hideous spectres of interminable miseries hereafter,—the poor widow in her unmitigated ignorance will dare to appease her hunger and thirst on the ekadasi day rather than confront death in all its horrors. If the practice were authoritatively abolished, if it were promulgated to-day that the non-observance of the ekadasi does constitute no sin, I doubt not, thousands of the poor widows will be too glad to give it up to-orrow. The practice as it obtains in the households of the Brahman, Kayasta, and Baidya castes, is a compulsory one; it admits of no relaxation in favour of infancy or age. The unhappy little child of 10 or 12, happening to lose her husband, has to observe it as well as the old decrepit widow of 80. In the case of the infant widows their sufferings are extreme; they are locked up in a room containing no edibles lest they take up a morsel or two unnoticed, and thus break the sanctity of the day. Let any one witnessing the indescribable distress of the poor child, locked the whole day in a room, rending the skies with her agonised shrieks to be released, and the pathetic resignation of the unhappy parents, bound hand and foot by a cruel and inhuman custom, ministering to the tortures of their child with streaming eyes and doleful hearts, conscientiously declare whether the practice is enforced or not. Lastly, your correspondent fares no better in his attempt to defend the practice from what may be called the utilitarian point of view. His position appears to be that since the practice leads to purity of life, to "making the pure Hindoo widows goddesses of our households," it must be observed at all hazards. Allowing this for argument's sake, I don't see why, if the utility of the practice be the sole cause of its adoption a particular day is selected for its observance and not any other; why the poor widow is compelled to abstain from all food and drink on the 11th day of the moon, while, from considerations of her health and other interests, it would be infinitely more beneficial for her to observe it on any other day. If total abstinence from food and drink once in a fortnight is enforced because of its beneficial effects, I see no reason why a hard-and-fast rule should be laid down with respect to the day. Your correspondent will probably answer that all the days of the moon are equally good for fasting. I may allow this even; but then he should remember that the effect of fasting does not depend solely upon the day on which it is observed, but, to the largest extent, upon conditions of health and age of the person fasting. A particular day may be propitious, but the state of body and mind are not necessarily so.—Yours, etc.,

DEFAMING A HINDU REFORMER.

On the Appellate side of the High Court yesterday, the Hon. Mr. Justice Jardine and the Hon. Mr. Justice Parsons disposed of the appeal in the case of Imperatrix vs. Vinayak Narayan Bhatre who was sentenced by Mr. Slater to three months' imprisonment for the offence of defaming the family of Mr. Vaman Abajee Modak.

Their lordships in delivering judgment said:—We expressed our opinion at the conclusion of Mr. Kirkpatrick's argument that the Magistrate was right in holding that the article complained of was defamatory to the complainant and his family. The circumstances of the reformer's family described in the article closely resemble those of the complainant's family, especially those relating to Western education and postponement of marriage. It is also proved that for some time before the article was published two rumours had been circulated and had come to the ears of the witnesses alleging an act of incest and a design to commit suicide on the part of two members of the complainant's family. There is evidence that the story told in the article about the doings of the reformer's family is substantially a repetition of the story told by rumour. The result was that the witnesses, intelligent men who had read the article had no difficulty at all in at once inferring that the persons indicated were members of the complainant's family. It has been argued here that the article may be viewed as a moral apologue, intended merely to warn the readers of the magazine against the evil results of Western education and the postponement of marriages and that the court ought not to assume that any individual person is designated. The coincidences already noticed precluded our taking this view of the article. So does the promise in the article to give the names of the persons, and it further appears that the accused did not inform the complainant that the article had no reference to him and his family and we find no such repudiation by the accused when the magistrate asked him to explain as he pleased. We deferred judgment in order to consider the more difficult question whether the complainant is a person aggrieved within the meaning of Section 198 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and thus entitled to maintain the complaint. It appears that the grosser charges made in the article are aimed at a son and daughter of the complainant. But the Magistrate finds that the complainant himself has a grievance too, because of the injury to his own reputation. He records as follows: "I hold that the libel does touch him personally. Like many a poisonous insect its weapon of offence resides in its latter end. The present account relates to the family of a reformer which we saw

* Is not the chastity of Hindu widows sufficiently safeguarded by the fact that they are allowed only one meal in 24 hours? Is it absolutely necessary that they should be brought to the verge of death once every fortnight in order to make them goddesses by such discipline? But the discussion as to the utility of Ekadasi is altogether irrelevant in the controversy. The only question is whether according to the Shasters absolute fasting is imperative on widows.—ED. R. & R.

from the information we have received. There can be no objection in such a remark unless it is intended to point the finger of scorn at the reformer, whose family through his boasted reform have fallen so grievously from the standard of morality of the orthodox." This is how the Chief Magistrate deals with the evidence. The witnesses, Hindu gentlemen of intelligence, depose that the tendency of the imputations is to lower the credit of the complainant. No evidence to contradict the witnesses has been given nor reasonable explanation of the meaning of the article or the motive of the writer, and in dealing with the question of injury to the complainant's reputation it is open to this court and in our opinion right to bring into consideration the fact that the complainant is the Principal of the Elphinstone High School. To say of the instructor of youths that he is a corrupter of morals would of course be defamation. The article before us does not, in express language, go so far; but we think, agreeing with the Magistrate that among the imputations are some relating to the complainant himself closely connected with the others and that as the witnesses say, they lowered his credit and might lower his character in respect to his calling. The writer has not been quite clever enough to elude the criminal law. The statement under the heading of the article is "such people should be considered even low beasts." This is general. When the narrative begins, the writer uses general language, which includes the whole family in this passage:—"In a good natured family among our Hindu community the sidgetiness of its male and other members, who have been embellished with Western education having increased owing to the flow of new reformation, all persons old and young are filled to the brim with the arrogance of their learning." This introduces the story of the immorality, its discovery and design to commit suicide and the article concludes with the statement that the family of a reformer is intended. Now the evidence of witnesses is that the above libel harms the complainant's reputation and the Magistrate has so found. It is not necessary for this Court in the absence of any evidence, to be astute in finding reasons for the contrary. Rather we are disposed to believe that the imputations as made would injure a reforming schoolmaster and would lower his credit in the Hindu society. The allegation about sidgetiness coming from Western education producing the arrogance of learning served, as we have remarked, as introduction to the two stories about other members of the family which they deny to be true, which are highly scandalous and are found to be false. The witnesses who have deposed to the effect of the article as regards the impression produced on their minds about the complainant's repute are intelligent men and this court believes that they were right. On the other point, namely, that the article related to the complainant and his family, we think that we may give weight to their opinion as to the result of the imputations on the complainant. Adopting this view we must sustain the conviction and sentence. We dismiss the appeal.—The Advocate of India, Bombay, November 20.

FATHER LAFONT'S LECTURE ON THE PHONOGRAPH.

THE hall of the St. Xavier's College was crowded last evening on the occasion of Father Lafont's lecture on the phonograph, illustrated by means of an instrument presented to him by the Maharajah of Durbhunga.

The lecturer described briefly the discovery of the invention by Mr. Edison, and told the audience exactly what the instrument was meant for, namely, to record and reproduce at any time any sound whatever. He explained that first of all any sonorous body must be in a state of vibration whether it be solid, liquid, or gas, provided that it periodically vibrates with sufficient rapidity. Between the human ear and the sonorous body there must be an elastic medium capable of being put in a state of vibration analogous to the vibrations of the source of sound. When those vibrations ultimately reached the drum of the ear, the sensation of sound was produced. Therefore there were three things necessary, and the first was the body in a state of vibration; secondly, the elastic medium which could be affected by those vibrations; and finally, there must be some living organism to perceive them. He perceived the sounds emitted by a body at a distance by the modifications of the medium existing between it and his ear, so that each of the modifications occurring anywhere in the line joining his ear and the sonorous body was sufficient to produce audition. It was then possible to construct an instrument which would reproduce the sensation of sound, and that was done by the phonograph by two distinct operations. The first was to obtain a permanent record of the vibrations produced in the air by the source of sound, and the second, by means of that record, excited fresh identical vibrations in the air. The former, or recording operation, was performed by causing a sharp cutting instrument attached to a vibrating disc to scoop out in the surface of a revolving cylinder of wax small indentations which were produced by the sonorous body itself. The second, or reproducing part of the instrument was made up of a similar disc, carrying, instead of a cutter, a little smooth polished ball of sapphire, which was kept gently pressed against the surface of the wax bearing the indentations. As the cylinder revolved, the little ball of sapphire exactly followed all the ups and downs of the indentations, thus communicating to the disc a mechanical state of vibrations identical in every respect to the state of vibration induced in the first disc by the sonorous body itself. Thus the air was affected as it was when the sonorous body emitted the sounds, and they were reproduced.

The reverend lecturer then held a conversation through the instrument, and the reproduction of the sounds was perfectly audible in every part of the hall. Solos on the cornet, piccolo, bassoon and xylophone were given through the phonograph, and the sounds emitted in a most perfect manner. The bagpipes were played, and the warbling of a bird imitated almost to perfection. A portion of the Italian song "Un Ballo en Maschera" was rendered by Signor Bonacci, and was also successfully reproduced. Altogether a most instructive evening was spent, and a request was made to the reverend gentleman to repeat the lecture on an early date.—The Indian Daily News, Nov. 20.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE MORAL OF LIFE.

I'd say, we suffer and we strive
Not less nor more as men than boys ;
With grizzled beards at forty-five,
As erst at twelve, in corduroys.
And if, in time of sacred youth,
We learned at home to love and pray,
Pray Heaven, that early Love and Truth
May never wholly pass away.

And in the world, as in the school,
I'd say, how fate may change and shift ;
The prize lie sometimes with the fool,
The race not always to the swift.
The strong may yield, the good may fall,
The great man be a vulgar clown,
The knave be lifted over all,
The kind cast pitilessly down.

Who knows the inscrutable design ?
Blessed be He who took and gave !
Why should your mother, Charles, not mine,
Be weeping at her darling's grave ?
We bow to Heaven that willed it so,
That darkly rules the fate of all,
That sends the respite or the blow,
That's free to give or to recall.

* * *

So each shall mourn, in life's advance,
Dear hopes, dear friends, untimely killed :
Shall grieve for many a perfect chance,
And longing, passion unfulfilled ;
Amen ! whatever fate be sent,—
Pray God the heart may kindly glow,
Although the head with cares be bent,
And whitened with the winter snow.

Come wealth or want, come good or ill,
Let young and old accept their part,
And bow before the Awful Will,
And bear it with an honest heart.
Who misses, or who wins the prize ?
Go, lose or conquer as you can ;
But if you fail, or if you rise,
Be each, pray God, a gentleman.

A gentleman, or old or young !
(Bear kindly with my humble lays)—

The sacred chorus first was sung
Upon the first of Christmas-days ;
The shepherds heard it overhead—
The joyful angels raised it then ;
Glory to Heaven on high, it said,
And peace on earth to gentle men.

WHAT IS HOME?

WHAT is home? in the thoughts of awakening spring,
When the green buds burst, and the glad birds sing,
And the garden breatheth its honeyed scents,
And puts forth its sweetest blandishments,
And each flower looks up with clear, bright eye
Into the face of the glowing sky,
And the buds, and the birds, and the bright flowers come
To the wanderer's dreams ; but they are not home.

For there lacketh the music of merry tongues,
That rang through the garden like fairy songs ;
And there lacketh the patter of happy feet,
That filled the haunts of each loved retreat ;
And there lacketh the glitter of laughing eyes,
And the joy of the young heart's gaieties,
That gave to the scene its living soul,
The inward spirit that named the whole.

Remove that charm, and in vain you come
From distant regions to seek for home ;
Though it beareth the old familiar name,
And its scenes of beauty remain the same
With those of the well-remembered spot
That memory cherished, that place is not
What our fancy shadowed in years gone by,
When we spoke of the home of our infancy.

Such is the change, in lapse of years,
That over every home appears ;
And it is well the heart should know
That all such pleasures come and go ;
Lest clothing any human tie
With thoughts of immortality,
We give to earthly things a love
That the soul owes to realms above.

Reginald Vere.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills effect wonderful cures of bad legs and wounds. If these medicines be used according to the directions which are wrapped round each pot and box, there is no wound, bad leg, or ulcerous sore, however obstinate, but will yield to their curative properties. Numbers of persons who had been patients in large hospitals, and under the care of eminent surgeons, without deriving the least benefit, have been cured by Holloway's Ointment and Pills, when other remedies had signally failed. For glandular swellings, tumours, scurvy, and diseases of the skin there is no medicine that can be used with so good an effect. Though potent for good, it is powerless for harm ; and though the cure it effects is rapid, it is also complete and permanent.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

IN Madras, they have the longest Christmas holidays—the same as the Doorga Pooja vacation in Bengal. The public offices at the Presidency and in the Provinces will close for the Christmas from Monday the 21st December 1891 to Saturday the 2nd January 1892, both days inclusive. It will be a general holiday, no particular offices being kept open during any of the thirteen days. Only provision will be made by heads of departments for the despatch of urgent business while the holidays last.

The native constables of the Calcutta Police are very seldom found to be sleepy. But they badly require sharp lessons for impressing upon them the nature of their responsibilities. They are very active when they see an opportunity of turning an extra penny. But when there is an occasion for their legitimate interference, they are always non est.

IN the city of Madras, an old woman, named Ramalutchmoo, was brought up before Sultan Mohideen Sahib Bahadoor, under a charge of theft of four currency notes of the value of Rs. 100 each, belonging to her widowed daughter named Moothalamah. One midnight, the daughter was awakened by the cries of "thief" of the mother, and on examining her box, found the notes she had locked up therein missing. Information was given to the Police who traced the notes to a party with whom the old woman had deposited them. The daughter was not prepared for this discovery. The mother was contrite, the daughter relented, and the magistrate too was compassionate. The mother pleaded guilty through a pleader, and threw herself on the mercy of the Court. The Magistrate, taking into consideration the age of the accused, and the relationship between the parties, sentenced the accused to six hours' simple imprisonment.

THE following touching scene occurred on the Chicago railway:—

"Among the passengers quitting the train just in from the South was a distinguished-looking gentleman, and clinging to his arm was a beautiful girl.

To take the Joliet train there came down the steps a burly officer, in citizen's clothes, and by his side was the former society favourite, George Lipe, convicted of forging his mother's name to valuable documents, who, in spite of all the influence brought to bear, will have to serve his term in the penitentiary.

A steel band was about the prisoner's wrist, attached to another about the officer's wrist. The two couples met directly in front of the big gates.

"Oh, papa!" exclaimed the girl, as her face lighted up with pleasure, "here is George come to meet us after our long journey."

She rushed forward to meet the convict, and impetuously seized both his hands. The shock that the sight of the manacles produced was positively frightful. Her great eyes opened, her face blanched, she tried to speak but could not, and then she fell fainting into the arms of her mother, who bore her to a carriage.

The convict, during this ordeal, was a pitiable looking object. The girl was his fiancee, who had been in Mexico all the winter.

He uttered no word; but, as he passed through the gate, it was seen that his lower lip was covered with blood. In his agony of self-control he had bitten through it."

THE cigar that the Prince of Wales smokes is valued at £360 a thousand, and it costs him about £400 a year, at the rate of 3 or 4 cigars a day.

THE new Lord Barnard, principal heir of the Duke of Cleveland and heir to a Peerage with £80,000 a year, a superb ancestral castle and a vast mansion in St. James's Square, was before his transformation only a Government clerk.

THE real Sir Roger Tichborne has been discovered at last—so at least says a Mrs. Jenkins of Sydney, who is in communication with the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland on the subject. The man on whose behalf the claim has been put forward, is at present an inmate of a Lunatic Asylum. It is said that documentary evidence has been found that conclusively proves his identity, and that she will take him to England at her own expense with a view to establish his claims.

ABOUT 800 telegrams are despatched daily from London to New York between the hours of 10 and 12. Replies to the messages are received within four minutes. The result is that the slightest fluctuations in the markets of Europe are felt almost simultaneously in those of the new world and vice versa.

LAST year, five hundred children under ten years of age were found drunk in the streets of London, and taken charge of by the Police.

A CHINESE Buddhist missionary is just now touring in India. His name is Lama Thochin. He travelled from Peking to Mandalay on foot. He was in Calcutta the other day, and is by this time at Budha Gya. Whether he is a mere religious enthusiast or a great scholar too, like the famous Chinese travellers of ancient times, is not yet known.

A HYDERABAD Correspondent writes to a contemporary that Abdul Huq has brought six valuable horses to present to the Nizam. It is said that he desired the Nizam to authorise him to conduct the Imperial Diamond case against Mr. Jacob, on condition that if a conviction was obtained, Abdul Huq should be reinstated in the Nizam's service or else Abdul Huq would pay twenty-three lacs to purchase the diamond. The negotiations are not complete.

THE minds of Faizabad Mahomedans are much agitated on account of the conversion of a grown-up Mahomedan woman into Christianity.

A MAHOMEDAN of Jacobabad who is past the age of 30, has just married an infant girl of 2 years, avoiding her grown-up sister still unmarried.

THE Secretary of State has sanctioned the construction of a chord line from Banelly to Moradabad. The cost has been estimated at 50 lacs of which the Rampur State advances 45 at 4 per cent. interest.

THE Excise Commissioner, Bengal, in his last Administration Report of the department in his charge, speaks of his Personal Assistant in the following graceful terms:—

"I have again to bring to notice the very efficient work done by my Personal Assistant Babu Mohendra Nath Bhattacharya, M. A. It would be difficult for me to be absent so much as I am from my headquarters, if my office were in less capable hands."

THE total income of the Bengal Government from excise was during 1890-91 over one crore and four lacs of rupees.

OUTSTILLS were abolished in the whole of the Burdwan, Presidency, Dacca, and Orissa Divisions from the 1st of April 1890. The number of outstills still existing in the province is 1,719 against 3,437 in the year 1888-89. The loss of revenue on account of the partial abolition of outstills has not been very considerable. The revenue from country spirits last year was Rs. 45,28,262 as against Rs. 47,07,132 in the previous year.

MR. Westmacott seems to be in favor of abolishing the outstill system in the Chittagong Division. In Behar, there are both central distilleries and outstills. Mr. Westmacott says that this dual system has not been successful, but observes also that he does not expect any improvement by a change. Reading between the lines, it seems that he is for abolishing the outstills altogether, though with his usual tact and cautiousness, he does not recommend any sudden and wholesale change. If we have interpreted his policy rightly, neither Government nor the people can be sufficiently grateful to him for the service he is trying to render to both.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

PARLIAMENT meets on the 9th February, 1892.

PRINCE George of Wales who was suffering from a severe attack of typhoid fever, has been pronounced out of danger.

THE principal textile manufacturers in Lancashire have combined to press on Government the reform of the monetary system and the recognition of a silver standard. They have found at last that, while the rupee is becoming of less and less value every day, mere philanthropy for Indian mill operatives will not give them sufficient return for their investment.

THE Chancellor of the Exchequer has explained, at a special meeting of bankers and merchants, his scheme for increasing the stock of gold in the Bank of England. His idea is to issue one-pound notes after a total note issue of £38,000,000 had been reached, four-fifths being issued against gold and one-fifth against securities held by the Bank. If this plan succeeded in increasing the stock of gold, his further idea was to relax the Bank's Charter, so that, in times of need, it might issue notes against securities, the Bank paying thereon a high rate of interest to Government. The success of the scheme, the Chancellor said, would depend upon the popularity of the one-pound note. The plan of issuing ten-shilling silver notes has been dropped, but if foreign mints offered free coinage of silver, the Bank of England would be called upon to enforce the provision in its charter, allowing it to hold a fifth of its bullion in silver. The Stock Exchange has approved of the scheme, but the Bankers do not regard it in the same light.

THERE is financial crisis in Australia. Three Banks, including the Standard Bank of Australia, and three building societies, have suspended payment. The worst is believed to be over. The local legislature at one sitting passed a law protecting the depositors as far as possible.

THE Times says that Russia intends buying silver and gold in Paris and London, with the view of adopting a silver standard.

M. de Giers, Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs, has been authorised by the French and Russian Governments to assure His Majesty the Emperor William that the maintenance of peace is the sole object of the Franco-Russian entente.

THE German Emperor had been talking Peace whenever there was an opportunity. It is now the turn of his Chancellor. Speaking in the Reichstag on the 27th November, General Caprivi declared that the visit of the French fleet to Cronstadt had made no change in the position between France, Russia and the Triple Alliance. He assured the assembly that the intentions of the Czar were most peaceful. The assimilation of Alsace and Lorraine with the German Empire was steadily progressing. Still the arming of the Powers was necessary and will long continue.

COMMERCIAL treaties have been concluded between Germany, Austria, Italy, Switzerland and Belgium, forming virtually a Central European Zollverein.

THE Czarina has given twenty million roubles for the relief of the sufferers from famine in Russia.

THE Czar has rescinded the order prohibiting the export of linseed from Russia.

THE London War Office Committee have recommended the abolition of the post of Commander-in-Chief of the Army from the next vacancy.

A ROYAL Warrant authorizes the formation of an Indian Native Infantry Regiment for service in Hongkong.

THE Countess of Russell has sued her husband for judicial separation. In her evidence the Countess spoke of persistent acts of terrorism and cruelty by the Earl in forcing her to do menial offices and degrading her before the servants. The cross-examination was directed to shew that she was subject to hysteria and that the discord between the couple was due to extravagance of the wife. Sir Charles Russell opened the case for Earl Russell, saying that there was no truth in the account given by the Countess and that it was only a hysterical delusion. The Earl, in his examination having given a different complexion to the incidents of cruelty related by the Countess and declared that his wife was of an excitable temper, and was sometimes violent, Sir Edward Clarke, counsel for the plaintiff, withdrew the charges hinted at in her evidence.

THE new Lord of the Treasury and late Chief Secretary to that luckless isle, has begun to look kindly on Ireland. Addressing a meeting at Huddersfield, on the 1st December, he gave it as his opinion that the time was now ripe to grant Ireland as wide a measure of local government as obtained in Great Britain.

MAHARAJA Sur Chandra Singh has not long survived the deportation of his brother Kula Chandra to the Andamans, and his exclusion from his own gaddi of Manipur. He died in his exile at Kankurgachi, in the suburbs of Calcutta, on the morning of Thursday, the 3rd December.

THE Maharaja of independent Tipperah is expected in Calcutta in the course of this month. The Bara Thakoor Bahadoor has preceded him.

THE Maharaja of Durbhunga arrived here on Thursday last, and is now in the enjoyment of good health, having suffered a good deal from fever since his return from Simla.

THE investiture of the Maharaja of Benares, Sir Prabhu Narain Singh Bahadar, with the Insignia of the Most Eminent Order of the Indian Empire came off last Saturday, at the Central Hall of the University, Allahabad. The Lieutenant-Governor of the N.-W. P., under instructions of the Viceroy and at the command of the Queen-Empress, presided at the ceremony. In presenting the badge, the grant, the warrant and the statutes of the Order, Sir Auckland Colvin alluded to the conspicuous position occupied by the Maharaja's family in Upper India—a position greatly enhanced by the loyal services of his illustrious father and of the eminent position he himself occupies in those provinces, and trusted that he would continue to occupy the same and merit and obtain further marks of the royal favour.

At the same Durbar, Maharaja Mahendra Singh of Bhadawar too received his insignia of the companionship of the same Order—in return, in the words of the Lieutenant-Governor, “for the good services, the loyalty and faithfulness of your ancestors, as well as in consideration of your own excellent services and good behaviour.” The Maharaja of Benares was “deeply sensible of the honor conferred upon him by her Majesty and trusted to show himself not unworthy of it.” The other Maharaja received his honor in silence with a bow.

THE Government of India remitted the nazarana amounting to Rs. 69,375 on the accession of Rana Partab Singh to the gadi of Ali Rajpur. The income of the state is Rs. 95,000 and the state debt Rs. 56,435. The Rana is nine years of age.

THE Agent to the Governor-General in Central India, in his report for 1890-91, speaks in glowing terms of the administration of the Gwalior State by the Council of Regency under the presidency of Babu Sahab Jadu. Among other instances of vigour, the Agent alludes to the measures taken for the suppression of dacoity and other violent crime.

The Council of Regency sanctioned three lacs of rupees for the marriage, in April 1890, of the daughter of the senior Maharani and a yearly allowance (or nennuk) of one lac on the bride. The sanctioned cost of the marriage of the Maharaja in January 1891 was 22 lacs.

IT has been noticed that land in Bancoora, specially in the south of the district, is changing hands. It is attributed to the involved condition of the zemindars. They, however, are unwilling to part with their property and give no small trouble to the new purchasers, most of whom are Calcutta capitalists.

IN spite of the mills set up in Bombay, the import of cotton piece-goods in the Western Presidency is increasing very considerably, the value of last year's import being greater than that of the year before by over 45 lacs. As in former years, nearly the whole of this trade was with the United Kingdom. The rise is observable under all the sub-heads. Thus, the value of grey goods was 4 crores against 3½ crores of the preceding year. Shirtings, mulls, and drills, were received in larger quantities, whilst T cloths, madapolams, Jaconets and prints shewed somewhat restricted imports.

The increase in the value of white goods was 17¼ lacs. There was, however, a loss of 40 lacs during the previous year. Shirtings, Jaconets and drills exhibited an improvement, while mulls, Cambrics, nainsooks, and Jaujibs a falling off.

The colored goods, specially Turkey red, keep up a steady increase. Last year, it was 5 lacs more than in the year preceding, which also shewed an increase.

CONSUMPTION has carried away Raja Haranath Roy of Dubalhati, in the district of Rajshyhe. He was in his 56th year and claimed to be the 53rd in descent from the founder of his family. He had for years together been in feud with his tenantry which he made up immediately before his death. Although of an ancient family, locally known as Rajas, it was only in 1875, that Haranath was made a Raja for life for services rendered during the famine of 1873-74. “The best monument of his public spirit,” as the Secretary of the Rajshahye Association writes to the manager of the Dubalhati estate, is his endowment of the Beaulah High School now raised to a College, for which he made over a portion of his zemindary to Government yielding an annual income of Rs. 5,000. In grateful remembrance of the handsome gift, the College was closed one day as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased endower. The deceased is said to have left a Will by which he has made provisions for the management of his estate during the minority of his son.

IT is said that M. Pasteur is an “unlicensed practitioner” and, according to the law of his country, cannot make any surgical operation—major or minor. Is the famous Frenchman of science then a quack? or is the necessary license refused to him on account of his originality and superior calibre? It is not impossible that the principle on which Sir John Gorst justified the Manipur policy of the Indian Government finds favor even in free and democratic France. In our own country, at the present time, Farradays and Pasteurs would be nowhere. Even the University of Calcutta cannot be expected to recognise them while there are lucky scribes and well-connected pedagogues to be honored and patronised.

THERE was a time when beer was the only drink available to the middle and the lower classes in England. The very names of tea and coffee were then unknown, and it was only in the great houses and on festive occasions that the juice of French or Spanish vine was placed on the board. Though the competition of foreign beverages has long since broken the monopoly which the malt liquor enjoyed in the favor of the Anglo-Saxon race, it is still one of their most favorite drinks. But beer drinkers had better be on their guard now. With the progress of the chemical science, it has been found that the hydrofluoric acid is very effective in inducing fermentation, and brewers have not been slow to take advantage of the discovery—the result being that the ale is now so adulterated that it may produce far worse effects than mere muddling of the brain. The deadly poison used in its manufacture has been found in it as sold in the market, and, though the amount of the poisonous ingredient is not large, yet its accumulated effect might, and very probably would, in time be serious to drinkers.

THE Madras High Court has held, recently, that the new provision in the Criminal Procedure Code legalizing the trial of municipal cases by Municipal Commissioners, is not wide enough to bring conservancy cases within the jurisdiction of a Magistrate who is the Chairman or is otherwise connected with executive administration of the civic body at whose instance the prosecution is instituted. This decision of the Madras High Court declares also that the patriarchal procedure adopted by the Court of first instance was altogether illegal. The Magistrate whose order has been set aside proceeded in an arbitrary manner which happily is not usual in the criminal administration of this country. He is the Chairman of the Adoni Municipal Council, and also Deputy Magistrate of Adoni Division, Bellary. While on inspection duty on horseback, he fined, on admission of offences, five persons for nuisances committed. The District Magistrate brought the irregularity to the notice of the High Court, and Messrs. Justices Shephard and Handley recorded the following judgment:—

"The procedure of the Deputy Magistrate in all these cases seems to have been irregular in several respects. In the first place the proceedings were not commenced by any summons to the accused or other formal notice that criminal investigation was about to take place. Chapter XXII of the Code of Criminal Procedure does not appear to intend that proceedings in summary trials shall commence ordinarily otherwise than in other criminal trials either by summons or warrant, indeed section 26 implies the contrary.

Section 263 requires a record of the proceedings to be made by the presiding officer and we think that it is intended that the record shall be made at the time of the trial. Presumably the Deputy Magistrate while seated on his pony could not have kept the record required by section 263 and he states that no clerk accompanied him. The record must therefore have been prepared after the close of the trial from memory or possibly from some rough note. This is not the procedure contemplated by the Code even in summary trials.

The admissions of the accused persons are directed by section 243 to be recorded and this also should be done at once and the words used in the admissions should be stated as nearly as possible. Here again the procedure of the Deputy Magistrate appears to have been defective, for he does not appear to have made any record of the admissions at the time and the record he did ultimately make does not profess to state the words of the admissions and does not show what was admitted. From the record it is impossible to say whether the accused admitted only the acts or omissions with which they were charged or admitted them with all the accompanying circumstances necessary to constitute their acts or omissions offences. This may have led to a most serious miscarriage of justice. In our opinion these errors and irregularities of procedure are sufficiently serious to invalidate the proceedings of the Deputy Magistrate and are not such as we can overlook even to secure the very desirable end of the improvement of the sanitary condition of Adoni.

And there is another fatal objection to these proceedings, viz., that the Deputy Magistrate as Chairman of the Municipal Council was the very person interested in abating the nuisances in respect of which these proceedings were taken and was therefore a Judge in his own cause.

It is true section 555 of the Criminal Procedure Code provides that the mere fact of being a Municipal Commissioner shall not of itself be a disqualification for trying any case, but the Chairman of a Municipality being an Executive Officer who would be the proper person to institute prosecutions for offences against the health or comfort of the town, is a very different person from a mere Municipal Commissioner and is clearly disqualified to try such cases.

For the foregoing reasons we set aside the conviction by the Deputy Magistrate and direct that the cases be commenced de novo and tried according to law by some Magistrate other than the Chairman of the Municipality."

It was to neutralise the decision of the Calcutta High Court in Wood v. The Calcutta Corporation, that the Explanation to section 555 of the Procedure Code was added. Nevertheless, such of the Calcutta Commissioners as happen to be Presidency Magistrates do not even now take up municipal prosecutions. But this restriction is not observed in the mofussil, where it is not easy to find Honorary Magistrates who are not Municipal Commissioners. The Madras High Court sticks to the old doctrine that a man cannot be judge in his own cause, and interprets the departure in the present Code as meaning that a Municipal Commissioner is competent to try municipal cases provided he is altogether unconnected with the proceedings leading to the prosecution. All that the law says is that he is not disqualified by belonging to the body corporate; but his mind must be unprejudiced to enable him to be a judge.

In the B. L. Examination of the Calcutta University, held on the 3rd November 1891, five candidates in the first and forty-five in the second division have been passed. None of the three who went up for the D L. could succeed. The examiners were Mr. A. P. Handley and Baboo Oopender Nath Mitter.

DURING the absence of Sir John Edgar on special duty as President of the Commission appointed to investigate the charge brought against Babu T. N. Mitter, Subordinate Judge, Gya, Mr. H. J. S. Cotton officiates as Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

WHILE there are inspecting officers for every department of Government, it is rather curious that there is no special agency for supervising the management of Wards' Estates.

THE special feature of the St. Andrew's Day in Calcutta this year, was the presence of the Viceroy as guest at the Dinner with which the Scots celebrate the memory of their patron saint. Lord Lansdowne is the second Viceroy and the third Governor-General entertained at the annual poor's feast of the loyal Caledonians. It is a long time since Sir John Shore was a guest at the St. Andrew's Dinner in 1795. In our own time, the first Viceroy to dignify the festive gathering was Lord Dufferin. The late Viceroy accepted the hospitality while about to lay down the reins of office in 1888. Lord Lansdowne is just now in the middle of his career, and some people might be superstitious enough to regard his taking a part in the late festivities as an omen prognosticating the premature termination of his Indian Viceroyalty. But the worldly and matter-of-fact men can afford to laugh at such prophets whoever they may be. The speech made by Lord Lansdowne deserves notice for more reasons than one. As a literary performance, it does not lose anything by comparison with the public deliverances of any of his predecessors. He began by a graceful reference to his personal connection with the native country of his hosts, and by good humouredly giving them every credit that their national vanity claims. But he did not occupy himself by mere sweet nothings. He disavowed having any ambition to be an epochmaker. Nevertheless, we can assure him that his recent utterances will secure for him that distinction, whether he wants it or not. If the native Princes have already a Magna Charta in the Queen's Proclamation, the late Viceregal deliverance will be their Declaration of Rights. It has a political importance in other respects also. But we give its full text elsewhere, and leave it to our readers to form their opinion with regard to it. In concluding our notice of it, we have only to refer to the bit dealt at the cheap philanthropy of home politicians to free India of the Opium demon. The chair was duly maintained by the Hon'ble J. L. Mackay. After the usual layd and royal toasts, he proposed the health of the Viceroy and "the Land we live in," to which Lord Lansdowne replied. The speech accompanying the toast is a clever one which we hope to reproduce in our next. The other toasts were as usual. Of late years, the toast for the Press has dropped off, and there seems no indication to revive it.

REIS & RAYYET.

INDEBTEDNESS OF AGRICULTURISTS.

IN 1875, a series of riots occurred in the districts of Poona, Sholapur and Ahmednuggur in the Presidency of Bombay. The rioters were Marhatta agriculturists who, in order to relieve themselves of their liabilities to their Marwari and Gujrati money lenders, attacked them and burnt their houses and papers. The state of things becoming very serious, Government had recourse to the usual remedy of appointing a Commission to enquire into the causes which embittered the feelings of the rioters against their money lenders and made them desperate. The outcome of that Commission was the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act, XVII of 1879, which is at present in force in the three districts named above and also in Sattara. Among other provisions, it contains one which requires that in all suits for recovery of money lent, or price of goods supplied, where the defendant is an agriculturist, and the amount of the creditor's claim is contested, the Court shall take an account of the amount actually advanced, and shall give a decree for such principal sum together with simple interest at a reasonable rate, the total amount of the interest not exceeding the principal in any case. The Act extends the period of limitation in cases coming under its scope, and also provides :—

- (1) That the Court may at any time direct that the amount of a decree against an agriculturist shall be paid by instalments with or without interest.
- (2) That agriculturists entitled to the special protection of the Act, cannot be arrested in execution of a money decree.
- (3) That their immoveable property cannot be attached or sold in execution of a decree, unless it has been specifically mortgaged for the repayment of the debt to which such decree relates.

The Act of 1879 was amended three times within the first seven years of its promulgation. But, upon the whole, official opinion was at the time in favor of its success. In a despatch dated the 6th November 1884, Lord Kimberly says :—

"It is shown that cultivation has extended in area since the Act became law; that it has not fallen off in quality; that the revenue is realised as punctually as ever; that it has ordinarily been paid from the produce of the land, not by borrowing or by the sacrifice of agricultural stock; and that, in those tracts which have suffered at once from short harvests and from low prices, the people have struggled against the difficulties of the seasons at least as successfully as they did before the Act was passed. It is the opinion also of officers who possess intimate knowledge both of the working of the law and of the condition of the people that the moral effect of the law has been good; that it has encouraged thrift, prudence, and mutual help. Finally, it is confidently stated that the opinion of the rayyets themselves is altogether in favour of the Act; that they have never been more contented than at present; that the people of localities in the vicinity of the four districts desired to be brought under the operation of the Act; and that natives of experience believe that in another ten years the Act will effect a striking improvement in the material condition of the agricultural classes."

The ways of bureaucracy are, however, inscrutable. In spite of the verdict recorded by his predecessor, Lord Cross ordered a fresh investigation in the year 1888. Mr. Woodburn, who was appointed to make the inquiry, submitted his report in April 1889, and we are now told that there is serious difference of opinion on the subject among the members of the Bombay Council. While Mr. Moore is strongly persuaded that the Act is of the greatest benefit to agriculturists, and advocates its retention unchanged, and even its extension to other districts, Sir Raymond West argues, from Mr. Woodburn's facts and figures, that it has not only done no good whatever, but has left the rayyets in a worse position than that in which it found them. Lord Harris is inclined to support the Act in principle with some modifications, and its extension, so modified, to other districts. Opinion being thus divided in the Bombay Council, Lord Lansdowne has ordered further enquiry as to the working of the Act by a special commission to be composed of the following officers :—

Mr. John William Neill, Judicial Commissioner, Central Province, President.

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur Krishnaji L. Nulkar.

Mr. Charles Montgomery Rivaz, Commissioner, Punjab.

Mr. Henry Farrington Evans, Judge, N.-W.P.

Mr. Stephen Hammick, Judge, Bombay Presidency.

Mr. Frederic Styles Philpin Lely, Collector and Magistrate, Bombay Presidency.

Mr. Leslie Alexander Selim Porter, of the Indian Civil Service, Secretary.

From the constitution of the Commission it will appear that the Central Provinces, the N.-W. Provinces, and the Punjab are represented in it, as also Bombay for which it is mainly intended. The reason why it is so constituted and the extent of its scope will appear from the following extract :—

"It has often been pointed out that the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act, though in some of its details specially adapted to the districts where it is in force, in its broad principles embodies an attempt to meet an evil which presses with greater or less urgency in many other parts of India—the growing indebtedness of the agricultural population, and the gradual transfer of proprietary interests in land from the martial and cultivating classes to the trading and money-lending castes of Hindu society. Not only has its operation been watched with interest in other provinces generally; the Government of India have now before them a definite application from the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab for legislation on substantially the same lines for that Province; and the late Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces in November 1889 submitted proposals for the constitution within his jurisdiction of special courts, empowered to go behind the bond, to enquire into the history of transactions, and to reduce unconscionable interest, in the manner provided by Chapter III of the Deccan Act. It is not, therefore, only with the object of deciding whether the Act shall be retained, with or without modification, where it is at present in force, nor even whether it should be extended to other districts in the Bombay Presidency, that the Governor-General in Council seeks the assistance of the Commission. It will be their task also to examine how far the principles which may have approved themselves by experience in the Deccan are capable of extension to other provinces where a similar problem presents itself, and are likely to afford an adequate remedy for the evils which are there complained of. Should the Commissioners be of opinion that the measures embodied in the Deccan Act can only be of temporary effect, and afford no lasting solution of this difficult problem of Indian administration, they should state what other measures, if any, they would recommend for the purpose."

There is no difference of opinion as to the condition of the Indian peasantry being one of abject misery throughout the country. But the true cause of the rayyets' poverty and indebtedness, in spite of the blessings of peace and good government under British rule, is very seldom rightly understood. The following summary of the causes of agricultural indebtedness in the Deccan is given in the report of the Commission appointed in 1875 :—

1. Poverty associated with an unproductive soil, precarious climate, and irregularity in the receipts of income both as to period and as to value.
2. Ignorance and improvidence.
3. Extravagance.
4. Ancestral debt.
5. Expansion of credit associated with the stimulus to agricultural enterprise caused by the Survey Settlement.
6. Increase of population, while the return from land was not increasing.
7. Facilities for borrowing owing to the number of competing money-lenders attracted to the business by the advantages offered to the money-lender by our law and other circumstances.
8. The Limitation Law as leading to renewals on usurious terms.
9. The revenue system of a fixed demand associated with the variations in the seasons."

Some of these circumstances have no doubt an important bearing on the economical condition of the rayyets. But the wretchedness of the Indian peasantry is due chiefly to

- (1) The drain of Home Charges that take away a material part of the capital of the country.
- (2) The depressed condition of our manufacturing industries.
- (3) The consequent enforced idleness of the rayyets and their cattle during the greater part of the year.
- (4) The want of a market for those staples which in the vicinity of large towns command monopoly prices, and which, on account of their perishable nature, cannot be exported to foreign countries.

It is a fundamental principle of the economical science, that industry is always limited by capital. It is also an undeniable fact that, when a material part of the capital of one country is lent to the Government or people of another, it is the laboring classes in the lending country who have to suffer most. As we have to give at least 20 crores of rupees every year to England, without even the hope of any tangible return, it is no wonder that we have very little capital left in the country, and that the share which our laborer gets of what is left is miserably small.

The problem of the rayyet's poverty can be solved only by stopping the drain of Home Charges, and by giving that encouragement to our manufacturing industries, which is possible only if heavy duties be imposed on the import of piecegoods and iron wares for a period of at least thirty years. We know that we can hardly expect so much benevolence from our rulers. Even if they are personally inclined to govern India without taking any undue advantage of her dependent position, they are simply powerless to cope with the influences that are brought to bear on them by the selfishness of English ship owners, cotton spinners, and iron manufacturers. Then, is there no hope for the rayyet? We think our rulers can do a great deal more than they have yet done.

To deprive the Zemindars or the money-lenders of their rights, is easy enough. But usury laws have never been successful, and we do not expect any lasting good from the attempt "to go behind the bond" made by the Act of 1879. The rate of interest can be lowered only by attracting more capital, and this cannot be done by increasing the obstacles in the way of recovering money from debtors. State Banks might do some good if honestly and efficiently administered. But it seems to us that private capital may be attracted to the business to a much larger extent, than it is at present, if Government be content to take less and spend more in connection with the administration of justice. From the figures given in the Resolution under notice, it appears that in Bombay the ratio of uncontested suits was 80 per cent. in 1873-74, and in Bengal 60 per cent. The ad valorem institution fee of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in such cases, is simply out of all proportion to the extent of relief given, and surely Government would not lose anything by reducing the fee in uncontested cases to even one-fourth of its present rate. If the court fee be thus reduced, the money-lenders' business would be much less risky than it is now, and they would be inclined to make advances on easier rates than those now demanded by them. At the present time, it very frequently happens that three, four, five or even half a dozen Munsiffs hold their courts in the same place. If, instead of the present system, the same officers be vested with both civil and criminal powers, and if only one officer be appointed to hold his court in one place, surely by that means also justice might be made less expensive than it is now, and at the same time brought nearer the homes of suitors.

SHAKESPEARE AGAIN AT CALCUTTA.

CALCUTTA is to be congratulated on the windfall of fortune which brought to her shores so accomplished and powerful an actor and so liberal and enterprising a caterer as Mr. George C. Miln. Their meeting was at once ominous and auspicious. It was an unlucky venture for the stranger to bring out an expensive Athenian company to Macedonia or Thrace, if not exactly Bæotia. He was cruelly jilted—woefully deceived. He made every effort and some sacrifices in order to please, but to no purpose. His hopes were wrecked and, with all his genius and the talents at his command and with all his perseverance, he found himself in a fix. Yet, the place is not to be disposed of with summary contempt. There were men enough in it for any decent purpose. And, though they might not understand the legitimate drama, they had money, and, though Scots most of them, could spend for their amusement. The Miln company invited the town to Hamlet and Othello, but the good citizens quietly went to the hippodrome, night after night. He was determined to reclaim these misguided people from vulgar ways. He tried more than one experiment with varied success. In short, he utilised the whole of his inaugural season in ascertaining the peculiarities of the taste of this metropolis. Armed with this knowledge and suitably prepared, he has come back with another force to the attack on Bengal stolidity. That is, surely, like a man and a hero.

It is easy to rail at the foolhardiness of the step. It looks so like the fly repeatedly dashing itself into the burning lamp as often as rescued. But stranger things have happened than success in similar circumstances, and, let us hope, and we for our part pray, that better luck may attend Mr. Miln this time.

In another column will be found Mr. Miln's parting programme at the Courtham. There will be besides two nights of a society drama, three nights devoted to Shakespeare—The Merchant of Venice and Hamlet.

Mr. Miln is no doubt a devoted student and interpreter of Shakespeare. But Mr. Miln is an animal with all the wants of the creature. He requires food and raiment and fifty other things. After the reception of his efforts of last session to interest the public in the great dramatist who is the British pride, all who in this land care for the legitimate drama and the higher culture ought to be personally grateful to Mr. Miln for again venturing on this perilous line of catering. But grateful or not, if they have a proper appreciation of their own selfish interests, they will not fail to make the most of the opportunity offered. Such an opportunity is not likely to occur within a measureable distance of time.

Our appreciation of Mr. Miln's acting we freely expressed in the late Shakespearean season. Mr. Miln's qualifications are of a high order. He is not your Heaven-born actor discovered by an accident. He is a gentleman of education and of considerable knowledge of the world and experience in different spheres. From a successful preacher he gradually made bold to assume his true vocation. And success sealed the step with justification. The mere genius is apt to be destitute of technique. Miln is thorough.

In Calcutta we do not see many good actors, but occasionally a comet surprises us as if it had lost its way. Mrs. Lewis brought tolerably strong companies, while she herself was an accomplished actress. Her Mr. Gill was one of the best in low comedy business. We had another superior actress for a short time in Miss Edith Bertman, a lady who was brought up on the stage under the care of Mr. Sothorn. This lady will be gratefully remembered in this city for her part of Lord Dundreary—a character created by Sothorn literally as well as ironically, and which was welcomed in the United States with eleven hundred performances, and had a run of four hundred and ninety-six consecutive nights at England at a single theatre. Such a feat is not to be had out of the best theatres in London. We ought always to be grateful to the Prince of Wales for allowing Calcutta some acquaintance, however slight, with Charles Mathews. Of interpreters of the Tragic Muse we had occasional visitors like Miss Emily Raynor, Mr. Bindett Howe, &c. Mr. Tetheridge and Herr Bandmann made longer stays or gave more frequent calls. The last named would have still included India in his professional tours, but for the Calcutta reporters who hounded the irascible German out of the country. Mr. Howe laboured under great personal disadvantages, but he was a powerful delineator. Herr Bandmann has a world-wide reputation and, not without desert. At one time perhaps a little too much was made of him, but the fact of a foreigner succeeding so well in representing the greatest English Poet, is truly phenomenal. Tetheridge and Bandmann were our last exponents of Shakespeare.

Now that there is to be next week another opportunity, we hope our readers will not miss it. For our native readers, to see such representations is not only to derive pleasure, not only to derive the profit of elevated thought, but also to receive education in the ordinary sense. The full profit comes after repeated observation of different players. But the sooner our English-speaking gentlemen and ladies begin, the better. As some substitute for their own knowledge, perhaps they would like to read some notes of the acting of our two previous actors taken at the time by a native student of Shakespeare. These will enable them to see Shakespeare at the Corinthian with more advantage.

"Tetheridge is a more efficient player than most of the fellows who have of late years been doing or rather undoing Shakespeare, but he overdoes his part, forgetting therein the very precept which as Hamlet he offers to the actor in the play within the play. He rather mouths and decidedly rants. That, indeed, is the common failing of actors, specially those of the tragic stage. To my mind, Tetheridge is rather too loud.

I remarked his pronunciation of 'obscure' with the accent on the first syllable; 'revenue' as re-vénue. Nuttal has in the first word the accent on the second syllable, and pronounces the second like Tetheridge, while the third word is given both ways.

Like many an actor, he inaudibly hurried through the apostrophe to angels and ministers of grace, &c., without any emphasis.

The ghost scenes, particularly No. 1 and the front stage part of No. 2, were wretched; the back scene could not be murdered even under Calcutta management. We sitting on the second row of the orchestra seats were under evident disadvantage. After Peper's ghost has been imported to Calcutta, such a poor devil as we had was intolerable.

Throughout, they generally mumbled and hurried through the words in a way that would have been Greek to any one unfamiliar with the text."

"Hamlet at the Corinthian last night, 11th January 1882, Lady Ripon attending instead of both herself and husband. Herr Bandmann and Miss Louise Beaudet, as Hamlet and Ophelia, being the attraction. Bandmann pronounced suit in 'customary suits' as suite. In pronouncing the line 'These, but the trappings, and the suits of woe,' he did not point to his person or habiliments.

The fine soliloquy in Act I, scene II, after the exit of King and Queen, which was not well done on the opening Hamlet night of the 31st December last, was not only well spoken yesterday, but the action was suited to the occasion. The overwhelming passion of the opening lines—

O, that this too too solid flesh would melt,
Thaw, and resolve itself into a dew!
Or that the Everlasting had not fixed
His canon 'gainst self-slaughter! O God! O God!

was justly rendered, for the most part sitting. Hamlet was evidently violently agitated within himself. To mark this self communion, the first line was delivered in an audible whisper, the voice rising in 'Thaw, and resolve itself into a dew!' &c., &c. After 'this world,' he advanced two steps and in another and easier tone spoke till 'merely.' Then the voice became graver from 'That it should come to this!' At 'that was, to this,' he pointed to the chair just vacated by the King, of course. 'Nay, not so much, not two' was delivered colloquially. On both nights, specially on the first, he ran through 'Hyperion to a satyr,' neglecting the force of the comparison. On that occasion, as on this, Bandmann, like other actors, I must say, hurried through

That he might not betwixt the winds of heaven
Visit her face too roughly.

emphasising the last word only. In my judgment, the lines should be spoken if rapidly enough, with the emphasis on 'winds.' But what jarred on my ear still more, was the actor's misemphasising of

Than I to Hercules:
but no more like my father,

He laid stress on 'father.' In my view, the stress ought to be laid on 'like.' The way in which

We'll teach you to drink deep ere you depart, was spoken, struck me as out of harmony. The line was delivered loudly and deliberately, in a manner which missed the conscious sarcasm.

—Faintly, thy name is woman!—

was delivered loddly, with the son's hand pointing to the door by which the mother had left. Towards the conclusion of the soliloquy, Hamlet sank into a seat on the other side, across the stage.

'In my mind's eye' was delivered in the ordinary way, almost flippantly. Before Horatio had almost finished he was a goodly King.' Hamlet commenced

He was a man, take him for all in all,
I shall not look upon his like again.

and finished too rapidly for the energy of the sentiment, without emphasis on 'man' or the all's, or 'like' or 'again.' Hamlet resumed his passion when Horatio communicated to him the fact of his having seen the late king 'yesterday night.' Then he got up and advanced close to his friend.

At every time he pronounced 'virtue' with the accent on the second syllable, and altogether he betrayed in the minor passages that Bandmann was a foreigner.

The ghost scene was capitally rendered. Hamlet was thoroughly natural and profoundly impressive in his speech and conduct. The ghost, like most stage ghosts, was poor in the illusion, but he delivered the speech grandly as befitted the spirit of a King, and it was a good device to screen the ghost behind a fretwork in the long distance before he spoke.

At other representations we have seen, Hamlet takes his stand beside the King and Queen in Act II. Bandmann seats himself."

ANOTHER ARITHMETICAL CHARM.

TO THE EDITOR OF "REIS AND RAYYET."

DEAR SIR,

In your issue of 28th instant you have a note on the remarkable characteristics of a certain series of figures. You correctly find out that if these figures be multiplied by any number, other than 7 or a multiple of 7, the same figures will be found in succession. It may be of interest to your readers to have the explanation of this apparent phenomenon. The original succession of figures is 142,857 and this series represents a repeating decimal, say 1 divided by 7. You will find that any repeating decimal has the same properties, and you might add that in this series the respective figures of the first series of three, added to those of the second series of three, will in each case make 9.

• Ex. gra. 142

As an illustration of my remarks you will find the following series of figures possesses the same characteristics.

58823529,41176470

This long series is the repeating decimal 1 divided by 17. It multiplied by any number, other than 17, or a multiple of 17, the figures will be found to come out in the same consecution and the first eight if added to the last eight will yield figures of nine, thus

ST. ANDREW'S DINNER.

LORD LANSDOWNE'S REPLY TO THE TOAST

"THE VICEROY AND THE LAND WE LIVE IN."

His Excellency the Viceroy, who on rising was received with loud and continued cheers, then spoke as follows:—Mr. President & Gentlemen,—One of the most enjoyable moments in the Viceroy's year is that in which after six months of a somewhat monotonous existence within the narrow limits of a hill station, followed by as many weeks of the unrest and rapid travelling which attend his autumn tour, he finds himself once more in sight of the Ochterlony Monument (Cheers). On the present occasion the pleasure of my return to Calcutta is enhanced by the kind welcome which you have given me, and which has been expressed by your Chairman (the Hon. J. L. Mackay, C.I.E.) in terms, I am afraid, somewhat coloured by a personal friendship which I am very proud to possess (Hear, hear, and cheers).

Speakers at Scotch gatherings are usually at considerable pains to prove to their hearers that they are themselves Scotch, or of Scotch extraction, however much the Glenlivet may have been diluted by admixture with less generous fluids. I believe, Mr. President, that I should not find much difficulty in demonstrating to your satisfaction that I have a good right to be counted one of yourselves (Cheers and laughter). I can, at any rate, say without affectation that there are no ties of blood which I value more than those which bind me to Scotland; that no hours have been happier than those which I have spent in the Scotch home of our family; and no friends truer or better beloved than those which Scotland has given me (Cheers).

Another favourite thesis upon these occasions is that the affairs of the world would have come to a stop long ago but for the part taken in their management by your fellow-countrymen.

That doctrine is one to which, within reasonable limits, I am perfectly ready to subscribe, and, if it holds good anywhere, it certainly holds good in India. It would be an interesting task to consider the effect upon the history of India which might have been produced if the Scotch ingredient had been withdrawn from among those who had the making of "the land we live in." To pursue such an inquiry into the regions of history would carry me altogether beyond the limits of an after-dinner speech. Moreover, it would probably be difficult to make researches in this direction, even if they were limited to the present day, without giving offence to the susceptibilities of those who have had the misfortune to be born in less favoured parts of the British Islands. (Cheers and laughter).

If, however, I do not pursue the subject further in so far as India is concerned, I cannot resist saying, in support of our theory, one word as to the immense services which Scotchmen have rendered in another part of the Empire (Hear, hear). I mean the great Dominion of Canada, in which I had the honor of representing Her Majesty for five years. The federation of the British North American Provinces took place in 1867, and during 19 out of the 24 years which have since passed by, it was a Scotchman, the late Sir John A. Macdonald (loud cheers), who, by the force of his character, by the courage of his patriotism, and his brilliant qualities as a statesman held together the scattered sections of the Dominion, and controlled the centrifugal forces which undoubtedly increased the difficulty of his task; it is a singular thing that during the remaining five years the Premiership was held by another Scotchman, the Hon'ble Alexander Mackenzie, a man of humble origin, for I believe he was the son of a stone mason in the little village of Logierait, whose simplicity of character, incorruptible honesty, and single-mindedness secured for him, both in and out of office, the deep respect even of those who differed from him politically (Cheers).

Gentlemen, the national work, of which, above all others, the people of Canada are proud, and which was completed during my term of office, was the great line of railway which now connects the Eastern and Western seaboard of British North America, and affords an alternative route from England to the East,—a work without which the federation of the Dominion would have been impossible, and which was carried out in the face of great political difficulties and in spite of physical obstacles of the most formidable kind. Gentlemen, that great railway was the work of Scotchmen, of George Stephen, Banffshire man, who was, at the outset of his career, unblest by any adventitious aids from fortune, while his colleagues were men whose names—Donald Smith, Angus, Macintyre—point unmistakably to the country of their origin (Hear, hear and cheers).

Mr. President, when I had the pleasure of accepting your invitation, I did so with one misgiving only. I felt that it would be impossible for me, amidst the disturbing conditions of an autumn tour, to arm myself with anything like a suitable reply to the toast which you have just so kindly drunk. It was indeed suggested to me that the occasion would be an appropriate one for an "epoch-making" speech. I am not at all sure that it is desirable to indulge too freely in the manufacture of epochs, and, at any rate, I am not prepared to attempt to produce anything half so indigestible to-night (Hear, hear and cheers). I was tempted at one moment to offer you a few reminiscences of my recently concluded tour, but what I have said just now about Canada reminds me of an episode in my Canadian experience which does not encourage me to talk to you about my tour. I had completed a somewhat protracted voyage over the far Western portions of the Dominion. On my return I was hospitably entertained by the citizens of a wellknown town, and I took upon myself to give them a short account of some of the wonders which it had been my good fortune to see during the course of my peregrinations. My speech was, I am thankful to say, very indulgently received, and I was rather pleased with it (laughter), but my satisfaction was not a little marred by an observation which was made to me by a candid friend soon after the entertainment. He confided to me that my speech owed its success mainly to the fact that one of my predecessors had visited the same place a few years before, and had delivered an oration which had lasted for no less than three hours, while my speech had lasted for less than 40 minutes. My hearers were surprised at my moderation, and were grateful to me. I accepted the hint as a warning against indulging in post-prandial geographical lectures (Laughter).

I should, however, like to say a very few words with regard to the tour which I have just completed. It took me to no less than four Native States, all of them more or less important, and I should be wanting in fairness to the Rulers and the people of these States if I did not bear testimony to the cordial spirit in which I was received and to the loyalty which, I believe, prevails within them (Cheers).

I found in Gwalior a young Chief of very great promise, and likely, I hope, one day to preside with distinguished success over the destinies of the State, the affairs of which have, during his minority, been faithfully and skilfully administered by the State Council. Its finances are in good order; it has been able to spend liberally upon Public Works, as well as upon Education, the Administration of Justice, and other useful public objects (Hear, hear).

In Bhopal I had the pleasure of making the acquaintance of Her Highness the Begum, a lady who had already impressed me by her shrewdness and sagacity, the traditions of whose State are thoroughly loyal, who is herself the firm friend of the British Government, and whose courteous reception of me at a time when she is still feeling the effects of a heavy domestic affliction I shall not readily forget (Loud cheers).

At Indore I found His Highness the Maharaja Holkar taking a personal part in the administration of his State, and interesting himself actively in the diffusion of knowledge amongst his subjects (Hear, hear).

My longest visit was that which I paid to the State of Kashmir. And, gentlemen, I must express the pleasure which it gave me, after a very careful enquiry into its affairs, to be able to invite His Highness the Maharaja once more to take a part in the government of the State, of which we have never ceased to regard him as the legitimate Ruler. During his temporary withdrawal from the government, the State Council, ably presided over by Rajah Amar Singh, and assisted by the British officer whom we have lent to the State, has laid the foundation for a sound system of financial administration, and has introduced improvements which will, I believe, in time, effect a transformation in the position of the cultivators and secure the removal of most of the abuses which had previously disfigured the State (Hear, hear and cheers).

I dwell upon these facts, because I regard it as a matter of first rate importance that the States in subordinate alliance with Her Majesty should be governed in such a manner that we need have no scruple in preserving for them the measure of independence which they at present enjoy. Not only would it be an act of injustice to deprive them of the privileges of self-government to which they are entitled, but it would, I am convinced, be a distinct misfortune to the Empire if these interesting remnants of indigenous rule were to be entirely effaced. They may not all of them be governed entirely in accordance with our ideas of good government, but it is a question whether, in spite of this, they do not, from their point of view, prefer to remain under their own Rulers, even if they are denied some of the administrative luxuries which we provide for the people of British India. Be this as it may, the territory directly under the Government of India is already so large, and our tendency to govern it in accordance with uniform principles, and according to stereotyped methods of administration, is so strong, that, from our point of view, I should regard with unfeigned regret any events which might force us to assume responsibility for any part of the large areas at present governed by Indian Chiefs and Rulers (Hear, hear). It is instructive both for the natives of this country and for Europeans, that the two kinds of government should be in force side by side, and in the full view of public opinion. We are all of us fond of dwelling upon the necessity of decentralising our administration, and, considering all the circumstances of India, I doubt whether there is any form of decentralisation more useful than that which leaves the domestic affairs of a large portion of the country to the management of its own people (Hear, hear).

But I must not forget that I am replying not only for the toast of my own health, but for that of the land we live in. Most of us will probably be content to accept the description which the Chairman gave of it when he told us that it was "not a bad place on the whole," and it certainly looks very pleasant to me this evening. But I think he hit the mark when he pointed out to us that its principal imperfection lay in the fact that it was, above all things, a land of great and sudden vicissitudes,—a land in which we can never tell to-day what to-morrow has in store for us. From the poor rayyet who sees his scanty crop swept off the face of the earth in a few hours by a swarm of locusts, to the Financial Member of Council, who sees his hopes of a surplus suddenly wrecked by agencies over which he has no control, we are all of us liable to see our "cloud-built castles and our golden dreams" shattered and dissipated by visitations as unlooked-for as they are overwhelming. However fair the prospect may be, India never ceases to be conscious that the gaunt spectre of war, want, and insolvency are hovering in the distance and ready to swoop down upon us at any moment (Cheers). Their unwelcome presence is one of the conditions under which we exist, and we must not regard it in a querulous or despondent spirit. We may find some crumbs of comfort in the reflection that it would not be difficult to point to other countries in which the prospects of peace are more precarious, and the consequences of famine even more terrible, than they are in India. The business of the Government of India is not to wring its hands, but to be forewarned and forearmed, ready for the emergency whenever it comes, and from whatever quarter (Loud cheers).

We are at this moment, I regret to say, confronted with the prospect of serious scarcity in several parts of the Empire, and our thoughts travel from this cheerful scene to regions in which distress and grave anxiety for the future must prevail for some time to come.

In portions of Rajputana, and more especially in that part of it which is under the Government of India, of Madras, and of Burma, the outlook is, I grieve to say, a very gloomy one. The same may be said of the Hyderabad State and of the eastern parts of the Bombay Deccan, and there are some districts in this Province in which everything depends upon the climatic conditions of the next few weeks. We may console ourselves by the reflection that we are better equipped than we ever were to meet the danger. Our intelligence is more timely, our means of supplying relief more adequate, than they were (Hear, hear).

It may interest my hearers to know that, taking the whole of the affected areas, the total number in receipt of State relief, either in the shape of work or charity, is at present under 60,000 (Hear, hear). The smallness of these numbers will be appreciated when it is remembered that they were considerably exceeded in the Ganjam District alone during the scarcity of 1889, and I may add that, although there has been great mortality amongst cattle, the loss of human life properly attributable to scarcity has, I am glad to say, up to the present time been insignificant (Hear, hear).

The measures adopted by the Local Governments have been well considered and vigorous, and I am glad to have this opportunity of placing on record my appreciation of the valuable exertions made by the authorities in the threatened districts, and more especially by Sir Alexander Mackenzie in Burma (Cheers), and by my friend Lord Wenlock, whom we shall have the pleasure of welcoming to Calcutta almost immediately, and whose personal solicitude for the welfare of the people of his Presidency at one time led him to run a serious risk to his own health (Loud cheers).

I am not surprised that my hon'ble friend should have called attention to the startling revelations of the last census. They do indeed afford food for reflection, some of it not of an altogether comfortable kind. We may perhaps draw two conclusions from them. The marvellous increase of the population, upon the one hand, proves to demonstration the success with which our system of government has combated those agencies which in former days imposed some check upon the multiplication of the people of India. The second conclusion which we shall probably draw is that it becomes every day more and more the duty of the Government of India to seek for some means of relieving the pressure of the population upon the means of subsistence by bringing new tracts under cultivation either by means of irrigation, or by improving the means of access to them, and by encouraging the occupants of the most densely inhabited districts to transfer themselves to those which are at present but sparsely occupied (Hear, hear). These important problems are, I am able to assure you, engaging our earnest attention (Cheers).

As to the spectre of war, we may, I hope, say confidently that there is but little prospect of strife within our own borders (Cheers). Not only is the surface smooth, but the great mass of the people are probably convinced that their prosperity is closely bound up with the peace which we have been able to secure for them, and that they will be the greatest losers if that peace should be disturbed (Cheers).

As for aggression from without, all that we can say is that the maintenance of peace does not depend upon our action here, but upon events occurring in other parts of the world, and over which we have no control. If that peace is broken, it will certainly not be in consequence of any acts of aggression, or of any desire for territorial aggrandisement, on our part (Hear, hear). Here too we may find consolation in the thought that we were never stronger for the purpose of resisting attack from without than we are at the present time, and, in view of this fact, I hope my friend, the President, will not grudge us that expenditure upon the country's defences to which he has referred, and which we shall, I devoutly hope, ultimately be able to curtail (Cheers).

But, gentlemen, there is another kind of warfare which does not come within either of the categories which I have mentioned, and with which we are, unfortunately, but too familiar in India. I refer to those little wars upon our frontiers of which, within the year which is about to end, we have unfortunately had no less than three upon our hands. With a land frontier of some five thousand miles, a great part of which is occupied by predatory and uncivilized tribes, complications of this sort are unhappily inevitable, and we cannot expect entire immunity from them. But I can assure you that upon no Government of India have these minor quarrels been more reluctantly forced than upon that of which I have the honor to be the head. My colleagues and I have fully realised the strain which they occasion to our resources, and the fact that their results are often scarcely commensurate with the trouble and the cost which they involve. The only point upon which I venture to insist is that, if disagreeable work of this kind has to be done, we should do it thoroughly (Loud cheers). The three little wars which we have had to wage during 1891 have been brought to a deliberate and satisfactory conclusion. None of them could, I believe, have been avoided without a serious blow to our credit and name (Cheers).

Mr. President, just as the maintenance of international peace depends upon the course of events in other parts of the world, so the maintenance of our financial equilibrium depends to a great extent, not upon ourselves, but upon the vagaries of Washington and Westminster (Cheers and Laughter). The triumph of the gentlemen, who are, I believe, known as the "gold bugs" in the one place, or of the extreme anti-opium party in the other, may at any moment not only destroy the prospect of a surplus, but may render it extremely difficult to maintain an equilibrium between revenue and expenditure. A few months ago we were basking in the sunshine of a one-and-nine penny rupee. My hon'ble friend, Sir David Barbour, very properly declined to be tempted into extravagances on the strength of this windfall, and the "kittle" coin has already been degraded to its former low estate. As for Opium, our danger seems to me to lie in the extraordinary misapprehensions which prevail as to the attitude of the Government of India in regard to this much vexed question. We have lately, as the President has told you, addressed the Secretary of State in an important Despatch dealing with a part of the subject—a Despatch which will, I hope, convince some of our critics that nothing is further from our intentions than to push the sale of opium for revenue purposes; that the alleged increase of consumption has been much exaggerated; and that where it exists it is to be explained by the increase of the population, and by the fact that, owing to greater vigilance on the part of our officers, the legitimate consumption of the drug has increased at the expense of the illicit traffic which prevails in many parts of India. Whether a moderate use of the drug is worse than a moderate use of the national beverage of which the President has spoken so affectionately (laughter), I will not now enquire, but of this I am persuaded that, if we were to be deprived, by a stroke of the pen, of our Opium revenue to-morrow, the consumption of the drug would continue in spite of us, and that it is as much beyond our power to put an end to the use of opium in China and in India as it would, I believe, be beyond the power of the friends of temperance in England to put an absolute stop to the consumption of intoxicating liquors in that country. The question is one which requires to be dealt with in a reasonable and judicial spirit (hear, hear), and I need scarcely add that the Government of India are ready to accept any useful suggestions which may be made by those who approach it in such a spirit for the removal of the undoubted abuses which attend the immoderate use of the drug. The Despatch to which I have referred contains proposals which, I think, to satisfy our critics of the bona fide of our intentions in this respect (Hear, hear).

If a reasonable view of the question prevails, I believe that, thanks to the elasticity of our revenue, we need not, even with the rupee at 1s. 4d., despair of making both ends meet without adding to the burdens of the tax-payer (cheers). But then my hon'ble friend is not content with an equilibrium on the basis of existing taxation. He has kindly told us that he does not propose to invite a discussion of his particular complaint on such a joyous occasion as the present, but I must be allowed to assure him that I entirely agree with him, both as an Income-Tax payer on an income which no amount of watchfulness on my part can possibly conceal from the vigilant eye of the tax collector (cheers and laughter), and as one who has considered these questions as matters of principle, in thinking that a direct tax on incomes is an impost which is open to a great many objections (Loud and continued cheers). But then, I am bound to add that so also is the increased tax upon salt (hear, hear) which we have been lately obliged to require from the poorest class of the community, while the same might be said of the duty upon rice, against which I have heard my friend, Mr. Steel, argue from his place in Council, with convincing force. I am afraid, therefore, that all the comfort which I can give my hon'ble friend is to assure him that, whenever we arrive at the blissful moment for considering what remissions of taxation we shall propose, the earnest protest which, upon this and upon other occasions, he has recorded against the Income-Tax shall be carefully weighed (Cheers).

But, Gentlemen, I have detained you too long, and I must bring these desultory observations to a close. You have been good enough to drink to my health. My friend Dr. Fenn assures me that I never was better in my health: it will be greatly invigorated by the tonic which you have administered to me this evening. My health is, however, a very small matter compared with that other health which you couple with mine. As to the health of the land we live in, I hardly like to issue an official bulletin. I am not her only doctor, and my diagnosis might perhaps not be accepted by the rival practitioners. If, however, you ask me for an opinion, I should be disposed to say that the patient, in spite of the administration of remedies not always consistent or appropriate, has such a sound constitution that she will survive the ailments from which she occasionally suffers, as well as the somewhat fanciful and unorthodox treatment to which she sometimes has to submit, if only her doctors will not quarrel too much among themselves and will be content to work with all their might and main, not for their own advancement or glorification, but for her welfare (Loud and continued cheers).

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

A BRIDAL MELODY.

She stood, like an angel just wandered from heaven,
A pilgrim benighted away from the skies,
And little we deemed that to mortals were given
Such visions of beauty as came from her eyes.

She looked up and smiled on the many glad faces,
The friends of her childhood who stood by her side ;
But she shone o'er them all, like a queen of the Graces,
When blushing she whispered the vow of a bride.

We sang an old song, as with garlands we crowned her,
And each left a kiss on her delicate brow ;
And we prayed that a blessing might ever surround her,
And the future of life be unclouded as now.

LOVE NEVER SLEEPS.

Love never sleeps ! The mother's eye
Bends o'er her dying infant's bed ;
And as she marks the moments fly,
When death creeps on with noiseless tread,
Faint and distressed she sits and weeps,
With beating heart. Love never sleeps.

Yet e'en that sad and fragile form,
Forgets the tumults of her breast ;
Despite the horrors of the storm,
O'erburdened nature sinks to rest ;
But o'er them both another keeps
His midnight watch. Love never sleeps.

Around—above—the angel bands
Stoop o'er the careworn sons of men .
With pitying eyes and eager hands
They raise the soul to hope again.
Free as the air their pity sweeps
The storm of Time ! Love never sleeps

Around—beneath—and over all,
O'er men and angels, earth and heaven,
A higher bends ! the slightest call
Is answered, and relief is given,
In hours of woe, when sorrow sleeps
The heart in pain. HE never sleeps.

LINES ON LIFE.

Joy comes and goes ; hope ebbs and flows,
Like the wave,
Change doth unknit the tranquil strength of men,
Love lends life a little grace,
A few sad smiles ; and then,
Both are laid in one cold place,
In the grave.

Dreams dawn and fly ; friends smile and die,
Like spring flowers.
Our vaunted life is one long funeral.
Men dig graves, with bitter tears,
For their dead hopes ; and all,
Mazed with doubts, and sick with fears,
Count the hours.

We count the hours ; these dreams of ours
False and hollow,
Shall we go hence and find they are not dead !
Joys we dimly apprehend,
Faces that smiled and fled,
Hopes born here and born to end ;
Shall we follow ?

ON A PAIR OF ANTLERS, BROUGHT FROM GERMANY

Gift from the land of song and wine,
Can I forget the enchanted day,
When first along the glorious Rhine
I heard the huntsman's bugle play,
And marked the early star that dwells
Among the cliffs of Drachenfels ?

Again the isles of beauty rise ; —
Again the crumbling tower appears,
That stands, defying stormy skies,
With memories of a thousand years ;
And dark old forests wave again,
And shadows crowd the dusky plain

They brought the gift that I might bear
The music of the roaring pine, —
To fill again my charmed ear
With echoes of the Rodenstein,
With echoes of the silver horn,
Across the wailing waters borne.

Trophies of spoil ! henceforth your place
Is in this quiet home of mine ; —
Farewell the busy, bloody chase,
Mute emblems now of " auld lang syne,"
When Youth and Hope went hand in hand
To roam the dear old German land.

Holloway's Pills.—For the cure of debility, bile, liver and stomach complaints this inappreciable medicine is so well known in every part of the world, and the cures performed by its use are so wonderful, that it now stands pre-eminent above all other remedies, more particularly for the cure of bilious and liver complaints, disorders of the stomach, dropsy, and debilitated constitution. In these diseases the beneficial effects of the Pills are so permanent that the whole system is renewed, the organs of digestion strengthened, and a free respiration promoted. They expel from the secretory organs and the circulation the morbid matter which produces inflammation, pain, fever, debility, and physical decay—thus annihilating, by their purifying properties, the virulence of the most painful and devastating diseases.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

FROM the official reports it appears that rice is selling in some of the districts of the Madras Presidency at 7lbs and 8lbs the rupee. This is certainly more than famine price. In the worst of Bengal famines, within our remembrance, the price of rice was never more than 10lbs to the rupee. In the present state of things in Southern India, comprehensive measures of State relief are needed immediately, and the sooner the arrangements are made the better.

THE days of gun-powder are numbered. The black instrument of death which has been, for centuries the terror of not only men but of almost the entire animated creation, is at last about to be superseded by a white parvenu put forward by the might of modern science. There were other pretenders in the field of late years, but none of them could succeed in establishing their claim to take the place which they aspired to, and gunpowder maintained its ground against them successfully. It will, however, have to yield before long to the new explosive which has the recommendation of being smokeless and at the same time more potent. We are told that arrangements have been already made for the manufacture of the latter in the Government Factory at Kukee, in the Bombay Presidency.

THE primeval lathi has, it seems, at last secured a footing in the favor of our British rulers. We are told that in order to prevent such riots as those that occurred at Sham Bazar in last May, the rank and file of the native police in Calcutta are to be armed with the handy bamboo stick which may be had almost for nothing and which, in close quarters, is perhaps even more effective than Snider rifles and Martini Hemis.

THE young Maharaja of Benares who recently performed at Muttra the ceremony of having himself weighed against gold and other metals, has decided to make over a portion of the same, amounting in value to rupees thirty thousand, to the use of the Middle School at Komh in the family domains. It is intended to raise the Middle to a High School for the benefit of Brahman students. It is a departure from the accustomed methods of distribution of the consecrated gold. But he keeps to the religious object of the ceremony. It is doubtful, however, whether the priests and Brahmans who expected a share in it, will appreciate the diversion, though for their own ultimate benefit.

THE Raja of Manda offered to bear for 3 years the cost of a medal awardable by the Allahabad University. The Syndicate, while thanking the Raja for the liberal offer, declined it as it was contrary to the principles of the University to award medals for a limited number of years.

THE archaeological Prince Galitzin dined with the Highlanders at Rawal Pind on St. Andrew's Day, and is at present at Lahore. With regard to his future movements, it is said that he will go to Mian Mir to visit the Commander-in-Chief, and afterwards to the Abgar Camp of Exercise. Having seen something of the military manoeuvres there, he will then visit Amritsar, Delhi, Agra and Benares, arriving in Calcutta about the time of the New Year's day. This does not look exactly like the programme of an archaeologist and a Buddhist scholar.

AT the General Hospital, Birmingham, on the 24th October, a middle aged woman from Walsall was operated upon in order to have a horn, like that of a ram, removed from her head. It was a hard excrescence, extending in curves from the top of the forehead and over the skull to the nape of the neck, its length being eight or nine inches. The first appearance of the protusion was about six years ago, when a hard substance, which the woman thought to be a wart, made its appearance on her forehead. Although it gradually increased in size, she felt no pain. To hide it from observation, she combed her hair over it and wore a thick woollen net.

THE Czar and the Czarina celebrated their silver wedding on November 9. There were thanksgiving services at St. Petersburg. At Lavidia, a special service was held in the palace chapel which was attended by the members of the Imperial family and the Emperor's distinguished guests. It was followed by a grand gala breakfast at the palace.

All the members of the Royal and Imperial party were present with their respective suites. The occasion was marked by numerous addresses and presents—poems and musical compositions. The festivities were not confined to the Russian capital. Other parts of the Empire as well as Berlin, Vienna, Paris and other places also celebrated the wedding.

THE Commander-in-Chief in India condemned the Polo as an expensive game. The Board of Visitors too discourage it at the Military College, Sandhurst. In their Report to the Secretary of State for War, they recommend that the game should be strictly forbidden at the College. They say that to encourage its practice at Sandhurst is to teach the cadets how to be extravagant—a lesson the young officer does not as a rule require any assistance in learning.

A VERY useful invention of the day is a nailless horse-shoe. It is fastened on the hoof from the top by a steel band which runs round the upper part of the hoof and passes through slots at the heel of the shoe. From this band comes one or more auxiliary bands which run at right angles to the top one, and are made secure to the upper band and to the shoe.

SIR Auckland Colvin has selected a Bengali—Baboo Ram Kali Chowdhuri—to succeed the deceased Bengali Baboo Bireswar Mitter in the Legislative Council of the North-West Provinces and Oudh.

THE Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal completed his Behar tour last week, returning to Calcutta on Saturday, the 5th December.

IT is said that the Lieutenant-Governor intends making an extended tour in Orissa during January. His programme is to go by sea to Pooree, and work up. The settlement operations now in progress will receive particular attention.

SIR Charles Elliott has sanctioned a scheme for rain-making experiments in Behar. About 300lbs of dynamite has been sent to Mr. Lee, Executive Engineer, Gandack Division, who, under Mr. Adling, Superintending Engineer, Sone canals, will carry out the operations.

MR. P. Nolan having been sent out of the Secretariat, Mr. C. E. Buckland has been confirmed as Secretary to the Bengal Government in the General, Revenue and Statistical Departments.

MR. C. C. Stevens, Commissioner, Patna Division, on leave, has been appointed the Junior Member of the Board of Revenue in place of Mr. A. Smith about to retire.

THE choice of next Sheriff for Calcutta has fallen on the Hon'ble J. L. Mackay, C. I. E., President of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce. The post is now honorary, but the Sheriff still retains the privilege of appointing his Deputy who draws a fixed allowance.

THE Graving Dock at Kidderpore is intended principally for the painting and cleaning of vessels and the execution of very slight repairs. In special circumstances only, its use for heavy repairs will be allowed. The capacity of the dock is—length on blocks, 520 feet; width at entrance, 67 feet and least depth on blocks, 23 feet. The Port Commissioners disavow any intention of making any of these repairs. Owners, Agents or Masters are left free to make their own arrangements for the execution of the work. No commission or other fees will be charged by the Port Commissioners on stores brought either by land or water into the Dock for cleaning, painting or repairing. The Commissioners charges for use of the Dock have been sanctioned as under. They include removal of vessels from Graving Dock entrance into Graving Dock and back, docking, pumping, shoring, and undocking, as also the use of stages and stage-ropes for cleaning and painting :—

For the first 24 hours with a minimum of Rs. 600 ...	Rs. A. P.	0	8	0	per ton gross tonnage.
For the second 24 hours or part thereof ...		100	0	0
For the third 24 hours or part thereof ...		200	0	0

and for every period of 24 hours or part thereof that a vessel remains in dock in excess of 72 hours, the charge of Rs. 200 will be repeated; provided that, if the Dock be required for another vessel, a vessel that has already occupied it for 72 hours must immediately vacate or pay

8 annas per ton gross tonnage with a minimum charge of Rs. 600 a vessel for every 24 hours or part thereof that she remains in occupation. For night work Rs. 100 a night, or part thereof, will be charged extra for work done in connection with the docking or undocking of vessels.

A vessel engaging the Dock and not using it will be charged Rs. 300.

At the last M. A. Examination of the Calcutta University, 50 candidates have been successful, namely,

In Mental and Moral Philosophy 8.—II. 1, III. 7.

In Mathematics 3.—III. 3.

In Natural and Physical Science (B). 4.—I. 2, II. 2.

The Agra College stands first in English, the Free Church of Scotland's Institution and Duff College in History, the Hughli College in Mental and Moral Philosophy. The passed candidates in Sanskrit are all from the Sanskrit College, with the exception of a Private Student. The Arabic candidate comes from M. A. O. College. The Presidency College sent up all who have been successful in Mathematics, Persian and Natural Science.

THE Times' Indian correspondent having telegraphed "The Viceroy Sir Frederick Roberts, and Lieutenant-General Brackenbury, Military Member of Council, have all recommended Sir George White as the next Commander-in-Chief," The Army and Navy Gazette writes:—

"The only thing against Sir George would appear to be his want of due seniority. He was specially selected for the rank of Major-General, July 1, 1887, in recognition of distinguished service in the field, being still supernumerary of his rank. The Commanders-in-Chief of Madras and Bombay are, however, both substantive Lieutenant-Generals, and General White's seniors as General officers by many years. It would be an anomaly certainly to have a Major-General in supreme command with senior officers filling subordinate commands under him, and it is difficult to see how the complication of such an arrangement can be overcome."

THE review of Marshal von Moltke's History of the War of 1870, contributed to the last number of the United Service Magazine, by Lord Wolseley, concludes with the following observations on the dream of "world's federation" and of the millennium, when war and bloodshed will be things of the past:—

"Von Moltke was no believer in a reign of universal peace in this world of ours as it is still constituted. At one time there were many good people who devoted time and money to the duty of warning England that the end of the world was close at hand. That mania has been replaced by a craze to make all civilised nations believe that war will very soon cease for ever to trouble the world. This craze is by no means new. Occasionally forgotten for long periods it reappears and reasserts itself as an old friend in some new guise. Now and then the earth is convulsed by the dire struggle between contending kingdoms; but though it may cause a few to fall off from this innocent and childlike faith, the religion—for such it is—does not die out. No amount of wars can eradicate it, though all nature is ever at war, and the greater part of animal life is fed by slaughter."

MRS. Grimwood indignantly gives denial to the Pretty Fair's story that she contemplates a second marriage during the present year. But she does not say that she will not marry again.

THE following list of articles, together with the names of the places where they may be had, is being circulated:—

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE Viceroy's Levée, as announced, came off on the night of Saturday last, and the Drawing Room on that of Thursday following.

The gentlemen whose names have appeared in connection with the Levée numbered

Private Entree	...	101	-Europeans 79, Natives	...	22
Public Entree	...	856	-Europeans 651, Natives	...	205
New Presentations	...	175	-Europeans 137, Natives	...	38
Unavoidably Absent	...	380	-Europeans 250, Natives	...	130

Thus the Europeans far outnumbered the Natives. The number of Europeans who sent in their cards but could not attend, was larger than the Natives who could be present. The European New Presentations were more than three times the Native Presentations. Under all the four heads, the proportion of Europeans to Natives was about three to one. The natives under all the heads could not come up to the Europeans under the one head of Public Entree. The grand total of the different numbers is 1518 and the number actually present 1132. Some native names are, indeed, mixed up with the European, but they are so few that they cannot be of any moment in considering the relativity of the two sections as represented in those official lists. Among the Natives, we noticed a boy not older than 12 years, who was arrested in his march up and down, but allowed to pass. How he performed the March Past, we could not know. He was, like many others, shabbily dressed.

In the Drawing Room, 46 ladies with the privilege of Private, and 144 with that of Public, Entree, attended. The New Presentations numbered 86. The Unavoidably Absent List is not yet out. Excepting a Burmese, no Native lady was present.

ON Tuesday, Lord Linsdowne unveiled the statue of Lord Dufferin. Notwithstanding the notification of the Military Secretary to the Viceroy giving the programme of the afternoon, and the Police Commissioner's notice regulating the traffic on the roads, published the same morning, the day's ceremony was more a private than a public business. The Executive Committee represented the Memorial Committee and the subscribers to the fund. Nor were the subscribers asked to be present. Such as were hardy enough to thrust their presence, had to suffer for their boldness. The Police notification only spoke of reserved chairs for ladies, there were other chairs besides, but very few gentlemen to occupy them. We reproduce elsewhere the speech of the Viceroy on the occasion.

IN regard to the forthcoming honours list on January 1st, it is stated that there are three vacancies in the list of K. C. S. P's and four in that of the C. S. P's. There are no vacancies in the K. C. I. E's, as one extra has to be absorbed. The usual number of C. I. E's to be allotted is twenty, and vacancies caused by promotion may be filled up in addition.

THE Amir of Kabul has issued a proclamation forbidding lavish expenditure on funerals. Here, in India, we all deplore the undue extravagance, to which on occasions of marriage and shradh, our countrymen are very often led by their own vanity, or by the immemorial routine of our society. Yet, we would neither tolerate state interference nor make any attempt by collective exertion to check the evil. The press is positively encouraging it by its reports of shradhs and marriages in high life. It is easy enough to lavish compliments on the Rajas and Maharajas for the lacs spent by them, on such occasions, in alms to the poor and in fire-works and feasts. But the Indian journalists who secure the favor of the aristocracy in this way, seem to be quite unconscious of the amount of mischief which they abet and facilitate.

LIKE every other religious system, our own creed recommends charitable gifts to the poor, and for the encouragement of learning. But our Shasters strongly condemn the squandering of the corpus of the family estate, so as to deprive the members of the means of their maintenance. Wasting paternal heritage is declared to be such a mortal sin by our religious teachers, that when the late Maharaja Sib Chandra of Nuddea failed to prevent the sale of one of his Zemindaris for arrears of revenue, in the early days of British rule, he fasted for three days in order to expiate the sin. The Rajas, Maharajas, and Babus who, in order to celebrate a shradh or marriage or to secure a title, mortgage their paternal estate and are eventually ruined for ever, are not the persons who deserve to be praised by the press. It may be that some of them are determined to fall victims to the tricks of wily priests and courtiers and can by no means be made to listen to disinterested advice. But the organs of public opinion can, under no circumstances, be justified in encouraging them in their career of ruin, by speaking of their conduct in terms of approbation.

THE Pioneer observes :

"The following extraordinary announcement, relative to the Land Indebtedness Commission, appears in the Times: 'The Governor of the North-West Provinces has nominated Mr. Evans as member of the Commission for the Punjab, Rivaz, and Bombay, but has not yet nominated a member for Bengal.' To transform Sir Auckland Colvin into a Governor, and make him supervise affairs in the Punjab and of Bengal, and to metamorphose Mr. Rivaz into an Indian province, is a feat famous even for so great a personage as the Sub-Editor of our contemporary, that great London thunderer—the Times."

The Pioneer itself is a provincial little Thunderer, and out of fellow-feeling lets off the old Zeus of Printing House Square gently. To us at any rate, our Allahabad contemporary's notice appears not only inadequate but simply evasive. To say of a piece of colossal stupidity that it is a feat famous even for so great a personage as the Sub-Editor of the Times, is to flatter away a great opportunity for an impressive homily or a good joke. To transform Sir Auckland Colvin into a Governor, is no great sin. Men at a distance are not familiar with administrative niceties, and even men on the spot are wont in common parlance to ignore them. Lieutenant-Governors are spoken of as Governors without offence, and the Presidency Governors may, without impropriety, be called Lieutenants of the Viceroy. The enormity of the example before us is in the addition of a name to Geography and the Gazetteer. The Times actually creates an Indian Province and calls it after a favorite official. Above all, the great journal openly allows the chief of one Province authority to meddle in all.

The Times is a gigantic enterprise, conducted on the most liberal principles, its arrangements as perfect as attainable. Yet it is by no means above the liabilities of our nature. It is indeed more than ordinarily frail. A clever new journal the Saturday Review put the point beyond dispute. That paper from its commencement paid unusual attention to the leading journal. It pointed out its daily laches and its researches established a periodicity in the frailty of the great daily. This infirmity has added a word to the dictionary, and we are indebted to the Saturday for the "silly season." Any nonsense is possible in its proper time.

Apart from that, the Times has from time to time committed the most extraordinary blunders. Considering the care that is taken by it to ensure accuracy, to say nothing of the tradition of the elaborate arrangements of the great journal, it is a marvel how mistakes, specially of the grosser kind, could at all creep in. India is a subject of bad omen for the British Press. There the best of them are notoriously apt to founder. Perhaps the craziest absurdity on any Indian question in the journalism of the world, was the Times's "leader" on the news of the outbreak in 1855 of the Santhals, in which they were described as the market gardeners of Calcutta, living in its vicinity, on the banks of the river.

THE Lieutenant Governor of the Punjab has recorded the following note on the remodelling of the Divisional and District Judge Agency in that Province :—

"I am inclined to think we might consider whether the Criminal and Judicial administration might not be improved and other advantages gained by remodelling the Divisional Judge and District Judge Agency in the following way :—Instead of 13 Divisional Judges—3 on Rs. 2,500, 5 on Rs. 2,250 and 5 on Rs. 1,800—and 9 District Judges—5 on Rs. 1,500 and 4 on Rs. 1,200—have, say, 10 Divisional and Sessions Judges on Rs. 2,500 and Rs. 2,250 and divide the Province into circuits accordingly. These officers should do all the important Sessions cases and Criminal Appeals, control the Criminal Judicial administration under the Chief Court, and do the most important Civil Judicial business of their Circles. The remaining 3 Divisional Judges and the 4 1st Grade District Judges (omitting Dewan Rām Nāih's post) would become 7 Assistant Divisional Judges on Rs. 1,800 and Rs. 1,500 as before, who would work as Assistants to the Circuit and Sessions Judges like, I believe, the Assistant Judges do in Bombay. They would take most of the Divisional Court Civil work, and perhaps some of the Civil work now done by District Judges; also the minor Criminal work of the Sessions Court.

The cost of raising the pay of 2 Divisional Judges on Rs. 1,800 to Rs. 2,250—Rs. 900 per mensem—might be met by abolishing the 4 appointments of District Judge, 2nd Grade, and substituting 4 Assistant Commissioners, 1st class, which would be a saving of Rs. 1,200.

Out of the Rs. 300 balance of saving and out of the Rs. 1,500, 1st Grade District Judge's appointment, now held by Dewan Rām Nāih (which might be abolished when he vacates it) allowances of Rs. 100 or Rs. 50 might be given to all Assistant Commissioners or Extra Assistant Commissioners performing the duties of District Judge.

A certain number of Assistant Commissioners would always be doing District Judge's work, and others would be acting as Assistant Divisional Judges. Assistant Commissioners would in this way have some experience of work of all kinds, and would decide whether to go into the Judicial or Revenue lines when they got offers either of a permanent Assistant Divisional Judgeship or of a permanent Deputy Commissionership. As a rule, no change, except by exchange, would be allowed afterwards.

Men in the Judicial line not fit to be Sessions Judges would remain as Assistant Divisional Judges at Rs. 1,800 and would do little harm there.

Appeals from Senior District Magistrates would no longer be heard by Junior Divisional Judges, and generally the most important work in Divisional and Sessions Courts would come before senior men and the less important before junior men."

THE ruler of an empire cannot afford to indulge in practical jokes, and we do not feel inclined to believe the report which credits or rather debits Lord Lansdowne with the desire of conceding to the aspirations of New Indian Babus and Congressists to the extent of granting them the privilege of volunteering. There are lots of men among the poorer classes of our country who are willing and well qualified to serve as paid soldiers. Such men may be found even in effeminate Bengal, among the Feizi Mahomedans of the eastern districts, and among Hindus of the Goala, Bagdi, and Aguni castes. But we doubt much whether there is any native of this country who would willingly go through the drudgery of serving as common soldiers for the sake of the "honor." There are Babus who serve as "honorary" Magistrates and "honorary" civic governors. But, if we are not greatly mistaken, nothing can induce the pupils of Mr. Hume to shoulder muskets, or to practise parade with the uniform of common soldiers. The want of practical wisdom that characterizes the Congress agitation, cannot be better exposed than by granting the privilege of volunteering, for which its promoters have been recording Resolutions every year. Our rulers, however, cannot, consistently with the dignity of their position, play the part of "sceptred cynics," and both for their sake and for the credit of our would be political regenerators, we consider the experiment undesirable. Should it, however, be tried, it would not be without some wholesome result.

SUPERSTITION is ingrained in human nature, and we can hardly expect its complete eradication under any circumstances. There is in fact so much misery in this world, and the fortunes of men are affected so much by unforeseen accidents, that the stoutest hearts become at times a game for wily priests, astrologers and old women. There are some superstitions which are capable of explanation, as being symbolical of good or evil luck. We can understand why the sight of an empty water pot, or the fall of kites and vultures on the roof of a house, is regarded as a bad omen. Walking under a ladder may have also its terrors to people accustomed to the sight of the gibbeting of criminals. But there are some forms of superstition which are quite inexplicable on any rational principle. To this latter class belongs the apparently new invention of the mountebank's art, called toonai, which has already become rather too popular in the Land of the Five Rivers. It gives a ray of hope to bereaved parents, and has such elements of success in it, that it is likely to be adopted in other parts of the country, if not throughout the world. It consists of clandestinely laying the dead body of a child that has died a natural death, in a mosque at night or near the edge of a canal, instead of burying or burning it. The belief among the people who are led to do so, is that, by this treatment of the dead child, long life is secured for children born in the family afterwards. The trick may not bring much money to the pocket of its originator, but it will serve to maintain his credit with his followers, at least for some years, and as its hollowness cannot be exposed, except by facts and figures which can never be readily available, it has every chance of securing a permanent footing in the beliefs of men.

See p. 318.

THERE is no limit to the gullibility of men, and a bold liar may, without much difficulty, play the rôle of a prophet, if he only takes care so to manipulate his prophecies that they may not be disproved by the test of experience. Such prophets have, in every age and country, played upon the credulity of their followers, with more or less success. There is still living a Bengali Brahman who, about the time of the Sepoy Mutiny, proclaimed himself to be an incarnation of the Hindu God, Vishnu, and promised to restore to his followers their deceased children, husbands, wives, and parents after a certain date. Thousands of men and women enrolled themselves among his votaries. Fair women mourning the loss of children or husbands, flocked from distant parts of the country with sweetmeats for feeding him with their own hands. Money poured at his feet as at the booking office of a first class railway station. For the period of about one year, he had a merry time of it. But the day of reckoning arrived when he was to fulfil his promise. The people who had hitherto been fondly expecting to see, on that day, their deceased objects of love and affection in flesh and blood again, were doomed to a cruel disappointment. Some of them began to curse their prophet openly. But such is the readiness of men to believe imposters, that a great many still clung to him, and he maintained his credit with them, by taking further time to perform his part of the contract. His initial mistake was to make a promise for which he could be called to account in his lifetime. The priests and prophets who never lose credit, are those whose rewards and terrors are invisible and beyond the ken of living men. The "incarnation of Vishnu," about whom we are speaking, had not the tact of the great masters of the art, and he failed. But, in spite of his failure to perform what he had undertaken to achieve, he was not completely deserted by all his followers till he betrayed his cloven foot unmistakably. The natural bent of his genius, and his want of training for any business or profession, made him, in his maturer years, a knight of industry. While living for a few days as a guest in the house of a friend in North Bengal, he helped himself to a watch and a chain belonging to his host, and by British justice, which makes no exception in favor of incarnations and prophets, he was condemned to pass a couple of years in a criminal jail. His meditations in the enforced silence of his cell as also the discipline and the diet which he had to submit to while in prison, may have contributed to the progress of his soul towards beatitude and nirvana. But his spiritual career terminated with his incarceration. He is still living, and though his is not a name at which the world ever grew pale, an account of his exploits cannot fail.

To point a moral or adorn a tale.

At the present time, the new fangled orthodoxy of beef-eating Babudom requires to be specially guarded against. All that we can do for the protection of its dupes, is to advise them to study their sacred theology carefully, and in an unsophisticated spirit. Little learning is dangerous in every sphere, and is especially so in religious literature. The rules and regulations prescribed by our ancient teachers are based upon a noble ideal. But in every age the benefactors of mankind are opposed by the wicked, and the work of the earnest disciplinarian is rendered nugatory by the tricks of the popularity hunter. It therefore happens that there is hardly a religion which has proved to be an unmingled blessing. That our religion too has a dark side would be obvious to the really sincere among our Babu enthusiasts, if they would take a little trouble to study, with an unprejudiced mind, such works as the Mahanirvan Tantra, the Bhagabat, the Narada Pancha Ratra, and the Gita Gobinda.

THE Bengal Times writes:—

"Silent Suffering. One custom in India for people, when overtaken by famine, is to suffer in silence and die. Sir Richard Temple, when Governor of Bombay, bitterly complained that Indians would rather die than come to relief works, and respectable people would not inform local authorities that they were suffering. But it seems such feelings are happily undergoing a change. For our part, we do not believe in people starving themselves. If there are fools, who choose this mode of death, they are no loss to anybody and rather a gain to society."

That is unquestionably British, but barely so. Even as such, it is a reaction of a long era of enthusiasm of humanity. Except as such, it will not be entertained on this poor frail earth of ours. It sounds so atrocious! It is no doubt logical, philosophical, scientific, politico-economical and all that, but our consciousness is not yet attuned to the cruel sciences, physical and moral. Humanity—in every sense—is below them—or above, if you will. Our contemporary scarcely realises the length of the logical conclusion of his doctrine. That doctrine involves the prime issue whether we should help the incompetent to live and breed. Accept the negative and apply it in different directions around you, and you see great institutions and departments of state decay and dwindle to nothing. The editor of the Bengal Times must have been in his barbaric Eastern spell before he could joy over the extinction of the fools wholesale by starvation. Let beggars beware! So far from receiving alms, their very skins are not safe from the attacks of such philosophers who are well acquainted with the prices current of leather!

The writer does not believe in people starving themselves. Coming from a raw Bull, it were appropriate speech. Jack Bull's people are ready for noting in famine time. They would beg, borrow, steal, rather than starve. We are surprised at our contemporary's confession. It is strange that a man living so long in India should display such scepticism. Such deaths may be unknown in Europe, but they are common enough in this country. In all the great periods of national calamity, men in numbers and whole families have been found dead within reach of help. Nor was the phenomenon discovered by Sir Richard Temple by any means. It first came out during the sad famine of Orissa in 1865-66, and was then brought to the notice of the European public. And it has been noticed ever since at every fresh recurrence of the same kind of calamity. Our own countrymen know that the feeling which prefers death to begging, is far more prevalent among our people than the statistics show. This national disposition is one of the recognized difficulties in the administration of famines. Those who cannot see the rationale of that mode of suicide, are to be pitied. They speak contemptuously of the salt of the earth.

IN April 1890, there was a murderous attack on the Superintendent of the Rampur Police, while on his way to Moradabad. A Police investigation followed and three men, named Mahmood Khan, Abdul Majeed and Chudlan, were arrested and put on trial before Mr. H. F. Evans, the Sessions Judge of Moradabad. They were all convicted and sentenced each to seven years' rigorous imprisonment. There was an appeal to the High Court, under Section 235, Criminal Procedure Code, on the ground that at the Sessions trial, all the assessors were not present throughout the proceedings. The objection took, and a fresh trial was ordered. By this time Mr. Evans had ceased to be the Sessions Judge and the three were tried by Mr. Mulock, who acquitted the first two and convicting Chudlan sentenced him to 10 years' rigorous imprisonment.

A QUERER case of kidnapping cropped up lately in the district of Backergunge. A teacher attached to an educational institution in Bursal removed his sister from his mother's guardianship to make a proselyte of her to Brahmoism. Thereupon, his mother has got him hauled up before the local magistracy on a charge of kidnapping from lawful guardianship. The girl is under fourteen years; but whether she is a widow or a maiden does not appear from the reports. Probably, she is a widow and the object of her brother is to get her married under the Brahmo Marriage Act. But in his defence he does not say that his object is to give her in marriage. He says that he meant only to bring her "into light." Where the guru and the chela are children of the same parents, such proselytising zeal may be harmless enough. But where the parties are strangers, "bringing to light" may have a very different complexion in the eye of the vulgar pagans groping in the dark, as well as of law.

IN a civil suit in the District Court of Cuddalore, twelve witnesses swore to an adoption which if found valid would have deprived the plaintiff of property worth Rs. 40,000. They were criminally prosecuted for perjury, and the Head Assistant Magistrate of the District, Mr. Swaminatha Iyer—a statutory civilian—found them guilty and sentenced eight of them to various terms of rigorous imprisonment, and four of them, the respectable of the lot, to six weeks' simple imprisonment each. One of the eight applied to the District Magistrate for mitigation of his punishment. His ground was that, though found guilty of the same offence, committed at the same time and in respect of the same matter, he was awarded a higher sentence than four of his comrades in the crime. The argument took, not as regards the appellant but against the four on whom he had based it. The four had already lived out their imprisonment. Yet the District Magistrate reported the matter to the High Court, which called upon the four to shew cause why the punishment of simple imprisonment should not be enhanced. It was argued on their behalf that they were men of respectability and that the simple imprisonment in their case was quite as deterrent as the rigorous imprisonment in the cases of the eight. Sir Arthur Collins and Mr. Justice Wilkinson held that Mr. Swaminath Iyer did not apparently realize the gravity of the offence, and ordered the four to be rigorously imprisoned for a further term of two calendar months.

THE Sessions Judge of Muzaffarnagar, agreeing with the verdict of assessors, convicted and sentenced to death Chunni, a Brahman, and Chhajju, a Kahar, for murder of a boy named Balmakund, aged ten years. The apparent motive of the deed was the theft of the boy's bangles, worth about Rs. 4. On appeal to the Allahabad High Court, the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Knox, while upholding the conviction, reduced the sentence to transportation for life.

BALWANT SINGH, a pensioned Sepoy, suspecting a neighbour, Ram Singh, of a liaison with his wife, attacked the wife with an axe. His mother interposing, she too was struck with the same deadly weapon. It was next the turn of Ram Singh who had run into the house hearing an outcry, and received wounds from the same axe. The wife died immediately, the neighbour did not survive long, the mother breathing her last a few hours after. Balwant was of course tried for triple murder. Before the Magistrate, he admitted these facts, but in the sessions court at Cawnpore, he justified his conduct saying he had found Ram Singh in the house with his wife and that the wife had connived in her infidelity. The assessors found him not guilty of murder, "because the evidence shewed no other reason for slaying except the liaison with Ram Singh or the suspicion of it. It was because of suspicion or certainty of his wife's liaison and for the sake of the honor of his family that he killed the three on provocation." Regarding the mother, the assessors argued that "a mother was a very dear relation and until it was certain that she had done an evil thing a son would not raise a hand against her." These findings of the assessors, the Sessions Judge said, were based on Oriental ideas and were inconsistent with the law as laid down in the Indian Penal Code. He, of course, not being an Oriental, disagreed with them, found Balwant guilty of murder and sentenced him to death. The matter went up in appeal to the High Court, and the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Straight dismissed the appeal and confirmed the sentence.

THIS year has been pre-eminently one of disasters on both sea and land. Famines, cyclones and railway accidents are the order of the day. All these are certainly owing to the Consent Act and the Mahapuja. As to the terrible famine in Russia, the explanation is not so obvious; but our Babu prophets may say that it is due to their loyalty to the British throne, and to their curses on Her Majesty's enemies. Verbum sat sapienti.

A RAILWAY accident is reported from the Punjab, between Okara and Satghara. Two trains collided. After a "line clear" message to both, one of which was subsequently withdrawn but too late perhaps, they met each other on the single line of rail. The report says—"A terrible scene then presented itself, a large number of the dead being horribly mangled and joined together." The majority of the passengers were, however, unhurt. The number of dead is not given. Only coolies and workmen were killed, but no woman or child.

THE death at Bombay of Edward Mansfield, Sub-Lieutenant, R. N. R., Aeronaut and Parachutist, Foreign Secretary, Balloon Society of Great Britain, through the collapse of his balloon "Wanderer," will be universally deplored. A previous attempt at balloon ascent made by him in that capital having failed for want of sufficient gas, he took particular care not to disappoint the public and had everything ready before the appointed time. He was not only determined to keep his faith with the public but to beat his last record of 11,400 feet before leaving the balloon. At ten minutes past four, he took his seat on the trapeze, and gave the word "let go." Twenty three and a half seconds elapsed and, when an altitude of ten hundred feet was attained, the "Wanderer" was seen to divide into two portions. The Lieutenant too was seen to struggle, and endeavour to get clear of the ropes and get hold of the parachute, but he was entangled in the ropes, and fell with tremendous rapidity to the earth, falling against the wall of the Victoria Gardens, whence the ascent was made in the presence of the Governor and 4,000 spectators. The wall separating the gardens from the spot where he fell was speedily scaled by Doctors and others. A sailor from the Marathon ran in the direction the Balloon was dropping, and with a native servant who saw him fall, rushed to his assistance. The shock was too great, and broke both his legs, the bones protruding through the skin. The sailor says he attempted to speak, but was unable. He swallowed some brandy, but it was of no avail, as he died in a few seconds. Before his fate was known, some one called out "he is safe and has dropped on a tree." Vociferous cheers broke the painful suspense. When the facts were known, the scene was distressing, many ladies shrieked, and numbers were led away crying bitterly. The Coroner's Inquest has found that there was a rent in the balloon which was brought to the notice of the deceased before his ascent, but was not deemed by him to be of any importance.

RENEWED gales have set in along the British coasts.

PRINCE George of Wales has had a slight relapse.

THE American financier Mr. Russell Sage has had a narrow escape from violent death from American scoundrelism. Two men entered his office and demanded from him one million dollars. The demand being refused, they exploded a dynamite bomb in the office which shattered a great part of the building. Three clerks and the miscreants themselves were blown to atoms and Mr. Sage severely injured.

THE Duke of Clarence and Avondale is betrothed to Princess Mary of Teck. It is said to be a love match.

SPEAKING at Hanley, Lord Cross said that the great keystone of British policy in India was justice. He declared that further aggrandisement was not wished for and that the Government desired to maintain the closest friendship with the Native States. It was wished, he said, that the Amir of Afghanistan should rule his subjects properly and continue friendly to England.

THE Paris correspondent of the Times says that the Russian Government has purchased as many Suez Canal bonds as it could procure. As to its object, we need not hazard any conjecture.

THE Bombay Chamber of Commerce have received a letter from Sir James Fergusson in which he regrets he cannot hold out any prospect of the adoption of a penny post to India. The new Postmaster-General of England points out that the charge for post-cards has been reduced, and mentions that a reduction in newspapers is in contemplation.

THE Countess of Russell's petition for divorce has been dismissed with costs. But can the Earl and the Countess live together again as man and wife under the same roof?

THE death is announced of Dom Pedro, ex-Emperor of Brazil.

THE "crownet's-quest" has decided that Sreemutty Mamada had "wilfully sought her own salvation." Salvation, indeed! In his address to the Jury, the Coroner admitted the cruelty perpetrated on her, but advised the Jury not to travel beyond the immediate cause of death. The mystery which shrouded that tragic end, remains unveiled. But,

She is gone, she's gone,
And we cast away moan:
God ha' mercy on her soul!

THIS week a promising youth of twenty-two—a son of the successful Attorney Baboo Ganes Chunder Chunder—who had successfully passed the last M. A. Examination, was found dead in his bed. At the post mortem examination, a large quantity of opium was found in the stomach and the Coroner's Jury returned a verdict of suicide from opium poisoning.

A SUGGESTION has been made in Calcutta to establish Savings Banks in connection with schools and colleges. The experiment, if tried, is almost sure to end in failure. State Banks for making advances to promising students, may have better chance.

THE Lieutenant-Governor has sanctioned the byelaw framed by the Calcutta Municipality for enforcing the construction of urinals and latrines in theatres and other places of public resort. The selection of sites and the plan of construction are to be subject to the approval of the Commissioners. Now that they have the power, it is to be hoped, the Commissioners will not strain it in order to introduce constructions they may have taken a fancy to.

A PUBLIC meeting, under the auspices of the Students' Club, was held on Tuesday, the 8th instant, in the hall of the General Assembly's Institution, to consider whether sea voyages are prohibited by the Hindoo religion. Babu Bunkim Behari Mitter, B. A., read a paper on the subject, and we are told that "he conclusively proved by quotations from the Vedas, Purans, Smritis, and dramatic works that our shasters do not forbid sea voyages." As the lecturer succeeded in satisfying his audience regarding the correctness of his conclusion, we congratulate both him and them, and hope that they will not meet with any opposition from Baba orthodoxy.

THE Government of Bengal has issued a circular to all heads of departments bringing to their notice that much inconvenience is caused from time to time by the difficulty of making out the signatures to official documents. In the case of native signature, the difficulty of deciphering is often heightened by the fact of different officers having the same surname and by the initials standing for their prenomens being illegible. To prevent this inconvenience, all officers have been ordered to sign public documents in future with their signatures written clearly and, in the case of native officers, with all the prefixes in full.

THE Governor of Bombay has been pleased to supersede for one year the Municipality of Dhondhuk, in Gazerath, for incompetency and persistent default in the performance of duties imposed on it by law. Lord Harris formulates his charges in the following terms:—

"(1). In January, 1890, the Municipality, by a majority of votes, resolved upon the abolition of octroi-duties on all but five articles and on the imposition of a small house-tax in lieu of the duties so to be abolished. This measure received the approval of Government in Government Resolution No. 1479, of 15th April, 1890, and thereupon came into force. Since that time, however, a majority of the Municipal Commissioners have persistently opposed and obstructed all steps for collecting the house-tax, and by thus retarding the realization of Municipal dues, have brought the work of the Municipality almost to a standstill.

(2). Owing to this obstruction, the classification of houses in the Municipal district for the purpose of assessing the house-tax was so much delayed, that at the end of January, 1891, i.e., two months only before the end of the financial year 1890-91, about two thousand houses still remained to be classified; the result being that the collection of that year's tax within the year was rendered almost impossible.

(3). At the budget meeting held in April, 1891, this state of things was brought under the notice of the Municipality, yet no steps were taken towards the collection of the house-tax. The consequence was inevitable deficit, to provide for which no other means was adopted.

(4). Seeing the attitude taken by the Commissioners, a considerable number of the towns-people have refused to pay the taxes due by them. Many suits have been filed against the Municipality to contest the legality of the house-tax. It cannot be expected from the Municipality, constituted as it is and hampered by such antecedents as have been described, that it should maintain its legal rights as a Corporation with the due degree of zeal and sincerity.

(5). On a consideration of these circumstances, the Governor in Council on the 1st June last gave a warning to the Municipality that unless, within two months, it took measures to reform its administration and to secure the proper collection, without delay, of the house-tax, the Municipality would be superseded.

(6). But from the reports received by the Governor in Council, it appears that the Municipality has taken no steps to improve its administration, or to cope with the difficulties which its resolution of 29th April, 1891, has led to. On the contrary, the Municipality is now Rs. 5,000 in debt and the schoolmasters and Municipal servants in its employ are without their pay."

The Government of Bombay seems to be in favor of the House-tax in lieu of the Octroi, which the municipality finds less objectionable to the ratepayers than the direct tax on their houses. Not long ago, there was a proposition to introduce in Calcutta the Octroi. It was, however, abandoned and the present law was enacted to assess more heavily the residential houses.

THE Hon'ble J. L. Mackay, C.I.E., has been re-appointed an Additional Member of the Governor-General's Council for making Laws and Regulations.

LORD Wenlock has gone back to his own Madras.

THE Russian "sightseer," Count Kreutz, and Baron de Nolde have been refused permission by the authorities to Sikkim.

HINDOO MEDICINE IN MOURNING.

BENGALI Society in Calcutta has become the poorer in Sanskrit medical lore and skill and experience in the healing art, by the removal from the world of two men. First died, as befitting, the older. And now this week Chunder Kissore has been followed by Brojendra Kumar. Sons of distinguished men, they were themselves distinguished too, after a sort. They had certainly made a name, each for himself, in his own way. They were not men of the same stamp, or class, or even age. While Chunder Kissore was of the old, Brojendra Kumar essentially belonged to the new generation. Their education was different. Chunder Kissore was a well-taught disciple of the Sanskrit Medicine. Brojendra Kumar was a scientific man who practised Hindu Medicine. Yet Chunder Kissore is not to be despised. He was not by any means a stubborn bigot who would shut his eyes on the ways of others. He watched the treatment of the practitioners of European Medicine, with as much interest and to as much purpose as his ignorance of English permitted. In this, he received signal help from the late Baboo Rajinder Dutt of the Wellington Square family. With such friendly contact, his fine intelligence could not help making great progress. Of course, under the fatal disability already mentioned, he could for the most part only gaze at the outside of the edifice of modern science without being privileged to enter it. But he made the most of his opportunity. The proof of this is in the bloodless revolution he has caused in native society and the indigenous practice of medicine. Whatever may be the scientific claims of Hindoo medicine and of European, Chunder Kissore's frank understanding at once recognised the administrative superiority of the latter. The more he observed and meditated, the more he was convinced that the joining of the characters of physician and apothecary in the same person was a mistake and a source of much evil. He desired to introduce the reform among his countrymen. On enquiry, he found that the experiment had been tried without encouraging results. He thought the fault lay in the manner of the experiment. He resolved to try it himself, and he embarked his whole fortune in the experiment. The first visible outcome of his zeal was the lofty pile in Fouzdari Balakhana dedicated to Hygeia and the production and sale of Hindoo medicines. It was at first ridiculed as Chunder Kissore's Folly, but its rapid success silenced reproach. At this time, there is scarcely a quarter of the town where there are no Ayurvedic chemists and apothecaries' shops.

Kaviraj Chunder Kissore was the younger son of Nityananda Sen of Kalna, in the Burdwan District. His father was the leading physician of his day in Calcutta. He was sent for study to Burdwan, where he was brought up in the medical seminary of the most renowned Rajballav Ray, whose insight into diagnosis was a preternatural gift and who is credited with the most miraculous cures. We believe Chunder Kissore was but a very short time at Burdwan. Most of his education he received from his father and elder brother, the latter of whom he afterwards distanced in success in practice. He was brought to notice by the Dutt family. He was the first Kaviraj whom the Europeans knew or who got European patients. Whenever any sensational case occurred in native or European society, Baboo Rajinder Dutt was sure to offer Chunder Kissore's services as an infallible doctor. And Chunder Kissore was thus enabled to give some remarkable proofs of his powers. Thenceforward, his fortunes galloped onwards, until they reached their acme at the head of the College of Health in Chitpore Road.

Brojendra Kumar was a different sort of man. He was a man of education versed in both Hindu and European medicine. His father was the Physician to the bigotted Court of Cashmere, and he succeeded to it. But with his education and his liberal notions, he could not submit to life at Jummoo. He came and practised at Calcutta. He was a perfect gentleman too, besides a great doctor. He has left no equal or second. He was the only practitioner of the Ayurveda system fit for consultation with those of the European medicine.

THE IMPERIAL DIAMOND CASE.

THE trial of Jacob in the Hyderabad diamond case commenced at the High Court Sessions on Monday last. The special Jury empanelled consists entirely of Europeans, all the five native gentlemen whose names were called being challenged by the defence. The Advocate-General with Messrs. Woodroffe, Jackson and Dunne are engaged for the prosecution. While Mr. Inverarity of the Bombay Bar, with permission of the presiding Judge Mr. Justice Wilson, and Messrs. Gattik and Pearson appear for the defence. Mr. Rattigan, of the Lahore Bar, had early been retained by Jacob, but he could not appear at the preliminary enquiry in the Police Court, on account of his public business, in connection with the Punjab Municipal Act. Mr. Rattigan, on his arrival in this town on last Saturday, was informed that the local bar resented his appearance in the case, specially as he had not the excuse of having represented the accused in the lower Court. Before applying to the presiding Judge for the necessary sanction under the Legal Practitioners' Act, he communicated with the Advocate-General to be assured that his taking a part in the defence would not be objected to. In reply, he was assured that it would not be an infringement of etiquette and that there was no ground for the hesitation that he felt. But somehow he was not satisfied that he was quite welcome, and not deeming it prudent, under the circumstances, to run the risk of being refused the necessary sanction by the Court, threw up his brief, leaving Mr. Jacob entirely in the hands of Mr. Inverarity and the juniors of the local bar engaged for his assistance. In a letter to the Englishman this morning, Mr. Woodroffe repudiates any opposition of the local bar to Mr. Rattigan's appearing in the case, or to any number of outsiders. At the same time, he explains that it is not the fact that all the senior Counsel of the Calcutta bar were retained for the prosecution, so as to justify the importation of foreign talent by the defence.

The Advocate-General's opening address was a masterpiece of forensic deliverance. It was concluded on the second day, and upon his proceeding to call witnesses, Mr. Inverarity asked the Court to decide first of all whether the Nizam's evidence given before the Commission issued by the committing magistrate, was admissible or not. The Court ordering accordingly, Sir Charles Paul asked the permission of the court to put in the evidence of the Nizam and, in support of his application, he put in an affidavit declaring that it would be highly inconvenient for His Highness to attend court. The deponent Mr. Hoimusjee Nusserwanjee was also examined as a witness. Mr. Inverarity submitted that the evidence taken on commission issued by the committing magistrate was inadmissible, under S. 507 of the Criminal Procedure Code, in the trial before the Sessions Court. In support of his contention, the counsel for the accused cited Empress v. Dabee Persad, 1 L. R., VI, Cal. 532. He cited also Empress v. Faridounissa L.L.R., 5, All., 92, in which the Allahabad High Court held that in criminal courts a Purdanashin lady was not, as a matter of right, exempt from personal attendance, and that the lady, who claimed the privilege in the case, was bound to attend as she was herself the complainant, and as the nature of the case was such that she could have got an effectual remedy by a civil suit. His Lordship observed that the general rule of the court was not to allow parties to be examined on commission and held, following a decision of Justices O'Kinealy and Pinsep, that the recorded evidence of the Nizam was inadmissible under S. 507 of the Criminal Procedure Code, as the word "case" in that section did not apply beyond the enquiry before the committing magistrate. As to the admissibility of the evidence under S. 33 of the Evidence Act, His Lordship said:—

"The only ground that had been urged against the Nizam's attendance was that of expense. It was a case in which a great deal would depend upon the conversation between the prosecutor and the prisoner, and it was very important that the prosecutor should be before the jury personally. The mere fact of the Nizam having to bring his retinue to Calcutta was simply one of state policy, but he did not think it was the kind of necessity which the Act contemplated at all. He thought the objection under section 33 was sound, and the evidence was perfectly inadmissible, but if the prosecution desired to make any application in order to facilitate His Highness giving evidence before the court, he (His Lordship) would be prepared to entertain it."

Sir Charles Paul then moved the Court for issue of a commission to examine his client in Hyderabad. But this application also was rejected.

Albert Abid, the Nizam's chamberlain and his chief witness, was then put into the box, and his examination-in-chief was commenced by Mr. Woodroffe on Tuesday afternoon. His cross-examination by Mr. Inverarity has just concluded.

UNVEILING OF LORD DUFFERIN'S STATUE.

On being asked to unveil the statue, His Excellency the Viceroy rose and said:—Your Honor, Mr. Mackay, Ladies, and Gentlemen,—I understand that before I proceed to unveil this statue, I am expected to say one or two words about the distinguished statesman whom it represents. They shall be few and simple. The memory of Lord Dufferin is still fresh in your recollection, and no words of mine can add to, or subtract from, his reputation.

I have, however, perhaps a right to address you upon the present occasion, not only as the head of the Government of India wishing to do honour to an Indian statesman, but as one whose friendship with Lord Dufferin carries me back to the earliest days of my childhood—an intimacy which, in spite of long periods of separation, has never been interrupted—and also as one who in two of the important appointments held by Lord Dufferin has had the good fortune to be his successor. My opportunities, therefore, of watching the judgment passed upon him after he had retired from the scene, and when those in whose full sight his work had been performed were no longer under the immediate and irresistible charm of his personal intercourse, have perhaps been greater than those enjoyed by others.

Perhaps the most noticeable feature in Lord Dufferin's career has been the unbroken continuity of his success. Most public men make mistakes, experience reverses, and find themselves for a time, rightly or wrongly, out of public favour, but the even course of Lord Dufferin's advance seems never to have undergone a check.

More than 30 years have passed since the time when, in 1860, he was deputed to represent British interest in the Lebanon, at a time when the blood-stained collisions between the Druses and Maronites promised to lead to serious complications in that part of the world. The distinction with which he acquitted himself, and the successful efforts which at this period of his life he made in the paths of literature and politics, established his reputation, and obtained for him appointments which familiarised him with more than one branch of the administration, and notably with that of the Great Empire which he was one day to govern.

His designation to represent the Crown as Governor-General of Canada was received with general acclamation. He undertook the appointment at a very critical period in the history of the Dominion, during the early days of the federation of British North America, and no Governor-General ever did more than he to stimulate the loyalty to Her Majesty's Canadian subjects, or to strengthen the ties which hold together the Provinces of the Dominion, as well as those by which the Colony, as a whole, is united to the mother-country. As to the tact, dignity, and sympathetic spirit with which he discharged his duties, whether official or unofficial, he left behind him no two opinions.

The high degree in which he possessed these qualities pointed to him as one eminently fitted to serve his country in a diplomatic capacity, and, although he had not undergone that training in the Diplomatic Service which forms the usual avenue to its highest posts, I never heard it said that the absence of experience of this kind in any sense impaired Lord Dufferin's usefulness as British Ambassador at St. Petersburg and Constantinople. With each of these Governments our relations were of the most delicate and important kind at the time when they were committed to his charge, and they certainly did not suffer in his hands.

Ladies and Gentlemen, the recollection of Lord Dufferin's four years' service in India is still fresh in your memories. Whether in regard to the external or to the internal affairs of the Indian Empire, those four years were unusually eventful and laborious, and brought with them more than their share of trouble and heavy responsibility. Upon our western frontiers he left his mark by a settlement, as complete as the circumstances permitted, of a boundary question which, less judiciously handled, would have imperilled the peace of the world, and by establishing upon the throne of Afghanistan a Ruler who has since shown himself faithful in his allegiance to us, and strong enough to hold in check the turbulent elements of which his kingdom is composed. Upon our eastern confines he brought to a close a long series of complications and anxieties by the addition to the Empire of the Province of Upper Burma. It would be impossible within the limits which restrict me this evening to deal adequately with his administration of the internal affairs of India. It will be memorable for many useful measures, amongst which a conspicuous place must be given to those for the improvement of the position of the cultivators of the soil in this Province, in Oudh, and in the Punjab. Education, the health of the people, the condition of the public service, the state of the Imperial Defences, the contribution to those defences made by the Indian States, the extension of our Railway system—all received their share of attention. I do not think it will be gained said that these and the other grave problems which confronted him were dealt with patiently, courageously, and judiciously. Nor, when the history of Lord Dufferin's administration comes to be written, will it be regarded as the least of his achievements that he throughout conducted the affairs of this country in such a manner as to create and to maintain a kindly feeling and mutual confidence between all classes and sections of your Indian community. One of the most unmistakable proofs that the verdict of his contemporaries in India was a favorable one is to be found in the fact that, as soon as his intended departure became known, a movement to erect his statue was set on foot. It was supported by all classes of the community without distinction of race, class, or creed.

Lord Dufferin is still serving his country, and will, I hope, continue to serve it for many years to come. All his old friends must have seen with pleasure that he has within the last few weeks had bestowed upon him the office of Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports—an office which, although purely honorary, confers upon the person who holds it the distinction of succeeding to a long roll of the most distinguished names in the modern history of Great Britain.

It would be hard, indeed, among his many brilliant qualities, to designate those to which his success has been specially due. It may perhaps be said that the most conspicuous of these have been his extraordinary perception of human nature, his unerring tact, and his power of conciliating opposition. Nor must we forget that rare gift of appropriate expression in speech and in writing which, it has often been said, came to him as a birthright, but which, as an assiduous student of arts and letters, he constantly cultivated and improved—a gift which invariably stood him in good stead, whatever the nationality or the character of his audience, and which enabled him with equal ease and happiness, and with the precise amount of erudition, humour, and sound sense which the occasion happened to require, to describe his own adventures in High Latitudes, to take his part in the hot encounter of political debate, to lay rich stores of wit and wisdom before an academical audience, or to give voice to the feelings of a sorrow-stricken nation sharing its Sovereign's grief for an irreparable loss.

To the list which I have just given might perhaps be added one other quality, possessed, I believe, in the same degree by no other public man of our day. His employment in the various offices of which I have just spoken has, to a great extent, cut him off from the narrower and more purely domestic politics of our own country, and has compelled him to look at the affairs of the Empire from a truly Imperial standpoint, and to include within his purview a horizon far wider than that of the average politicians of our day. It is no doubt to this that are due those qualities of higher and broader statesmanship which are discernible in almost everything that he has said and written. That is why his reputation will go down to posterity as that of a statesman, rather than a politician, as that of one who, in an age of party rivalries and sectional cleavage, was able to keep steadfastly before his eyes the larger interests of that great Empire, the dignity and reputation of which he has upheld in so many parts of the globe.

The statue, which I will now unveil, is the work of Sir Edgar Boehm, an artist whose recent decease removed one of the foremost sculptors of our generation. I have no doubt that the work will be worthy both of the great artist who has produced it, and of the man whom it represents. (Applause.)

ST. ANDREW'S DINNER.

THE TOAST OF "THE VICEROY AND THE LAND WE LIVE IN."

On rising to propose this toast Mr. Mackay, the Chairman, was greeted with a hearty outburst of applause. He said:—Your Excellency and Gentlemen,—Twelve months ago a reception was given here to the toast of the health of the Viceroy, which, I am sure, would have gratified His Excellency had he been present to witness it, and to-night when Lord Lansdowne has conferred on us the great honor of being our guest, I venture to predict that the charm which he sheds around him wherever he goes, will alone be sufficient to ensure the toast of his health being received with the warmest enthusiasm (Loud cheers). The year now drawing to a close has been more or less eventful in the annals of Indian history, a year of episodes which, though comparatively insignificant in themselves, have served to remind us of what some people would try to make us forget, namely, that in India, unfortunately, we still live, so to speak, on a magazine which requires to be constantly guarded (Hear, hear). A few months ago every one was startled by rumours which came from a subordinate state on the far off north-east frontier, and all true men were shocked to hear, after days of suspense, that Her Majesty had lost several of her officers by the fondest treachery. A short time later the country was again agitated by a series of religious riots, accompanied by misguided newspaper attacks upon Englishmen and the British Raj, attacks which had to be, and which have been, suppressed (Cheers). Gentlemen, in the day-to-day administration of the Government of India, the Viceroy must always have his hands more than full, but when, in addition to the ordinary cares and responsibilities of his high office, he is harassed as His Excellency must have been within the past six months, his position is apt to make us think of the words "uneasy lies the head that wears a crown." A short time ago in speaking of certain events then under discussion, the Secretary of State for India, in his place in the House of Lords, said:—"I gladly take this opportunity of bearing my humble testimony to the zeal and efficiency with which Lord Lansdowne has discharged the high duties (Cheers). He has maintained untarnished the honor of the British name, he has added to the strength of the defence of the empire, he has done much to improve the social and moral condition of the various races committed to his care, and he is deserving of the unabated confidence of his Sovereign, of Parliament, and of his country" (Cheers). Gentlemen, I think this would be a fitting occasion to assure Lord Lansdowne that these words, spoken in England, were but an echo of the feelings which filled the heart of every loyal subject in India (Loud applause). Placed high above his fellow-men, with his every act and every line of his policy subjected to criticism, not always generous, but often unfair, because based on imperfect information, the ruler of a conquered race, the Viceroy of India from the personal nature of his Government has a greater individual burden to bear than any other man in the empire. It cannot, therefore, but be gratifying to His Excellency to know that in all the anxieties which have recently beset him, his single-minded chivalrous action, and his courageous policy have had both the approval of the Sovereign and the approbation of his fellow-country men (Cheers). It is a source of unqualified satisfaction to every one to learn that the rumours, which were current a year ago regarding Lord Lansdowne's contemplated resignation, have proved to be incorrect (Hear, hear), and that his health is now such as to lead him to believe that he will be able to complete the term of his Viceroyalty (Cheers). Gentlemen, I will ask you to join me in expressing the fervent hope that His Excellency's anticipations may be fully realised (Loud and prolonged cheering).

Gentlemen, the land we live in is by no means a bad sort of place, but it cannot be denied that in some respects it is capable of improvement, and when I make this remark, I have before me chiefly our own city of Calcutta (Laughter). I have not the honor to be a member of the Municipal Corporation of Calcutta (groans), but I am well aware the duties of that body are both responsible and laborious, and I do not forget that those who devote their time to municipal affairs have, as a rule, but a thankless task. The Municipal Corporation of Calcutta, its Chairman and Executive Officers, past and present, are entitled to every credit for all they have done for the city (cheers), but, gentlemen, I don't think I shall be going too far when I say that there still remains a deal to do (Hear, hear). For instance, we require to have those hot-beds of disease, those places otherwise known as bastees, remorselessly swept away from the European quarter of Calcutta (cheers), and cost what it may, we should refuse to rest content till this end has been accomplished. Let the butte lands be bought up and cleared and turned into public gardens or leased out as building sites, and let the quarter benefited be taxed as necessary to meet the outlay (cheers). Then, gentlemen, now that the Municipality has embraced the suburbs, let the suburban portion of the city, while it is still lying waste or covered with inexpensive buildings, be mapped out on an intelligent and definite plan, which will provide broad air-circulating streets and roads instead of foul lanes and narrow pestilential gullies in which old Calcutta abounds (Hear, hear). And while admitting that Calcutta with all its drawbacks is not a bad place to live in, it is also a good place to get away from (laughter), especially to that beautiful sanitarium, with an almost English climate, which nature has provided on the slopes of the Himalays. And Darjeeling will be a still better place to go to when the Railway journey occupies eighteen instead of four and twenty hours, an improvement which will doubtless be effected at no distant date by our enterprising Railway magnates (Cheers). Then when you reach Darjeeling you are at the gate of that beautiful and almost unknown land of Sikkim, a country probably unsurpassed for its charming scenery and its delightful climate, a country which, thanks to the enlightened policy of our Political Agent, is rapidly being opened out and made accessible to all. There, in a day's march, you may revel in smiling landscapes, in rugged mountain gorges or among pine clad hills, which will recall your childhood's days. You may find yourselves camped for the night on the summit of a mountain three times as high as Ben Nevis, with the thermometer marking fifteen degrees of frost, on the shores of a lake which will remind you of Loch Maree, or in some sheltered valley, by the side of a clear and rapid mountain stream, the water of which may be safely drunk,--when mingled with Glenlivet (Cheers and laughter). Gentlemen, you must all have been greatly impressed with the remarkable disclosures of the recently taken Indian census. Ten years ago the population of this country stood at the modest figure of 254 millions, while to-day it stands 286, the increase in the interval having been equal to nearly the whole population of the British Isles. The population problem now staring us in the face is a most serious one for India, and its contemplation cannot but force every one to realize, not only that it is necessary to leave no stone unturned likely to develop the country's resources, but that it is also essential to avoid the premature introduction of laws calculated to retard the progress of industries which, if carefully fostered, will provide a means of existence for numbers of our ever-increasing millions. Gentlemen, what India wants for many a day yet to come, is proper and enlightened encouragement from the Government for all branches of its commerce (cheers),--encouragement which will bring more Scotchmen to the front (laughter) and will attract more of that enterprise and energy which spring to life on the mountain sides, on the breezy moors, in the lovely valleys, and along the shores of our native land,--qualities which have done so much in the past, qualities which will do much in the future for the land we live in (Applause).

Gentlemen, it is fortunate for the proposer of this toast that his duty fills on the 30th of November, and not on the 30th June, for I am afraid few of you who spent last June in Calcutta would have been much disposed at the end of the month to drink to the land we live in (laughter). The long weary hot weather day, the stifling hot weather night, when sleep depends on the punkah-wallah, those severe spells which so frequently come between April and October, all incline to make us sometimes doubt whether life in India is really worth the living, and lead us to register mental vows to quit the country at the first favorable opportunity,--which vows, however, somehow seldom seem to be fulfilled. Gentlemen, we frequently hear India spoken of as a land of regrets, but I think it might, with equal reason, be described as a land of resolutions, for there are probably more resolutions made and broken in India than in any other country in the world (Laughter). And speaking of resolutions reminds me of that interesting state paper which was recently given to the world on the subject of our old friend, the income-tax (Loud laughter). Gentlemen, I have heard a good deal of indignation expressed in regard to that resolution, especially about two of its paragraphs, and I have heard a good deal of speculation advanced as to which of the doctors in Calcutta had made his six thousand rupees per month, which of the barristers, which of the brokers, and which of the dress-makers had made those lakhs of rupees (Laughter). But while we all have our conjectures to be duly acted upon when there is a subscription in hand I doubt very much if the figures to which attention was drawn really divulged, against his will, the income of a single individual, and as regards the bogus books which are said to have been started for the benefit of the income-tax Collector, the possibility that such a state of matters may exist only goes to show how utterly unsuited is an Income-tax to the circumstances of a country such as India (Hear, hear). But, gentlemen, while I am disposed to the opinion that the wrath raising paragraphs did little, if any, practical damage, I think there can be no question that there is much in the resolution which ought to do a great deal of good, much that ought to tend to convince those responsible for the finances of this country, that there is nothing so ill-adapted for revenue-raising purposes in India as a direct tax upon income. (Applause). We have it laid down now in clear and definite terms on the high authority of His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal that "nothing but financial necessity can justify the retention of a tax which can only be based on a series of more or less accurate guesses," and as a first step towards lessening its evils, His Honor has suggested that two-thirds of those who at present pay the tax should be exempted. Gentlemen, His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor will place us under a lasting obligation if he succeeds in prevailing upon the Government of India to adopt his suggestion, because when that financial necessity, of which Sir Charles Elliott speaks, has passed away, one step further must be taken, and that step will be to abolish the tax entirely (Loud Cheers). Gentlemen, this is neither the time nor the place to ask Lord Lansdowne to listen to our grievances, but I think I might venture to say that we hope before His Excellency gives up the reins of office, he may have so far succeeded in completing the country's defence that he will feel justified in abandoning the special revenue, which was established to pay for them,--namely, the direct tax upon income. (Loud applause).

Gentlemen, when by your favor, I had the honor and opportunity of addressing you a year ago, I took occasion in speaking of certain legislation then proposed, to refer to the grave danger which seemed to threaten us of Indian interests being sacrificed on the altar of party politics in England, and a few months later we were faced by the astounding announcement that the British House of Commons had adopted a resolution in regard to opium, which, if brought into operation, would mean nothing short of bankruptcy for India. It has been well said, if India is ever lost to the British Crown, it will surely be in consequence of the ignorant interference of the English Parliament. I have seen it stated that a despatch has recently gone from the Government of India to the Secretary of State in reply to the resolution about the opium trade. Gentlemen, I sincerely hope the despatch has pointed out, if even only in official language polite, that it would be well if the people at home, before attempting to meddle with Indian morals, would abandon the insignificant annual income of twenty millions, which they at present derive from their own treasured traffic in drink. (Applause). And now, gentlemen, in asking you to drink to the Land we live in, I will beg of you to forget for a little those trifling inconveniences of which we sometimes complain. I will ask you to forget about its withering heat, its noxious smells and all its minor worries. I will ask you to forget that life in India is more or less of an exile involving for the most of us a good deal of painful separation. I will ask you to forget, if you can, that the rupee is now worth little more than a shilling (cries of Oh!) that those who started life with you and remained at home have done just as well as you, and I will even ask you to forget for a moment the wicked annual exodus to the hills, and that you continue to be oppressed by that dreadful tax upon income. And then, gentlemen, I will ask you to remember India's delightful cold weather, its unequalled sport, its boundless hospitality, and its magnificent thirsts, (laughter), which, in the old country, money can never buy. I will ask you to remember the nine or ten months of cheerful sunshine which you enjoy every year, and to compare them with the same period of murky gloom which has to be borne in the land of your birth. And I will ask you to bear in mind the many good friends you have made in this country and the fairly good time you have had on the whole; and, gentlemen, I feel certain when the day at last dawns for you to bid adieu to India, you will do so with deep regret, and when in years to come you are settled at home, you will look back with nothing but pleasure to your Indian life, and you will never fail to keep a cosy corner in your heart for the Land we live in. Gentlemen, I ask you to fill your glasses and to join me in drinking to the Viceroy and the Land we live in with Highland honours (Loud and prolonged cheering).

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

TWO SONNETS OF CARLO MARIA MAGGI.

TRANSLATED BY JAMES GLASSFORD.

I.

MUSINGS.

This sweet and silent clime already throws
New spring into my soul ; the fanning air,
The brook, the shade, my weary thought repair,
And feast the sense, and give the mind repose.

Its wonted fears the heart no longer knows ;
And pure delights again their blossom bear :
Now the mind reigns, and, freed from other care,
God's law contemplates, at his goodness glows.

Thus peace and joy in healthful seats renew
The golden age once more, not loath to fly
The city haunts, and bid the court adieu.

How streams the radiance of an open sky !
What charm has nature in her simple hue !
The soul what grandeur in her liberty !

II.

SLEEP.

Oh thou, the birth of Silence and of Night,
Father of fleet and lovely forms that fade,
Soft Sleep ! upon whose noiseless chariot stayed,
Love bears the spirit oft to realms of light—

Now, in the lap of shadowy visions bright
When every heart but mine is gently laid,
Oh, leave awhile thy grots replete with shade,
Dark as my thought, and haunts of sad delight.

Hither, oh come, with fond oblivion sweet,
And tranquil brows on which I love to rest,
Shedding thy balm into this troubled mind ;

That if no more I can expect to find
In thee the dream of bliss, I may at least
Behold death's image, whom I fain would meet.

LOVE'S TREASON.

It was the old knight's only child
Went forth upon the twilight wild :
The silent sky was purple grey
With one pale light of yellow day,
That hung upon the western track,
And marked the level distance black.

And there they met ; a minstrel he,
The landless soldier's daughter she.

The clouds hung heavy o'er the hill,
The broad, bare waste was dark and still,
But love in either heart was bright,
And so they stood beneath the night.

And o'er the breezy wold they strayed,
And through the woods he led the maid ;
And his the mighty gift of song
That lent its magic to his tongue ;
And love, and love, was still the theme
That lulled their hearts in happy dream.

Beyond the margin of the wood,
In stately pride a castle stood :
And as they gazed, all lustrous bright,
As joy bursts in on sorrow's night,
The gracious moon poured down her sheen,
A silver shower o'er the scene.

And then he clasped the maiden's hand,
And looked upon the spreading land,
And said, No minstrel poor was he,
But noble earl, of high degree,
And hailed her ladie mistress there
Of castle proud and forest fair.

But with a wonder strange she heard,
In breathless hush, her lover's word,
And in her face a wild dismay ;
And then she drew her hand away,
And calmer grew her brow and eye,
That told a settled purpose high.

She said : " Love is a thing of light,
Nor brooks the shade of falsehood's night ;
And love must shrink, and fade, and faint,
Within the circle of its taint ;
Forever and forever die,
Whose life is nourished by a lie ! "

And then she drew her mantle round,
And turned her to the forest bound ;
Transfixed all in stark despair,
He stood and gazed upon her there,
Until beneath the wings of night
She passed forever from his sight.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—For the cure of burns, scalds, wounds and ulcers, this justly celebrated Ointment stands unrivalled, its balsamic virtues, immediately on application, lull the pain and smarting, protect the exposed nerves from the air, give to the vessels the vigour necessary to heal the sore, and confer on the blood a purity which permits it only to lay down healthy flesh in place of that destroyed. Holloway's Pills, simultaneously taken, must assist the Ointment's purifying and soothing power. Together these medicines act like a charm ; no invalid, after a fair trial, has found them fail to relieve his pain, or completely cure his disease. The combined action of the Ointment and Pills, in all disorders, is too irresistible to be withstood.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THE University of Calcutta have decided that from 1894, in the Arts Examination, the Sanskrit papers must be answered in the Devanagari character.

LAST year, the M. A.'s and holders of corresponding degrees in the other Faculties of the Calcutta University were allowed the liberty of electing two of their number to be Fellows. The same privilege has been granted again this year by the Governor-General in Council. The election comes off on the 1st January—a public holiday. There are nineteen candidates, and active canvassing is going on. The selection, last time, although accepted by the Viceroy, is now admitted by the best friends of the elected to be far from satisfactory. The best were kept out and such as could best move about won the largest numbers of votes. It is to be hoped, better judgment will prevail this time.

THE Raykumar Jubilee High English School at Noakhali has been struck off the list of schools recognised as qualified to send up candidates for the Entrance examination. The school was found guilty of admitting a student, Anwar Ali, under the name of Anwaruddin, to its first class without a transfer certificate, and without a letter of application from his guardian, and thereby of wilfully transgressing one of the Transfer Rules for High Schools.

FOURTEEN Schools having passed not more than 20 per cent. of the candidates sent up to the Entrance examination for the last three years, the Syndicate of the Calcutta University have warned them that if they fail to show better result at the next examination they will be disqualified.

Two of these are free institutions and one of them is constantly before the public as having obtained donations from such and such persons.

MR. A. Smith has made over charge to Mr C. C. Stevens as junior Member of the Board of Revenue, and Mr. C. W. Bolton has been confirmed as Senior Secretary to the Board, vice Mr. C. E. Buckland, whom he had been officiating.

AS Commissioner of the Presidency Division, Mr. J. Beames has begun as a mild lamb. In his present capacity, he is displaying nothing of that temper against the Baboo which he had acquired after his removal from the Board of Revenue.

BABOO Ram Charan Bose, Deputy-Magistrate and Deputy-Collector, 24-Pergunnahs, has obtained his peace. He has at last been granted furlough for six months for which he had applied some months ago. He is not expected to join the service again. This will be the third retirement of old and experienced Native Deputy Magistrates since the advent of Mr. Baker. Baboo Bankim Chunder Chatterjee left in disgust, Baboo Hem Chunder Ker followed him and now Baboo Ram Charan is about to take the same course.

LIEUTENANT-Colonel J. E. Sandeman has been appointed Superintendent and Lieutenant R. T. Crichton Assistant Superintendent for carrying out the survey in Orissa.

RAJA Baikuntha Nath De Bahadur, of Balasore, has offered to establish a charitable dispensary, to be called the "Elliott Charitable Dispensary", at Soro, on the Jaganath road, in the district of Balasore. The Raja Bahadur is unwilling to take the full credit of this necessary charity, but draws in a local permanent fund to assist him in the work. He is ready to guarantee for ten years the payment of Rs. 300 a year or Rs. 25 a month, provided the local Pilgrims Lodging-house Fund contribute a corresponding amount. The Lieutenant Governor has accepted the offer and thanked the Raja for his "liberality."

BABOO Krishna Mohun Rudra Sirkar, of Irapala, in the Midnapore District, has earned the thanks of the Local Government for "liberality and public spirit." He has deposited in the sub-treasury at Ghatal the sum of Rs. 13,500, in order to endow a charitable dispensary which he proposes to establish in his native village of Irapala. The conditions attached to the gift are that the institution be called after his deceased father, Ram Prosad, and that if at any future time Government finds it necessary to close the institution, he and his heirs shall have the right to withdraw the invested funds from the custody of Government.

A FREE and unrestricted charity—"a most liberal donation"—"a munificent gift"—is that of Syed Mahomed Mahdi Hossain Khan of Patna. He gives Rs. 10,000, to form the nucleus of a fund for the establishment of a Female Medical Hospital in that city.

A MEETING was held on Saturday last, in the L. M. S. Institution, Bhowanipore, to elect delegates to the forthcoming Nagpore Congress. A Congress paper announced the meeting in its column of sporting news.

THE Hon'ble L. R. W. Forest has been re-elected Chairman of the Bombay Chamber of Commerce.

DR. Gholab Shah, late of Cabul, has married at Liverpool, according to Mahomedan rites, the widow of the late Mr. Spencer Robinson, whose family embraced the faith of Islam some months ago.

COLONEL Olcott arrived at Colombo on November 30. He will proceed to Madras in time for the annual Convention of Theosophists.

THE Council Hall, Poona, has been placed at the disposal of the Commission to enquire into and report upon the working of the Deccan Agriculturists Relief Act. The Commission is expected to finish its labors before the end of March next.

THERE seems to be a general desire in Bombay to commemorate, in some permanent form, the name of the late aeronaut Lieutenant Mansfield, whose unfortunate adventure and death last week has been already noticed.

It seems that the millennium has arrived at last. The recent manifestations of coalition between Christian Missionaries and gentlemen professing the Hindoo faith, are inexplicable on any other hypothesis. The meeting held on 5th December, in the hall of the General Assembly's Institution, for considering the shastric aspect of sea voyages by Hindus, was, no doubt, for a cause with which Christians of all shades of opinion—missionaries as well as lay men—might well sympathise. But as if a building dedicated to the service of Jesus Christ was the best place for the discussion of Vedic and Sanhita texts, a meeting was, on Saturday last, held again in the same hall, under the auspices of an institution bearing the name of a Hindu deity. The chairman in this assembly was Dr. Gmudas Banerjee, and the speaker was Pandit Rajani Kant Gupta. The lecture was on the four Asramas, or stages, in the ideal of life recommended by our Rishi's. We may, at a future time, have to say something about the subject matter of the discourse. For the present, we have only to congratulate all concerned in the meeting for the catholic spirit evinced by them in bringing the religions of Christ and Chaitanya en rapport and in overlooking the incongruity of holding shastric debates in a Christian Missionary Hall.

THE enormous Gothic pile on the Esplanade, formidable in the imagination of the people as the Temple of Justice, is in a fair way of becoming an Egyptian Hall or Astley's Amphitheatre. There are some amusing performers on the establishment. It is particularly given up to illusions. A most extraordinary instance of sleight of hand recently occurred. During the late Long Vacation, the sitting bench having ordered the great Dacca case, in which the leading Vakeel of that District is implicated, to be transferred to the High Court, the records of the case were despatched from Dacca to Calcutta in a wooden box. A wooden box duly came, but, on opening it at the High Court, it was found filled with ashes only, the debris of burned papers. All sorts of speculation followed the strange incident. The destruction of the proceedings in the prosecution was accepted, as a certainty. Who was the destroyer? That was the question. Each side, of course, accused the other. The defendant was easily suspected, but his friends were perfectly within their right to suspect the enemy, and they repelled the suggestion back upon the local clique which, as they suggested, in jealousy of his unparalleled success and influence, had seized a likely opportunity for his ruin. Meanwhile, there was great stir in the High Court. A grand overhauling took place—a rummaging of all offices from the lower courts up to the House of Commons and to the Privy Council—and a bullying of clerks and criers and messengers.

After the box containing the record sent from the Dacca Court had reached the High Court with the papers burned, one would think there was little purpose in any such subsequent inquiry. But those who engaged themselves in this seemingly bootless errand, knew what they were about. Certainly, perseverance has been rewarded with success. On Monday last, a box was found lying on a table in a room in the court house. How it came there has yet to be discovered, but, as it was a box that had been left on the top of an abnirah, its unexplained descent caused its contents to be examined, when lo! and behold! the missing Dacca nadhi—the record hitherto reported to be burned—was found in it safe and sound in all its integrity!

Was there ever a better case of mysterious disappearance and unexpected turning up?

It seems that the various powers under law and practice exercised by the Commissioner of Police, Calcutta, are not enough for that functionary. The last Calcutta Gazette appoints Mr. J. Lambert, C. I. E., a Presidency Magistrate for this town. This announcement is followed up by the vesting of the two stipendiary Magistrates—Mr. F. J. Masden, Chief Presidency Magistrate, and Syud Ameer Hossein, C. I. E., Presidency Magistrate, Northern Division—with power under section 144 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, to issue orders absolute at once in urgent cases of nuisance, for prevention of “obstruction, annoyance or injury or risk of obstruction, annoyance or injury to any persons lawfully employed, or danger to human life, health or safety, or a riot or an affray.” The recent riots, we are afraid, must account for these additional powers, as for the arming of the police with swords, rifles and bamboo lathis.

MR. W. HOLMWOOD, Inspector-General of Registration, Bengal, will probably be made a District Judge, and, in that case, his place will to be taken by Mr. W. C. Macpherson. Mr. Holmwood has a high reputation as an executive officer and is believed to be one of the few men best qualified for secretariat work.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

UNDER the head of Contemporary Poetry, we have rescued from oblivion and loss many of the finest pieces of fugitive literature. As regards metrical form, our exhibition has been particularly rich in sonnets. We have also sought to present our readers with translations from the poetry of other than English-speaking nations. Having already given many specimens of German and Spanish and a few of French genius, we this day print two from the Italian. Although the work of an obscure writer, they are highly meritorious productions, as may be seen from the translations. Of course, a great deal, in these cases, depends upon the translator, and Carlo Maria Maggi, whose two sonnets will be found Englished in our front page, was lucky in his.

A LONDON telegram of the 14th speaks of terrific gales raging on all the coasts of Great Britain and of many wrecks.

INDIA and England are not the only countries which have this year suffered from the wrath of the storm god. Delaware, Baltimore and Washington have been struck with a fearful cyclone and waterspout.

THE miseries caused in Russia by famine, were aggravated by typhus fever, and now small-pox has appeared on the scene to further heighten the calamity.

LORD Dufferin has succeeded Lord Lytton as British Ambassador at Paris. This announcement has revived the oft-contradicted rumour of the early retirement of Lord Lansdowne. He had succeeded Lord Dufferin in Canada and has followed him to India and may replace him in Rome.

THERE was in London a Conference of four hundred rural delegates, to discuss the reform of the Land and Poor Laws, the Magistracy, and Disestablishment of the Anglican Church. Reuter does not report the proceedings, but gives the opinions expressed by Mr. Gladstone at a breakfast given to the delegates. According to him, the amelioration of the lot of the labourers was a question of urgency. He would wish much to see an increase of rural candidates in Parliament, their electoral expenses being borne by the country. He was in favor of a fairer division of rates, and empowering the local authorities to acquire land for allotment and of formation of Village Councils. He justified Labour strikes for increased rates of wages.

THE French Chamber of Deputies have negatived, by a majority of 165 votes, the motion of M. Hubbard for the separation of Church and State. The Chamber have also recorded a vote of confidence in the Government.

THERE is disagreement between France and Bulgaria, in consequence of the latter refusing to permit the recall of a French journalist who was expelled from Bulgaria.

THE Nihilists have served the Czar with a demand for a Russian Parliament.

THE first year of General Booth's "Darkest England" scheme is satisfactory. The report shews a receipt of £116,000. Of the work done, we are told that two hundred thousand beds were found in London and over two million free meals given to the poor. Two hundred men are employed on Colonial farms established by the Army. The General is now in Ceylon. On the 17th, he lectured at Colombo on the social scheme. The Governor was present and subscribed to the fund.

WITH the death of Mr. Parnell, Irish politics is cantering merrily to Donnybrook fan. Here are the details of a late encounter:—

“On Tuesday, while Mr. Healey was in the library of the Four Courts at Dublin, word was brought to him that Mr. MacDermott wanted to see him. He went out into the passage and found himself confronted by a tall young man, twenty-two years of age, the son of a solicitor and a nephew of Mr. Parnell's. Mr. MacDermott had a riding whip in his hand; he immediately seized Mr. Healey by the collar and proceeded to castigate him with great vigour. The blows sounded like the beating of a carpet. Mr. Healey struggled to get free, and tried to strike his assailant with his fists, but the latter was too powerful and held him at arm's length, thrashing him, while Mr. Healey jumped about the passage minus his wig, but uttering no cry. Meanwhile a spectator fetched a policeman, who at first seemed puzzled how to act. However, he rescued Mr. Healey after the latter had received fifty six cuts on the body and shoulder. The constable asked Mr. Healey if he gave Mr. MacDermott in charge. This Mr. Healey declined to do, and left the corridor and returned to the library to resume his studies. Mr. P. O'Brien and Mr. W. Redmond wired to Mr. MacDermott from Cork: ‘Bravo! We congratulate you on having whipped that cowardly cur who has attacked a defenceless and sorrowing woman.’ Yesterday Mr. P. O'Brien, speaking at Cork, called for three good cheers for the man who whipped the cur, which were heartily given. It is reported that the ladies of Longford, Mr. Healey's constituency, have decided to present Mr. MacDermott with a silver mounted whip.”

ON the 13th, the Parnellites opposed the entry at Waterford of Messrs. O'Brien and Davitt, for electioneering purposes, by barring the town gate. The Anti-Parnellites resisted the attempt. They stormed the position and entered the town. A fierce struggle followed, stones being freely used by the rival parties. The Police interfered and repeatedly charged the rioters. Mr. Davitt was badly cut about the head.

The Parnellites again, on the 14th, attacked the members attending the National Federation meeting at Ennis. The result was a serious riot, in which Mr. Dillon was severely assaulted and badly cut about the face.

THE dream of a through railway between India and Europe, may at last be a fait accompli. We are told :—

"The project of railway connection between London and India is once more before British capitalists. The idea this time is to extend the Ottoman Railway through Persia and to join it with the Indian system of railways. One spur of the Ottoman Railway has already reached Anatolia. It is proposed forthwith to carry this on to Bagdad. It has been ascertained that, as far as the Porte is concerned, the necessary concessions will be made, and the men who have taken the business in hand are of the kind likely to carry it through."

THE Russian Governor of Turkestan has thanked Colonel Yanoff for the brilliant manner in which he traversed the Russian portion of the Pamirs. It is admitted that the Colonel acted under orders. Nor is there any doubt that the expedition under the command of Colonel Yanoff was of a military character.

CAPTAIN A. C. Yate, who had last year travelled in Central Asia, has, under date Kurrachee, Oct. 16, addressed a letter on the Pamir question to the Times. Here is the cream of it :—

"From my experience of the methods by which Russia arrives at the settlement of her frontiers, I am of opinion that the question of right or wrong has no bearing on this affair in the Pamir. If Penjdeh and the experiences of the Afghan Boundary Commission did not teach us that 'might is right,' it ought to have done so. What the Russians won then they won by sheer bravado and astute diplomacy. They had got the measure of the British Ministry before they began operations, and they took the measure of the local situation as they went on. The result was the bold stroke at Penjdeh, which dealt at the time a very heavy blow to our prestige in Persia and Afghanistan. It must be admitted that everything seemed to work in their favour at that time. The British Government seemed to attach no importance to the 'Chul,' forgetting that 150 to 200 miles of desert is one of the strongest of defensive frontiers. Then, again, the British Commissioner considered that the policy of the Government he served enjoined upon him a degree of patience and forbearance that English generals would not, as a rule, be disposed to show towards filibustering Russians."

"It is to be hoped that, whatever Ministry may be in power, we shall not again have to bear the mortification of defeat by a weaker but astuter and bolder rival. Very much depends on the man on the spot. Russia is now represented by General Kuropatkin in Transcaspia and by General Baron Vrevsky in Turkestan. Grodekoff (of 'ride to Herat' fame) was commanding the troops at Tashkend, and M. Paul Lessar represented diplomacy at Bokhara at the end of last year when I was travelling in those parts. These are some of the men with whom we have to reckon. We may ourselves reckon, presumably, on the support of China. Our best guarantee is a bold and resolute man on the spot."

That is the characteristic expression of Anglo-Indian militarism. There is no mincing of matters. The Captain speaks with unconcealed cynicism. There is no question of right and wrong. Might is the only right recognized in the political sphere. All that may sound deep and very practical, but it is sad stuff. It might be something if you were always the stronger party in every dispute. That being uncertain, Captain Yate, in speaking contemptuously of morality in affairs, is perhaps engaged in suicidal work. He hints at the Russians' bad faith, but he scarcely permits himself to condemn them. And no wonder, because he hopes England will do likewise, whenever she got a chance.

MARRIAGE is an important event in the life of every individual, but is specially so in the case of great authors. The news that Rudyard Kipling, the rising star in literature, is engaged to be married, cannot therefore fail to be of interest to the public. The author of Plain Tales from the Hills is at present only twenty-six years old.

LEPROSY may not be contagious in all cases. But there can be no doubt that it is sometimes so. The penalty that Father Damien paid for his devotion to the relief of the wretched sufferers from this dreadful malady, is wellknown. We are now told that the Rev. W. D. Dalrymple of the Presbyterian Mission, who lately died of it at Rampore Bauleah, contracted it by his efforts to alleviate similar misery.

THE days of the Congress seem to be numbered. With the exception of Assam and the Punjab, all the Provinces of India have been honoured by its sittings, and its "father and mother", Mr. A. O. Hume, now announces that the forthcoming Congress at Nagpur is to be the last of its kind in India. We pity Shillong and Lahore for the invidious distinction which is to keep them in the cold shade of neglect, though their escape from the expenditure which the honour would have involved may be regarded as a matter of congratulation too.

THE Congress came into existence under high auspices and with liberal promises. To give it a good start in life, its promoters devoted their money and their energy without stint. During the last seven years, it has cost them more than ten lacs of Rupees. But what is the result? As a political organisation bringing together a large number of leading men from different parts of the country, it is entitled to the sympathy of every one interested in our national welfare. But if it is to be judged by the Baconian test of "fruits," apart from the exuberance of its wordy foliage, it has achieved literally nothing. The line which it took up and pursued, made its failure inevitable. Its programme did not admit of its chalking out an independent career. The possibility of its success depended entirely upon the generosity of the Government which it sought to supersede or rival. The result is that, in spite of its brilliant speeches and resolutions, it is now about to end in smoke. How different its fate would have been if its leaders had devoted their energy and resources towards the development of the country's economical resources?

POLITICAL powers and privileges have no doubt their value. But they are never attainable without a hard struggle. What is thoroughly feasible and is wanted most urgently, is, not political, but economical independence. If we could secure the liberation of our manufacturing industries from the domination of Manchester, we might, at least for the present, do without the forms of constitution demanded by Mr. Hume's Congress.

THE reason why Government has determined to effect a cadastral survey of the Behar Division, may be found to some extent in the following paragraph in the Bengal Resolution on the last annual report of the Excise department :—

"The revenue from tari rose during 1890-91 from Rs. 8,26,314 to Rs. 8,45,586, and the settlements made during the current year lead the Excise Commissioner to anticipate a revenue of Rs. 9,35,000. Of the amount realised in the past year, Rs. 5,67,185 were collected in the Patna and Bhagalpore Divisions, while Rs. 1,66,257 were levied in the Presidency Division. Hooghly, Howrah and Cuttack raise about Rs. 25,000 a piece under this head, but elsewhere throughout the province the revenue is insignificant. The Excise Commissioner discusses at length the important question of developing the receipts from tari, on the system introduced first in Bombay and afterwards in Madras with excellent result, the duty having produced in the Madras Presidency a revenue of 44 lacs in the last year for which returns are available, and proposes the introduction of a more precise system under which the license fee would be fixed according to the number of trees tapped for juice. A register of trees is being prepared in Patna, and inspecting officers are collecting statistics. At the same time the rights of the landholders to levy rent on the trees will, as the Board observe, have to be investigated and definitely settled."

Whatever be the immediate object of Government in ordering the cadastral survey, the figures given in the above extract leave no room for doubt that the adjudication of the rights of tenants in respect of trees growing on their lands, and the numbering of the tal and the mohwa trees, would materially improve the excise revenue. That being the case, it is obviously the duty of Government to contribute a much larger share than it has offered to bear of the cost of the survey.

IN the Raniganj shooting case, the Sessions Judge of Burdwan, Mr. F. W. Badcock, has reversed the decision of the Deputy Magistrate, Mr. A. J. Fraser, convicting Adolf Sonnenschein, under section 304 A, I. P. P., and fining him Rs. 500 for culpable negligence resulting in the death of a native Ranjit Rai. The Austrian has been acquitted and the fine ordered to be refunded.

The convicting Deputy Magistrate has been sent away on furlough, and the fine remitted. It now only remains to alter the criminal law and by admitting all Europeans in this country to the privileges of the British-born—to complete the programme laid down at the meeting of the non-official European residents of the Raniganj district, on the 3rd November, at the Railway Institute at Assensole.

WE read in the Calcutta Gazette of the week that Mr. F. C. Henvey, Assistant Conservator of Forests, is posted to the Jalpaiguri Forest Division for special duty in connection with the preparation of Working-Plans. Simultaneously with that notification, we see in the Englishman of the same date, Wednesday the 16th December, that Mr. Henvey was shot dead in the Tondur reserve—a large forest in the Jalpaiguri district. According to the narrative in the daily, Mr. Henvey was deputed to point out sal logs to Messrs. S. and G. Shillingford who have contracted to supply sleepers for the Duars Railway. They had been, on a previous occasion, attacked by a rogue elephant, and, upon its reappearance, they proposed to shoot it. For this purpose, they, with one 500 express rifle and two shot guns and accompanied by Mr. Henvey, entered the forest at night. The night was bright and some natives were instructed to light fires and drive the animal. Hearing something coming towards him, Mr. S. Shillingford fired into the jungle. The shot was fatal. It killed no elephant or native, but the Assistant Conservator of the Forest. Mr. Henvey is a son of the Resident Henvey, and came out in December, 1890.

THIS is the twelfth day of the Hyderabad Diamond case in the Criminal Sessions. The prosecution closed on the 10th day. Mr. Inverarity concluded his defence yesterday. After finishing his long address, he examined two or three witnesses very briefly. He asked permission of the Court to put in the evidence of Sir Dennis Fitzpatrick, the Resident, taken on Commission at Hyderabad. The Advocate General opposed its admission on the grounds on which that of the Nizam was declared inadmissible. But the Court ruled otherwise, and the Resident's evidence was read to the Jury. At the rising of the Court on Tuesday, Sir Charles Paul gave notice, with reference to a recent ruling, that if any evidence had been wrongly admitted or wrongly disallowed, he, prosecuting in the case as Advocate-General, would be bound to give a certificate in the case of any application for a new trial.

THE contremeps which kept away Mr. Rattigan from the defence of the jeweller Jacob, is further explained in a letter addressed by the Junior Advocate Edward J. Jacob, on behalf of the Calcutta Bar, to Mr. Rattigan and published this week. That letter makes Mr. Rattigan responsible for the articles on the subject in the Pioneer of the 9th December, in the Englishman of the 11th December and the Indian Daily News and the Pioneer of the 12th December, 1891, tracing their appearance in the three dailies to his part proprietorship of the Pioneer. The justification of the publication of the letter is based on his silence and non-contradiction in propria persona of the articles. It then reminds the Honorable head of the Punjab Bar that the Calcutta High Court refused his application to practise in that Court during the session in Calcutta of the Supreme Legislative Council of which he is an Additional Member, with liberty to apply to the presiding Judge for permission to defend Jacob. It then alludes to Mr. Rattigan's fear of refusal of the permission and his objection to meet such a rebuff in open court. It next points out that he was advised to see Mr. Justice Wilson in his private room at Court or to ascertain his views through the Registrar or through one of his brother Judges with whom he was acquainted, which advice was not adopted, and that he never placed himself in a position to appear as Counsel for the defence.

The next reference controverts the statement that all the senior counsel of the local bar were retained for the prosecution. It is pointed out that with the exception of the Advocate-General, and Messrs. Woodroffe and Jackson, the defence was free to engage the Standing Counsel and others, such as Messrs. Monmohun Ghose, Hill, Evans, Bonnerjee, T. A. Apcar, seniors to Mr. Rattigan at the Bar.

It is distinctly denied that the Calcutta Bar entertained any objection to any outsider appearing in the Diamond case, on the score of etiquette or otherwise.

III. Other Holidays.

The second day following Christmas Day ... 27th December.

H. H. RISLEY,

Offg. Secy. to the Govt. of Bengal.”

It is to be noticed that the Doorga Pooja and the Christmas holidays under the Act, are equal in duration—four days being given to the Hindu as well as to the Christian Festival. Here is equality to be sure.

The holiday notification has been a blundering business since 1890, when the ruthless hand of the destroyer cut down the Doorga Pooja long vacation. It commenced with that blunder. The first notification for the holidays for that year issued the year before was rectified. That rectification again required another. And the present needs rectifying too. “The Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881” is numbered XXVI of 1881 in the statute book and not XVI as in the above notification in the Calcutta Gazette of the 16th December 1891. There is, however, an appropriateness in the authority quoted in the notification. Act XVI is a destructive law and might be employed to remove or destroy the long vacation. Under Act XXVI, “the expression ‘public holiday’ includes Sundays: New-Year's day, Christmas day: if either of such days falls on a Sunday, the next following Monday; Good Friday; and any other day declared by the Local Government, by notification in the official Gazette, to be a public holiday.” In the current year, we had only 4 days Doorga and Lakhi Pooja public holidays, namely, the 10th, 12th, 13th and 17th October, the two days 11th and 18th October being Sundays. There being no provision in the Act, as in regard to New-Year's and Christmas days, the Local Government would not declare the 14th and 19th October public holidays. Still it was open to it to do so. This concession is not asked for in regard to the other Hindu holidays. But surely the grandest Hindu Pooja may claim the same consideration which is shewn to the chief Christian festival.

THE standing orders of Government with regard to applications for extra budget grants, require that, before proposing any additional expenditure, the officer making the same should endeavour to meet it by savings in other grants. When the local officers are unable to provide for the expenditure out of the grants at their disposal, the head of the department must be applied to and he shall see whether the expenditure is necessary, and, if so, provide funds by reappropriation out of the grants of the department under his control. If still unable to find the fund, he is at liberty to apply to Government for sanction for additional expenditure. But he must, at the same time, shew cause why it should not be postponed to the next financial year, with the further cause why the expenditure was not foreseen and included in the year's estimates. The Accountant-General is also required to report on the feasibility of the reappropriation thus proposed by the local officers, to indicate the possibility of meeting the expenditure from savings in the same major head or other heads, or of allowing the charge to proceed against general savings in the total Provincial grant. After these preliminary steps, the application becomes ripe for the order of Government, and it may then be granted or rejected.

IN February last, the Municipal Commissioners of Calcutta instructed their Budget Committee for the present year to provide for an increase of pay of the Chairman from Rs. 2,500 to Rs. 3,000 per month. It was not, however, allowed by the Local Government with whom rested the final sanction. Sir Charles Elliott would not disallow the addition but he wanted to be satisfied of its necessity before sanctioning it. So he laid down the rule that if the Commissioners decided on any addition to Mr. Lee's pay, a majority of them, not less than 38, must vote for it, and such reasons given as would satisfy their constituents. On this opinion, the Commissioners decided not to take up the question before the next Budget. The determination of the Chairman to avail himself of the furlough to which he was entitled, unless the increase was given, led, however, to the reconsideration of the question, in a modified form, before its time. And, at a special meeting of only 37 Commissioners, on Thursday last, the motion was carried, by 21 votes against 13, granting a house allowance of rupees five hundred a month to the Chairman, from January 1892.

It is now left to Sir Charles Elliott to decide whether this allowance is to be granted or not. He was against giving increased pay, but he may take a different view with regard to the present grant, though the distinction between pay and house allowance is not of much practical importance to rate payers. A decision of the Commissioners cannot be vetoed by the Provincial ruler without hampering what is popularly called "local self-government." Nor can the head of a Government withhold his sanction in such a case, without damping the zeal of his immediate subordinates and making his own position very uncomfortable. In the case of the former Chairman, the late Sir Ashley Eden, at first scouted the idea of giving him house allowance, but allowed it, intimating, however, that it was not to be considered as an increase of pay but as a contribution towards the maintenance of the position and dignity of the post. He further suggested that by capitalizing the sum, a house might be built for the Chairman of the Corporation. The idea of a public residence for the Chairman was not given effect to. The Chairman continued to draw the allowance, and started the entertainment of a Garden Party on the Queen's Birthday. Mr. Lee commenced with the Garden Party, but dropped it, as he was not allowed the extra emolument. We may now expect the revival of the only public entertainment in deserted Calcutta in the hot days.

WE announce with sincere pleasure that the Hon'ble Dr. Rash-behan Ghosh has just been appointed an additional member of the Council of the Viceroy and Governor-General for making Laws and Regulations. A leading pleader of the High Court, of more than twenty years' standing, Emeritus Tagore Professor, author of a classical treatise on the law of mortgage, an active member of the Bengal Legislature, to which he has been repeatedly called, Dr. Ghosh's fitness for the appointment goes without saying. After his success at the Bengal Chamber, he had so to say established a claim to translation to the higher Conclave. Yet, it is far from the rule to put the right man in the right place, and as Dr. Ghosh does not play to the gallery nor haunts antechambers, we were not hopeful that his name would be brought forward before the Viceroy. It is not a little to the credit of Lord Lansdowne that, after so many months passed away from Bengal Proper, he should come and make such a hit.

PANDIT ISWAR C. VIDYASAGAR AND DR. RAJENDRALALA MITRA IN AMERICA.

BOTH Pandit Iswar Chandra Vidyasagar and Dr. Rajendra Lala Mitra, were men of such mark that their fame travelled beyond the four corners of their fatherland. The vanishing from the world of either, whenever it might occur, was sure to be taken notice of, among other nations. The almost simultaneous departure of the two literary cousins—cousins in hate too, by the way, as in letters—could not fail to strike the world at large. Accordingly, we see India receiving the earnest condolences of the literary world abroad on her double deprivation. In all parts of the globe with any pretensions to civilization, our two lost countrymen are being mourned and glorified. Even rude Queensland has had her say. Intrinsically, the utterances are not very noteworthy, being, necessarily, for the most part, but echoes of the obituary notices of the Calcutta newspapers. Unfortunately, the Indian press displayed a sad want of enterprise on the occasion. No independent effort was visible—no personal research was instituted. Everybody looked up to the papers to tell the country all about its lost worthies, and the papers merely looked up their guide. In that emergency, the whole press—Reis and Rayyet of course excepted—relied entirely on Ghose's compilation. Some of the Anglo-Indian offices corrected Ghose's grammar, but in general the editors neither added nor subtracted. It was amusing to see the very opinions of Mr. Lok Nath Ghose adopted undesignedly by Englishmen. With such leading, foreign writers could only maintain the self-same groove, and swell the same chorus. And so they are doing. It will be different when the experts, or when those who, in some measure at least, knew the deceased personally, come to speak. They may not supply biographical data of much value, beyond an occasional anecdote, but their intelligent estimate of character and services will command attention. It is always worth knowing how any of our distinguished men impressed ingenious strangers. Such criticism from without is most suggestive.

Of the many paragraphs and articles that have to this day come from abroad, the most noteworthy by far is the notice taken by a leading newspaper of New York. Although anonymous, it shows uncommon grip. It is evidently the work of one who knows as well as understands. For the benefit of our readers, we reproduce it below. Although Dr. Mitra predeceased Pandit Iswar Chandra—by three days—the latter is first noticed. Thus:—

"A grievous loss has befallen the native community of Calcutta in the death, on the 29th of July, at the age of seventy, of the most eminent and enlightened of its scholars and one of the foremost of its philanthropists, Pandit Iswarachandra Vidyasagara. Learned, liberal, conciliating, and modest, the Pandit was in equal measure revered by his own people and respected by all Englishmen and Americans with whom he was brought into contact. Of his sterling merits, whether as a man, as an educationist, or as a writer and editor, anything like full particulars would be out of place in our column. Nor can more than brief reference here be made to the demonstrations of regret which followed the announcement of his decease. A single one may, however, be mentioned. As he was a Brahmin, some of the pupils of his own school evinced their sense of bereavement, inappropriately enough, though from laudable motives, by resolving to go barefoot for ten days; this being, among Hindus of sacred rank, the manner of mourning for their near kindred. Born of parents far from wealthy, the Pandit, utilizing a sound education of the old stamp and improving on it with prescient sagacity, succeeded in raising himself, by energy and perseverance, both to material prosperity and to such fame as few of his countrymen have, in later times, achieved. Alike theoretically and practically a devoted friend of female education, he established no fewer than forty schools for native girls, to the support of which he contributed with his habitual munificence. In him the remarriage of widows also had a strenuous advocate; and it was mainly owing to his exertions that the Indian Government was induced, in 1856, to pass an act by which the sons of married Hindu widows are entitled to inherit property. Of his various publications, the high value is recognized by all competent judges; and, by general acknowledgment, his mother tongue is indebted to him in no small degree for its present expansion, purity, and elegance. For independence of character, for moral excellence of every description, and specially for humanity and beneficence, one could not be all accounts, award him praise exceeding his deserts. That, in his latter years, he withdrew himself a good deal from commerce with his educated compatriots, as distrusting their moral courage, was, let it be hoped, because of his misunderstanding them. Several meetings have, as was to be expected, been held in honor of his memory, which abundantly claims to be kept alive by some substantial endowment bearing his name."

The writer's estimate of Vidyasagar is thoroughly gracious. It is a great pleasure to see one of our countrymen's fame sung so eloquently on the distant shores of the Atlantic, in a world undreamed of by our Rishis. The notice of Mitra is in a different vein. It will not please friends; it is so downright frank. Nothing, it would seem, is extenuated, though nought set down in malice. The extent of Dr. Mitra's fame throughout the world, is fully acknowledged, and the appreciation of his labors by such authorities as Max Müller is pointedly referred to, before taking his true measure.

"The death of Pandit Ewanachandra was preceded, by an interval of only three days, by that of his fellow townsman, Rajendralala Mitra, a person who attained, outside of India, a much greater celebrity, yet one which he will eventually be found to have little deserved. His character, as drawn by those who were most intimate with him, by no means commands respect. In what he accomplished in book-making and the like, as in his literary career, traces of want of conscience are too often discoverable. As to the immense amount of work, ranging from good to exceedingly bad, for which he has the credit, by far the greater part of it was executed by others; and his assistants were seldom of the best. The traits of the jack-law of natural history and folk are it once associated with the thought of him. In his numerous editions of Sanskrit texts, and in his translations and what not, there is little that is trustworthy, or that possesses other than slight value; his acquaintance with the ancient language of India having been that of a mere scholar. In fact, the whole compass of his information was superficial in the extreme, while his pretentiousness knew no limits. His edition of the Ten Commandments and the Twelve Tables will suggest what he was capable of. Prof. Max Müller has, however, seen fit to name him side by side with Nabahr, and has also spoken of him as a Brahmin, whereas he belonged to the humblest of the Hindu caste, the Sudra, or servile. According to his own account of his origin, he was of descent no less than royal; a claim which nothing could surpass for preposterousness. In short, he was of a piece throughout, and, equally as regards scholarship and personally, was such that, the more narrowly he is scrutinized, the more unattractive will be the estimate of him which facts will necessitate."

The American writer evidently understands the matters he speaks about. One must not speak lightly before such a critic. But with all deference to him, we must be allowed to say that we can not accept his judgment without reservation. In much that this New York publicist writes, we anticipated him. We endeavoured to draw a correct sketch of the eminent Bengali, with honest accuracy. It was a study in chiaroscuro. Although we could not deal in extravagant eulogy of a mythical Mezzofanti who was also a medical man and a lawyer, still we could not be blind to his positive and great merits. Without being a conspicuous or accurate linguist, he was a vigorous controversialist. He was blessed with a strong intellect, a great capacity for work, and no small amount of determination and force of character. He could make a little provision go a great way. His birth and breeding as a Hindu, gave him an immense advantage over the greatest foreigners, and his accomplishments in English enabled him to make his mark among the learned.

HINDU IDEAL OF LIFE.

THE ideal of life recommended by our speculative thinkers, is very similar to that of the Stoic philosophers of ancient Greece. They all teach their followers to be indifferent to pleasure and pain. The Bhagbat Gita is full of this doctrine, and it is inculcated with more or less force in all our philosophical systems. They are never tired of asserting that the world is an illusion, and that it is altogether absurd for men to be elated by happiness, or to be grieved by misfortune. The ideal may be a noble one. It may be said to aim at exalting man to the level of gods. But the question is, Is it attainable? No one not actually demented would answer the query in the affirmative.

Whatever the merits of the doctrine may be, the practical lawgivers whose legislation still regulates our conduct in life, adopted a very different principle in framing their laws. The very groundwork of their Codes is the maxim that men desire happiness and wish to avoid pain. The experience of the whole world is against the possibility of resisting the cravings of our bodily organs. Our ancient lawgivers recognised this, and, unlike the teachers of other religions, enjoined marriage as a sacred duty. They declared it to be a purificatory ceremony which every man and woman is bound to go through. No doubt, they condemned the remarriage of widows. But they did so evidently to prevent greater evils, viz., bigamy and promiscuous intercourse. The effectual abolition of the beastly practice of nirryoga, which prevailed in ancient times, was perhaps also one of the objects which the sages had in view, when they declared against the propriety of the remarriage of widows. The Rishis who aimed at practical legislation, do not, however, make it absolutely obligatory, in any case, to fight against nature. They lay down different alternatives, to suit individual inclination and capacity.

If it be admitted that the physical constitution of man can never be so altered by philosophy or religious contemplation, as to place him altogether above his corporeal necessities, then the conclusion is irresistible that, in determining our actions in life, we must be guided by some other ideal than that which is prescribed by the speculative thinkers of ancient times. It is easy enough to teach others that we ought not to be pained by hunger, thirst or disease. But experience shows that with an empty stomach or a bodily malady, the wisest philosopher feels quite as miserable as any man of the world. The Pandit who expounds the law for others, very seldom takes care to conform to ordinances which enjoin abstinence of any kind. The professional orthodoxy which has recently come into fashion, may lead some journalists to support the cruel practice of chadasi in the form in which it is observed by the widows of Bengal. But do they ever practise it themselves? Their worst slanderers will not accuse them of such folly.

It may be all very well for them to say that the fasting of ekadasi which brings the widows of Bengal to the verge of death twice every month, elevates them to the position of so many goddesses. But the Bābū exegetes of our Shasters ought to know that the ordinances of our sacred scriptures on the subject are quite as binding on males as on females. Why is it then that they do not subject themselves to the discipline, and attain the level of gods? The fact is, that the ideal of stoic and Hindu philosophy is unattainable and absurd. It is condemned as impractical by the mode of life of the philosophers themselves.

The ignorance and dependent position of our women, naturally lead them to trust to our guidance. In our efforts to secure their moral elevation, we may be actuated by the best of motives. But the question is,—Whether we are justified in forcing upon them a discipline which, if based at all on shastric ordinances, is equally binding on us, but which we never think of going through ourselves? What is insisted upon by the Shasters, must be obeyed by the orthodox. But if our sacred scriptures do not make it imperative that widows should abstain altogether from every kind of food and drink on the ekadasi day, then what right have we to subject them to the cruel discipline to which they are victimised now?

To say that it serves to elevate them to the level of "gods and goddesses," is about quite as cruel and hypocritical, as the assurance of heaven* that the ruffians of Benares used to give to the pilgrims whom they murdered with impunity in former times. Those who justify ekadasi on such grounds, ought to know that our shastric ordinances are based upon express texts, and not upon any European, American or New Indian idea of expediency. If our critics can point to a sacred text which applies specially to widows, and which renders it obligatory on them to observe the fasting of ekadasi without any kind of food or drink, then we will not carry on the controversy further, but confess at once that our ground is not tenable. In the absence of such a text, their abstract reasoning may be regarded by them and their followers as quite convincing, but will fail to make any impression on the real Pandits, or upon any unsophisticated man of common sense. The view that fasting and other austerities ought to be forced upon widows, in order to elevate them morally, is not only dehors the question at issue in the controversy, but is utterly untenable, because a human being, with such cravings as he has, can never possibly rise to a higher level than that which is his own. All that the orthodox Hindu is concerned about is, to enquire what is laid down on the subject by the texts of our sacred scriptures. If the Bābū exponents of Hinduism are for taking the place of Manu and Yajñavalkya, and if they would impose a stricter discipline than that of the ancient legislators, they may in order to attain to the level of gods, perch themselves permanently on the top of some high pillar, like St. Simeon. The weathercocks who recently gave the honour of sainthood to a heterodox reformer, and would yet uphold the cruel practice of ekadasi as observed by the widows of Bengal, cannot be assigned a better place for their habitation. The world of practical and sincere men is too low for them to live and move in. It would be a great advantage to them and to their countrymen, if they could be fixed on the top of the nearest tower, to remove them out of harm's way.

A DIAMOND CONTROVERSY.

WHILE in India a monster gem—the Imperial Diamond—has for months been exercising society and lawyers and judges, until it is now the subject of an unprecedented state trial in the highest court, the servants in Europe are fighting over the history and claims of the chiefs of the jewel world in England.

Professor Maskelyne and Dr. Ball are engaged in a controversy as to the identity of the celebrated diamond Kohinoor. The Professor is of opinion that the Great Mogul—in the possession of the Shah of Persia—and the Kohinoor—with the Queen of England—are two separate diamonds. The Doctor says that the historical Great Mogul is the same as the Kohinoor and that, being whittled down by cleavage, it has assumed the appearance, the shape and the form that it has at present. He wrote to this effect in his Manual of the Geology of India. Published by order of Government, and he maintains the same opinion. Of course, in his view, the Shah's Great Mogul is a humbug.

The history of the Kohinoor given by Professor Maskelyne is orthodox. The gem was with the Rijas of Malwa in 1300 A.D. After the conquest of this country by Alaaddin Muhammad Shah in 1304, it was brought to Delhi, and, after the invasion of Baber in 1526, it passed into his hands. Baber gives the weight of the Kohinoor as 8 mshkals, being equivalent to about 589.088 grains. In the Exhibition of 1851, its weight was ascertained to be 589.52 troy grains or about 186 carats. Anselm de Boot, in the early years of the 17th century, speaks of Garcias de Orto, a Portuguese physician at the Viceregal Court of Goa, who saw a large diamond weighing 140 mangelins. De Boot puts its weight as equal to 187½ carats, whereas Le Cluz puts it at 700 apothecary grains or 573.8 troy grains, which is about 180 carats. The Kohinoor was surrendered by Muhammad Shah to Nadir, when the conqueror saluted this historic gem by its present name. It was given up by Shah Rukh to Ahmad Shah after great torture. Shah Sooja recovered it from his blinded brother Shah Zamaun, who secreted it in a crevice of his prison. Shah Sooja, under compulsion, handed it over to Fakker Noorooddeen, who was sent by Runjit Sing to take possession of it, and who, in doing so, remarked that it is a source of "good luck, for he who has possessed it has done so by overpowering the enemies." It is considered as the reputed talisman for acquiring imperial sovereignty over India. The notion is still prevalent that it brings both good and bad luck to its possessor.

As to the history of the Great Mogul, Bernier described it as "ce grand diamant que l'on estime sans pareil." It was a gift to the Emperor Shahjehan by Amir Jumla, a Persian adventurer, in the service of the King of Golconda. In 1665, Tavernier was invited by Aurungzebe to inspect his jewels. Tavernier saw the great diamond, which is a rose, round, very convex on one side. There was a small crack at the edge below, and a little flaw within. It weighed 319½ ratis or 280 "of our carats," the rati being ⅔ of a carat would give 279½ carats. Herein arises the difficulty. Tavernier's weight of 319½ ratis apparently agrees with that given by Baber as 320 ratis for the Kohinoor. Professor Maskelyne surmises that the ratis of Baber are gold ratis, 320 of which would be equal to 240 pearl ratis or 224 Deccan ratis of Ferishta. Professor H. H. Wilson, who contributed the account of the Kohinoor in the Official Catalogue of the Exhibition of 1851, put forward the view that Tavernier weighed the diamond with weights and scales supplied by Akil Khan its custodian. Although not expressly so recorded, this may be taken for granted. Akil Khan was the officer in charge of the Jewel department of the Imperial Household. Tavernier says that Akil Khan put the diamond in his hand. If the visitor was curious to ascertain by his own weightment the weight of the stone, there were the scales in the Juwaher Khana for it. Akil himself would hand them to him. There were no others. Tavernier did not visit the store of gems with his instruments and apparatuses. He would not be allowed to take them in. The department was jealously watched over and very strict rules regarding ingress and egress prevailed. Professor Maskelyne combats the view, however, and he adduces in support of his contention the fact that Tavernier's account in the tenth does not correspond with that given in the twenty-second chapter of his work. This fault Dr. Ball attributes to M. Samuel Chappauzeau, the editor of Tavernier. Professor Maskelyne, on the other hand, puts it on Tavernier himself, for he was somewhat illiterate and his memoirs were put into shape by extraneous aid. Further, he derived much information from personal contact with Bernier. The Great Mogul had been cut by a European, but Tavernier's drawing suggests a characteristically Indian-cut stone, resembling in form and faceting the Russian diamond Orloff.

*When the gundis began to belabour any pilgrim with their lathi, and he remonstrated, their usual reply was, "We are going to enable you to attain the merit of dying in this holy place," Dham prapt kar deta.

The Great Mogul is accompanied by two large diamonds; "while above and below, is a row of three enormous rubies encircled by emerald enamel. Ten pearls above and ten below, some of them $\frac{1}{4}$ of an inch in diameter, form a fringe to this gorgeous ornament."

There is another diamond of the precise weight of the Kohinoor, in the possession of the Shah of Persia. It is called Dariyanoor or "Sea of Light," and this Maskelyne identifies with the Golconda Table Diamond. Dr. Ball, however, shows no signs of giving up. He still harps on the key that the old Kohinoor or Great Mogul diminished has assumed the form of the present Kohinoor. So far it can be said that, when the Great Mogul and the Dariyanoor as identified by Maskelyne are in the possession of the Shah of Persia, there is little chance for Dr. Ball's theory that the Great Mogul or the old Kohinoor has—more from intention than accident—been reduced to the size of the present Kohinoor.

A DAY WITH FATHER NEWMAN.

MARLESFORD, ENG., March 18, 1891.

In the autumn of 1859, while crossing the Atlantic from Liverpool to the United States, I made the acquaintance of a compatriot, Father T., who had then for some time been associated with the celebrated Dr. J. H. Newman, subsequently raised to the cardinalate. Both of us intended to return to England in the course of the next spring; and Father T. expressed a hope that, as he was pretty certain of preceding me, I would call on him at Edgbaston, if I chanced to take Birmingham on my way to Southampton and Calcutta.

The following March found me at Birmingham, whence, one morning, after an early breakfast, I drove out to Edgbaston. The servant who answered the bell at the Oratory could tell me nothing about Father T., except that he was still away. Unsatisfied with this scanty information, I gave him my card, asking him to go and ascertain, if he could, something more definite. He came back with the message that Dr. Newman wished me to come in.

Despatching my errand to the famous Doctor as expeditiously as I was able, I was about to withdraw, when he requested me to be seated. I accepted his invitation. On my soon again offering to take my leave, I was once more politely detained by him, with the assurance that he was quite at leisure. I resumed my seat.

Since I had spoken of Father T. as my fellow-countryman, Dr. Newman was aware of my nationality. America, its people, and everything relating to both were, evidently, in spite of his perceptible antipathy to them, objects of interest to him. We talked on and on, he putting questions innumerable relative to them, and I replying to the best of my knowledge. Among the various Americans regarding whom he manifested curiosity, Dr. O. A. Brownson seemed to be foremost. Having read all the writings of that indefatigable and ingenious speculator, and being familiar with the history of his multifarious career, I had much to communicate which my querist owned to be new to him. In time, however, our conversation turned to India, where, as I had incidentally mentioned, I had spent a good number of years, including the momentous period of the mutinies of 1857. It turned out that I was the only actual witness of Sepoy atrocities that he had met with; and, before we had done with the subject, he drew from me many particulars of horrors and sufferings which I desired, as I still in vain desire, should pass from my memory. But finally we got on the topic of Hindu philosophy, in the study of which I had of late been zealously engaged. To this my untiring interrogator pinned me for a full hour and more, when, just as I was protesting, with reference to something demanded of me, that the point would require a whole day to develop and expound satisfactorily, the bell rang for dinner. Pressed to accompany him and refresh myself, if I could be content with monastic fare, nothing loth, after the compulsory exhaustion I had undergone, I followed my host to the refectory.

The four sides of the refectory were wainscoted. Near two of them that formed an angle stood small detached tables, each for a single person, with a form behind. The company consisted of nine or ten Fathers of the Oratory and myself. Roast-beef, potatoes, bread, beer, and a plain pudding composed our meal. These were passed from the kitchen through an opening in one side of the room, and were handed round by one Father after another. While we were dining, as if the promotion of dyspepsia were a discipline of piety, strict silence was observed by all, and yet mental entertainment was considerably provided. Diagonally opposite to the corner where the rows of tables met was an ambo, perched in which a young man, habited priestwise, read for our edification. First he gave us a chapter of the New Testament, of course from the Vulgate. Then followed, also in Latin, legends of several saints commemorated on the day that was passing. Last of all, we were treated to what I recognized as from Carlyle's 'French Revolution.' To that work, certainly, as to many others by the same pyrotechnic rhapsodist, the remark of Lord Macaulay is applicable, that its author "might as well write in Irving's unknown tongue, at once." It appeared to me, then, in no wise singular that Dr. Newman, with his critical sense of good English, after listening for a few minutes to the uncouth and spasmodic jargon that was stunning us, put up his hand, impatiently exclaiming "Sufficit." Carlyle being thus summarily dismissed, we finished our repast without a word spoken by any one.

Thanks being duly transacted, Dr. Newman informed me that "recreation" was next in order. Naturally enough, the term set me conjecturing. I thought of leap-frog, summersaults, hide-and-seek, and sundry other guileless diversions of like kind, though only to reject the idea of them, in favour of no idea whatever. But I was not long held in suspense. Headed by the Doctor, we proceeded to a spacious apartment where a large grate was in full blaze. In front of the fire, chairs were disposed in a semi-circle. We took our seats; and I soon discovered that the "recreation" of my solemn companions was general conversation. And very much indeed, both as to topics and as to tone, was it the conversation of the profane world. Through an aperture in one side of the room, just as in the refectory, creature comforts were handed in for us; only they were now merely supplementary tea and biscuits. All the waiting was done by Dr. Newman. There being no novelty to me in experience of "the pride that apes humility," so often discernible in professional niggers of the salt of the earth, this ostentatious exhibition of servitorship did not, I confess, affect me agreeably. Nor did I see anything to admire in an incident which happened while we were sipping our tea. One of the Fathers, finding his cup unpalatable, made a wry face, on noticing which, Dr. Newman seized the cup, and insisted on bringing him another, at the same time patting the fastidious shavelling on the shoulder, and coaxing him, precisely as if he were a little girl in a pet.

The "recreation" in which I participated was, in part, not such as I would have chosen. For many years I had then been accustomed, as I have been accustomed still more years since, to be regarded, because of being an obscure American, as, at best, an anthropological or anthropoidal phenomenon, a creature that must needs speak barbarously, that knew nothing, and that could have no ideas, principles, or aims but the most reprehensible and sordid. When cast among persons who, by their interrogatories or comments, have plainly signified that such was their preconceived estimate of me, I have always been as sparing of speech as was practicable, and, consequently, have been the more free to listen and to reflect. And so it was on the occasion in question. I learned much more from my opinionated inquisitors than they learned from me. And one of the things which I learned was, that Englishmen, in changing from Protestants to Romanists, are the same as ever in the article of ignorance touching Americans, and in the contempt for them which, even to this hour, forms a conventional feature of British tuition. With the patience which abundant demand for practice of it had made easy to me, I once more underwent a diatribe on what were taken for granted to be, without gainsay, the blemishes and shortcomings of my countrymen.

Daylight was disappearing before I left the Oratorians. The impression which they produced on me I lost no time in committing to paper, so that, in recounting it, I am not obliged to depend on recollection. Everything that had passed before me bore, to my apprehension, the stamp of intellectual obliquity, ethical emasculation, grimace, hollowiness, or histrionism. All was unreal, and almost all looked insincere. It seemed strange to me, in particular, if Dr. Newman could lastingly influence, in the least degree, any but those who, what between ill-starred idiosyncrasy and irrational tutoring, had ripened into sentimental visionaries and enthusiasts. His allies were, manifestly, men of the same mould as himself; and his deliverance of some morbid half-poetical tancy, or subtle sophism, was what especially excited their delight and elicited their applause. That, like their leader, they were persons grown incapable of seeing truth in a dry light, and that they saw it through a haze of fantastic theory and refracting prejudice, was, to me, a lifelong student of theology, but, for all that, still an unresolved investigator, palpable beyond all mistaking. I had read and reread all that Dr. Newman had published; and the man himself was just what I expected from the author. Lord Macaulay, in one of his Speeches, aptly characterizes the jesuitical "Tract Number Ninety" as "a set of quibbles, under cover of which a diving may hold the worst doctrines of the Church of Rome, and may hold with them the best benefice of the Church of England." The concoctor of that Tract did not, when I was brought face to face with him, disappoint me at all in his favour.

As many are well aware, Mr. Charles Kingsley could easily have produced, if he had but had the patience to search long enough, repeated proofs of the grave disingenuousness which he laid at the door of Dr. Newman. One such proof, unless I am greatly mistaken, offers itself in what is about to be cited, namely, a passage occurring in p. 21 of Dr. Newman's 'Callista,' published in 1856:

"Under the cross were two or three pictures, or, rather, sketches. In the centre stood the Blessed Virgin, with hands spread out in prayer, attended by the holy Apostles Peter and Paul, on her right and left. Under this representation were rudely scratched upon the walls the words 'Advocata nostra,' a title which the earliest antiquity bestows upon her."

An eminent doctor of divinity was once inspired to discharge his spleen on me, as an American, because I approved of the measures taken to restore the integrity of the Union. One day, in conversation with this profound scholar, laying before him the words just quoted, I remarked that the phrase "earliest antiquity" could not there possibly point to any age later than the paulopost-apostolic, and added that, to the best I could discover, the term advocata was, at that period, altogether unknown. What ground, then, I went on to ask, was there for the allegation that the primitive Christians gave to the mother of Jesus the epithet "our advocate"? And how, if there was irrefragable authority for that designation of her, could a Protestant that supplemented the New Testament by other recorded traditions deny that he ought to enter the Roman communion? My collocator, who had long been an intimate friend of Dr. Newman, gave me no reply. I pressed him for one; and at last he angrily silenced me by saying that I was to submit my difficulty to some one else. If I failed to draw other than uncomplimentary inferences from this evasiveness, it was not for want of trying.

"It may be almost laid down as an historical fact, that the mystical interpretation and orthodoxy will stand or fall together." So writes Dr. Newman, in his 'Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine.' And the passage is noteworthy, for we see in it a man who deems himself not far from being a prophet, and who, as an arbitrary fantasist, takes rank with Origen and Jacob Boehme. Nor did the public misapprehend that he was what he was. Nevertheless, the grief and veneration which, on the announcement of his death, found expression in the English press, could have been foreseen. Those who knew him best have all concurred in representing him as distinguished, constitutionally, by melancholy, superstition, and unreasoning self-will; and he was, thus, except as to his mysticism, typically English. And again, he had rendered himself famous. In our own time, more than was ever the case before, his countrymen stand conspicuous as hero-worshippers; and in him they recognized a hero preeminently sharing their national characteristics. And this was enough to secure for him their reverent homage, though millions of them could not but acknowledge that his aspirations were such as, if realized, would go far to extinguish genuine enlightenment, and would operate to enslave the world once more to the execrable tyranny and the ridiculous mummeries of mendacious and self-seeking priestcraft.

THE NAGPORE CONGRESS.

Nagpore, 20th November 1891.

Dear Sir,—I find, here at Nagpore, all the preparations for the coming Congress well in hand. In no year and in no place have the necessary arrangements been taken in hand at such an early date and carried out so systematically and satisfactorily. So far as the Nagpore Berar Reception Committee are concerned, your Committee may rest assured that all will be well at the coming Congress.

You are doubtless aware that our English Committee, after repeatedly discussing the question and after most carefully considering it, have suggested to us that no more National Congress should be held in India until we have had a meeting in London. This latter would be held in 1893, if the general elections take place in 1892, in 1894 if these are postponed to 1893.

A word as to these elections. The liberal party believe that on the question of the Irish Local Government Bill, which the Conservatives are pledged to introduce next session, they will be in a position to force the hands of the Conservatives (many of whom are strongly opposed to even that mild measure of local self-government that Mr. Balfour, it is understood, will bring forward) and compel them to go to the country. On the other hand the Conservatives dispute this and declare that their whole party will vote solid whether they like the Bill or not, and that as it is of vast importance to them to gain time they will hold on if possible, to the last.

You see that while, doubtless, at the present moment an appeal to the country would bring in the Liberals with a small majority of from 15 to 45, according to different estimates, independent of the Irish vote, which, now that poor Mr. Parnell has gone, will practically be solid with them to the extent of at least 70, many things might happen, which would entirely change the aspect of affairs and result in a Conservative majority. Thus suppose the French saw fit to be nasty about Egypt, and in any way hector or threaten --- and though this unlikely now, a month ago it seemed highly probable--- the Gladstonians would be quite out of court---and the country if appealed to at such a crisis would certainly re-elect the Conservatives. There are a dozen other similar continental contingencies, none it is true apparently imminent, but any one of which may become so at a moment's notice, any one of which would vastly improve the prospects of Lord Salisbury and his following, and hence I fully believe what my Conservative friends told me before I left England, viz., that if possible they will hold on until the legal limit, i. e., until 1893. Of course the Liberals say that they will not permit them to do this, and doubtless any little accident may place the Conservatives at their mercy---but on the whole it will be safest for us to consider that our projected English gathering will not take place until 1894, and that if we decide to have no further meetings of the National Congress till after this the next assembly of this latter will not take place before 1895.

I find that in India many leading men agree with the Committee in London, and consider that for the present the National Congress has done its work, and that it is, therefore, inexpedient to continue to saddle the country with the lakh and a half which each National Congress costs until by the 'progress of affairs' fresh work for this Congress arises. In this view I entirely concur.

A great work had to be done---we had to clear our own ideas and then make them clear to our opponents: to thresh out, by persistent discussions, the wheat of our aspirations from the great body of chaff that, as in all such cases, accompanied it. We had to find out exactly what those reforms were, which the country, as a whole, most needed and most desired---we had to evolve and formulate a clear and succinct programme---to erect a standard around which now, and for all time, until that programme is realized, all reformers and well wishers of India could gather and so to place that programme on record that neither foreign autocrats, nor domestic traitors could efface its pregnant lines.

The great work has been accomplished, this programme has been built up by years of patient labour and promulgated, and it has been recorded more imperishably than on tablets of stone or bronze, for we have written it on the mind of the nation, we have graven it in the hearts of the people!

Asoka's monolithic edicts still stand, it is true, here and there, fossil records of a happier, purer age---yet for a thousand years or more they have been dead and dumb; but the ideas that we have sown can never pass away, never die, never grow dumb, but must develop and spread as time rolls by, eternal as the race amongst whose intellectual possessions they henceforth and for ever take their place.

Here, in India, for the moment, the work of the National Congress has been accomplished. The work that still remains has to be done partly by Provincial Congresses here and mainly amongst British constituencies.

This present seventh Congress is needed, not to discuss new subjects, but to put the seal on all that its predecessors have demonstrated "and to complete the cycle." With it ends one distinct stage of our progress, and it is only fitting that this important occasion should be suitably honoured. It is particularly desirable that every circle and portion of the country should be adequately represented so that this formal sealing up and, as it were, consecrating the labours of this first cycle may carry due weight and appear as what it really is, a formal ratification by the country at large of the demands which the Congress has at one time or another made on its behalf.

Such being the case, your Committee will doubtless agree, that the numerical limit for delegates, so rigidly enforced last year, may on this crowning occasion be properly relaxed, and will take measures to secure the full representation of all parts of their circle.

Personally, too, I would ask as many of my friends to come as possible as this may in all likelihood be the last time that I shall have the chance of seeing them.

My health, never of late years very strong, has broken down under the severe attack of influenza, which I suffered from in the spring. I can no longer sustain the anxieties involved by the General Secretaryship, which I must resign into the hands of Congress at its coming session; and independent of failing health my private circumstances will not permit, at any rate for some few years to come, the yearly visit to India which the tenure of the office of General Secretary makes indispensable---and so as I shall be leaving India soon after this coming Congress---"it must be for years and it may be for ever"---and as I have many true and dear friends scattered over the length and breadth of the land, I hope that as many as possible will come to the Congress to say farewell.

I need not add that, so far as health and means will permit, I shall continue in England to work for India, and really in my own opinion, at the present stage of our affairs, I believe that I can do more and better work in Europe than I could in India. Yours sincerely ever,

A. O. HUME.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

NEW YEAR'S EVE.

A TRANSLATION, OR RATHER ADAPTATION, FROM A SWEDISH TALE
BY ANDERSEN.

LITTLE Gretchen, little Gretchen,
Wanders up and down the street;
The snow is on her yellow hair,
The frost is at her feet.

The rows of long dark houses
Without look cold and damp,
By the struggling of the moonbeam,
By the flicker of the lamp

The clouds ride fast as horses,
The wind is from the north,
But no one cares for Gretchen,
And no one looketh forth.

Within those dark, damp houses
Are merry faces bright,
And happy hearts are watching out
The old year's latest night.

The board is spread with plenty,
Where the smiling kindred meet,
But the frost is on the pavement,
And the beggars in the street.

With the little box of matches
She could not sell all day,
And the thin, thin tattered mantle,
The wind blows every way.

She clingeth to the railing,
She shivers in the gloom—
There are parents sitting snugly
By firelight in the room;

And groups of busy children
Withdrawing just the tips
Of rosy fingers pressed in vain
Against their burning lips,

With grave and earnest faces
Are whispering each other
Of projects for the new year, made
For father or for mother.

But no one talks to Gretchen,
And no one hears her speak;
No breath of little whisperers
Comes warmly to her cheek;

No little arms are round her;
Ah me! that there should be,
With so much happiness on earth,
So much of misery.

Sure they of many blessings
Should scatter blessings round,
As laden boughs in autumn bring
Their ripe fruits to the ground.

And the best love man can offer
To the God of love, be sure,
Is kindness to his little ones,
And bounty to his poor.

Little Gretchen, little Gretchen
Goes coldly on her way;
There's no one looketh out at her,
There's no one bids her stay.

Her home is cold and desolate,
No smile, no food, no fire,
But children clamorous for bread,
And an impatient sire.

So she sits down in an angle,
Where two great houses meet,
And she curleth up beneath her,
For warmth, her little feet.

And she looketh on the cold wall,
And on the colder sky,
And wonders if the little stars
Are bright fires up on high.

She heard a clock strike slowly,
Up in a far church tower,
With such a sad and solemn tone,
Telling the midnight hour.

Then all the bells together
Their merry music poured;
They were ringing in the feast,
The circumcision of the Lord.

And she thought as she sat lonely,
And listened to the chime,
Of wondrous things that she had loved
To hear in the olden time.

And she remembered her old tales
Her mother used to tell,
And of the cradle songs she sang
When summer's twilight fell,

Of good men and of angels,
And of the Holy Child,

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

Who was cradled in a manger,
When winter was most wild ;

Who was poor, and cold, and hungry,
And desolate and lone ;
And she thought the song had told
He was ever with his own

And all the poor and hungry,
And forsaken ones, are his ;
"How good of him to look on me,
In such a place as this !"

Colder it grows and colder,
But she does not feel it now,
For the pressure at her heart,
And the weight upon her brow

But she struck one little match
On the wall so cold and bare,
That she might look around her,
And see if He were there.

The single match has kindled,
And, by the light it threw,
It seemed to little Gretchen
The wall was rent in two.

And she could see the room within,
The room all warm and bright,
With the fire glow red and dusky,
And the tapers all alight

And there were kindred gathered
Round the table richly spread,
With heaps of goodly viands,
Red wine, and pleasant bread.

She could smell the fragrant savor,
She could hear what they did say,
Then all was darkness once again,
The match had burned away

She struck another hastily,
And now she seemed to see,
Within the same warm chamber,
A glorious Christmas tree

The branches were all laden
With such things as children prize,
Bright gift for boy and maiden,
She saw them with her eyes

And she almost seemed to touch them,
And to join the welcome shout
When darkness fell around her,
For the little match was out

Another, yet another, she
Has tried, they will not light,
Till all her little store she took,
And struck with all her might

And the whole miserable place
Was lighted with the glare,
And lo, there hung a little child
Before her in the air.

There were blood-drops on his forehead,
And a spear-wound in his side,
And cruel nail prints in his feet,
And in his hands spread wide.

And he looked upon her gently,
And she felt that he had known
Pain, hunger, cold, and sorrow,
Ay, equal to her own.

And he pointed to the laden board,
And to the Christmas tree,
Then up to the cold sky, and said,
"Will Gretchen come with me?"

The poor child felt her pulses fail,
She felt her eyeballs swim,
And a ringing sound was in her ears,
Like her dead mother's hymn.

And she folded both her thin white hands,
And turned from that bright board,
And from the golden gifts, and said,
"With thee, with thee, O Lord."

The chilly winter morning
Breaks up in the dull skies,
On the city wrapt in vapor,
On the spot where Gretchen lies.

The night was wild and stormy,
The morn is cold and gray,
And good church bells are ringing,
Christ's circumcision day.

And holy men were praying
In many a holy place ;
And little children's angels
Sing songs before his face.

In her scant and tattered garment,
With her back against the wall ;
She sitteth cold and rigid,
She answers not their call.

They have lifted her up fearfully,
They shuddered as they said,
"It was a bitter, bitter night,
The child is frozen dead"

The angels sang then greeting,
For one more redeemed from sin ;
Men said, "It was a bitter night,
Would no one let her in?"

And they shuddered as they spoke of her,
And sighed : they could not see,
How much of happiness there was,
With so much misery.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

WITH this issue and the close of the year, Reis & Rayyet completes its tenth year of its existence.

THE National Congress meets at Nagpur, on Monday next, under the presidency of Rai Bahadur Ananda Chattru, of Madras.

Mlle. Rosa Bonheur has, after three years' labor, produced a picture which she has named "Le Dépiquage," or "Threshing." It is the largest animal picture ever painted, and represents ten horses of full size trotting over a threshing floor, as still seen in several parts of Southern Europe. It is said that she had an offer of 12,000*l.*, but she refused to sell the painting for that sum.

LORD Lytton, before his death, had, it is said, completed a volume of poems for publication.

"CARMEN SYLVIA"—the Queen of Rumania—has published a new volume of tales under the title of "Lendens Erdengang" or "Pilgrimage of Sorrow."

THE new Under-Secretary of State for India—Mr. George Curzon—has in the press a book "Persia and the Persian Question," being a description of his travels in all parts of Persia in 1889-90.

THE cadastral survey is not to be confined to Behar. The Calcutta Gazette of this week has the following notification :—

"The 22nd December, 1891.—Under section 3 of the Bengal Survey Act V of 1875, the Lieutenant-Governor is pleased to order that a survey shall be made of all lands in towns Nos. 1, 2, and 3 of the Bankura district, and that the boundaries of mouzas and fields situated therein shall be demarcated.

C. E. BUCKLAND,
Secretary to the Govt. of Bengal.

THE total number of holidays and vacations fixed by the Director of Public Instruction, Bengal, for Government Colleges for the year 1892, is 150, including 52 Sundays. The number of holidays for collegiate and 1st grade training schools will be 83 days and for zilla schools 68 days, exclusive of Sundays. Of the 95 days for the Government Colleges, 4 are for Mahomedan, 13 for Christian and 36 for Hindoo festivals, the summer vacation taking up the remaining 45 days.

WE find that in the Middle Examination for girls for 1893-94, in these Provinces, female candidates have been allowed the option to substitute cutting and making of pirans, pyjamas and chapkans, and knitting, darning and embroidery for Geometry and Mensuration, and Botany, Chemistry or Natural Philosophy.

BABOO BHUDEB MUKERJEE, C.L.E., succeeds Raja Rajendralala Mitra, C.L.E., as President and Baboo Bankim Chandra Chatterjee, B.L., as member of the Central Text-book Committee. Another new member is Baboo Chandra Mohun Majumdar, M.A., B.L., who will also act the Assistant-Secretary.

THE Chandernagore School has been affiliated to the Calcutta University in Arts up to the F. A. Standard.

A SURVEY has been ordered for a line of railway from Midnapore to Howrah, through the villages of Damari, Machada, Sanlupur, Gola, Sundabasan, Nundori, Banjepur, Barha, Chenchoree, Ballea Dangree, Dokunda, Dyaran Chul, and Malurah.

IT is notified by the Chief Secretary to the Bengal Government, in the Calcutta Gazette, that by an order in writing of the 18th December 1891, passed by virtue of the provisions of section 30 of Act IX of 1887, the Courts of Small Causes at Backergunge, Bhagalpur, Cuttack, Furruckpore, Jessore, Midnapore, Moorshedabad, Patna, Purnea, and Rajshahye have been abolished. This abolition increases the work of the Subordinate Judges of those places. They have been vested with original powers as Judges of Courts of Small Causes for the trial of suits cognizable by such courts up to the value of Rs. 500.

THE Munshi of Purlia, in the district of Manbhum, has been abolished from the 4th November 1891.

FROM the commencement of the new year, the postage on post-cards from British India to the United Kingdom or to any British Colony or Possession, or any foreign country or Post Office which is, or may hereafter be, comprised in the Universal Postal Union, will be one anna for each single Post-card and two annas for each Reply Post-card. This means a reduction of half and one anna respectively. There is also to be a reduction in the postage on packets of Printed Papers, Legal and Commercial Documents and Samples. Instead of the different rates for the various countries included in the Universal Postal Union, there will be from the first January 1892, uniform rates as under :

Printed Papers (including Newspapers). Half an anna per two ounces.

Legal and Commercial Documents. Half an anna per two ounces, but the lowest charge for each packet shall be two annas even if it weighs less than two ounces.

Samples. Half an anna for two ounces, but the lowest charge for each packet shall be one anna even if it weighs less than two ounces.

The present rate of postage on newspapers to the United Kingdom or the United States of America through the United Kingdom, is 1½ anna for each newspaper weighing not more than four ounces. From the next week, a newspaper of the weight of two ounces or less will be carried for half an anna, and one weighing up to four ounces for only one anna. Similarly, newspapers for France, Austria or Italy, weighing not more than two or more than four ounces need not bear more than ½ or 1 anna postage.

"The Indian Postal Guide" makes a distinction between "Newspapers" and "Printed Papers." Under the first head, we read : "In order to be entitled to the newspaper rate of postage, newspapers must be sent either singly, or separately folded and tied together in a bundle which must be superscribed with the number of newspapers contained in it; and the rate must be prepaid on each newspaper whether one or several are enclosed in the same cover." Under the other, occurs :—"Printed papers" include newspapers and periodicals, books, pamphlets, music, visiting cards, address cards, proofs of printing with or without the manuscript relating thereto, papers impressed with points in relief for the use of the blind, engravings, photographs, pictures, drawings, plans, maps, papers or cards embossed in plain relief, catalogues, prospectuses, announcements and notices of various kinds, whether printed, engraved, lithographed, or autographed, and in general all impressions or copies obtained on paper, parchment, or card-board, by means of printing, lithography, autography or any other mechanical process easy to recognise, except the copying-press and the Type-writer. Stamps or forms of prepayment, whether obliterated or not, and printed articles constituting the representative sign of monetary value, are excluded from classification as 'printed papers.' There is difference too in the postage chargeable. While newspapers are calculated by four ounces, printed papers are weighed by two, though the rate of postage for both is the same. The present order, however, from the commencement of the next year, equalizes the weight as also the postage on newspapers and "printed papers," namely, half an anna per two ounces.

A BOMBAY contemporary writes :

"Allopo of insults to Native Princes, let us call upon Government to take severe notice of an incident which is said to have occurred recently nearer home. There is an apparently well founded report that His Highness the Gaekwar when lately travelling by the G. I. P. Railway on his way to Sholapur was disturbed in his sleep by the noise of the engine which happened to be in close proximity to his own carriage. The guard in charge of the train as well as the Station Masters at one or two stations on the way were informed of the disturbance, and were requested to attach the carriage to the end of the train. There were at first some evasive replies. At last one Station Master had the courage of his convictions and gave the polite reply : 'Give the Maharaja a sleeping draught and he will get sleep. I am not going to detain the train to shout off his carriage and attach it to the end.' The Railway official was wiser of the situation and the Maharaja had to make the best of a sleepless night."

A CLERGYMAN of eminence, the Rev. James Casper Chatterback, Doctor of Divinity, late His Majesty's Inspector of Workhouse Schools, has just been convicted of swindling his friends of £35,000, on pretence of investing money in Government loans bearing ten per cent. interest, and been sentenced by Mr. Justice Cave to four years' penal servitude. We suppose this conviction so annihilating to the Church, strikes the nation in much the same way as the execution in the last century of the Rev. Dr. Dodd for forgery.

THE Englishman says :

"St. Vincent, the little West India Island which has recently been the scene of a popular outbreak, is one of the most beautiful and fertile of the Windward or Caribbee group. The total population (ancestry exceeds 40,000, including some 3,000 Europeans and 30,000 Negroes. Previous to the year 1885, St. Vincent was under the general Government of the Windward Islands, but since that time Barbadoes has been given a separate administration, and St. Vincent, Grenada, Tobago, and St. Lucia have been grouped together under a Governor."

By an order dated the 22nd December, the Calcutta Gazette of the 23rd following invests, by name, five Sub-divisional officers in the 24 Pergunnahs with powers under section 435 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. But the same Gazette, under a previous order of the 18th, transfers one of the five to the head quarters station of the Rajshahye district, as soon as he may be relieved by the incoming officer. Is it intended that the transferred Sub-divisional officer will carry his new power to his new district? Otherwise, it is inexplicable why any power which is not made to have retrospective effect should be granted and at the same time otherwise rendered unenforceable. Possibly by the time when he comes to exercise it, if not earlier, he will cease to be a Sub-divisional officer of the 24-Pergs.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

For a whole generation Europe has given herself up to the worst passions, the nations' chief end and concern being to crush one another by brute force of arms, until, the serene lights banished, the higher feelings and aspirations have been suppressed and a blinding egoism has taken the place of a living consciousness of the moral government of the universe. There is no longer any shilly shallying. No more vain regrets or idle blishes. The transition is complete—the secularization perfect. In open day, before the whole world, the Emperor William addressed the following words to the recruits of the 1st Regiment of Foot Guards quartered at Potsdam, on the occasion of the administration of the oath of allegiance:—

"Recruits, you have, in the presence of the consecrated servants of God and before the altar, sworn fealty to me. You are still too young to understand the meaning of the words which you have just spoken, but be diligent in following the directions and the teaching you will receive. You have, my children, sworn fealty to me, which means that you have given yourselves to me body and soul. There exists for you only one enemy, and that is my enemy. With the present Socialist agitation it may possibly happen that I may have to order you, which God forbid, to shoot down your own relatives, your brothers, and even your parents, but if I do so you must obey without a murmur."

There you have the head of the Holy German Empire speaking to his brave soldiery! The Rationalism of the Nineteenth Century could not brook the pretensions of the Church, but it bows to the pretensions of the State. The Papedom has been shorn of the last tags of temporal power, but here is the Empire set up as a new fetish for enlightened Germany to worship. There is no minding of matters here. The young prince supersedes Popes and abolishes God Himself. He is not content to command the simple allegiance of his people. He claims them in toto, carcass and all. We are reminded of the greatest creation of German genius. Thus might Mephistopheles remind poor Faust. One cannot help pitying the poor lads who enter life on such conditions. They thought they entered the service of their country. They find themselves annexed body and soul, by a terrible young imp. They may not understand the ceremony they pass through—the meaning of the mantras they mumble—but there they are—sold for ever. They must do the bidding of the master, right or wrong, against man or God. There is no exception whatever. They must not hesitate to shoot down father or mother, if ordered. The divine right of Kings was never pitched to such preposterous height, nor was military discipline so brutally candid.

GENERAL CAPIVI is gaining in the favor of his Imperial master, who has bestowed on him the rank and title of Count. The occasion was the passing by the Reichstag of the commercial treaties between Austria, Italy and Belgium, evidencing the high political capacity of the Chancellor.

A NEW Parnellite organ has been started at Dublin claiming Home Rule, reform of the Land Laws, reinstatement of unjustly evicted tenants, dependence of the Executive upon the Irish Parliament which is to have the appointment of the Judges.

At a conference on the position of women held in London, on December 1, under the auspices of the Women's Franchise League, they passed the following resolutions:

1. That in order to provide adequate preparation for the work and duties of life, women should be granted equal educational facilities with men in all grades and branches of intellectual, technical, and professional training.
2. That in order to secure the economic independence of women, all obstacles of law and custom which bar their admission into industrial work, professional avocations, and public employments should be removed.
3. That in industrial work all limitations as to time now imposed upon men should also be imposed upon women.
4. That in all employments women should receive for equal work the same rate of remuneration as men.

TERRIFIC gales on the coasts have been succeeded by intense frost throughout Great Britain. The latest news speaks of dense fogs throughout England, seriously delaying traffic and causing numerous accidents.

MR. Hastings, M. P., is charged with misappropriation of trust funds amounting to £15,000.

THE British Medical Journal gives a glimpse of the report of the Leprosy Commission that came out to India. The amount and risk of contagion is declared to be much overrated. There are, it is said, only about one hundred thousand cases, and the risk of contagion is rather more possible than probable. There is a great deal of evidence in favor of non-heredity of the malady. The rage for segregation of lepers may have to be cooled down when the report is published.

A WRITER in the London Daily News, presumably Mr. Justice McCarthy, writing of the late Irish leader, makes a nice distinction between the physique and the constitution. According to him, bodily strength may consist with constitutional imbecility. This was exemplified in the deceased. He was formerly fond of all kinds of manly sports and was a bold and splendid rider, but latterly he had given up everything except a little riding. He never was a reader, unless he could get hold of books in applied science. For a modern gentleman, he was wonderfully ignorant, of not only the books of the season but the leading books of the age. He cared nothing for literature. He cared more for art, in deference to his sister who painted. Even in that, he advised her not to copy nor to seek for subjects in history, but take her subjects from nature. Nor had he any inherent predisposition to politics. He was an agitator in his own despite. The career for which he thought himself made, was that of an active country gentleman—a reforming farmer and improver of his property.

ON Tuesday, the fourteenth day of the trial, in the Hyderabad Diamond case, the Jury unanimously found Jacob not guilty on all the thirteen charges, and he was acquitted. The public had in a manner been prepared for this result of all the expensive and elaborate preparations on behalf of the Nizam, by the rejection of his evidence on commission. Whatever the legality of the order, it was a political blunder to keep out that evidence. But the court had not to consider that aspect of the case, and the Nizam and the British Government in India must suffer by that order of the British Indian Court. The humiliation of the ruler of the Deccan is complete. Those who wanted to dissuade the Nizam from appearing as a witness have now their justification.

The order of acquittal does not end the trouble either of the Nizam or his jeweller. Before the verdict of the Jury was recorded, a civil suit had been filed in the same High Court on behalf of the Nizam against Mr. Jacob. When Mr. Justice Wilson in the Criminal Sessions ordered the restoration to Jacob of the Imperial and his money deposited in Court, Mr. Justice Trevelyan in the Civil side had already issued orders for their detention in court in the civil suit.

ADVERTISING boards are being put up in municipal Calcutta. One H. Malet has the contract from the Corporation. He will pay one rupee per running foot of board thus posted and not of the ground occupied. The contract is not limited to any fixed period, though the terms may be revised at the end of a year. The selection of sites is to be subject to the approval of the Chairman. This grant to Mr. Malet puts an end to the indiscriminate affixing of advertising sheets on boards on municipal property. Those using that property for their advertisements are now restricted to Mr. Malet's boards. We may therefore expect a rush by free advertisers on private property. It will be to the interest of Mr. Malet to see that private walls are protected from such invasions. We believe the Police Act prohibits such encroachments, but it rests with the owners of houses to enforce that law.

The advertising structures ought to be substantial so as not to be dangerous to the public and at the same time an ornament to the city. The Boards will undoubtedly be an advantage to the public and the advertisers. For one thing, the advertisements will appear from day to day until removed by the contractor, safe from the destructive boyish sport or adult mischievousness. But we are not sure that the Corporation is free to profit by the new source of revenue opened out to it by Mr. Malet. Its sources of revenue are fixed by law, and it will require no ordinary ingenuity to have the present admitted in proper quarters as a part of the existing ones.

Mr. James Payn, in his column in the Englishman, relates how, in a case of watch robbery, the other day, a witness pulled out his own watch in illustration. "Let me look at that, Sir," cried the magistrate. "It was handed up to the bench. 'How do you account for a person in your position possessing a gold watch with a crest and monogram?' And he had such a difficulty in doing it that the article was 'retained for enquiries.' On the other hand, a person of assumed position can wear anything. The eccentric commandant of a great garrison town had the most gorgeous watch chain eyes ever beheld. I said to him one day 'that chain must surely have cost a fortune, General.' 'It cost me seven and sixpence,' he replied; 'it's only mosaic gold.' 'Who would have thought of a man in your position wearing such a thing as that?' 'Just so my young friend' (for I was but a lad, at the time, as may be gathered from my inquiry), 'and that is the very reason why I do wear it.'"

Just so His Majesty the Shah patronized "paste." He was caught in the act in England, and many of the good people there came to think the great Shah a sham like the diamond buttons of his state coats and the gems on his person, and his fame for wealth and specially for precious stones a fable. There they were wrong, though. Persia is a poor country to be sure, but the Persian King is rich in the possession of a large store of gems. On this subject, there is no doubt. Many Europeans have been admitted to a sight of the store at Teheran. Mr. Eastwick of the British embassy was one of those privileged men, and he gives a minute account of his visit to the Shah's Jewel department. His Journal of a Diplomatist's Residence in Persia tells of multitudinous gems, great and small, many of them of prodigious size and "of purest ray serene." His Majesty, however, was not prepared to carry any part of them with him on his travels. No true lover of gems—certainly, no Oriental—has the heart to trust such treasures—treasure above insurance—to the chances of such journeys to distant lands, over mountains and across seas. Above all, even the most enlightened of Shahs might well think it scarcely prudent to convey the Persian regalia right into the heart of the Land of the Gnomes. Yet a Shah in public is nothing without the bravery of resplendent gems. Thus, the Shah was driven to sham. He sported pinchbeck and paste without a fault, heart, knowing nobody could suspect him. The trick was discovered, however, to his great disgrace. He should never have descended to that meanness. If he could not or would not bring his genuine trinkets, he should have repressed his vanity and forgone the pleasure of dazzling the staring Nazarenes. On no account, ought he to have gone in for Brummagem.

The rule applies to all Shahs and men. Mr. Payn's pinchbeck General is no exception. The reason given by him might pass with a boy relative, but does not stand examination. No respectable man ought to have anything to say to sham and make believe. Jewellery is a poor vanity at best. But what shall we say of sham jewellery? A diamond is a piece of brilliant coal, beautiful to see, and rare and costly. To wear it, is perhaps a bit feminine, but it is a harmless enjoyment, and the taste may be cultivated with some refinement, perhaps. But to counterfeit it—to deceive people by a two penny half penny bauble—is the lowest meanness. Nor is it expedient for the wealthy who possess the genuine articles, to wear counterfeit. Such trifling with the public taste is the surest way to debase the credit of jewellery and ultimately deteriorate the market value of the rare and real.

We regret to announce the death, on Tuesday last, of our well-known townsman Mr. Manackji Rustomji. He died full of years, at the age of 70, after a short illness. His death removes from Calcutta a familiar figure—a social landmark. He was the last of a bygone generation. All his friends and associates in life had departed sometime. Even Raja Rajendralala Mitra, who died in August last, was his junior by many years. Mr. Rustomji was the grandson of Mr. Cowasji, head of the firm of Rustomji, Cowasji and Co., Parsee merchants of Calcutta. Many local names in town and suburb preserve the memory of the family. Their original home was Bombay, where the late Mr. Rustomji was born in 1815. After finishing his education at the Elphinstone School, he came to Calcutta at the age of twenty-two, and was admitted a partner in the firm. Since then, he knew no other home, though he has sometimes been to Bombay and even to Singapore and China. He lived among the people as one of them, identifying himself with their interests, their hopes and aspirations. For a quarter of a century, he was a party in most public movements. In one of the large historical pictures of this city, before the Mutinies, his figure may be discerned, and as long as his health permitted he attended every social function. He was a conservative, of course, like all his friends, and did not sympathize with the go-aheads. Latterly, he acted under great disadvantage. He was unfortunate in business. His Persian Consulship was an empty honour. His connection with the liberal Nawab of Dacca, was more to the purpose. Even under the worst circumstances, his popularity and tact stood him in good stead. To his sons and grandsons and all his family, we offer our condolences and our best sympathy in their great loss.

REIS & RAYYET.

THE CRUSADE AGAINST OPIUM.

THE seigniors of the British Parliament have condemned the monopoly of opium, and have recommended its abolition as early as practicable. The British merchants are still making strenuous efforts to force the hands of the Indian Government to give effect to the recommendation. The Christian Missionaries, who, from the nature of their vocation, must be always for promoting the cause of good morals, have been wheedled into joining the agitation. The modus operandi has assumed the very shape which was adopted when Her Majesty's ministers were led to abolish the monopoly of salt manufacture in the seaboard of Bengal, ostensibly to benefit the starving rayyets of India, but in reality to create a market for Cheshire salt, and thereby to make the East Indian trade more profitable than it could be, when, for want of any cargo besides glasswares, British merchants had to bring empty vessels to India and to buy the products of her looms and her rich dyes with gold and silver or by means of bills drawn by the home authorities on the Indian exchequer. The Indian rayyet has to buy Liverpool salt now at a much higher price than that for which country-made salt was available formerly. But the British merchants have no concern with the welfare of the Indian peasantry now. It may not be very easy to induce the Government to give up such a large revenue as opium yields. But the pressure that is being brought to bear on our rulers fills us with misgivings. The monopoly of opium may be bad. But why are English merchants so anxious to have it abolished? Is it from a high sense of morality, and a genuine sympathy for the subjects of His Celestial Majesty? It is nothing of the kind. The English merchants want to make larger profits by being able to sell the drug at a lower price, and thereby encouraging its consumption. Would the English merchants like that the Government of India should prohibit altogether the cultivation of opium? That is one important test by which their morality and philanthropy can be measured.

Next to the land tax, the monopoly of opium is the most important source of imperial revenue in India. The trade with reference to China may be an iniquitous one; and it may, with a show of reason, be held that the cultivation of opium ought to be stopped altogether, except so far as is necessary for medicinal purposes. Such prohibition would involve an enormous sacrifice of revenue. Nevertheless, we would ask the Government to forego it, if the interest of the human race was in question. But we cannot admire the enthusiasm of the English merchants and their mouthpieces in Parliament. They want to deprive the Government of India of the enormous revenue, in order apparently to have a larger share in the profits of the trade.

Had they been inspired by genuine moral sense, they would have directed their energy and power to stop the far more iniquitous traffic in liquors, in which they themselves take the most important part. Medical opinion may be cited by them to show that opium is the cause of all evils, and that brandy and rum are quite as harmless as bread, butter, and meat. But such doctrines, however convenient they may be to particular interests, are not supported by experience. The habit of opium eating has not killed any one, on the contrary, it has prolonged the life of many. But the victims to wine may be numbered by thousands in our country, while the mischief done by it, by bringing about domestic misery and increasing crime, is simply incalculable. Perhaps, it would be said that it is absolutely optional with the people to drink or not. If the people voluntarily take to the habit of drinking, it is not the fault of Government. But is it not an undeniable fact in trade that the artist creates the want? Who wanted the steam engine before it was invented? No one wanted the juice of vine before it was brought to this country by British merchants. For fiscal purposes, Government opened central distilleries in the head-quarters of districts and sub-divisions. The few dealers in wine in the country distilled it there. They made great profits by bringing the poison within the reach of the people in the locality. Others were attracted. The number increased, and the central distillery was abolished altogether at one time, in order to give a wider scope to the unholy traffic. Now grog shops are becoming as plentiful throughout the country as those of confectioners. The poor unsophisticated natives of the soil can not therefore be blamed, if they ascribe the increase of drunkenness to British trade and the fiscal policy of Government. Whether they are justified in doing so or not, there can not be any doubt that the consumption of both imported and country liquor is increasing day by day. And the English merchants who profit by dealing in French wines and English beer, are not the men entitled to pose as moral teachers, and to lecture our Government to give up an important source of excise revenue for the sake of their preachings.

THE DEMON OF SURVEY IN BEHAR.

THE necessity of a field to field survey and the ascertainment of the rights of tenure holders, in temporarily settled estates, may be readily admitted. But the advantage of Government in letting loose a horde of survey officials in tracts the revenue of which is permanently assessed, is not so obvious. For aught we know, a disinterested concern for the welfare of the Zemindars and rayyets may be the determining cause of the policy of which the Behar cadastral survey is the latest outcome. The parties who are supposed to be most interested, take, however, a very different view. The suggestion that we made last week, may not afford a complete explanation. But there can be no doubt, that a material improvement in the excise revenue is expected from the survey of the chief tari-consuming districts under the Government of Bengal. The entire responsibility of this measure, is naturally thrown, by the press and the public, on Sir Charles Elliott. But it seems to have a much longer history than the connection of Sir Charles with the administration of Bengal. And after the explanation that he has himself given, there can be no doubt that he has no claim whatever to a monopoly of the praise or blame.

Although the contemplated survey is being strenuously opposed by the Zemindars, it must be clear enough, that they are likely to derive great advantage from it. Every now and then, the Zemindars attempt to make what is called ekandaj survey of their estates. But they are very seldom successful. In some cases, the ameens are not allowed to enter the villages. The collecting agents of the Zemindar themselves make common cause with the rayyets. The surveyors get a rough handling, or they are bribed by the villagers to throw up their appointments. They represent to their employer that the opposition cannot be quelled except by legal proceedings. A civil suit under section 91 of the Rent Act follows, or a prayer for survey by the Revenue authorities is threatened. At last, there is generally a compromise, by which the rayyets agree to pay a certain percentage on their rental, and the survey is postponed sine die. Under weak landlords, the ameens continue in service for some time. But they do nothing whatever, and, after drawing their pay from their employers and filling their pockets by levying blackmail on the rayyets and the rent-free tenure-holders, they decamp, never submitting the chittahs, khatians and maps for the preparation of which they had been paid.

The landlords who oppose the proposed survey, cannot be unaware of its advantages to them. Sir Charles Elliott observes, that their attitude with regard to it is due to the advice of their amla who are interested in maintaining the present chaotic state of Zemindari records. But our belief is that the corrupt underlings of the Zemindars are much more interested in welcoming the survey, than in obstructing it. It would give them a grand opportunity for carrying on a flourishing business in bribe brokerage, and they are not the men to throw any obstacle in the way of Government in a matter which is sure to prove so profitable to them. The opposition of the Zemindars is not due to any sinister advice, but is the result of what they know, by bitter experience, of the character of Government ameens, and their capacity for mischief even when they are honest. In fact, in the view of practical Zemindars, a corrupt ameen or peshkar is much more manageable than an honest but doctrinaire settlement official of the department. The alarm of the Zemindars is due to the prospect of having an army of surveyors billeted on them, and to the fact that their rights will be entirely at the mercy of a set of officials, who are generally bound neither by any law nor by an overscrupulous conscience. Nevertheless, they may, with a little expenditure of money, secure many substantial advantages which are not obtainable otherwise. The parties most likely to suffer, are the rayyets. The Zemindars have a regular organization for conducting legal proceedings. They have mooktears duly empowered to represent them. They have naibs, gomastas, and legal advisers, to manage their business for them. But the rayyet is generally friendless and moneyless. On the day he is called upon to appear before any of the authorities, he may be ill or he may be without the necessary funds to fee a mooktear. He may have none to swear to the truth of his case, except where there is a regular combination. Then, again, it is a notorious fact that it is much more convenient for corrupt officials to take bribes from Zemindars than from rayyets. The result may be that, in spite of all the good intentions and instructions of Government, the rayyet's case may be so conducted that the officials called upon to adjudicate it, may not deem it possible to decide it in his favour. If he should get a favorable decision at all, an appeal would be made against it.

and, sooner or later, he would have to cry peccavi. The common saying in the country is, that the British courts are for the rich. In the case of a poor rayyet fighting with his Zemindar, even victory amounts to defeat. To the Zemindar, the cost of a single lawsuit means nothing. But to the rayyet, it means absolute ruin. It may be that, as a body, the rayyets are not ruined for ever by a survey or a settlement, and are found to recover their ground. But this can be explained in the same way as the rapid resuscitation of communities ruined by wars, floods, cyclones or earthquakes. We read in Mill's Political Economy:—

"An enemy lays waste a country by fire or sword, and destroys or carries away nearly all the moveable wealth existing in it; all the inhabitants are ruined, and yet in a few years after, everything is much as it was before. This vis medicatrix nature has been a subject of sterile astonishment * * * * There is nothing at all wonderful in the matter. What the enemies have destroyed would have been destroyed by the inhabitants themselves; the wealth which they so rapidly reproduce, would have needed to be reproduced in any case, and probably in as short a time. Nothing is changed except that during the reproduction they have not now the advantage of consuming what had been produced previously."

The recovery of the rayyets, after cadastral surveys in other parts of the country, is to be accounted for in the same way. If the object of Government in ordering the survey of Behar is to give better security to the rights and titles of the peasantry, we are afraid, the measure will prove simply tantalising. It is sure to do a great deal of mischief; but it is not at all certain that it will do any good. A record of rights based on the summary adjudication of the Revenue authorities, is like a surgical operation of the major order for removing a harmless tumour. We cannot approve of such an operation, except where the case is so bad as to admit of no other remedy, and the party affected by it is prepared to run the risk and to bear the expense of subjecting himself to the manipulation. The Zemindars, who, according to our view, are likely to be, to some extent, benefited by the proposed survey, are opposed to it. To the rayyets, it must be like a great natural calamity. They may be ruined by it, unless by the dire necessity of the position they learn to combine and fight out the battle against the superior resources of the landlords. In this state of things, we feel no hesitation in supporting the protest that has been made by the Behar landholders. A survey such as that contemplated, has, no doubt, many advantages. It would be worthy of a civilized Government aiming at having a complete record of everything about which any information may be necessary. But the advantages and the disadvantages ought to be carefully weighed in the balance, and if the latter be found to preponderate, surely a measure of the kind ought not to be forced on the people, simply for the sake of an ideal. If the Government has any interest of its own, that is quite another matter. But, in that case, the cost, instead of being made payable by the rayyets and the Zemindars, ought to be met from the particular source of revenue which is likely to be benefited.

A VISIT TO SUMBUL.

MANY years ago, I went to Sumbul. As it is a place of historical interest and Hindu pilgrimage, it may be interesting to the reader to see the notes that I took on the occasion. Sumbul is in the Moradabad district, twenty-two miles from city Moradabad. We started from Aligar and crossed the Ganges at Anupshar at night. Next morning, at 9 o'clock, we reached Sumbul.

3rd April 1869, 8-15 A. M.—A mile off before me I descry the cupola of a Siva temple, at Sumbul, believed to have been built in one night in the Satya Yug. Just left the ruins of some black stone foundation which one grass-cutter said was or had been a place of worship—the stone platform being still an object of prayers though less than formerly. The man, however, repudiated my suggestion that it was a temple, i. e., that there was a house of worship. My bearers, however, said that it was the remains of the grave or mausoleum of a parrot mura erected by its master in days of old. There are, occasionally, on the sides of the road, a small mausoleum to mark the spot where a suttee was burnt. Near this place (in the environs of Sumbul), are two small two storied rooms, one on each side of the road, opposite to each other, called chalters for travellers to betake themselves for shelter from the sun and weather, or for the citizens to repair to of afternoons for amusement, &c.

Sumbul, 9 A. M.—We halt at a garden. It is a remarkable thing of its kind—a vestige of former opulence and history as well. Being a walled enclosure, it is tempting to all travellers, who care for either privacy or for purity like our orthodox Hinduselves. We occupy a range of rooms within, at the side. The garden is studded thick with fine trees, principally oranges, many of them now rich in flower and blossom. The beautiful red of these in the midst of the green foliage, has a most beautiful effect. It is delightful to walk in the shade of the grove. The scene has become for the moment all the more charming with the caquetals of Narees and Kakabans which we have placed on the branches, and the boxes of rare plants from Calcutta we have placed at the foot of the trees. All our party, attendants, camp-followers and all, are disposed, after the monotony of our tedious journey, to make the most of the opportunity. For myself, I am reminded of the scenes of yore at Lucknow under the orange grove of the Begum, in front of my house at Zumboor Khana, whereto I and a friend had the privilege of admittance, and where we used to sit or lie down in moonlight, listening to the singing of our music-master as well as hers, Ameer Ali, varied at intervals by the more artless and sweeter notes of the hidden Begum and her daughters, bulbuls and brunette peris as they were, with their peepings into our assembly, the lightning glances they would flash and their disappearance leaving us for the moment vacant, and pursuing the sound of clanking gold or silver bangle or gemmed ear-ring in imagination into the recesses of the Zenana.

The public entrance to the garden is a noteworthy structure. The architecture is of the Hindu type, found all over the country and adopted by the Mussulmans. But the interior of the gateway, as usual, and the inside of the rooms above it, do not keep up the impression of the outside. I and Jacob went up the top of the gate and had a view of the town. The views on two sides, one at the back of the garden and the other to the north, are picturesque, and I have asked Jacob to take photographs which he said do. The city is on an elevation; in fact, the ground rises after this garden, or rather breaks into undulations here and there, which would be more picturesque if they were not so bare, until it rises into a slightly raised platform for the town to stand upon. The town is a straggling one of course, with the look of an old retired place, many a time ruined and recovered and ruined again, but latterly visibly gaining in prosperity, for you see new houses all round, several made of old brick, indeed, but most built of new materials. The temples, of which there are several, seem to have been rebuilt or newly plastered. At the back of the garden, is one with a small golden or gilt top and one toward the front corner also gilded. On the right, is Manokanna, a sacred tank, said to possess the same virtues as Lake Mansorobar, the renowned piece of water in the heights of Thibet. The universal belief is that this city has existed Four Yugas. The temple in front of our garden, is of stone, brought from the Vindhya chain, built, before the mutiny, by the Rane of Indore. The temple to the left adjoining, belongs to the owner of the garden and commenced building before the mutiny, but finished afterwards. It is of small brick, very old, but like new and fine brick. The gateway of the garden is built of the same brick—it cannot be less than thirty years old—and the walls too. The whole garden and temple, are within the site of the moat of the ancient fort of Prithibij, the ruins whereof exist here and there. There is no Zemindar of the place.

There is a Tehsildar, a Brahman of Junpore, and an Inspector of Police with sixty constables and 200 chowkidars. The temple in front, belongs to a family of country (desi) not hill Josees, who have connection with Indore. Pandit Gobindram lived there. He was held in the highest respect by the Holkar and all his people. The Maharaja used to bring him up from half a mile's distance whenever he called. He read and recited the Kalki Puran before Mahji Saheba, a Dowager Bai or Lady of the Holkar, it is said the mother of the present Holkar. That scripture predicts the advent of the Kalki Avatar—the Hindu Messiah—the final incarnation of Vishnu. The great lady was so edified that she directed him to build a temple at Sumbul—the spot where, according to that said scripture, the Kalki Avatar was to make his first appearance. So the lucky reciter came for the purpose armed with Rs. 20,000. While the temple was building, both the Dowager and Gobindram died, and it was found difficult to defray the expenses of the temple, Rs. 3 per diem. Gobindram had left five villages, jaghirs of Holkar (besides some others which were escheated), the income of which was wholly taken up for the support of Ramram, son of Gobindram, who is at Indore, and now wields great influence at Court, having seat immediately behind the Maharaja. If the Josee would repair to Indore, his temple will assuredly be provided for, as he thinks, though I doubt, but he does not like to go that distance and is content with whatever Gobindram has left him.

This garden is a fortified one, having broad walls on the parapet of which you can mount guard, and on the four corners having sentry boxes and round or polygonal platforms with steps to ascend from inside.

After breakfast, I walked round the wall, and then inspected a map of the pilgrimages and sacred places and wells of Sumbul. I may here mention that Sumbul is one of the three grams (villages) and seven tirthas (pilgrimages) mentioned in the Puran. The three grams being Nandagram near Muttra, Salgram, near the Gunduk river, where the salgram stones are found, and Sumbul gram, where I now write. The tirthas, of course, are Kashi (Benares), Kanchi, &c. The map exhibits, according to the Puran, a triangular area, which is sacred ground and which contains 68 tirthas (pilgrimages) and kups (sacred wells). These pilgrimages are representative rather than real, there being Rameswar, the Bhagirathi, Kurukshetra, and the rest all in this Sumbul ground.

Sumbul is traditioned to have been the capital of Prithiraj. The walls of the city (fortified) no longer exist, but it is easy to perceive the site of fortifications. Traces of the wide moat are also seen, now cultivated into fields. The garden in which we halt, seems to have been reclaimed from the moat. Near the moat, at one place on the side of the present road, is a gate. It is small and neatly built, seen to have been one of the smaller gateways, of small well burnt clean bricks. After dinner, I went round the pathway to the top of the walls of our garden from which I had a good view of the city and ruins. The whole ground before me was uneven, with elevations and mounds of earth here and there, betokening the sites of ruins, while the present inhabited part is distinctly high. Then, after inspecting the map, I visited the Hari temple, the old Hindu temple now for generations, centuries perhaps, deprived of its integrity as such, though it is still regarded with the old, perhaps with more than the old veneration from antiquity. Before the mutiny, it used to be resorted to by Hindus and Mahomedans alike, as a kind of halting place for travellers and resorted to by the townspeople, the Mahomedans sometimes prayed in it, while the Hindus also used the temple sometimes, but less and less. On the breaking out of the mutiny, the Mahomedans took possession of the temple to the exclusion of the Hindus. Just now, it is in the possession of one Villyat Yar Khan, a small landholder, who lives opposite. The place was closed but not locked, and we opened it and entered. There was confined within a boy or two. My guides, one Brahman priest and a Mahomeda chowkidar, left their shoes as they approached the temple. I hesitated a moment, but after all I carried my shoes. It was observed by my guides, but they said nothing. However, further on, near the temple, I found a Mahomedan boy with a pair of shoes on. There is a ruined hauz or reservoir of water in the middle of the court, with a hole in the centre, from which evidently sprang jets of water. The right corner of the court towards the gate is used as a burying ground, for the great I suppose.

The dome of the temple is nearly thirty cubits in height from floor to ceiling. On both sides there are long ranges of arched small domes. It is entirely built of brick, small neat clean bricks in perfect preservation, except in ruined parts—parts of the building had given way, but have been repaired by some. The temple is built on high ground on the side of the public road. I ascended the roof of the two wings of the temple, and the view was grand. While I was on the roof, I saw a gathering of Mahomedans at the door of the Court of the temple, who seemed to be annoyed at my audacity. In fact, one fellow loudly called me, I believe, and, not being in a fighting mood, I went down, and, without speaking a word, inspected the corners of the place hastily and proceeded to come out. But the chief of the demonstration kept on his hands over the door, although the chowkidar told him to move off. I, however, passed under his arm as he sulkily stood. I then, to keep appearance, inspected a large well of stone. Some of the old bricks of Sumbul are very huge pieces. I saw them in some shops on the roadside. I hear the temple was full of idols, which were turned upside down and buried. It is said that the idols may still be found buried under the floor. I much doubt this, but the matter is worth enquiry. This is one of the places to send an archaeological expedition to. I don't understand which Prithiraj they mean. Certainly, not the King of Ajmeer who fought with Shahabuddin and once defeated him. But there is some similarity in the traditional names of the enemies of Prithiraj to those of the real Mahomedan enemies of the Ajmeer King—Alud malud.

From the name Alud, I at first supposed that it was the corruption of Alauddin, Emperor of Delhi.

THE HYDERABAD DIAMOND CASE.

FOURTEENTH DAY, TUESDAY DEC. 22.

The Judge's Summing up.

His Lordship, Mr. Justice Wilson, addressed the Jury as follows:—This case has occupied a very long time and a great number of details have been put before you, but the Jury should concentrate their attention on what were the real essential points of the case, and not diffuse it over a multitude of details, many of which have only a slight value and bore but lightly on the guilt or innocence of the prisoner. The questions they had to consider were very few in number, and not one of them was attended with any special or peculiar difficulty. It would be his Lordship's endeavour to enable the Jury to concentrate their attention on the real essentials of the case, and only to give slight attention to matters which were not really essential. Before he got further he would refer to some things which he would not speak of himself because they were just the matters which it was essential for the Jury to consider for themselves. He was not going to say a word about the demeanour or the bearing of any of the witnesses in the box. With the exception of the Resident, Sir Dennis Fitzpatrick, everyone of them had been before the Jury, and they had had an opportunity of forming their own judgment. A very great deal had been said about the conduct of the accused from time to time throughout the negotiations, and other matters which culminated in and laid the foundation for these charges. It had been suggested that he had dealt very unfairly by the Nizam in not disclosing to him more than he did, or rather anything about the price of the diamond. The Jury should always remember that this was not a case of principal and agent; it was not a case in which Mr. Jacob was acting as agent for the Nizam. An agent was bound to act directly for the benefit of his principal. But in this case Mr. Jacob was the seller, and the Nizam was the buyer, and there was no special obligation on Mr. Jacob in the matter, except such as arose from the relations of buyer and seller, and he was under no special obligations, except such as might be imposed upon him by the terms of the contract. His Lordship was not going to say a word as to whether he was honest or dishonest, whether he had gone beyond the rights of a seller, or whether he had told the truth from time to time about many matters.

Holloway's Pills.—In the complaints peculiar to females these Pills are unrivalled. Their use by the fair sex has become so constant for the removal of their ailments that barely a toilet is without them. Amongst all classes, from the domestic servant to the peeress, universal favour is accorded to these renovating Pills; their invigorating and purifying properties render them safe and invaluable in all cases; they may be taken by females of all ages for any disorganization or irregularity of the system, speedily removing the cause and restoring the sufferer to robust health. As a family medicine they are invaluable for subduing the maladies of young and old.

There was no charge founded on any misapprehension or misconception. The charges were of a totally different character. His Lordship did not say they were not to take into consideration the fact of it having been so, because it might have a bearing on the question, assuming that Mr. Jacob did so wrongfully. Then there was another matter. It had been pressed upon the Jury that this was a private prosecution. But if it was a private prosecution, it was conducted by those who were acting for the Nizam, who considered himself the aggrieved party, and not by the Government. But that made no difference, because the Jury would have to deal with the evidence. But it was suggested that as a private prosecution the conduct of the case was not invested in the responsible officers of the Government. It was for the Jury to judge whether or not this case had been conducted with that scrupulous care and fairness to the accused which was observed in all criminal trials, without any over-anxiety to secure a conviction. His Lordship expressed no opinion. He left that for the Jury to judge. The only question for them to consider was not what theories had been first forwarded, but whether the prosecution had satisfied them beyond reasonable doubt of the truth of the essential elements in the case.

OUTLINE OF THE STORY.

He would first remind them about what there was in dispute—the outline of the story. Mr. Jacob was a jeweller, having a shop and stock of jewels in Simla, and was in the habit of visiting other places. He used to visit Calcutta, and make purchases. For several years he was in the habit of visiting Hyderabad and making sales to the Nizam, and very large sales. As regards Mr. Abid, it was known that he was a person in a confidential position, at any rate in an influential position, in the household of the Nizam; that he began life in a minor position; that he had now got a position, not a very high position it is true; but that he is responsible for looking after the Toshakhana and the palaces, and his position enabled him to obtain commission on a considerable scale; and that he received from Mr. Jacob ten per cent. on all sales. The extent of the dealings would appear from a letter from the prosecutor's solicitors which showed that in the present year, wholly independent of other transactions, between the 12th January and 20th April sums aggregating close upon nine lacs were paid by the Nizam to Mr. Jacob for jewellery, and in respect of the sale he paid to Mr. Abid commission amounting to Rs. 89,000. That was all that it was necessary for his Lordship to say with regard to the relations between the parties. The Jury remember that the subject of this diamond was first introduced between the parties in the month of January in a letter from Mr. Jacob to Mr. Abid. Mr. Jacob had gone in the latter part of last year to Persia; he came back as far as Bombay and he received a letter from Mr. Jacob opening these transactions. Mr. Jacob went to Hyderabad in February, and went away without having done anything apparently. He came again early in March, and then came the first really essential matter regarding the transactions about the diamond. His Lordship used guarded language here, because there was a serious controversy as to what took place. But this much was clear that at that interview it was arranged that Mr. Jacob was at his own expense to get the transfer of the diamond from England to India; that is to say, he was to obtain the diamond and bring it to the Nizam to see, and that the Nizam was, on the arrival of the diamond in India, in order to enable Mr. Jacob to get hold of the diamond (whatever the proper understanding might have been) to make over 23 lacs to Mr. Jacob for that purpose. Mr. Jacob said that paid or not paid was not mentioned at that interview in the first instance, but subsequently the matter must have been subject to approval, and he admits, as all the documents in the case show, that at any rate at first there was a contract subject to the approval of the Nizam when he had an opportunity of seeing the diamond.

THE CALCUTTA CONTRACT.

So much was all his Lordship need say now about the bargain in March. But Mr. Jacob had another person to deal with; he could not sell the diamond unless he got it from the owner. He had therefore to make a contract with Kilburn and Co., the agents of Pittar Leveson and Co. Then some correspondence passed, and on the last day of April the contract between Mr. Jacob and Messrs. Kilburn and Co. was finally concluded. Mr. Jacob said that he on that day paid Rs. 50,000 to Messrs. Kilburn & Co., to secure the sum of £2,000 which he was to pay as forfeit in case the transaction was not ultimately carried out, and he said he had the option of purchase up to the 31st July. So far with regard to that. The next which happened was that according to that agreement the diamond was brought out and reached Calcutta by post on the 25th of June. The diamond having come it was time for the next step to be taken in giving effect to the contract between the Nizam and Mr. Jacob, that the Nizam should place 23 lacs in the hands of Mr. Jacob in whatever form it might be, and accordingly, after some delay and apparently some misunderstanding between Mr. Jacob and Mr. Abid, the money was deposited. The Nizam had given his securities in the hands of the Bank of Bengal, and they advanced 23 lacs on the security of the Government paper. The 23 lacs were placed to the credit of the Nizam's Minister, Sir Asman Jah, and from his account it was transferred to the credit of Mr. Jacob, and accordingly on the 3rd of July Mr. Jacob had that money to his credit in the Bank. The next transaction was on the 10th July. Having made his bargain with the Nizam in March, and arranged with Messrs. Kilburn and Co. and the owners of the diamond, the diamond having arrived, and the 23 lacs been placed to his credit, he proceeded to make further arrangements with Messrs. Kilburn and Co., and he was to deposit 22½ lacs with that firm, not 23 lacs. The amount was arrived at in this way.

The price of the diamond which Mr. Jacob was to pay was fixed at £1500,000, and Mr. Cheetham, representing Messrs. Kilburn and Co., arranged with Mr. Jacob that he should settle the exchange for the purpose of this transaction at 1s. 4½, bringing the amount to 22½ lacs; and accordingly that sum was to be transferred from the credit of Mr. Jacob to the credit of Messrs. Kilburn and Co., for that purpose in a special account (P.L.). But there was 23 lacs to the credit of Mr. Jacob, and only 22 lacs were transferred to Messrs. Kilburn and Co. On the other hand, ever since 30th April Messrs. Kilburn & Co. had deposited with them by Mr. Jacob Rs. 50,000 to secure the diamond coming out, which Mr. Jacob was entitled to have back if the sale was concluded. Accordingly Messrs. Kilburn & Co. drew a cheque in Mr. Jacob's favour for that Rs. 50,000 which Mr. Jacob re-endorsed to Messrs. Kilburn & Co., and transferred out of his credit 22 lacs to Kilburn, the effect being that they paid back Rs. 50,000, got fresh amount of 22½ lacs on payment of which they were to deliver the diamond. On the other hand, as far as Mr. Jacob was concerned, the result was that he got for his Rs. 50,000 the difference between 23 and 22½ lacs; therefore what he actually kept was one lac. But half of that he was entitled to get back. On that the diamond was made over by Messrs. Kilburn & Co. to Mr. Jacob.

REJECTION OF THE DIAMOND.

The next thing that took place was on the 21st of July. After the arrangement of the 10th of July Mr. Jacob obtained the permission of the Nizam to remain a short time in Calcutta to attend a sale. He then went to Hyderabad, had an interview with the Nizam, and produced the diamond. On that, as stated by Mr. Abid, the Nizam said he would not take the diamond, exercising thereby his option of paid or not paid. So far there is no controversy. There was no doubt again that during that day Mr. Jacob had an interview with Mrs. Abid, of which he gave one account and she gave another; and there was no doubt that on the evening of the same day he had an interview with Mr. Abid, who said nothing took place, except that he referred to the diamond having been rejected, and the money must be repaid promptly, whereas Mr. Jacob says that in that interview he was given to understand that the Nizam made an offer of 40 lacs, and he accepted that offer, and that he considered from that time that through Mr. Abid there was an acceptance of the diamond for 40 lacs, of which there had been paid 23 lacs. His Lordship drew the attention of the Jury to what took place there as being exceedingly important. Mr. Jacob left Hyderabad on the 22nd, and arrived in Calcutta on the morning of Sunday the 26th. The Jury would hear by and by all the telegrams and letters which passed. On the 27th Mr. Jacob went to Kilburn & Co.'s office, and on that day he instructed them to remit £150,000 to the owners of the diamond in England, and it was remitted. But they would remember that the deposit with Kilburn & Co. was 22½ lacs, being £150,000 at 1s. 4½; as a matter of fact by the 27th July when the remittance took place the office of the Bank said that it was at 1s. 5½, making a very material difference, and therefore instead of 22½ lacs what he really wanted was Rs. 20,72,868, leaving a balance of 1,77,000 and odd; and that balance was handed to Mr. Jacob. That is the outline of the story, and so far there is no dispute.

ANALYSIS OF THE CHARGES.

But before going further into any evidence bearing on that story his Lordship thought it essential to make it perfectly clear to the Jury what the nature of the charges was. There were 13 charges, but it was not necessary to refer to them in any detail at present; all he wanted them to bear in mind was this, that 12 of them were founded on the offence of criminal breach of trust, but the 13th was a charge of criminal misappropriation of money. As far as his Lordship could see, the accused could not possess any property of the Nizam unless the charges which were based on criminal breach of trust were established; therefore, he thought the Jury might really dismiss from their minds the minor charge of criminal misappropriation, and only consider those which were based on criminal breach of trust. To constitute that offence there must be three elements. First, there must be a trust; secondly, there must be the employment of trust funds in violation of that trust; and third, there must be an element of dishonesty in the transaction. It was clear that in order to establish those three things a trust must be made out. And that they might follow the evidence he thought right to state to them exactly what the trust was that was alleged here. There seemed to him no doubt that the transsaction was passand or na passand, and that the money (23 lacs) was to form a part of the purchase money if the transaction was carried out, but ought to be returned if it was dropped.

Now he asked them to dissociate their minds altogether from the diamond, and look upon it as an altogether ordinary transaction. Suppose his Lordship went into any music shop in Calcutta and asked them to bring out a Broadwood's grand piano for him, and asked them the price, which they stated. Suppose he told them that he was particular about the tone of the instrument, and that if he did not like the tone it would be returned. They might say to him, "We must ask you to pay for half or one third of the price in advance, and suppose he did so. If the piano came, and he rejected it he would be entitled to have his money back. There was no trust in the transaction; it was merely a matter of arrangement, and if he did reject the piano they would give him back a cheque on their account. There was no element of trust; it was a contract for sale on approval: the money paid in advance was to be paid back if the sale was not effected. Similarly in the present case, if the matter rested on a contract of passand or na passand only, namely, that the money was to be paid back if the diamond was not approved, there would be no element of trust in it, and therefore, there could be no criminal breach of trust. The learned Advocate-General in opening the case opened a case which did give rise to this consideration, and there was evidence in support of it. The case in regard to which evidence had been given showed not only that the contract was one for sale on approval, and not only was the 23 lacs to be returned in case of non-approval, but further, there was an express contract between Mr. Jacob and the Nizam by which the 23 lacs were to be placed to the credit of Mr. Jacob and to be retained by him in deposit in the Bank in his own name, and not to be operated upon by payment to anybody whatsoever, the owners of the diamond or anybody else, until the diamond was approved. That was a trust which was alleged, and that was the only trust of which there was any evidence whatever. That was the only trust of which Mr. Abid spoke: and if the Jury could not find that trust there was no case for the prosecution. The first evidence of the contract was that the 23 lacs paid to the credit of Mr. Jacob on the express bargain that it was to remain in his credit until approval and not drawn out for any purpose whatever or paid over to anybody until the diamond was approved. The next element was misappropriation. If the Jury were satisfied that that trust really was created, and that the money was deposited on that trust, then there might be criminal misappropriation. But before they considered that it was right he should point out to them that to constitute such a trust it was not enough to show that one party expected that the money would be dealt with in that way, but it was necessary to show that both parties understood that that was the bargain between them. Supposing the jury were convinced of that express bargain then there was evidence on which they could find that the money was in the hands of Mr. Jacob on trust. The charges related to three matters, the first was not with regard to the Rs. 50,000 which Mr. Jacob had paid to Kilburn & Co. in April but to the other Rs. 50,000, which went to make up the one lac which he received. The first group of charges related to the Rs. 50,000, making the difference between 22½ and 23 lacs; the 2nd group related to the sums spent on the 27th of July. It was spent to remit £150,000, for the remittance of which Kilburn & Co. did not require 22½ lacs, but something under 21 lacs, and accordingly there was transferred to Mr. Jacob the difference. The 3rd group referred to the other portion of the 23 lacs which was paid back to Mr. Jacob (Rs. 1,77,000 and odd), the difference between the estimated value of £150,000 and what turned out to be the rate of exchange. The jury would have to consider in each of these cases, supposing that a trust was established, that there was a violation of such trust. A great deal had been said about the meaning of "dishonestly." It came to this, that dishonestly meant what it would mean to any one of the jurors in the course of their business. It was described by the law to be with the intention of causing wrongful loss done to one and wrongful gain to another; that was to say with the intention of taking what the person knew to belong to another than himself; the intention of taking from another what belonged to him. Dishonest intention involved a knowledge of the wrong which a person was doing; that he was taking what belonged to another person. That was all his Lordship need say with regard to the charges.

Then with regard to the evidence before them. It was of two kinds, oral and documentary—documents which actually passed between the persons concerned at the time the transaction was going on. Inasmuch as there was considerable controversy as to the right to be attached to them, his Lordship thought he would help them best if he went through them shortly. He was not going to read to them any portion of the documents, and it was for that reason that he did not ask the officer of the Court to hand to them any of any documents. He would deal with them in this way. Points of minor importance he would merely summarise; documents of real importance he would ask them to consider the

First, there was a group of oral evidence, of Mr. Jacob and Mr. and Mrs. Abid and others. It showed that great weight was attached by Mr. Jacob to Mr. Abid's influence in securing access to the Nizam. In one instance it did shew that Abid gave instructions to Mr. Jacob to make purchases for which Mr. Abid said he had no authority from the Nizam, and that shewed the strength of Mr. Abid's position in the household of the Nizam. Just before Mr. Abid went to Persia in the end of 1890, Mr. Jacob wrote asking him who would attend to his business and requested that it should not be a Christian, and according Mahaboob Yar Jung, an aide-de-camp, was nominated by Mr. Abid. The letters began with the letter of the 13th January, just at the time when Mr. Abid came back from Persia, stating that he wanted to show him a model of the diamond. It was necessary to tell them that Mr. Jacob went down to Bombay, where Mr. Abid was, and there he made over to him a history of the diamond, a document apparently drawn up by the vendors of the diamond or some one in their interest; it praised it very highly and stated that its value was estimated at £800,000, upon which was founded the statement made to the Nizam that it was worth one crore and 20 lacs, which would not be very short of £800,000. Then Mr. Jacob appeared to have gone away to Calcutta, because he was telegraphed for by Mr. Abid on the 31st February to come to Hyderabad, and that the Nizam would pay his expenses. The first of the important letters and telegrams passed about that time, and then the first and all-important interview took place between Mr. Jacob and the Nizam, and it was a matter of much controversy as to what passed on that occasion. Was it only a bargain that the diamond was to be purchased passand or was there that arrangement for an express trust of the 23 lacs to be held in the Bank in Mr. Jacob's name until the diamond was approved. The first of those letters said that Mr. Abid must ask H. H. to return the model, because the moment he (Mr. Jacob) arrived in Calcutta he must return the model or pay for it. Then there was a letter in March which really related not to the diamond but to the price of other goods sold to the Nizam by Mr. Jacob. Then Mr. Jacob seemed to have left Hyderabad, and he telegraphed on the 4th April from Delhi to Mr. Abid at Hyderabad: "Large diamond bought; owner wants half the money deposited in Bank before sending it" and if not approved must forfeit £2,000. But in considering the truth of the bargain about the 23 lacs which was to stand in Jacob's name in the Bank till passand or na passand, the jury must pay attention to these words as to the deposit of the money. Mr. Abid telegraphs: "it is not easy to deposit so large a sum at once," and the answer is "You misunderstood; not at once, but in 3 months by the end of June." Then there was a letter from Mr. Abid to Mr. Jacob, which was only important in this way. Mr. Jacob said in one of his letters that there was a bargain or proposal by him to Mr. Abid about partnership. Mr. Abid said there was none, but this letter of 21st April confirmed Mr. Jacob's statement in some manner. Then there was a telegram of 23rd April from Mr. Abid to Mr. Jacob "Nizam read your telegram, please settle about diamond." Next was Mr. Jacob's letter to Mr. Abid of 24th April which showed that there was some proposal about partnership and sharing of profits. The next letter of importance was the long letter of 24th May from Mr. Jacob to Mr. Abid (letter read.) That letter Mr. Abid said was placed by him before the Nizam. It was for the jury to say whether it was consistent with the story that the arrangement was simply a contract for the sale of the diamond with the understanding that the money was to be paid back by Mr. Jacob in case the Nizam disapproved of the diamond; or whether the contract was that the 23 lacs were to be kept by Mr. Jacob specifically in the Bank in his own name, and not to be paid to any body. That certainly seemed to be the first statement made by Mr. Jacob that he wanted the 23 lacs to get the diamond by paying it to the owner to induce them to part with it. Next came the information that the diamond had left London and Mr. Jacob sent word to the Nizam of it. Then came the very important letter of 8th June from Simla, from Mr. Jacob, to Mr. Abid, (letter read) in which he said he wanted the 23 lacs to enable him to get the diamond and take it to Hyderabad. And this was the arrangement which was made as he said, that this 23 lacs was to be half the price and the other half he would take after delivering the diamond to His Highness.

In that letter there was one of the many points in regard to which it was said that Mr. Jacob had considerably transgressed the truth. He could not himself say anything for such a statement as that. It was for the Jury to consider whether these statements were of such a character as to enable them to come to the conclusion that Mr. Jacob was acting dishonestly when he dealt with the money, supposing that they found that there had been trust and that criminal breach of trust had been committed in respect of it. The answer to that letter was by the telegram—"Your letter received, will translate in Persian and place before his Highness." His Lordship did not think the Jury would find any other letter or telegram purporting to be an answer to that letter. Then there followed a number of letters and telegrams which though important in themselves were not of serious importance to the case. Then there was that telegram of the 24th which says, "Diamond received, inform his Highness."
